II. Jeter was a party to the suit determined by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, and it forms res judicata.

'Tis true he was not a party by name, but the opinion of the Supreme Court is explicit, that Mrs. Ford's action as executrix was for the use of Jeter.

Having once litigated his rights through all the courts of Louisiana, the plaintiff cannot renew the contest in the federal courts. The exceptio rei adjudicatæ, is a complete bar to his suit.

III. The monition proceedings and judgment on them, are in the nature of proceedings in rem, and bind all the world, even those ignorant of their pendency—a fortiori, do they bind one who, like Jeter, was not only conusant, but was active in opposition.

The Monition Law of Louisiana (Acts 1834, p. 125; Rev. Stat., 1852, p. 425) is a wise and beneficial statute, and should be liberally construed. It was passed for the protection of innocent purchasers at sheriffs' sales, and by the 4th section, the court that issued the process had jurisdiction.

By the 6th section, the judgment is conclusive evidence that the proceedings of the court on the monition were regular; and by the 7th section, the judgment of the court confirming the sale, operated as res judicata and a complete bar against all persons, whether of age or minors, whether present or absent.

There is nothing in the 8th section which can release the plaintiff from the effect of this estoppel, because "notices of the sale and appraisement were served by the sheriff by leaving them on the plantation with the overseer, and plaintiff had notice of the sale, and was present at it, and bid for the property."

Besides, plaintiff was in the place and stead of Ford, and Ford had confessed judgment in the original mortgage, and thereby waived citation to make defense.

When a mortgage is granted with confession of judgment, executory process issues at once without citation (Code Practice, 734), and is in the nature of the fi. fa. that is issued on such judgments as are confessed in court.

IV. Jeter's presence at the sale, his bidding, his failure to notify other bidders of any opposition to the sale, form a complete estoppel en pais, as well under the principles of equity jurisprudence, as by the settled rules of the law of Louisiana.

Harris v. Denison, 8 La., 543; Dozer v. Squires, 13 La., 130; Walker v. Allen, 19 La., 308; McMasters v. Commissioners, 1 La. Ann., 11; Muir, Syndic, v. Henry, 2 La. Ann., 593; Moore v. Lambeth, 5 La. Ann., 67; Bk. La. v. Ford, 9 La. Ann., 299.

V. Both Mrs. Ford and Jeter were parties to a deed, by which, in consideration of $2,000, they ratified the title of the purchasers.

This deed was passed on the 11th of April, 1851. It had reference to the property now in dispute.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff commenced this suit to recover a plantation and slaves, with the horses, mules, implements, and other things enumerated in the petition destined to the use and convenience of the plantation, and for an account of rents and issues for a term of years. He deduces his title from Christopher Ford, who was in possession of the plantation at his death, in 1849, through a conveyance from Louisa W. Ford, the widow, executrix, and instituted heir of her deceased husband, dated in November, 1850.

The defendants show, that in November, 1845, two banking corporations of Louisiana (Bank of Louisiana and New Orleans Canal and Banking Company) sold to Christopher Ford this plantation and twenty eight slaves, for the price of $40,000, a portion of which was paid in cash, and for the remainder a credit was given, and that Ford mortgaged the property conveyed to him, and sixty-eight other slaves, which he agreed to place on the plantation. On the same day, he obtained from the Bank of Louisiana a loan of money, which was secured by another mortgage on the same property. At the time of the death of Ford, he was in arrears for the debt and interest that had accrued.

In the mortgage to the Bank of Louisiana, Ford agrees not to alienate, deteriorate, or incumber, the property mortgaged, and confesses judgment for the sum of money to be paid. He renounces the benefit of the laws that require property seized on execution to be sold on credit or after appraisement, and agrees, that if the debt shall not be paid according to the tenor of the mortgage, then the banking company may obtain an order of seizure and sale, and sell the mortgaged premises and slaves by public auction, for cash, after an advertisement of thirty days. He waives his privilege to be sued in any other district than the first judicial district of the State, and agrees that process may issue from the district court for the first district, or any other court in New Orleans having jurisdiction.

The charter or the bank provides, that upon all mortgages executed under the Act, the bank shall have the right to seize the property mortgaged, in whatever hands it may be, in the same manner and with the same facilities that it could be seized in the hands of the mortgagor, notwithstanding any sale or change of the title or possession thereof, by descent or otherwise.

On the 16th December, 1850, after the conveyance of Mrs. Ford to the plaintiff, the Bank of Louisiana instituted a suit upon the second mortgage above mentioned; a writ of seizure and sale issued, and the property was advertised for sale the 1st February, 1851. Jeter was present at the sale that took place on that day, bid for the property the sum of $70,000, and it was adjudicated to him at that price. He offered a draft for the amount of the execution, on merchants residing in New Orleans, and asked for time to go for the money; and these being refused, the property was again offered for sale, and purchased by Heron & Hewitt for the price of $66,000; and thereupon the sheriff executed a deed to the purchasers, conformably to the adjudication.

This sum being insufficient to discharge the incumbrances on the property, proceedings were taken for the seizure and sale of other slaves, which were sold in September, 1851, and adjudicated to the defendants.

The defendants resist the claim of the plaintiff under these titles. The plaintiff objects to them—

1st. That Ford, the mortgagor, was dead at the commencement of these proceedings, and that the notice issued to him was nugatory; that his heir and executrix was not notified at all, and did not reside in the Parish of Ascension, nor have any title to the plantation at which the notices of the seizure were left; and that the plaintiff is not concluded by his presence at the sale and bid for the property, having forbade the sale before the offer, at which the defendants became the purchasers, was made.

2d. That the sale was irregular and illegal, in respect of the notice of the seizure, the advertisements, appraisement, and refusal to allow the plaintiff time to complete his purchase.

3d. That the fifth district court was not authorized to entertain a suit for a thing in the Parish of Ascension; and that, if consent could give jurisdiction, the consent given by Ford in his mortgage was personal, and binding only in respect to his own privilege, and did not affect his heir or her assignee.

The purchasers, Heron & Hewitt, in April, 1852, applied to the District Court of New Orleans, under a statute of Louisiana, for a monition, citing all persons who can set up any right to the property adjudicated, in consequence of any informality in the order, decree or judgment of the court, under which the sale was made, or any irregularity or illegality in the appraisements and advertisements, in time or manner of sale, or for any other defect whatsoever, to show cause why the sale so made should not be confirmed and homologated, and, after due proceedings in the premises, that the said sales be confirmed, homologated, and made the final judgment of the court.

The executrix (Louisa W. Ford) appeared to this monition, and made opposition to the homologation of the sale, and disclosed at large the objections above specified, and prayed that the sale be declared null and void, and that the property might be restored to her possession.

To this opposition Heron & Hewitt replied, that they were bona fide purchasers at a public sale by the Sheriff of Ascension, under a writ from the court, without any knowledge of neglect, or illegality, or want of jurisdiction; that the opponent had sold her interest in the property, and was estopped to oppose the sale by her acts. They pleaded that the mortgage contained a confession of judgment, and no notice was necessary to anyone to obtain a judgment; and assert there is no just cause to deny the homologation of the sales.

The district court, at the November Term, 1852, entered an order describing the property embraced in the sheriff's deed, and reciting the facts relative to the grant of the monition, and the motion for the homologation of the sale, and conclude:

"The court being satisfied, from inspection of the record and evidence adduced, that all the formalities of the law have been complied with; that the advertisements required have been inserted and published for the space of time and in the manner required by law; that the property has been correctly described, and the price at which it was purchased truly stated; and there being but one opposition filed thereto, to wit: by Mrs. Christopher Ford, it is adjudged and decreed that said sheriff's sale be confirmed and homologated according to law, in so far as the same has not been opposed."

The cause was continued in the district court, upon the opposition proceedings of Mrs. Ford.

In June, 1853, the district court rendered the judgment upon this opposition, that the sale was null and void, for the reasons pleaded, and condemned the petitioners (Hewitt & Heron) to costs. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Louisiana. That court rendered its judgment in 1854.

The court say: the appellants are bona fide purchasers at a judicial sale of the plantation and slaves, at the instance of a mortgage creditor, at a far price, which has been paid, and possession taken, and improvements made. That, as executrix, Mrs. Ford had done nothing, except to obtain probate of the will, and as heir she has sold her interest to Jeter in the estate, he covenanting to pay the debts, and that she gave him a power to sell and administer the estate. That Jeter had failed to comply with his bid at the sheriff's sale, and that then the appellants had become the purchasers, settled with mortgage creditors, and took possession. "Under these circumstances," the court conclude, "we think it inequitable to permit this sale to be questioned by the executrix, whom we consider as merely attempting to aid Jeter, her vendee and agent, in a speculation, at the expense of these bona fide purchasers, under the guise of representing a small minority of the creditors, whom she, personally, and Jeter are bound to pay. It is obvious, under the facts above stated, that neither of them, Jeter and Mrs. Ford, would be permitted personally to question the sale, on account of the alleged informalities." And thereupon the decree of the district court was reversed, and the opposition dismissed, reserving to the creditors their right, if any, to sue for a rescission of the sale. Bank of Louisiana v. Ford, 9 La. Ann., 299.

The effect of the judgment confirming and homologating the sale is declared in the statute that authorizes the monition to issue, in favor of purchasers of property "at sheriff's sales," at those "made by the syndics of insolvents' estates," at those "made by the authority of justice," or of courts, and to enable them "to protect themselves from eviction from the property so purchased," and "from any responsibility to the possessors of the same." It confers upon the order made by the court upon the monition, "the authority of res judicata," so as to operate "as a complete bar against all persons, whether of age or minors, whether present or absent, who may thereafter claim the property so sold, in consequence of all illegality or informality in the proceedings, whether before or after judgment;" and the judgment of homologation is to be received and considered "as full and conclusive proof that the sale was duly made according to law, in virtue of a judgment or order legally and regularly pronounced on the interest of the parties duly represented," saving and excepting, "that it shall not render a sale valid made in virtue of a judgment, when the party cast was not duly cited to make defense."

The judgment of the district court homologating the sale concluded all parties except Mrs. Ford, who had filed opposition to the order. Subsequently the Supreme Court overruled her opposition, assigning as the reason that the sale was fair, the purchasers bona fide, and the opponent had no interest in the subject of contest. The plaintiff, whether we consider him as acting independently or in connection with Mrs. Ford, and under the "guise of her name" and character, is affected by these orders.

By the very terms of the statute, all the objections that apply to the manner of conducting the sale and to the form of the judgment are cut off by the judgment of homologation.

The only question that the judgment leaves open is, whether the court that rendered the original judgment had jurisdiction of the person. But this question was presented to the district court and the Supreme Court upon the opposition of Mrs. Ford, in the same manner in which it is presented to this court. The facts of the death of Ford, the probate of his will in the Parish of Ascension before the order of seizure, the seizure within three days from the date of the order, the notice directed to Ford, and left at the house of the overseer, in the absence of Mrs. Ford, and after her sale to Jeter; the presence of Jeter at the sale, the adjudication to him of the property upon his bid, and the resale upon his neglect to comply with the terms of the sale, and the purchase by Heron & Hewitt, with the sheriff's deeds to him, were presented to those courts upon the evidence that has been submitted to this court.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Louisiana was, that as executrix, Mrs. Ford did not really and truly represent the interest of the creditors of her husband in her opposition, and that she used that title to protect her own interest and that of Jeter, her agent and vendee —but that they would not be permitted "personally to question the sale, on the score of the alleged irregularities."

The authority of res judicata as a medium of proof is acknowledged in the Civil Code of Louisiana; and its precise effect in the particular case under consideration is ascertained in the statute that allows the proceeding by monition. Under the system of that State, the maintenance of public order, the repose of society, and the quiet of families, require that what has been definitely determined by competent tribunals shall be accepted as irrefragable legal truth. So deeply is this principle implanted in her jurisprudence, that commentators upon it have said, the res judicata renders white that which is black, and straight that which is crooked. Facit excurvo rectum, ex albo nigrum. No other evidence can afford strength to the presumption of truth it creates, and no argument can detract from its legal efficacy.

The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, in cases like the present, is derived exclusively from the fact that the parties are citizens of different States. The rights of these parties originate in the law of Louisiana, and must be ascertained by a reference to the principles adopted and administered by her constituted authorities. We are not invested with power to review the sentences of her courts, except in a few cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States; nor is it our province to augment or diminish their value, or to place any different estimate upon them than they have in the municipal code of the State. They are entitled to the same force and effect here as they have in Louisiana.

The statement of the case of these parties shows conclusively that the whole subject of this controversy has been legally submitted to the tribunals of Louisiana, and that the adjudication was in favor of the defendants.

This was the decision of the Circuit Court of the United States in Louisiana, from whose judgment this writ of error has been taken. It remains for us only to affirm that judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

THE KNOX INSURANCE COMPANY, LEVI SPARKS ET AL.,

(See S. C., 22 How., 380-392)

Stockholders of insurance companies—when liable to creditors—continuing to act after knowledge of fraud, waives it—cannot avoid payment, because other stockholders not sued.

Where a number of special partners are incorporated to carry on the business of insurance, the stock subscribed and owned by the several stockholders or partners, constitutes the capital or fund publicly pledged to all who deal with them.

Where an insurance company did not require their stockholders to pay in cash more than ten per cent. of their several shares, but they were allowed to retain the remaining ninety per cent. in their own possession, substituting therefor other securities, the ninety per cent. retained by the stockholders is as much a part of the capital pledged as the cash actually paid in.

When that portion of the capital represented by these securities is required, to pay the creditors of the company, the stockholders cannot be allowed to refuse the payment of them, unless they show such an equity as would entitle them to a preference over the creditors, if the capital had been paid in cash.

Those who seek to set aside their solemn written contracts, by proving loose conversations, should be held to make out a very clear case.

When they charge others with fraud, founded on such evidence, their own conduct and acts should be consistent with such a hypothesis.

Stockholders cannot repudiate their contracts on the allegation of fraud, if, after having a full prior opportunity to examine for themselves into the affairs of the company, they alleged no fraud, nor expressed any desire to withdraw their subscriptions.

After they have a full opportunity to know the situation of the company, its funds and its property, and they organize a branch of the corporation which continues to meet, till a succession of losses make it apparent that the capital of the company will be nearly all required to pay for the losses incurred, when the directors conclude to consider themselves defrauded, and withdraw their capital from the company; held, that this discovery was made too late, and that a court of equity cannot receive such a pretense as a valid defense against the creditors of the corporation.

The objection made to the bill, of want of proper parties, is equally untenable.

If a stockholder is bound to pay his debt to the corporation, in order to satisfy its creditors, he cannot defend himself by pleading that the complainants might have got their satisfaction out of another stockholder quite as well.

If the debts attached are sufficient to pay their demands, the creditors need look no further.

Argued Feb. 16, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellants, who are judgment creditors of the Knox Insurance Company, against said Insurance Company and numerous of its stockholders.

The court below having entered a decree dismissing the bill, the complainants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. H. Gillet and S. Judah, for appellants:

1. Exceptions to the answer of Cullum, which was admitted by the other defendants, were well taken and should have been allowed. The bill stated numerous facts distinctly, and by interrogatories called upon the defendants for explicit answers, which they did not give. Among other questions, they were asked if they subscribed for and took stock in the Company. Instead of stating they did or did not, they state facts, and say they did not unless those facts amounted to a subscription.

2. The witnesses, Cullum, Savitz and Schwartz, were parties to the record and interested, and their depositions must be suppressed.

Ch., 612; Lingan v. Henderson, 1 Bland's Ch., 266; Barrett v. Gore, 3 Atk., 402; Dixon v. Parker, 2 Ves., 219; Clark v. Van Reimsdyk, 9 Cranch, 153; De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat., 367; Scott v. Lloyd, 12 Pet., 145; Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet., 209, 219; Bridges v. Armour, 5 How., 91, 95.

3. Where one of two innocent parties must suffer by a fraud, the one who had full opportunities to inquire into the facts and protect himself, must suffer instead of him who had no such opportunity.

In the present case, those called upon to subscribe for the stock, if they had chosen so to do, might have ascertained the amount of stock previously subscribed, and the amount of eastern exchange on hand owned by the Company.

4. The subscriptions and obligations of the defendants are not void or voidable, even if it shall be admitted that the facts set up in their answers are true.

The defendants do not aver that the Company authorized the false representations complained of, or that that they approved of them after they were made. Nor do they aver that they repudiated the transaction as soon as they learned the true state of things. Nor do they state that they offered to restore things to their original condition. They set up that on the 25th of June, 1851, more than a year afterwards, they would have nothing more to do with the Company, nor would they pay their notes or bills. This was about a year after they knew of the heavy losses. In order to defeat their liability, they must connect the Company with the fraud alleged.

"It (a corporation) is not, however, responsible for unauthorized or unlawful acts, even of its officers, though done colore officii."

Ang. & A., pp. 250, 251; Thayer v. Boston, 19 Pick., 516, 517.

5. The fact that from May, when the true amount of the Vincennes stock must have been known by the Jeffersonville stockholders, to the middle of August, no complaint was made on that account, is conclusive evidence that the defendants did not consider themselves injured by that fact.

6. The objection, in May, by the Jeffersonville stockholders, to an increase of the Vincennes stock before the dividend expected in July, is conclusive that they were not decieved or dissatisfied with the amount subscribed at that place. They were satisfied then, and are bound to be so now.

7. The fact that no complaint was made concerning the quantity of stock subscribed at Vincennes, until after the Jeffersonville stockholders were called upon to pay the $50,000 loss at Owensburg, it is conclusive evidence that it was the losses, and not the limited amount of stock taken at the former place, that occasioned the dissatisfaction.

8. If a fraud had not in fact been committed, it was the duty of the party promptly and distinctly to repudiate and rescind it, and restore things to their original condition. In the present case, the subscribers waived the right to rescind, if they ever had the right, and could not afterward resume it, especially to the injury of innocent third persons or creditors.

See Mason v. Bovet, 1 Den., 69; 2 Pars. Cont., 278, 279; Wheaton v. Baker, 14 Barb., 594; Munn v. Worrall, 16 Barb., 221.

The defendants did not conform to the rules laid down in these authorities.

9. The meeting and action of the Jeffersonville Board from May to August, after they knew the true state of the subscriptions, is conclusive evidence that they ratified and approved their subscriptions and obligations, and they are estopped from disputing either.

10. No fraud committed by the members of a corporation upon one another, can impair their respective liabilities or that of the company, so far as third parties, doing business with said corporation and trusting it, are concerned.

As to the alleged misrepresentations, the rules concerning such representations are:

1st. The fact represented must be material.

2 Pars. Cont., 266, 267.

2d. It must appear that the defendants did rely, and had the right to rely, on the representations.

2 Pars. Cont., 270.

3d. The representations must be contemporaneous.

Story, Agency, sec. 137.

4th. It must be in the peculiar knowledge of the party.

But admitting the charge of fraud to be proven, and that defendants relied on the representations, the defendants cannot protect themselves by it. It is too late.

2 Pars. Cont., 278; Masson v. Bovet, 1 Den., 69; 2 Pars. Cont., 278, note S; Wheaton v. Baker, 14 Barb., 594; Munn v. Worrall, 16 Barb., 221.

12. If these defendants might set up this fraud against the Company or their co-stockholders, they cannot set it up against the creditors of the Company. When one of the two innocent parties must suffer by the fraud of a third party, he of the two who afforded the means or gave the credit, must bear the loss.

13. It is a rule, that when a man votes at a corporate election or acts as an officer of a corporation, he is estopped to deny the validity of the organization, or of his subscription.

Ang. & Ames, Corp., sec. 532, p. 518.

Mr. R. Crawford, for appellees:

1. The plaintiff's exceptions to the answers to the interrogatories, are not well taken.

Whether the Insurance Company had been organized or not, and had authority to receive subscriptions, involved matter of law as well as of fact.

2. The defendants were not stockholders of the Insurance Company. They did not subscribe to the capital stock, as alleged in the complaint. The charter of the Insurance Company is a public act, and this court will notice it.

The 8th section provides that books for the subscription of the capital stock should be opened at Vincennes, and it should be lawful for any person to subscribe for any number of shares. To become a subscriber, required the writing of the name to such a book, or to some paper, which expressed in substance that the party agreed to take a given number of shares of stock.

Giving their notes and bills did not make them subscribers or stockholders.

The notes and bills were without consideration, and cannot be enforced. There was no mutuality.

Lees v. Whitcomb, 5 Bing., 34; Sykes v. Dixon, 9 A. & E., 693.

The defendants never afterwards became stockholders, by accepting certificates of stock.

14 N. Y., 533; 18 Barb., 152.

The defendants never did any acts which estopped them to deny that they were stockholders. They never voted as such, or did any corporate act, or in any way whatever held themselves out to the world as stockholders.

3. The notes and bills described in the complaint were obtained from the defendants by fraud of the Insurance Company's agent, and were repudiated by them as soon as they were informed of the fraud.

The evidence upon this point, the depositions of Cullum, Schwartz, and Savitz, is objected to on the ground that the witnesses were parties to the suit, and that they were interested.

It is a familiar and unquestioned rule in the books of practice and of evidence, that one defendant in chancery may be examined by a co-defendant, if not interested in favor of the latter.

The plaintiffs have objected that if Carnan did practice this fraud upon the defendants, it was his own wrong only; the Insurance Company did not authorize it, nor ought it to be affected by it. It is true it had the alternative to reject or adopt the unauthorized acts of its agent. If il had rejected them, there would have been no contract between it and the defendants. But it chose to adopt them, and therefore it took them tainted as they were.

Chit. Cont., 679; 2 Pars. Cont., 276 and n. (a); 1 Story, Eq. Jur., sec. 256; Doggett v. Emerson, 3 Story, 735; Atwood v. Small, 6 Cl. & F., 448; Mason v. Crosby, 1 Wood. & M., 342; Jeffrey v. Bigelow., 13 Wend., 518; Swatara R. R. Co. v. Brune, 6 Gill, 41; Crump. v. U. S. Mining Co., 7 Gratt; 352.

It is also objected that these misrepresentations were not made at the time when the notes and bills were given, and therefore are not a good cause for avoiding them. As to some of the defendants, it appears expressly that they gave their notes at the time of the representations; but this is immaterial.

No man can publish a falsehood to-day, and to morrow contract with an innocent victim and hold him bound.

See Crocker v. Lewis, 3 Sumn., 8; Smith v. Babcock, 2 Wood. & M., 246; 8 Bing. N. C., 97; 26 Eng. L. & Eq., 129.

But the plaintiffs contend that if the fraud has been ever so strongly proved, and it has not been waived, and might be a good defense in a suit brought by the Insurance Company, yet it is no defense against them. They claim to have a peculiar equity.

Yet their complaint alleges that the defendants severally made the subscriptions, notes and bill stated in it, and the issue joined; and the very question, therefore, to be tried, is as to their validity. It follows that the plaintiffs must prove them to be valid and binding on the defendants, or they do not maintain the issue. If the transactions are void on account of fraud, then there is legally no subscription, note or bill.

In effect, the plaintiffs ask to be substituted in the place of the Insurance Company, and to be permitted to enforce the payment of debts which it has wrongfully neglected to enforce. If there is no valid debt due from any of the defendants to the Insurance Company, there is no matter alleged in the complaint on which the plaintiffs can recover. The plaintiffs can acquire no greater rights than it had, and where it had none, they acquire none.

Hyde v. Lynde, 4 N. Y., 387; in matter of Howe, 1 Paige, 125; Mech. Bank v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co., 13 N. Y., 599; Roberts v. Alb. & W. Stock R. R. Co., 25 Barb., 662.

4. There is an utter failure in the proof of the main corpus of the plaintiff's case. The complaint alleges that they were severally creditors of the Insurance Company, and had obtained judgment against it, and returns of "no property."

The answers deny all knowledge of the matters alleged, and the record contains no proof of them.

5. Necessary parties are wanting to the action. This objection was taken in all the answers.

In this kind of cases, each defaulting stockholder is liable pro rata only, with all the other defaulters, for his portion of the unpaid subscription which may be necessary to satisfy the plaintiff's debts and costs.

Mann v. Pentz, 3 N. Y., 415; Bank v. Iglehart, 6 McL., 568.

The decree must be several against the defendant for his separate liability; therefore, in order that the relative share each has to pay may be ascertained, all the defaulting stockholders must, as far as possible, be brought before the court.

3 Com., 415; 6 McL., 568; De Wolf v. Mallet, 2 J. J. Marsh., 401; Crease v. Babcock, 10 Met., 525; Caldwell v. Taggart, 4 Pet., 190.

Where the parties are so numerous as to render it very inconvenient, the court may allow the case to go on with only a part of them before it.

But this is an exception to the rule, and it is for the court and not the plaintiff's counsel, to decide whether persons proper to be made defendants are to be left ont under this exception; and, therefore, the reason must be stated why they are not made parties.

Martin v. McBride, 3 Ired. Ch., 531; Gilham v. Cairns, Breese, 124.

In the present case, the defendants are not very numerous, and nearly all of them are shown to be within the jurisdiction of the court, and no excuse is offered, except in one case, for not making all of them defendants.

M. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainants in this case are judgment creditors of the Knox Insurance Company. The numerous other defendants are stockholders of the Company, and are severally charged as debtors to it, for the unpaid portion of the stock subscribed by them.

The Company is insolvent, or at least is unable to pay its creditors, without calling in the capital subscribed and secured, but not actually paid in cash. This it has failed or refused to do. This bill is filed to compel these stockholders or debtors to the Corporation to pay the amount of their debts, in order that the creditors of the Company may obtain satisfaction.

The bill was taken pro confesso as against the Corporation. The other defendants, being corporators, are consequently concluded as to the averments of the bill affecting them as such. As stockholders who have not paid in the whole amount of the stock subscribed and owned by them, they stand in the relation of debtors to the Corporation for the several amounts due by each of them. As to them, this bill is in the nature of an attachment, in which they are called on to answer as garnishees of the principal debtor.

Where a number of special partners are incorporated to carry on the business of insurance, the stock subscribed and owned by the several stockholders or partners constitutes the capital or fund publicly pledged to all who deal with them. Insurance companies or corporations, unless they have the privilege of using their capital for banking purposes, seldom require the actual payment of it all in cash. Contracts of insurance or indemnity, though not literally "gaming contracts," are, nevertheless, in the nature of wagers against the happening of a certain event. The calculation of chances is greatly in favor of the insurer. In a large number of policies, it is but reasonable to expect that the amount of premiums will exceed that of the losses. The insured are thus made to pay one another, and with common good fortune afford an overplus to make a dividend for the insurers. Hence the Knox Insurance Company, like others of the same description, did not require their stockholders to pay in cash more than ten per cent. of their several shares. They were allowed to retain the remaining ninety per cent. in their own possession, substituting therefor their bonds, or other securities. Thus every stockholder became a borrower from, and debtor to, the capital stock of the Company. If in the course of events the chances were favorable, a dividend of twenty per cent. on capital would give a profit of two hundred on the money actually paid out by them. On the contrary, if they were adverse, the capital represented by securities must necessarily be paid in to satisfy the just debts of the Company.

The ninety per cent. retained by the stockholders is as much a part of the capital pledged as the cash actually paid in. When that portion of the capital represented by these securities is required to pay the creditors of the company, the stockholders cannot be allowed to refuse the payment of them, unless they show such an equity as would entitle them to a preference over the creditors, if the capital had been paid in cash.

Let us now examine their defense, and see if they have established such an equity.

They do not deny that they paid the ten per cent., gave their securities for the balance, and have received their certificates for their several shares af stock; but they contend that they are not bound to pay these securities, because the agent of the Corporation, who took the subscriptions of stock, made certain representation concerning the state of the affairs of the Corporation, which were not true; and as a consequence thereof, they are not bound to pay these securities.

The numerous defendants, with some immaterial variations and qualifications, adopt the answer of their co-defendant, Collum, which we shall give verbatim from the record, to show we have not misstated or mistaken the nature of the defense set up.

"And, by way of defense to said suit, s'd Collum alleges that just before he gave s'd note, accepted s'd first bill, Robert N. Carnan, an agent of said ins. company, came to Jeffersonville to procure persons there to give notes and bills for stock in s'd ins. company; and in order to induce said Collum to give his s'd note, and accept s'd first bill for such stock, s'd Carnan, as such agent, then and there falsely and fraudulently s'd and represented to s'd Collum, and in his hearing, that stock in s'd ins. company to the amount of seventy-five dollars had then been subscribed for at Vincennes, and on the Wabash river, and all of s'd amount had then been paid or secured as the charter of s'd insurance company required. S'd Collum did not then know, nor then have the means of knowing, to the contrary of s'd representations, and he fully believed them to be true, and with that belief he gave his s'd note, and accepted s'd two bills for stock in s'd ins. company; and if he had not fully believed s'd representations he would not have given said note nor accepted s'd bills, or either of them. At the time s'd representations were so made, and s'd given and s'd first bills accepted, there had not been more than twenty-five thousand dollars of stock in s'd ins. company subscribed for and paid and secured, as s'd charter required, at Vincennes, on the Wabash river, which said Carnan then well knew. Said Carnan also, at and just before s'd Collum made his s'd note and accepted his s'd first bill, represented to him that s'd ins. company then had $40,000 of funds on hand, mostly in Eastern exchange, which they could not dispose of at Vincennes, and they wished to get stockholders at Jeffersonville, so as to have an officer of s'd insurance company there, and they would then send those funds there to be sold and used. Said Collum did not then know, and had no means of knowing, to the contrary of s'd representation, but he believed it, and it was a strong inducement with him to make his s'd note and accept his s'd bills; yet he is now informed and believes said representation was grossly false, and that s'd ins. company did not at that time have, and had not at any time, had that sum or anything like that sum of money on hand, and mostly in Eastern exchange, which they could not dispose of at Vincennes."

Carnan, who was examined as a witness, denies the charges made in this answer, and declares that he was not authorized by the Company to make such representations, and did not make them.

To establish their defense, several of the defendants themselves were called as witnesses, alleging that, as their responsibility was several, and not joint, each one may be called as a witness for all the rest. Much of the argument of this case has been expended on the question of the competency of these witnesses to testify in their own case; but we do not think it necessary to decide it, as there are other facts in the case which show clearly that the matter pleaded cannot affect the relative rights of the parties in the case, assuming it to be true.

Those who seek to set aside their solemn written contracts, by proving loose conversations, should be held to make out a very clear case; and when they charge others with fraud, founded on such evidence, their own conduct and acts (which speak louder than words) should be consistent with such a hypothesis. Assuming the fact that Carnan did make the representations charged, what was the conduct of these Jeffersonville stockholders, who now seek to repudiate their contracts on the allegation of fraud? After having a full opportunity to examine for themselves into the affairs of the Company, they alleged no fraud, nor expressed any desire to withdraw their subscriptions; on the contrary, when fully informed that the amount of stock subscribed at Vin cennes did not equal that taken at Jeffersonville, and when an offer was made to increase the Vincennes subscriptions, so as to equal those at Jeffersonville, the defendants and those who acted with them objected, and insisted that the lower the amount of stock the higher would be the dividend, and consequently it had better not be increased till after the first dividend of twenty-five per cent. had been made.

2. After the defendants had a full opportunity to know the situation of the Company, its funds and its property, they organized at Jeffersonville a branch of the Corporation, having resident directors at that place. This Board met from time to time, through the months of April, May, June, July, and up to 13th August, 1850. While there was a prospect of a dividend of 250 per cent. on the amount of cash paid in, their eyes were shut to the deceit supposed to have been practiced on them. In the month of May, a fire at Owensville, Kentucky, was reported, in which the Company lost about $50,000. This seemed to injure the prospect of the large dividend; yet even then it was not so clearly perceived that the defendants were defrauded.

The directors at Jeffersonville, who represented their interests, continued to meet till the middle of August, and till a succession of losses made it apparent that the capital of the company would be nearly all required to pay for the losses incurred. When these facts became patent, the directors at Jeffersonville, at their last meeting in August, "After taking time to consider what was best to be done," concluded to consider themselves defrauded and withdraw their capital from the Company.

We need not cite authorities to show that this discovery was made too late, and that a court of equity cannot receive such a pretence as a valid defense against the creditors of this Corporation.

II. The objection made to the bill, for want of proper parties, is equally untenable. The creditors of the Corporation are seeking satisfaction out of the assets of the Company to which the defendants are debtors. If the debts attached are sufficient to pay their demands, the creditors need look no further. They are not bound to settle up all the affairs of this Corporation, and the equities between its various stockholders or partners, corporators or debtors. If A is bound to pay his debt to the Corporation, in order to satisfy its creditors, he cannot defend himself by pleading that these complainants might have got their satisfaction out of B quite as well. It is true, if it be necessary to a complete satisfaction to the complainants, that the Corporation be treated as an insolvent, the court may appoint a receiver, with authority to collect and receive all the debts due to the Company, and administer all its assets. In this way, all the other stockholders or debtors may be made to contribute.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court should be reversed, with costs, and that the record be remanded, with instructions to that court to enter a decree for the complainants against the respondents severally, for such amount as it shall appear was due and unpaid by each of them on their shares of the capital stock of the Knox Insurance Company, and to have such other and further proceedings as to justice and right may appertain.

THE UNITED STATES, Appts.,

v.

HENRY F. TESCHMAKER, JOSEPH P. THOMPSON, GEORGE H. HOWARD, AND JULIUS K. ROSE.

(See S. C., 22 How., 392-406.)

Record evidence of Mexican grant should be produced, or its absence accounted for—occupation, next best evidence—antedating grant.

Raising cattle and other stock, furnishes very unsatisfactory evidence of possession and cultivation of the land, in the sense of the colonization laws of Mexico.

The non-production of record evidence of Mexican title, excites suspicions as to its validity, and throws upon the claimant the burden of producing the fullest proof of which the party is capable, of the genuineness of the grant.

Record evidence should be produced, or its absence accounted for to the satisfaction of the court.

The genuineness of the official signatures to the paper title alone, can never be regarded as satisfactory.

The record proof is, generally speaking, the highest. Possession and occupation of some duration, permanency, and value, are next entitled to weight.

At least, satisfactory evidence should be required, to make the antedating of Mexican grant irreconcilable with the proof; otherwise, there can be no protection against imposition and fraud in these cases.

Argued Jan. 27, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellants:

The grant, if made at all, was made without any previous petition, investigation, reference or report; no map; no order of concession; no registry. Arce's certificate (or the certificate with his name to it), that note had been taken of this title in the proper book, is false. The proper book is here, and it contains no such thing. There is not a vestige or trace of this title, or anything like it, to be found among all the records of the department. The title was never produced, nor its existence publicly asserted in any way whatever, before the 25th August, 1852, when the deed from Salvador Vallejo to the claimant was acknowleged before a notary. The deed from Juan to Salvador Vallejo is dated Dec. 30, 1849, but it is not acknowledged or recorded; nor does it appear ever to have been seen by anybody but the parties.

Salvador Vallejo and Carillo, their brother-in-law, swear that there was a sort of possession from 1842 or 1843, with some improvements which the former witness says cost a great deal of meat and spunk. But they do not say, and there is no reason to believe, that the title now set up was exhibited, or the land claimed under it. Juan Castenada says the possession was not taken until after the grant in 1844 or 1845.

1. The grant is illegal for want of a petition, map, inquiry, &c.

2. It is not proved, because a grant produced from the private custody of the claimant, without any record of it among the archives, is no grant at all.

3. It is false, forged, fabricated.

If it had been really made by the Government at the time it bears date, why was it not recorded? Why was the false note of Arce placed at the foot of it?

The bad character of the Vallejos, as well as of their principle witnesses, renders it extremely probable that all the papers, including the petition for license to occupy, the license itself, and the pretended grant from the Governor, are sheer fabrications, fraudulently got up long after the change of government.

The chief of the Vallejos (General Mariano) was a professional witness, until his credit run down so low that he was no longer worth calling In the case of Luco v. The United States, 64 U. S. (23 How.), 515, it was proved that he had forged a grant, and the claim under it was rejected on that ground alone.

Juan Castenada is a well known professional witness. So is Francisco Arce, who falsely certifies that this grant was recorded in the proper book.

The grant is dated in September, 1844. That was the very time at which the Vallejos were banding themselves and their followers against Micheltorena, to drive him from the country, and he knew it. It is not probable that he was making grants of valuable lands to them at such a time.

Mr. R. H. Gillet, for appellees:

Material facts established by the evidence in the record:

First. The grant was made by Governor Micheltorena to Salvador and Juan A. Vallejo, Sept. 5, 1844, for the premises in question.

Second. The grantees settled upon and occupied the land granted.

[Counsel reviewed the evidence in the case on this point, and referred to the following cases: Vaca 59 U. S. (18 How.), 556; Sutherland, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 363; Frémont, 58 U S. (17 How.), 542; and said these three cases must be overruled or the present grant must be confirmed.]

Third. Judicial possession was not given, because the magistrate applied to was afraid of the Indians.

Fourth. The United States offered no evidence in this case on any point, by way of contradiction, or explanation, or otherwise; but left that of the claimants wholly unquestioned.

Sixth. No objection was raised before the board, except that the conditions subsequent had not been performed, and that the localities and boundaries were not given with sufficient definiteness, and these were removed by testimony taken in the district court.

But two questions were presented to the district court, and they were questions of fact upon which the claimants made full proof, and the United States offered no evidence at all.

Argument.

1. No additional evidence can be introduced on an appeal to this court except in admiralty cases.

9 U. S. L., 633; 1 U. S. L., 84; 2 U. S. L., 244; 61 U. S. (20 How.), 261.

2. No question can be be raised and decided on appeal which was not raised below.

3. When an equitable right is once vested under a grant by a governor, it cannot be devested, except by the action of the government upon a denouncement by a third person.

Frémont's case 58 U. S. (17 How.), 567; Reading's case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 6.

4. Confirmation by the Departmental Assembly is not necessary, in order to confirm a California grant made by a governor.

It was the duty of the governor and not of the grantee, to present it for confirmation.

See Frémont v. U. S., 58 U. S. (17 How.), 542, 563; Cruz Cervantes' case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 553; Larkin's case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 562; Reading's case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 7.

5. When an officer of the Mexican Government, having the power to make grants, exercises that power so as to create the reasonable belief in the mind of the grantee that he received the valid grant, and he takes possession under it, such grant, whether made after compliance with all legal formalities or not confers an equitable right, which this court is bound to confirm.

U. S. v. Sutter, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 178.

6. By the laws, usages and customs of Mexico, a grant is valid, whether the preliminary formalities were observed or not.

The Act of 1851 (9 U S. L., 633, sec. 1), under which these proceedings were had, provides that the Board and ports shall be "governed by the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo and the law of nations, the laws, usages and customs of the government from which the claim is derived, the principles of equity and the decisions of the Supreme Court, as far as they are applicable."

The grantees' rights are the same under the treaty and the laws of nations. Whatever rights they had, whether perfect or imperfect, full and complete or otherwise, are protected under both.

In equity, all rights, whether legal and perfect or equitable and imperfect, are protected and can be enforced. Congress declared that those having rights of any kind, should have all the advantages that a court of equity could decree them. The rules applied in equity cases should apply in these. It is a well settled rule, that a court of equity cannot apply its power to confirm or enforce a forfeiture, while there is another which requires it to exert them whenever practicable, to prevent forfeitures, and to set them aside, and to relieve against them in all proper cases.

In these land cases, except where the title is a strictly legal one, the whole case is an equitable one, and the court deals exclusively in equitable principles and enforces them.

The claimant shows that he has received some sort of title under the government, and calls upon the court, under the Law of 1851, to confirm it. Here he is met by claim of forfeiture, and in the exercise of equity powers, the court is requested to enforce it. The law is too well settled that this cannot be done, to require the citation of authorities.

In the present case, the grant cannot be questioned. But it is objected there were formalities usually observed, which were omitted. If these were required by positive law to confer a legal title, they are not required to create an eqitable one.

No one will contend that an equitable right is invalid, because it was not acquired in the same manner that is required to vest legal rights; because if that were so, an equitable right could not be acquired at all, for all rights would then be legal rights. The very object of a court of equity is, to relieve in those cases which are defective under the strict rules of law.

Mexico did not sell her lands.

She gave them away to have them used, and they were principally used for raising horses and cattle. This very grant was applied to that purpose, as soon as it was safe to put cattle and horses there, and as early as Frémont took possession of the Alvarado grant. The government got all it expected from this or any other grantee. Could Governor Micheltorena, the day after making this grant, have declared it null and void, and have taken the land from the grantee and made it part of the public domain? Clearly not. In Reading's case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 1-7, this court said: "In other words, from our reading of these decrees, the governor could not either directly recall a grant made by him, or indirectly nullify it when it had been made conformably with them, and the laws and regulations." If he could not, then the grant must be held to convey an interest which has not been, and cannot now be, taken from the grantee. When Mexico ceded to us, the power to take away a grant by denouncement ceased.

7. It is to be presumed that Governor Micheltorena performed his duty in relation to the necessary preliminaries to this grant, till the impeaching party proved the contrary.

See the cases of California land grants already cited; Peralta's case; U. S. v. Clark, 8 Pet., 436.

The United States are estopped from denying the fact of the petition, &c., by the previous recital of their grantor in the grant, to the claimant, which was prior to theirs.

9. The regulations specifying preliminary steps to be taken in applications for grants, are merely directory, and may be dispensed with without vitiating the grant.

The regulation of Nov. 21, 1828, is as follows:

"2. Every person soliciting lands, whether he be an impresario, head of a family, or single person, shall address to the governor of the respective territory, a petition setting forth his name, country, profession, the number, description, religion, and other circumstances of the families or persons with whom he wishes to colonize, describing as distinctly as possible by means of a map, the land asked for."

There is no provision declaring that the grant shall be invalid if there is no petition to the governor in writing, specifying the various particulars thus enumerated. It is not probable that in all the cases confirmed by this court, there is one where the petition has conformed in every particular with this regulation. By the regulation, a map is just as essential as the petition. It is a highly important document. But it appears only in a part of the cases before this court. It was not shown in Ritchie, Arguello, or Peralta's case, Reading or Fossat or Frémont's case. On the contrary, in the latter case the petition showed there was no map, and an excuse was offered for not presenting. This court held that the map was not essential, and confirmed the grant without it. In 58 U. S. (17 How.), 561, the Chief Justice said: "According to the regulations for granting lands, it was necessary that a plan or sketch of its lines or boundaries should be presented with the petition. But in the construction of these regulations, the governors appear to have exercised a discretionary power to dispense with it under certain circumstances."

Now, if the governor can dispense with one condition, precedent or requirement of the regulation, he can with another, without rendering the title invalid in equity. The omission here is no greater than in Frémont's case, and the same indulgence must be shown.

In The U. S. v. Sutherland, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 363, 364, this court said:

"In construing grants of land in California, made under the Spanish or Mexican authorities, we must take into view the state of the country and the policy of the government; it was the interest and policy of the King of Spain, and afterwards of the Mexican Government, to make liberal grants to those who should engage to colonize or settle upon them."

10. Conditions subsequent, if not performed, do not render the grant void, nor authorize the government to forfeit the grantee's right for its own use.

Frémont, Reading, and Larkins' cases, already cited.

Conclusions:

I. The genuineness of the grant has been fully proved.

II. All the conditions subsequent that were to be performed by the grantees, were performed, such as possession, building, and cultivation.

III. The place and boundaries are definite, and capable of location, and have been actually located.

IV. Every question raised by the district attorney, in the court below, was met and answered by conclusive evidence.

It follows that the claim must be confirmed.

Mr. Justice Nelson, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the District Bourt of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The case involved a claim to sixteen square leagues of land known by the name of "La Laguna de Lup Yomi," situate north of Sonoma, in the County of Napa, California. It was presented to the Board of Land Commissioners on behalf of the appellees, who derived their title from the two brothers, Salvador and Juan Antonio Vallejo, claiming to be the original grantees of the Mexican Government. The Board rejected the claim, but, on appeal to the district court, and the production of further evidence, that court affirmed it.

The first document produced is a petition of the two brothers, S. and J. A. Vallejo, to the senior commandant-general and director of the colonization of the frontiers, for a grant of eight leagues of land each, reciting that they were desirous of establishing a ranch in the Laguna de Lup-Yomi, situate twenty leagues north of this place (Sonoma), which tract is uncultivated, and in the power of a multitude of savage Indians, who have committed and are daily committing many depredations; and being satisfied that the tract does not belong to any corporation or individuals, they earnestly ask the grant, offering to domesticate the Indians, and convert them by gentle means, if possible, to a better system of life. Salvador Vallejo adds, that being in actual service in quality of captain of cavalry, and not having received his pay, he proposes to apply $2,500 out of his pay for his portion of the land. This petition was dated at Sonoma, October 11th, 1838.

Under date of March 15th, 1839, the senior commandant-general, M. G. Vallejo, a brother of the petitioners, accedes to their petition so far as to permit them to occupy the tract, but, for the accomplishment of the object, they must hasten to ask a confirmation from the Departmental Government, which will issue the customary titles; and, at the same time, they must endeavor to reduce the wild nature of the Indians, assuring them that the government wishes a treaty and friendship with them.

The next document is a title, in form, granted by the Governor, Micheltorena, dated Monterey, 5th September, 1844. At the foot of the grant is a memorandum, as follows:

"Note has been made of this decree in the proper book, on folio 4.

In the absence of the com'r.

FRANCIS C. ARCE."

The signatures of M. G. Vallejo to the permit of occupation, and of Micheltorena and F. C. Arce, the governor and acting secretary, are genuine, if three witnesses are to be believed—Castenada, W. D. M. Howard, and Salvador Vallejo, one of the original grantees. The proof of possession and occupation is slight, and not entitled to much consideration, in passing upon the equity or justice of the title, or even upon its bona fides.

This proof rests mainly upon the testimony of S. Vallejo. He was examined twice on the subject—once when the case was before the Board of Commissioners, and again when on appeal before the district judge. In his first examination, he states, that immediately after permission was given to occupy the ranch (March, 1839) he placed on the land about one thousand head of cattle, between three and four hundred head of horses, and from eight hundred to one thousand head of hogs; that he built a house on the land the same year, and also corrals, and left an overseer and servants in charge of the place.

In his second examination, he states, that in the year 1842 or 1843 he placed cattle on the ranch, built a house and corrals, and in the year 1843 or 1844 received a title for the land; that he then lived on it, but was frequently absent visiting his house and lot in Sonoma, and his other farms, but always left a mayor domo on the rancho; and during this time he cultivated beans, corn, pumpkins, watermelons, &c. The last house he built on the place was about the time the country was invaded by the Americans. That during the time mentioned, he had on the place from 1,500 to 2,000 head of cattle, 500 to 600 head of horses, and from 1,500 to 2,000 head of hogs. He further states, that most of his stock was subsequently stolen and driven off by the Indians and emigrants. This evidence is slightly corroborated by the testimony of Castenada and Carillo.

From the numerous cases that have already been before us, as well of from our own inquiries into the customs and usages of the inhabitants of California, especially those engaged in the business of raising cattle and other stock, this mode of occupation furnishes very unsatisfactory evidence of possession and cultivation of the land in the sense of the Colonization Laws of Mexico. Any unappropriated portion of the public lands was open to similar possession and occupation without objection from the public authorities. Indeed, according to the laws of the Indies, the pastures, mountains and waters, in the provinces, were made common to all the inhabitants, with liberty to establish their corrals and herdsmen's huts thereon, and freely to enjoy the use thereof, and a penalty of five thousand ounces of gold was imposed on every person who should interrupt this common right. 2 White's Recop., 56.

There is also a fact, stated by the witness Vallejo himself, that is calculated to excite distrust as to the extent of the possession and occupation, and for the purpose stated. He says that there were constant revolutions among the Indians at the time; that it was unsafe for families to live there, and that the alcalde at Sonoma refused to deliver him judicial possession in 1845, on account of the danger.

It is quite apparent, also, from the testimony of this witness, that the huts built for the herdsmen of the cattle were of a most unsubstantial and temporary character. No possession of any kind is shown since the cattle and other stock were carried off by the Indians and emigrants. When that took place does not appear; but doubtless as early as the first disturbances in the country, in the fore part of the year 1846.

The possession and occupation, therefore, even in the loose and general way stated, was only for a comparatively short time.

We have said that the signatures of the officers to the documentary evidence of the title are genuine, if we can believe the witnesses—Castenada, Howard and Vallejo; but, as all of these officials were living after the United States had taken possession of the country during the war, and even after the cession by Mexico, and, with the exception of the governor, resided in California, these signatures may be genuine, and still the title invalid. It was practicable to have made the grant in form genuine, but antedated.

The permit to take possession of the tract, in connection with the short and unsubstantial character of the possession, is not of much importance in making out the claim. Vallejo had no power to dispose of the public lands.

We do not understand that his permission to occupy, as director of colonization on the frontiers, laid the governor or Mexican Government under any obligations to grant the title. If followed by valuable and permanent improvements, considerations might arise in favor of a claimant that should influence a government, when called upon to grant the property to another. We think, therefore, that the claim rests chiefly, if not entirely, upon the grant of the title by the governor of the 4th September, 1844.

This grant stands alone. None of the usual preliminary steps, prescribed by the Regulations of 1828, such as the petition, marginal reference for a report as to the situation and condition of the land, report of the proper officers and minute of concession, were observed. These, with satisfactory proof of the signatures to the papers, give some character to the grant, and tend to the establishment of its genuineness. Even the permit of Vallejo is not noticed by the governor, nor any present occupation of the premises by the grantees.

So far, therefore, as respect the title, or even any rightful claim to the tract, it depends mainly upon proof of the signatures of Micheltorena and of F. C. Arce, the acting secretary. There is no record of the title in the proper book, shown in the case, nor exists in fact, as it is understood this book of records exists for the years 1844, 1845, and no record is there found. The memorandum, therefore, at the foot of the grant, by Arce, the secretary, "Note has been made made of this decree in the proper book, on folio 4," is untrue. Nor has there been found any approval of the grant by the Departmental Assembly, for those records are extant, as found in the Mexican archives. The archives are public documents, which the court has a right to consult, even if not made formal proof in the case. The absence of any record evidence is remarkable, if the title is genuine, as one of the grantees, Juan Antonio Vallejo, resided at the time in Monterey, where these records were kept, and where all the formalities of a regular Mexican grant might might readily have been complied with. The parties, also, were men of more than ordinary intelligence, and belong to one of the most influential Mexican families of the Territory, and doubtless well understood the regulations concerning grants of the public domain.

The non production of this record evidence of the title, under the circumstances, is calculated to excite well-grounded suspicions as to its validity, and throws upon the claimant the burden of producing the fullest proof of which the party is capable of the genuineness of the grant. We do not say that the absence of the record evidence is of itself necessarily fatal to the proof of the title; but it should be produced, or its absence accounted for to the satisfaction of the court.

We have already said, that the genuineness of the official signatures to the paper title might be established, and yet the title forged, and stated our reasons. Proof of the genuineness of these alone can never be regarded as satisfactory. It must be carried farther by the claimant. The record proof is, generally speaking, the highest. Possession and occupation of some duration, permanency, and value, are next entitled to weight.

At least, satisfactory evidence should be required, under the circumstances in which most of these Mexican grants were made, as to make the antedating of any given grant irreconcilable with the proof; otherwise, there can be no protection against imposition and fraud in these cases.

The decree of the court below reversed, and the case remanded for further evidence and examination.

THE UNITED STATES, Appts.,

v.

ANDRES PICO ET AL.

(See S. C., 22 How., 406-416)

Same decision as in United States v. Teschmaker, ante, p. 353.

In this case, no record of the grant or title paper is found among the Mexican archives or in any book, nor is there any evidence of possession or occupation, deserving notice or consideration.

The case falls within the principles, and is governed by the views of the court, in the case of the United States v. Teschmaker, decided at this term.

Argued, Feb. 8, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Att'y-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for the appellants:

This is a claim for eleven leagues of land called Moquelemos, which the claimant alleges, in his petition to the Board of Commissioners, was granted to him by his brother, Pio Pico, in the month of May, 1844, and confirmed to him in June, 1846. The land lies on the Moquelemos River, in what is now the County of Calevaras.

The documentary evidence of title produced by the claimant is:

1. A grant signed by Pio Pico and countersigned by Jose Morias Moreno, describing the land in question, dated at the City of Los Angeles, on the 6th day of June, 1846.

2. A paper headed "Departmental Assembly of California," and signed Narciso Botello, Deputy-Secretary, addressed to Secretary Moreno, in which the fact is stated that this grant and others which are named, were approved by the Departmental Assembly in that day's session. Note. The date of this paper (July 15, 1846) is certainly the date which it truly bears. It is so in all the records, the original Spanish as well as the translations.

3. The paper signed by Pio Pico and Jose Morias Moreno, dated June 15, 1846, setting forth that the most excellent Departmental Assembly, "in session of to-day," decreed the approval of the grant in question.

This is all the documentary evidence in the case. There is no petition, order of reference, information, decree of concession, map or copy of the grant found among the archives. No map or diseno of the land was exhibited to the court below, or is to be found upon the records sent here. There is no registry, nor any kind of entry upon any book. The grant was produced from the private custody of the grantee himself. So it appears was the certificate of Pico and Moreno, that it had been approved by the Departmental Assembly. Judge Hoffman distinctly declares that the only paper found in the archives is the communication of Botello, transmitting the title deed and asserting its approval. Who placed that paper upon the record and how or when it came there, are questions not easily solved. That it did not get there honestly, will be very apparent to the court long before this examination is finished.

The objections which the government now makes to the affirmance of this decree, are those which follow:

1. The grant is made by the governor to his brother, and is therefore void.

2. It is void because Pio Pico, at the time of making it, had no authority, jurisdiction or power to make any grant in this case, for want of petition, investigation and map, such as the laws of 1824 and 1828 require in all such cases.

3. There is no record evidence of the grant, nor any explanation furnished of its absence, and therefore it is, to all intents and purposes, the same as if no evidence at all of it had been given.

4. It is a forgery. The proof of this is powerful and overwhelming. It is not possible to furnish any reason why the grant was not entered upon the record, if it was really made at the time it bears date. In addition to that, the journals of the Departmental Assembly furnish very strong circumstantial evidence against the genuineness of this title.

Mr. R. H. Gillet, for appellee:

Facts established by the evidence in the record.

1. A grant was made by the governor on the 6th of June, 1846.

2. This grant was approved by the Departmental Assembly on the 15th of June, 1846, at Los Angeles.

3. Owing to the Indian hostilities, immediate possession could not be taken of the grant, nor judicial possession given.

4. The claimant, when the country permitted, took and continued actual possession.

5. The grant has distinct boundaries, which distinguish it from the residue of the public domain.

6. No evidence was offered by the United States, to contradict or repel any offer by the claimant.

7. No question as to the want of a petition, reference, report or map, was raised by the United States, either before the board, or district court.

No question was raised before the board or district, court concerning the power and authority of the government to grant, or the Assembly to confirm.

9. The bona fides of the grant was not questioned, either before the board or the district Court.

Argument.

1. No question can be raised and decided upon appeal, which was not raised below.

2. When an equitable right is once vested under a grant by a governor, it cannot be devested by the action of the government, upon a denouncement by a third person.

3. Conditions subsequent, if not performed, do not render the grant void, nor authorize the government to forfeit the grantees' rights for its own use.

4. When an officer of the Mexican Government, having the power to make grants, exercises that power so as to create the reasonable belief in the mind of the grantee, that he received a valid grant, and takes possession under it, such grant, whether made after compliance with all legal formalities or not, confers an equitable right which this court is bound to confirm. In this case the record shows that a grant was actually made, and no question was raised as to its genuineness.

5. By the laws, usages and customs of Mexico, a grant is valid when confirmed by the Departmental Assembly, whether the usual preliminary formalities were observed or not.

6. It is to be presumed that Governor Pico performed his duty in relation to the necessary preliminaries of this grant, until the impeaching party proves the contrary.

7. The United States are estopped from denying the fact of the petition, &c., by the previous recital of their grantor in the grant to the claimant, which was prior to theirs.

8. The regulation specifying preliminary steps to be taken in applications for grants, are merely directory, and may be dispensed with without vitiating the grant.

9. No additional evidence can be introduced on an appeal to this court, except in admiralty cases.

See, also, argument in the preceding case.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The appellee presented to the Board of Commissioners a claim for eleven square leagues of land, known by the name Moquelamos, situate in the County of Calaveras, California. The board rejected the claim; but, on appeal to the district court, and the production of some further proof, that court affirmed it.

The preliminary proceedings required by the Regulations of 1828, before a grant of the public lands, were not produced, if any existed. The only evidence of the title is a grant of the tract by a formal title to the claimant, dated Los Angeles, 6th June, 1846, signed by the Governor, Pio Pico, and J. M. Moreno, the Secretary of State, and two other papers relied on as furnishing proof that the grant was approved by the Departmental Assembly. One of them is a certificate to that effect of the governor and secretary, bearing date 15th June, 1846, the other purports to be a communication from N. Botello, Deputy-Secretary of the Departmental Assembly, of the approval to Moreno, Secretary of State, for the information of the governor. This approval, according to the Deputy-Secretary of the Assembly, was in a session held on the 15th July, 1846. The paper was found among the Mexican archives.

The other documents—the grant and certificate of approval—came from the hands of the claimant. No record of them was found among the Mexican archives or in any book, nor is there any evidence of possession or occupation deserving notice or consideration.

The case falls within the principles and is governed by the views of the court in the case of The United States v. Teschmaker et al., decided at this term. Besides the suspicious character of the grant, it appears to be wholly destitute of merit.

The decree below reversed, and the case remanded for further evidence.

THE UNITED STATES, Appts.,

v.

MARIANO G. VALLEJO.

Same decision as in U. S. v. Teschmaker, ante, p. 353.

Where neither the grant nor the certificate of approval has been found among the Mexican archives, nor the record of them upon any book of records, and both papers came from the hands of the claimant, and the genuineness of the title depends upon proof of the official signatures, and some evidence of possession, held, that this case falls within the views of the court in the United States v. Teschmaker, decided this term.

Argued Feb. 28, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellants:

The usual effort is made to supply the legal proof, by testimony of occupation and possession.

There is no espediente on file. The grant is not found in Jimeno's index. The claim rests upon the production of two papers and proof of handwriting. It is not supported by any legal evidence requisite to establish a valid claim.

The following specific objections are made to confirmation:

1. No espediente, or official record of the proceedings, required by the Mexican laws in granting lands, is produced, nor any record evidence whatever.

The law required the "titulo" to be authenticated by the secretary of the department. Jimeno was the secretary; and if from any cause Arce acted as secretary ad interim, the fact should have been shown, and he should have been called to prove the execution of the instrument by the governor.

3. Handwriting is secondary evidence, and competent only when, from the nature of the case, primary evidence by the attesting witness cannot be obtained.

4. The paper bearing the names of Pico and Corvarubias is nothing more than a private certificate by those persons. No proof is made as to when it was given, and it affords no evidence of the action of the Departmental Assembly, which should be shown by their own journal. The journal of the Assembly for 1845, shows no cession on the 18th of February, 1845, the day that the certificate states the confirmation to have been made. If there was a cession on that day, the fact might be, and should have been, proved.

5. If this grant were genuine, it would have appeared regularly numbered and entered in Jimeno's index, with a corresponding espediente on file in the archives. It would also have been noted in the Toma de Razon of that year, but there is no mention of it. Every claimant is bound to establish his claim by legal proof in conformity with the Mexican laws and usages in granting land. The whole burden of proof is upon him, and unless that burden is fully discharged, he has no right to a decree of confirmation. The absence of an espediente, or any record evidence of the grant, is unaccounted for. No excuse is shown or ground laid for secondary evidence.

Mr. P. Phillips, for appellees:

The present claimant derives his title under a deed of warranty, in consideration of $3,000 from Miguel Alvarado, dated 20th February, 1849, for "three sitios de gando mayor, which I have granted to me by the Departmental Assembly of this Territory, approved by the assembly of the same."

This deed is witnessed by Castenada and Salvador Vallejo, and is acknowledged before the alcalde on 22d February, 1849.

The title on which confirmation is rested, is a grant from Micheltorena to Miguel Alvarado, dated at Monterey, 23d November, 1844.

In this formal grant, the following facts are recited:

1. That Alvarado had solicited the land.

2. That the proper measures and examinations had been made.

3. That the land is shown by the map attached to the espediente.

4. That the interest was to confirm him in the ownership of the title, which he had obtained from the Señor director, &c., Don Mariano Vallejo.

If the court is satisfied that this grant is genuine, then these facts are established by their recital.

Besides the grant, there is the approval of the Departmental Assembly, signed by Pio Pico and Jose M. Corvarubias.

These were produced as original documents, and the signatures of all the parties proved.

No objection can be made in this court, that they were not proved by competent evidence.

The genuineness of the title was established to the satisfaction of the Board of Commissioners, who rejected the claim on the ground that the quantity of land was not sufficiently designated.

The decree of Judge Hoffman shows that this defect was cured by the evidence of other witnesses, "whose testimony, taken on appeal, in our opinion establishes the identity of the land granted to Alvarado, and removes the only objection urged to a confirmation of the claim."

The absence of record evidence, either in the archives or in Jimeno's index, can amount to no more than cause of suspicion. It cannot of itself invalidate the title.

The attempt to raise the question as to the bone fides of the grant, is condemned by the decision of this court.

"It has been urged that this grant is a fictitious one, &c. Our answer to this suggestion is that no objection to the bone fides of the grant was taken before the tribunals below, where it should have been made if relied on by the government, so as to have given the complainants an opportunity to have met it. To permit it to be taken in the appellate court for the first time, where there is no opportunity for explanation, would be a surprise upon them, of which they may justly complain."

Larkin's case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 561.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The appellee, Vallejo, presented to the Board of Land Commissioners a claim for three square leagues of land, known by the name of Yulupa, situate in the County of Sonoma, California, having derived his title from Miguel Alvarado, the original grantee.

The documentary evidence of the title is: 1st. A grant in due form, dated Monterey, 23d November, 1844, purporting to be signed by Micheltorena, Governor, and Francisco Arce, Secretary, with a memorandum by the secretary: "Note has been made of this title in the proper book;" and 2d. A certificate of approval by the Departmental Assembly, bearing date at the City of Los Angeles, 18th February, 1845, signed by Pio Pico, Governor, and Jose M. Corvarubias, Secretary.

Neither the grant nor the certificate of approval has been found among the Mexican archives, nor the record of them upon any book of records. Both papers came from the hands of the claimant. The genuineness of the title depends upon proof of the official signatures, and some evidence of possession.

The Board rejected the claim; but on appeal to the district court, and the production of further proof of possession, that court affirmed it.

The case falls within the views of the court in The United States v. Teschmaker, et al., decided this term.

Decree reversed, and the case remanded for further evidence.

CHARLES EMERSON, Plff. in Er.,
v.
HORATIO N. SLATER.

(See S. C., 22 How., 28–45.)

Time, when essence of contract—performance within time limited—subsequent performance and acceptance—verbal agreements before or at execution of written contract, inadmissible—after written agreement made, when verbal contract may waive or vary it—but not contract within Statute of Frauds—common counts, when proper for recovery.

NOTE.—Time, when of the essence of the contract. See note to Slater v. Emerson, 60 U. S., in Book 15, 626.
Parol evidence as applicable to written contracts. See note to Bradley v. Wash., &c., St. Packet Co., 38 U. S. (13 Pet.), 89.

In an action upon written contract that the plaintiff would complete all the bridge work agreed to be done by defendant for a railroad company, by the first day of December next after the date of the contract; held, that time was of the essence of the contract.

Where time is of the essence of the contract, there can be no recovery on the contract, without showing performance within the time limited.

But subsequent performance and acceptance by the defendant, will authorize a recovery on a quantum meruit.

Verbal agreements between the parties to a written contract, made before or at the time of the execution of the contract, are, in general, inadmissible to vary its terms or to affect its construction.

After the contract has been reduced to writing, it is competent for the parties, in cases falling within the general rules of the common law and not within the Statute of Frauds, at any time before the breach of it, by a new contract, not in writing, either altogether to waive, dissolve, or annul the former contract, or in any manner to add to or subtract from, or vary, or qualify the terms of it, and thus to make a new contract.

A written contract, within the Statute of Frauds, cannot be varied by any subsequent agreement of the parties, unless such new agreement is also in writing.

Cases in which the guaranty or promise is collateral to the principal contract, but is made at the same time, and becomes an essential ground of the credit given to the principal debtor, are, in general, within the Statute of Frauds.

Other cases also fall within the statute, where the collateral agreement is subsequent to the making of the debt, and the subsisting liability was the foundation of the promise on the part of the defendant, without any other direct and separate consideration moving between the parties.

The written agreement in this case, was an original undertaking on a good and valid consideration at the time the instrument was executed, therein expressed.

The plaintiff had a right to proceed upon the common counts, where he claimed performance subsequent to the time named in the contract and acceptance by defendant.

Argued Feb. 21, 1860. Decided March 12, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. C. Cushing and Henry C. Hutchins, for plaintiff in error:

1. At common law a contract reduced to writing, may, by parol agreement of the parties subsequently made, be varied, waived, or discharged, whether the same is a simple contract or under seal.

2. And there is no distinction in this respect between a contract in writing at common law, and a contract required to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds.

3. If the promise of Slater is within the Statute of Frauds, it is within the Statute of Frauds of Massachusetts. And the decisions of the courts of Massachusetts have been uniform, that the time of performance and terms of a contract required to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds of that State, may be extended, or waived, or varied, or wholly discharged by parol.

The case of Clarke v. Russel, 3 Dall., 415, is distinguished from the present.

6. There is a fact in proof in this case, which did not appear in the case when before this court before, and that is, that when Slater made the agreement upon which suit is brought, securities were placed in his hands by the principal debtor, to indemnify him for his liability. His promise is not, therefore, within the Statute of Frauds.

7. A parol promise to pay the debt of another in consideration of property placed by the debtor in the promisor's hand, is not within the Statute of Frauds. It is an original promise and binding upon the promisor, and in this respect it is immaterial whether the liability of the original debtor continues or is discharged.

The defendant, having waived by parol, the performance of the work at the day, thereby himself prevented performance, and he cannot avail himself of the non-performance he has himself occasioned.

8. When this case was before this court before, no question was made nor discussion had whether the promise of the defendant was within the Statute of Frauds. The question was simply whether time was of the essence of the contract; and this court decided that it was.

Slater v. Emerson, 19 How., 224.

9. The evidence offered by the plaintiff in error under the common counts that the defendant in error had securities in his hands to indemnify him for his promise took the case from the Statute of Frauds. It made him an original promisor for the work done after November 14, 1854 (the date of the contract), and he is, therefore, liable upon the common counts upon a quantum meruit as an original debtor.

Mr. S. W. Bates, for the defendant in error:

This case was before this court at the December Term, 1856, and is reported in 19 Howard, 224. This court then decided:

1st. That the original contract between Emerson and the corporation, to build the bridges for the corporation, remained in full force unaffected by the contract between Emerson and Slater.

2d. That by force of his contract Slater stood in the relation of a surety for the corporation for the amount for which he had agreed to become liable.

3d. That the time of performance (December 1) was of the essence of Slater's contract and he was not liable thereon, as Emerson had failed to perform within the time fixed.

The judgment of the circuit court was reversed and the cause was remanded for a new trial.

As this court had decided that Emerson could not sustain his action on the written contract with Slater when the case came on for a new trial in the circuit court, the plaintiff offered to prove by parol "that after November 14th, 1854, and before the 1st day of December, 1854, and after the 1st day of said December, the defendant, by his acts and declarations, waived and dispensed with the performance of work, by the plaintiff, on the 1st of said December, and agreed to substitute, therefore, performance thereon, on or before the 20th day of December, 1854, and to deem performance by the plaintiff, on or before the 20th of December, 1854, a substitute for an equivalent to performance on the 1st day of said December, according to the contract, and that the corporation also assented thereto, and that the work was fully performed within the extended time.

This testimony was objected to by the defendant, upon the ground that the contract of November 14, 1854, was a special promise for the debt, default or misdoings of another, and was within the Statute of Frauds, and that the alleged waiver, extension and substitution, were not by writing. The court sustained the objection and excluded the testimony, to which ruling the plaintiff then and there excepted.

This ruling was right.

This court had decided what performance by the 1st day of December was an essential part of this contract." And manifestly a contract cannot be varied in one of its essential parts without making a new contract.

And when such new contract has been made, it must be declared on.

This plaintiff declares on such new contract in his last count. And inasmuch as the contract declared on is that of a surety, it must be in writing, and wholly in writing. The Statute of Frauds is not complied with by producing a contract which is partly in writing, while one of its essential parts rests in parol.

Rowan v. Runnels, 5 How., 139.

The plaintiff at the trial in the circuit court introduced three deeds of land from the railroad corporation to the defendant, dated three days after the defendant entered into the contract of Nov. 14, and said to have been made to indemnify the defendant from his liability under the said contract.

But we are not aware of any case or dictum showing, that because a surety, after he has become bound, as such, takes security from his principal to indemnify himself against loss by his contract of suretyship, he thereby ceases to be a surety and becomes a principal debtor.

However true it is that assumpsit for a quantum valebant or quantum meruit will lie, where the terms of a special contract have not all been complied with, to recover the value of the land and materials held and enjoyed by the defendant, yet nothing is better settled than that no action can be maintained on the contract itself, without alleging with exactness, performance in entire accordance with the terms of the contract, including that in relation to time of performance and proving the allegation.

This proposition has been affirmed in nearly every State.

In this case there has been no performance within the time, and no legal excuse for the breach on the part of Emerson.

On November 14th he agrees to complete the work in sixteen days. He was more than double that time in doing it, and no hindrance on the part of anyone is shown, and no excuse for its non-completion.

Emerson cannot recover therefor unless it be on the common counts, and not then unless it be on the quantum meruit and valebant. Can he recover on these?

The agreement of November 14 shows that the money and notes given by Slater were to apply to the then indebtedness of the company to Emerson, and were not to apply to any work to be done heretofore—and this was one of the points argued at the former trial, contending that Slater was only a surety. That Emerson understood that he was doing the work for the company is evident from the fact that he charged the company with it, presented to them his bills, settled with its committee, and never presented any charges for work to Slater.

If, as this court has heretofore decided, Slater was a surety for the price of the work done for the corporation, there can be no recovery had against him on counts for work, labor and materials furnished to himself. None were furnished to himself. The law will not imply a promise to pay another's debt. It requires an express promise in writing.

There is no case of recovering on a quantum meruit or quantum valebant except for some work or materials done or furnished, and that, too, for the defendant.

But Emerson furnished no work or materials for Slater. They were all for the railroad company.

Suppose Emerson had died, become insolvent, or in some other way had become absolutely incapacitated from completing the work agreed on by December 1st, would Slater have been liable on a quantum meruit?

How long a time after December 1st would have been allowed to executors of Emerson to complete the work so as to bind Slater?

If Emerson and the railroad company had canceled their contract, or had the Company refused to allow Emerson to continue his work, would Slater have been liable on a quantum meruit?

Mosby v. Hunter, 9 Ired., 119.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. It was an action of assumpsit, brought by the plaintiff in error against the present defendant, upon a written agreement, bearing date on the 14th day of November, 1854.

By the terms of the instrument, the plaintiff covenanted and agreed with the defendant, in consideration of the agreements of the latter therein contained, and of $1 to him paid, that he, the plaintiff, would complete all the bridge work to be done by him for the Boston and New York Central Railroad Company, ready for laying down the rails for one track by the first day of December next after the date of the contract. In consideration whereof, the defendant agreed that he would pay the plaintiff, within two days from the date of the agreement, the sum of $4,400 in cash; and also give to the plaintiff, on the completion of the bridges, and when the rails for one track were laid from Dedham to the foot of Summer Street in Boston, his, the defendant's, five notes, for $2000 each, dated when given, as provided, and made payable to the plaintiff or order, in six months from their date. Another stipulation of the agreement was, that the notes, when paid, were to be applied towards the indebtedness of the railroad company to the plaintiff, and that the agreement was in no way to affect any contract of the plaintiff with the railroad, or any action then pending between them.

When the declaration was filed, it contained three special counts, drawn upon the written agreement, together with the common counts, as in actions of indebitatus assumpsit.

Performance on the part of the plaintiff, and neglect and refusal on the part of the defendant to give the five notes specified in the agreement, after seasonable demand, constitute the cause of action set forth in the several special counts. They differ in nothing material to be noticed in this investigation, except that, in the first count, performance on the part of the plaintiff is alleged, according to the contract, on the 1st day of December, 1854, while in the second and third counts it is alleged at a period twenty days later.

An additional special count was afterwards filed by consent, which, in one respect, varies essentially from the other counts. After setting out the substance of the contract, it alleges that the defendant waived performance at the day stipulated in the agreement, and extended the time to the twentieth day of the same December, and that the plaintiff performed and completed the work within the extended time. Demand of the notes prior to the commencement of the suit, substantially as alleged, was admitted at the trial, as were also the execution of the agreement and the payment by the defendant of the $4,400.

As appears by the transcript, the cause has been twice tried upon the same pleadings. At the first trial, the verdict was for the plaintiff; but the defendant excepted to the rulings and instructions of the circuit court, and, after judgment, removed the cause into this court by writ of error.

Among the questions presented on the writ of error, the principal one was whether, by the true construction of the written agreement, time was the essence of the contract. That question was directly presented by the fourth exception; and this court held, that the refusal of the circuit judge to instruct the jury, as prayed by the defendant, that the plaintiff could not recover on the special counts without showing that the work was completed by the day stipulated in the contract, was error. Accordingly, the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to issue a new venire.

In the opinion delivered on the occasion, this court said, in effect, that in cases where time is of the essence of the contract, there can be no recovery on the written agreement, without showing performance within the time limited; but added, that a subsequent performance and acceptance by the defendant will authorize a recovery in a quantum meruit. Slater v. Emerson, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 239.

Failing to show performance at the day named in the agreement, the plaintiff, at the last trial, offered to prove by parol to the effect that, after the date of the agreement, and before as well as after the day specified for the completion of the work, the defendant, by his conduct, acts and declarations, waived and dispensed with performance at the day named in the written agreement; and agreed to substitute therefor, performance on the twentieth day of the same December, and to deem performance on the day last named as equivalent to performance on the day specified in the written agreement, and that the work was fully performed within the extended time.

Objection was made by the defendant to this testimony, upon the ground that the written agreement declared on was a special promise for the debt, default or misdoings of another; and that the alleged waiver, substitution and extension, not being in writing, were within the Statute of Frauds; and the court sustained the objection, and excluded the testimony. To which ruling of the court the plaintiff excepted.

He then proposed to proceed upon the common counts, and offered evidence accordingly. After reading the agreement set up in the special counts, he introduced three deeds, each dated November 17, 1854, purporting to convey certain parcels of real estate therein described. They were each given by the railroad company to the defendant, to indemnify him for the liability he assumed in the beforementioned written agreement with the plaintiff. Estimating the value of the real estate so conveyed by the considerations expressed in the respective deeds, it amounted in the aggregate to the sum of $13,500.

He also introduced a memorandum agreement between the defendant and the railroad company, whereby the former leased to the latter ten hundred and fifty tons of railroad iron, to be laid down by the company and used on their railroad. By the terms of the last-named agreement, the railroad iron was estimated at the value of $68,400; and the company agreed to pay the defendant for the use of the iron, $5,000 per month, the first payment to be made on the first day of March then next, and so upon the first day of each succeeding month, until the whole sum was paid, with interest on the same from a given day—the defendant agreeing, if there was no default of the payments, when the whole was paid, to sell and deliver the iron to the company for the estimated value including the interest.

To secure these payments, together with the interest, the railroad company, by the same instrument, assigned and set over to the defendant the proceeds of the railroad, to an amount equal to the estimated value of the iron, with the interest, and authorized and required the superintendent of the road to retain in his own hands, out of the proceeds, a sum sufficient to pay the amount to the defendant, in the manner and at the times specified in the agreement.

Emerson's contract with the railroad company was also introduced, and makes a part of the record. It bears date on the 17th day of December, 1853, and provides, on the one part, that the plaintiff shall build and complete, sufficient for the passage of an engine over the same, by the first day of May then next, all the bridging, as then laid out and determined upon by the engineer, from the wharf, near the foot of Summer Street, in Boston, to Dorchester shore, and to complete the same as soon thereafter as might be reasonably practicable. On the other part, the agreement prescribes the compensation to be paid by the railroad company to the plaintiff, for building and completing the respective works therein designated and described, stipulating that eighty-five per cent. upon the estimated value of the materials furnished, and seventy-five per cent. upon the estimated value of the labor performed, should be paid monthly, as the work was done, and that the balance should be paid by the company upon the completion and acceptance of the whole work.

Parties to the suit are, by law, competent witnesses in the courts of Massachusetts; and under that law the plaintiff was examined in this case.

He also called and examined five other witnesses. From this parol testimony, it appears that securities were put into the hands of the defendant, deemed by him and the company adequate, at the time, to indemnify him against his contract with the plaintiff. Those securities, two of the witnesses say, consisted of real estate, and the bonds of the company for $1,700, secured by a mortgage upon the road. In respect to the real estate, it is to be observed that the deeds of conveyance bear date three days after the date of the contract; but the presumption from the circumstances is a reasonable one, that they were given in pursuance of the arrangement made at the time the contract was executed. It also appeared that the company failed in July, 1854, and that it was actually insolvent at the date of these transactions.

Prior to the date of the agreement of the 14th of November, 1854, the plaintiff had stopped work under his contract with the company, and refused to continue it. As soon as the contract with the defendant was made, he resumed the work on the bridges, and finished them about the middle of December, 1854; but the rails were not all laid by the company until the twenty-first day of the same month.

At the date of the contract between these parties, the defendant was a large stockholder in the corporation, and holder of the bonds of the company, which were secured by a mortgage of the road to trustees. During the progress of the work under the contract between these parties, and before the day therein named for the completion of the work, the officers of the company, or some of them, repeatedly stated to the plaintiff, in the presence of the defendant, and without objection on his part, that all the company wanted, was that the plaintiff should keep out of the way of the tracklayers.

Three of the directors, including the defendant, on the 24th day of November, 1854, called on the plaintiff while he was at work on one of the bridges, and inquired of him if he could complete it by the fourth day of the then next month, stating to him the reason why it was desirable that he should do so—and by working nights and Sundays he completed it, according to their request.

Several witnesses state—and among the number the one who laid the rails for the company—that the tracklayers were not delayed by the plaintiff; and the plaintiff testified that the defendant never objected because the bridges were not completed by the day specified in the written agreement. On being recalled, he further testified that he paid, for work done and materials furnished after that day, the sum of $11,157.84, and that he had not received a dollar for it from any source.

Thereupon the presiding justice ruled and instructed the jury that, upon this testimony, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover on the common counts, and directed the jury to return their verdict for the defendant. Accordingly, the jury found that the defendant never promised; and the plaintiff excepted to the rulings and instructions of the court.

Several questions were discussed at the bar, which, in the view we have taken of the case, it will not be necessary to decide.

Both of the exceptions to the rulings and instructions of the court necessarily involve the construction of the contract between these parties; but the question presented is widely different from the one considered and decided by this court on the former record. On that occasion, the single question of any importance was, whether, by the true construction of the contract, it was agreed and understood between the parties to the instrument that the completion of the work at the time therein prescribed was a condition on which the obligation of the defendant to give the notes was to depend.

Contrary to the ruling of the circuit judge, this court held that the covenants of the respective parties were dependent; that time was of the essence of the contract, and remanded the cause for a new trial.

That rule of construction, beyond doubt, is the law of the contract, and no attempt has been made to evade or question it on either side in this controversy. But the question now presented is of a very different character.

It is insisted by the plaintiff that the promise of the defendant was an original undertaking, on a good and valid consideration, moving between the parties to the instrument. On the part of the defendant, it is insisted that his undertaking was a special promise for the debt, default, or misdoings, of another, and so within the Statute of Frauds.

If the theory of the plaintiff be correct, then it would seem to follow that the rulings and instructions of the circuit court were erroneous. Verbal agreements between the parties to a written contract, made before or at the time of the execution of the contract, are in general inadmissible to vary its terms, or to affect its construction. All such verbal agreements are considered as merged in the contract. But oral agreements subsequently made, on a new and valuable consideration, and before the breach of the contract, in cases falling within the general rules of the common law, and not within the Statute of Frauds, stand upon a different footing. Such subsequent oral agreements, not falling within the exception mentioned, may have the effect to enlarge the time of performance specified in the contract, or may vary any other of its terms, or may waive and discharge it altogether. On this point, the authorities are numerous and decisive, of which the following are examples: Goss v. Nugent, 5 Barn. & Ad., 65; Nelson v. Boynton, 3 Met., 402. Speaking of the exceptions to the general rule, that parol evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written instrument, Mr. Greenleaf says: "Neither is the rule infringed by the admission of oral evidence to prove a new and distinct agreement upon a new consideration, whether it be a sustitute for the old one, or in addition to and beyond it; and if subsequent, and involving the same subject-matter, it is immaterial whether the new agreement be entirely oral, or whether it refers to and partially or totally adopts the provisions of the former contract in writing, provided the whole agreement be rescinded and abandoned." 1 Greenl. Ev., 303. But the rule, so far as it is applicable to this case, is better stated by Lord Denman in Goss v. Nugent, 5 Barn. & Ad., 65, wherein he says: "After the agreement has been reduced into writing, it is competent to the parties, in cases falling within the general rules of the common law, at any time before the breach of it by a new contract, not in writing, either altogether to waive, dissolve, or annul, the former agreement, or in any manner to add to or subtract from or vary or qualify the terms of it, and thus to make a new contract." That rule was afterwards qualified by the same learned judge in a particular not essential to the present inquiry; and with that qualification it appears to be the rule constantly applied by the English courts, in cases not within the Statute of Frauds to the present time.

Harvey v. Grabham, 5 Ad. & El., 61; 1 Phil. Ev. (Cow. & Hill's ed.), p. 563, n. 987; Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick., 298; Snow v. Inhabitants of Ware, 13 Met., 42; Vicary v. Moore, 2 Watts, 451; Cummings v. Arnold, 3 Met., 489; Fleming v. Gilbert, 3 Johns., 528.

On the other hand, assuming the theory of the defendant to be correct, that, by the true construction of the contract, his undertaking was a special promise for the debt, default or misdoings of the railroad company, then perhaps the better opinion is, according to the weight of authority, that a written contract within the Statute of Frauds cannot be varied by any subsequent agreement of the parties, unless such new agreement is also in writing.

Marshall v. Lynn, 6 Mees. & W., 109; Goss v. Nugent, 5 Barn. & Ad., 58; Harvey v. Grabham, 5 Ad. & El., 61; Stowell v. Robinson, 3 Bing. N. C., 927; Stead v. Dawber, 10 Ad. & El., 57; Emmett v. Dewhirst, 8 Eng. L. & Eq., 88; Hasbrouk v. Tappen, 15 Johns., 200; Blood v. Goodrich, 9 Wend., 68; Stevens v. Cooper, 1 Johns. Ch., 429; Clerk v. Russel, 3 Dall., 415.

Decided cases, however, are referred to, from the Massachusetts reports, which evidently wear a different aspect, and it is contended by the counsel for the plaintiff that the principle adopted in those cases constitutes the rule of decision in this case; but it is unnecessary to determine that point at the present time, as we are of opinion that the promise of defendant contained in the written agreement was an original undertaking, on a good and valid consideration moving between the parties to the instrument. Nelson v. Boynton, 3 Met., 396; Stearns v. Hall, 9 Cush., 31.

Cases in which the guaranty or promise is collateral to the principal contract, but is made at the same time, and becomes an essential ground of the credit given to the principal debtor, are, in general, within the Statute of Frauds. Other cases arise which also fall within the statute, where the collateral agreement is subsequent to the execution of the debt, and was not the inducement to it, on the ground that the subsisting liability was the foundation of the promise on the part of the defendant, without any other direct and separate consideration moving between the parties. But whenever the main purpose and object of the promisor is not to answer for another, but to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, involving either a benefit to himself, or damage to the other contracting party, his promise is not within the statute, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another, and although the performance of it may incidentally have the effect of extinguishing that liability.

Nelson v. Boynton, 3 Met., 400; Leonard v. Vredenburg, 8 Johns., 39; Farley v. Cleveland, 4 Cow., 432; Alger v. Scoville, 1 Gray, 391; Williams v. Leper, 3 Burr., 1886; Castling v. Aubert, 2 East, 325; 2 Pars. Con., 306.

Nothing is better settled than the rule, that if there is a benefit to the defendant, and a loss to the plaintiff, consequential upon and directly resulting from the defendant's promise in behalf of the plaintiff, there is a sufficient consideration moving from the plaintiff to enable the latter to maintain an action upon the promise to recover compensation. 2 Addison Cont., 1002, and cases cited. Other authorities state the proposition much stronger, authorizing the conclusion that benefit to the party by whom the promise is made, or to a third person at his instance, or damage sustained at the instance of the party promising, by the party in whose favor the promise is made, is sufficient to constitute a good and valid consideration on which to maintain an action.

Apply these principles to the terms of the written agreement, in view of the attending circumstances and the subject-matter, and it is quite clear that the promise of the defendant was an original undertaking on a good and valid consideration moving from the plaintiff at the time the instrument was executed. On its face it purports to be a contract between the parties for their own benefit; one agreeing to do certain work, and furnish certain materials, and the other agreeing to pay therefor a stipulated compensation. Their promises are mutual, and in one respect dependent. In consideration that the plaintiff engaged to do the work and furnish the materials by a given day, the defendant, on his part, agreed, among other things, when the work was completed, to give the plaintiff the five notes therein described. Reference was made to the contract of the plaintiff with the railroad company in the first instance, as descriptive of the work to be done, and of the materials to be furnished; and in the second instance, doubtless for the reason that, as a part of the transaction, the Company had placed, or agreed to place, securities in the hands of the defendant, to indemnify him for the liability he thereby assumed to the plaintiff. Part of those securities were delivered over to the defendant at the time, and the residue as soon thereafter as the conveyances could conveniently be made. But when we consider the attending circumstances, the presumption is much stronger that the arrangement was one mainly, if not entirely, for the indifidual benefit of the defendant.

Prior to that date, the railroad company had failed, and was utterly insolvent, owning nothing, it seems, except the securities transferred to the defendant for his indemnity in this transaction, and the franchise of the road. Unlike what was exhibited in the former record, it now appears that the defendant had large interests of his own, separate from his relation to the company as a stockholder, which were to be promoted by the arrangement. He had leased to the Company railroad iron for the use of the road, amounting in value to the sum of $68,000, and, as a security for payment, held an assignment of the proceeds of the road to that amount, with interest, which was to be paid in monthly installments of five thousand. Now, unless the bridges were completed and the road put in a condition for use, there would be no proceeds; and as he had already taken into his possession all the available means of the Company to secure himself for this new liability, should the road not be completed, the Company could not pay for the iron.

In this view of the subject, it is manifest that the arrangement was one mainly to promote the individual interest of the defendant. Damage also resulted to the plaintiff, as is obvious from the whole transaction. Under his contract with the Company, they had stipulated to pay him monthly eighty-five per cent. upon the estimated value of the materials furnished, and seventy-five per cent. upon the estimated value of the labor performed as the work was done. Failing to receive those monthly payments from the Company, the plaintiff, as he had a right to do, stopped the works, and refused to proceed, in consequence of the failure of the Company to make the monthly payments. To remedy this difficulty, and insure the completion of the bridges so as to render the road available for use, this arrangement was made by the defendant. It was not an arrangement to pay a subsisting indebtedness, but only for work to be done and materials to be furnished; monthly payments were discontinued, and the plaintiff was induced, with an advance of $4,400, to resume and complete the work at his own expense. Without detailing more of the evidence, as exhibited in the statement of the case, it will be sufficient to say that, in view of all the attending circumstances, we think it is clear that the promise of the defendant was an original undertaking upon a good and valid consideration moving between the parties to the written agreement.

For these reasons, we think the plaintiff had a right to proceed upon the common counts, and that it was error in the presiding justice to direct a verdict for the defendant. It is also contended by the plaintiff that the effect of the indemnity given by the railroad company to the defendant was to take the contract out of the Statute of Frauds; but we do not find it necessary to determine that question at the present time.

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded with directions to issue a new venire.

THOMAS OTIS LE ROY AND DANIEL SMITH, Appts.
v.
BENJAMIN TATHAM, JR., HENRY B. TATHAM AND GEORGE N. TATHAM.

(See S. C., 22 How., 132-141.)

Discovery must be of practical use, or no patent will be granted—Tatham's patent.

However brilliant the discovery of a new principle may be, to make it useful it must be applied to some practical purpose, or no patent can be granted.

Tatham's patent for making pipes and tubes from lead, tin, or soft metals, is sustainable.

Argued Jan. 18, 1860. Decided Mar. 19, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellees, to restrain an alleged infringement by the appellants of a patent for making lead pipe, and for an accounting and general relief. A final decree was entered by the court below, in favor of the complainants, for $16,815.57, with interest to the date of the master's report, making an aggregate of $27,133.34; whereupon the defendants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. C. Noyes and E. W. Stoughton, for appellants:

1. In ascertaining whether that which is claimed as novel was before known, courts disregard mere differences in form, proportion, size, strength and materials. Variations in all these respects may exist, and still the prior machine or improvement be substantially the same as that patented.

2. That the application of an old machine to a new use is not patentable, unless such application requires a change to be made in the machine or apparatus so applied, in which case the invention consists in the change so made, and not in the mere application.

If the mechanical combination of the Hansons—assuming them to have been its first inventors—were used for the purpose of making lead pipes, by causing the lead to pass the bridge in a fluid instead of a "set" state, and to cool within the die and around the core; no one would question that such use would be an infringement of their patent.

Indeed, this necessarily follows from the proposition, that the mere application of old machinery toa new purpose, is not patentable

Messrs. C. C. Goddard, L. W. Goddard and C. M. Keller, for appellees:

The discovery of the fact that lead possesses the property of welding after being separated in the solid state, was of practical utility. That alone did not teach how to manufacture leaden pipes of a better quality; for it was merely an abstract discovery that lead possesses this property, and, therefore, not the proper subject-matter of letters patent.

But when the Hansons discovered that by the use of a mechanical combination having a defined mode of operation, working on lead at a high degree of heat, but yet in a set or solid state, it can be separated and perfectly reunited or welded, to manufacture pipes either of a better quality or at less expense than by any other known method, they cannot be said to have simply discovered an abstract fact not before known; but how, and by what means to produce a useful result—a result never before produced in that way and by such means; the exercise of which would be useful to society. And in determining what is the new thing discovered or invented, the discovery of the practical fact cannot be separated from the employment of the means by which the newly discovered property of the lead is rendered indispensable to the result to be produced.

The employment of a known mechanical combination or construction, to produce a given result not before produced in like manner, by acting on the material to be wrought in a different condition necessary to produce the required result, is the subject-matter of patent, and not a mere double use.

Russell v. Cowley, Webb. Pat. Cas., 459, 465; Curt. Pat., sec. 88, and cases there cited.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the final decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, on a bill filed by the appellees to restrain the infringement, by the appellants, of a patent for making lead pipe, and for general relief.

A suit at law was commenced, after the filing of the bill, on or about the 10th of May, 1847, to recover damages for the same infringement.

This action was twice tried—once on the 3d May, 1848, and resulted in a verdict for the appellants, which was set aside by the court, and a new trial awarded. It was tried in May, 1849, when the jury gave a verdict for the respondents for $11,394 in damages. Exceptions were taken to the charge, and the judgment was reversed, and a new trial ordered in December Term, 1852. 14 How., 156.

Before this decision was made, and in January, 1852, it was stipulated between the counsel for the respective parties that the testimony taken on the last trial in the action at law should be read; and it forms the principal part of the evidence on both sides in this suit.

The action at law was not to be tried again; but the suit in equity was prosecuted in its stead.

The patent, under which the plaintiff's claim, bears date the 14th March, 1846; and in their schedule they say: "Our invention consists in certain improvements upon and additions to the machinery used for manufacturing pipes and tubes from lead or tin, or any alloy of soft metals, capable of being forced, by great pressure, from out of a receiver, through or between apertures, dies and cores, when in a set or solid state, set forth in the specification of a patent granted to Thomas Burr, of Shrewsbury, in Shropshire, England, dated the 11th of April, 1820, recited in the Repertory of Arts, &c., London, &c."

The bill alleges that John and Charles Hanson, of England, were the inventors of the improvements specified, on or prior to the 31st of August, 1837; that on the 10th of January, 1840, the Hansons assigned to H. B. & B. Tatham, two of the defendants in error, the full and exclusive right to said improvements; that on the 29th March, 1841, letters patent were granted for the improvements to the Tathams, as the assignees of the Hansons; that afterwards H. B. & B. Tatham assigned to G. N. Tatham, the remaining defendant, an undivided third part of the patent.

On the 14th March, 1846, the said letters patent were surrendered, on the ground that the specifications of the improvements claimed were defective; and a new patent was issued, which granteed to the patentees, their heirs, &c., for the term of fourteen years from the 31st August, 1837, the exclusive right to make and vend the improvements secured.

The defendants denied the infringement charged.

A great number of facts were proved, showing the successful manufacture of lead in the mode stated in the specifications, and particularly that "pipes thus made are found to possess great solidity and unusual strength, and a fine uniformity of thickness and accuracy is arrived at, such as, it is believed, has never been attained by any other machinery." And they say the essential difference in the character of this pipe, which distinguishes it, as well as that contemplated by Thomas Burr, from all others heretofore known or attempted, is, that it is wrought under heat, by pressure and constriction, from set metal, and that it is not a casting formed in a mold.

"And it was proved, that in all the modes of making lead pipe previously known and in use, it could be made only in short pieces; but that, by this improved mode, it could be made of any required length, and also of any size; and that the introduction of lead pipe made in the mode described had superseded the use of that made by any of the modes before in use, and that it was also furnished at a less price." And it was proved that lead, when recently become set, and while under heat and extreme pressure, in a close vessel, would re-unite perfectly after a separation of its parts.

In the case of The Household Company v. Neilson, Web. Pat. Cas., 683, it is said: "A patent will be good, though the subject of the patent consists in the discovery of a great, general, and most comprehensive principle in science or law of nature, if that principle is, by the specification, applied to any special purpose, so as thereby to effectuate a practical result and benefit not previously attained."

Mr. Justice Clerk Hope, in his charge to the jury, said: "The specification does not claim anything as to the form, nature, shape, materials, numbers, or mathematical character, of the vessel or vessels in which the air is to be heated, or as to the mode of heating such vessels."

Now, in this case it must not be forgotten that the machinery was not claimed as a part of the invention; but the jury were instructed to inquire "whether the specification was not such as to enable workmen of ordinary skill to make machinery or apparatus capable of producing the effect set forth in said letters patent and specification;" and that, in order to ascertain whether the defendants had infringed the patent, the jury should inquire whether they "did, by themselves or others, and in contravention of the privileges conferred by the letters patent, use machinery or apparatus substantially the same with the machinery or described in the plaintiffs' specification, and to the effect set forth in said letters and specification."

Now, as no specification was claimed in regard to the machinery, it is not perceived how the patent could be infringed, unless upon the principle that, having claimed to specific mode of applying the heat, he could use any mode he might prefer, in defiance of the rights of other patentees.

Now, this cannot be law; certainly it is not law under the Patent Act of this country. That Act requires the making and constructing "the thing, in such full, clear and exact terms, as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it appertains, to make, construct, and use the same."

Alderson B. Webster's Patent Cases, 342, says: "The distinction between a patent for a principle and a patent which can be supported is, that you must have an embodiment of the principle in some practical mode described in the specification of carrying into actual effect; and then you take out your patent, not for the principle, but for the mode of carrying the principle into effect."

"It is quite true, that a patent cannot be taken out solely for an abstract philosophical principle—for instance, for any law of nature or any property of matter, apart from any mode of turning it to account. A mere discovery of such a principle is not an invention, in the patent law sense of the term." Web. Cases, 683.

However brilliant the discovery of the new principle may be, to make it useful it must be applied to some practical purpose. Short of this, no patent can be granted. And it would not seem to be a work of much labor for a man of ingenuity to describe what he has invented.

The "newly discovered property in the metal, and the practical adaptation of it, by these means, to the production of a new result, namely: the manufacture of wrought pipe out of solid lead," was the discovery. "There can be no patent for a principle; but for a principle so far embodied and connected with corporeal substances as to be in a condition to act and to produce effects in any trade, mystery, or manual occupation, there may be a patent."

"It is not that the patentee conceived an abstract notion that the consumption in fire engines may be lessened; but he discovered a practical manner of doing it, and for that he has taken his patent. This is a very different thing from taking a patent for a principle."

The principle may be the new and valuable discovery, but the practical application of it to some useful purpose is the test of its value.

In the case of Le Roy v. Tatham, 14 How., 156, it was said, "that in the view taken by the court in the construction of the patent, it was not material whether the mere combination of machinery referred to was similar to the combination used by the Hansons, because the originality did not consist in the novelty in the machinery, but in bringing a newly discovered principle into practical application, by which a useful article is produced, and wrought pipe made, as distinguished from cast pipe."

Now, it must be observed that the machinery used was admitted to be old, and any difference in form and strength must arise from the mode of manufacturing the pipes. The new property in the metal claimed to have been discovered by the patentees belongs to the process of manufacture. The result is before us. We see the manufactured article, and are told that its substance is greatly modified and improved, but we derive little or no knowledge from inspecting it. Except by the known process of its formation we cannot appreciate its value, or comprehend the various purposes for which it was made. We want to see and understand the processes by which it was formed, the machinery in action, and a full explanation of its parts.

The claimants say: "We wish it to be understood that we do not confine ourselves to the mode of operation herein described, by making the cylinder rise with the hydraulic ram and other parts, and keeping the piston stationary, as the same effects will take place when the cylinder is stationary, and the power of the ram is applied to the top of the piston to cause it to descend into the cylinder, and our improvements might be applied to a cylinder and press, fitted up in other respects upon Burr's plans, whereby the pipe is received over the top of the machinery, &c., all which and other variations will readily suggest themselves to any practical engineer, without departing from the substantial originality of our invention.

"The combination of the following parts above described is claimed, to wit: the core and bridge, or guidepiece, with the cylinder, the piston, the chamber, and the die, when used to form pipes of metal, under heat and pressure, in the manner set forth, or in any other mode substantially the same."

To the above is added: "We do not claim as our invention and improvement any of the parts of the above-described machinery, independently of their arrangement and combination above set forth."

The machinery described in both the above sentences is only claimed when used to form pipes of metal under heat and pressure. And it must be admitted, that the machinery described and illustrated by the drawings is sufficiently explicit to show the nature of the invention. If it be admitted that the machinery, or a part of it, was not new when used to produce the new product, still it was so combined and modified as to produce new results, within the patent law. One new and operative agency in the production of the desired result would give novelty to the entire combination.

The specifications are drawn with care and no ordinary skill, and they cannot be misunderstood. No one can be supposed to mistake the new product for the machinery through which it is developed. And in regard to a practical application of the new conception, it is as necessary as the conception itself; and they must unite in the patent. "The apparatus described is properly regarded by the patentees as subordinate, and as important only as enabling them to give practical effect to the newly discovered property, by which they produce the new manufacture." Certainly no comparison was instituted between the mechanical contrivance used and the new discovery.

In the case of Le Roy v. Tatham, 14 How., 176, the court instructed the jury, "that the originality of the invention did not consist in the novelty of the machinery, but in bringing a newly discovered principle into practical use."

Principle is often applied to a machine to describe its movements and effect; and we are told that the originality of this invention did not "consist in the novelty of the machinery, but in bringing a newly discovered principle into practical effect." Whether the new manufacture was the result of frequent experiments or of accident, it will be admitted that the process has been demonstrated to the satisfaction of all observers; and this has been done in the mode described.

In the complicated and powerful machinery used to produce this result, it is not perceived why it should not be adverted to, as showing the most natural and satisfactory explanation of the discovery. It is only necessary to examine the machinery combined, to see that its parts are dissimilar to others in use; and there would seem to be no other reason for the use of the new principle, to the exclusion of the mechanical structures employed, except a higher reach of knowledge. However this may be, it would seem that, when dealing with a patentable subject, its appropriate name should be given to the machinery by which it was developed. The admitted want of novelty in the machinery, referred to so frequently, might invite criticism, if it were necessary, to the case in 14th Howard; but the case now before us is in chancery, and has been deliberately considered.

Up to the year 1837, the date of Hanson's invention, two methods only were known of making wrought pipe from lead, in the set or solid state, and these were the Burr method and the draw-bench method. As soon as the plan of the Hansons was introduced, they superseded all other methods.

Both of the above methods were defective—the draw bench on account of the great labor, limited length of pipe, produced and unequal thickness; and the Burr, because of the difficulty of holding the core central in the die, in forming pipes of small caliber.

The superiority of the Burr method, for the general purposes of manufacturing leaden pipes which require different sizes to be made, was so slight, as it seems, that for seventeen years after the date of the Burr patent, not one of such machines was put in use in the United States or in Europe.

In this combination of machinery there are six essential parts:

First. A metal cylinder, capable of receiving the lead in a fluid state, and permitting it to become set or solid therein, and of great strength.

Second. A piston, which is a solid metallic body, fitted to the bore of the cylinder, to work therein accurately, to prevent the charge of lead from escaping around it, and so connected with a hydraulic press, or other motor of great power, as to traverse the length of the cylinder with a force applied, of several tons, to force out the charge of lead, not in the liquid state.

Third. A die, which is simply a block of steel, with a central hole of a cylindrical form, and of a diameter of the pipe to be made.

Fourth. A core, which is simply a short cylindrical rod of steel, of the diameter of the caliber of the pipe to be made.

Fifth. A bridge or core holder, which is a plate of metal with apertures, having four or more arms radiating from the central part, which has a central hole of the size of the core.

Sixth. A chamber of construction, located between the bridge and the die, and extending from the one to the other, and either conical or cylindrical, provided the end next the bridge be made of greater diameter than the die.

It is rare that so clear and satisfactory an explanation is given to the machinery which performs the important functions above specified. We are satisfied that the patent is sustainable, and that the complainants are entitled to the relief claimed by them.

In the order of the court, entered by Mr. Justice McLean, appears the following:

"It is the opinion of this court, that the complainants in the court below are entitled to recover from the defendants the sum of $16,815.57. Whereupon it is now here ordered, adjudged and decreed by this court, that the decree of the said circuit court in this cause be, and the same is hereby affirmed, to the extent of the aforesaid sum of $16,815.57, and that it be reversed as to the residue; and that this cause be, and that the same is hereby remanded to the said circuit court, with directions to enter a decree for that amount in favor of the complainants. And it is further ordered and decreed by this court, that the costs in the court below be paid by respondents in that court, the appellants here, and that each party pay his own costs in this court."

v.

WILLIAM W. WOODFOLK.

(See S. C., 22 How., 318-330.)

In equity, payment of price of lands, and transfer of title, correlative obligations—vendee may pay incumbrance, from purchase money, or for defects—after contract executed, the only remedy is on covenants of deed, or for fraud—purchase money cannot, after payment, be reclaimed as security—conveyance of less, with indemnity, not decreed—nor security for fulfillment of contract.

A court of chancery regards the transfer of real property in a contract of sale, and the payment of the price, as correlative obligations.

The one is the consideration of the other; and the one failing, leaves the other without a cause.

A vendor is allowed a lien for the price of the property, against the vendee and his assigns.

The vendee is permitted to appropriate the purchase money, to exonerate his estate from a lien or incumbrance, and, in some cases, to compensate for original defects in the estate, as respects its quantity, quality or extent of vendor's interest therein.

If the contract has been executed by the delivery of possession and the payment of the price, the grounds of interference are limited by the covenants of the deed, or to cases of fraud and misrepresentation.

If there is no fraud and no covenants to secure the title, the vendee is without remedy, as the vendor, selling in good faith, is not responsible for the goodness of his title, beyond the extent of the covenants in his deed.

A vendee, in possession under a contract of purchase or a deed with covenants, cannot reclaim the purchase money already paid, to be held as a security for the completion or protection of his title.

In a suit for the specific performance of a contract, if it turns out that the defendant cannot make a title to that which he has agreed to convey, the court will not compel him to convey less, with indemnity against the risk of eviction.

The purchaser is left to seek his remedy at law, in damages, for the breach of the agreement.

Where the vendee had notice of an incumbrance when he made and performed his agreement of purchase, and did not stipulate for any additional indemnity to that resulting from the covenant of warranty, the court must conclude that he was willing to rely upon the protection afforded by the covenants in his deed, and cannot, in addition, compel the vendor to deposit security for the fulfillment of his contract.

Submitted Mar. 1, 1860. Decided Apr. 9, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Arkansas.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Albert Pike, for the appellants:

The first position of the learned counsel for Woodfolk in the court below, was that, as the covenant was "to make a good and sufficient conveyance in fee simple with general warranty," and as the fee is not in Notrebe's heir, but in the bank, it follows that they cannot perform the covenant. It is too late a day in the law for us to need to produce authorities to show that the mortgagor retains the fee in the land, the mortgage being a mere lien or security.

The law is perfectly well settled, that the covenant of seisin that the grantor is seised of a good, sure, sole, lawful, absolute and indefeasible estate of inheritance in fee simple, is not broken by the existence of incumbrances which do not strike at the technical seisin of the purchaser.

See Fitzhugh v. Croghan, 2 J. J. Marsh., 439; Sedgwick v. Hollenback, 7 Johns., 380; Runyan v. Mersereau, 11 Johns., 538; 16 Johns., 254; Tuite v. Miller, 10 Ohio, 388; Lewis v. Lewis, 5 Rich., 12.

The agreement here is, to make "a good and sufficient conveyance in fee simple," that will be satisfied by a conveyance by deed of bargain and sale with covenant of seisin (i e., indefeasible title in fee simple), or of good title and right to convey, which is the same thing.

The chief question in this case is a perfectly simple one. Woodfolk proposed to purchase certain land of Notrebe; he was informed that it was mortgaged to the Real Estate Bank, which was insolvent. The mortgage was of record and the charter of the bank, showing the liability under mortgage, was a public law of the land. It was totally uncertain what would be the ultimate liability under the mortgage. It was meant to cover the share of Notrebe and Cummins, in any of the deficit of the assets of the bank. Whether there would be any deficit or not, was not known. Notrebe told Woodfolk all he knew about it; that the bank attorney thought there would not. All the sources and means of information on the subject, were as open to Woodfolk as to Notrebe; and knowing, or having the means of knowing, all that anybody could know, he purchased the land at the low price of $10.50 per acre, and took a bond from Notrebe, to make him "a good and sufficient conveyance in simple, with covenant of warranty."

Can he, after occupying the land several years, and paying up the purchase money, when it is still as uncertain as ever, what, if any, will be the ultimate liability under the stock mortgages claim at the hands of a court of equity, that it shall compel Notrebe's heirs to indemnify him against such contingent liability? or will it not be held that he made a chancing bargain, an aleatory contract, getting the land at the price he did, on account of the contingent incumbrance upon it, and taking the risk of that incumbrance? That is the whole question.

The words of the covenant do not bind Notrebe to make a conveyance with a covenant against incumbrances.

It is not a case of a defective title, where, as held in Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet., 297, the vendee may enjoin payment of the purchase money, until ability to comply with the agreement for title is shown.

It is very clear, that if Woodfolk had a covenant against incumbrances, and were now to sue on it, in the absence of any eviction or foreclosure, he could recover only nominal damages.

Delavergne v. Norris, 7 Johns., 358; De Forest v. Leete, 16 Johns., 128; Stanard v. Eldridge, 16 Johns., 256; Clark v. Perry, 30 Me., 148.

There is no doubt as to the rule, that where a vendor does not in his covenants specially except such incumbrances as are known to the purchaser, and subject to which the purchaser agrees to take the property, the fact of their being known to the purchaser will not prevent a recovery at law on the covenants. That we admit. But it is perfectly obvious, that such knowledge on the part of the purchaser should operate strongly, if not conclusively, against his right to equitable relief, where the covenants are yet not so broken as to give a right to actual damages.

If suit were now brought on a covenant against incumbrances, on account of this mortgage, nominal damages only could be recovered.

Vane v. Lord Barnard, Gilb. Eq., 7; Bean v. Mayo, 5 Me., 94; Randell v. Mallet, 14 Me., 51; Herrick v. Moore, 19 Me., 313; Richardson v. Dorr, 5 Vt., 9; Davis v. Lyman, 6 Conn., 255; Jenkins v. Hopkins, 8 Pick., 348; Leffingwell v. Elliott, 8 Pick., 457; Tufts v. Adams, 8 Pick., 549; Brooks v. Moody, 20 Pick., 474; Commings v. Little, 24 Pick., 269; Baldwin v. Munn, 2 Wend., 405; Gilbert v. Wiman, 1 N. Y., 563; Patterson v. Stewart, 6 Watts. & S., 528; Pomeroy v. Burnett, 8 Blackf., 143; Foote v. Burnet, 10 Ohio, 317; Halsey v. Reed, 1 Paige, 446.

The quia timet jurisdiction of the court of equity is one which the court has often exercised; but it will be extremely tender in so doing, because it materially varies the agreement of the parties at the time of the transaction.

Flight v. Cook, 2 Ves., 620.

And the doctrine seems to be well settled, that where a deed has been executed, and the only covenants in it are for quiet enjoyment or of warranty, and so long as there has been no eviction, actual or constructive, equity will, as a general rule, refuse to entertain a bill for relief, either by way of enjoining the purchase money, or a fortiori, by rescinding the contract; and although it has at times been intimated that the presence of a covenant for seisin may in some cases fortify the position of the purchaser, it does not appear that the cases generally draw much distinction between the different covenants for title.

Rawle, Cov., 679, and the many cases cited.

If this contract is still executory, then in that case, as a general rule, the purchaser is entitled to a good title, free from incumbrances. He cannot be forced specifically to perform, unless such title can be made. If sued for the purchase money, he may enjoin its collection or compel the removal of incumbrances. That is the general rule. But the question here is, what relief has he in equity, if making the bargain, knowing of an incumbrance, he pays the purchase money without requiring it to be removed, and when it is of the nature of the one here complained of.

It is not a question here whether he could be compelled to peform his contract. He has performed it; he is in possession; he has used the land and enjoyed its issues now for nearly ten years. He does not offer to give it up. He protests against doing so. If he had all the covenants he could possibly demand, there has been no breach of any of them that would entitle him to damages, and therefore he would be entitled to recover only nominal damages at law, and would have no relief in equity; it is too clear to be denied.

Rawle, 680.

How can he be entitled to any more relief because he has not yet taken a deed?

In Anonymous, Freem. Ch., 106, a case was cited, "where a purchaser brought his bill to be relieved where incumbrances were concealed; but was dismissed; for he ought to have provided against it by covenants; but it was said by Rawlinson, that if the purchaser had in this case had his money in his hands, this court would have helped him, but not after he had paid his money."

The difference between the principles that govern executed contracts, and those that govern executory ones, is a broad one; before the consummation of the contract, the criterion of which event is the execution of the deed, the right of the purchaser to a title clear of defects and incumbrances, is an undoubted one, given by law and not created by the particular terms of a covenant in the agreement, nor lost or even weakened by the absence of any stipulation for covenants, or as to warranty and title; after that time, his rights are regulated, both at law and in equity, solely by the covenants he has received.

Looking into the cases on executory contracts, we find as follows: "A purchaser discovering an incumbrance, shall retain so much for it as remains in his hands."

Troughton v. Troughton, 1 Ves., 86; see, also, 2 Sug. Vend., 419; Hart v. Porter's Exs., 5 Serg. & R., 201; Witherspoon v. Anderson, 3 Desaus., 246.

Notrebe, by his bond for title, did not agree to warrant against incumbrances. He agreed to make a good and sufficient conveyance in fee simple, with general warranty. A deed, with covenants of title and right to convey and general warranty, without any covenant against incumbrances, would fully satisfy that contract.

When a man covenants against incumbrances he cannot be allowed to show by parol that a particular incumbrance was accepted, for that would be to contradict and vary the terms of a written instrument; and therefore he cannot show that the vendee knew of such incumbrance, because that is offered solely as tending to prove that he took the contract subject to that incumbrance. That is the rule and the reason of the rule.

Funk v. Voneida, 11 Serg. & R., 112; Levitt v. Withrington, Lutw., 317; Hubbard v. Norton, 10 Conn., 422; Grice v. Scarborough, 2 Spears, 654; Harlow v. Thomas, 15 Pick., 70; Townsend v. Weld, 8 Mass., 146; Porter v. Noyes, 2 Me., 22; Donnell v. Thompson, 10 Me., 117; Collingwood v. Irwin, 3 Watts, 309; Suydam v. Jones, 10 Wend., 184.

Woodfolk does not ask to be excused from performing his contract—that is, from taking the land. He has paid for it and wishes to keep it. There is no suit against him to compel him to take it; none by him to procure a rescission. He has no covenant on which he could now recover. He has no right to ask a covenant against incumbrances. And knowing of the incumbrances when he purchased, and when he paid for the land, he must be satisfied with such covenants as he has, and with his legal remedy thereon, whenever he is endamaged. Until then, as he has no cause of action at law, so equity has no relief to give him.

Allen v. Lee, 1 Smith, Ind., 12; 1 Cart., 58; 2 Hughes' Prec., 2d ed., 205; Savage v. Whitebread, 3 Ch. R., 24; Ogilvie v. Foljambe, 3 3 Meriv., 48; Rawle, 607, and cases there cited; Ludwig v. Huntzinger, 5 Watts & S., 58: Ross, Appeal, 9 Pa., 497; McGhee v. Jones, 10 Ga., 127; Fludyer v. Cocker, 12 Ves., 27; Burroughs v. Oakley, 1 Meriv., 52; Margravine of Anspach v. Noel, 1 Madd., 316.

We have sought in vain for a case where a bill, asking indemnity alone, has been sustained or even heard of, filed by a purchaser, when that indemnity was sought against an encumbrance by mortgage well known to the purchaser at and before the time of purchase, and where he had fully paid the purchase money, without requiring indemnity or complaining of the incumbrance.

It is a mere attempt "to amend the plaintiff's security in equity; to give him a better remedy for his money in chancery, than he had provided for himself by the condition of the bond which he took." There was no fraud in Notrebe; he told Woodfolk all that he himself knew about the incumbrance; the bill is a plain attempt to get a court of chancery to mend Woodfolk's bargain, and we see no better ground to assign for the application, than "that chancery ought to suffer no man to have an ill bargain."

A bill filed for compensation singly, cannot be maintained.

The jurisdiction of equity in cases of compensation, is only incidental and ancillary to that of giving relief by enforcing the performance of contracts for the sale of real property.

Newham v. May, 13 Price, 749.

The court will give it when title to a part of the property fails, and it decrees that the purchaser shall accept, or he agrees to accept, that to which there is a good title.

Besant v. Richards, 1 Taml., 509; Pratt v. Law, 9 Cranch, 458, &c.

Mr. R. J. Meigs, for appellee:

Since the covenant is to convey, that is to transfer and pass the fee, well and sufficiently, and the fee is not in Notrebe's heirs, but in the Real Estate Bank, it follows that they cannot perform the covenant. No one can dispute the proposition, that if a man agrees to sell me an estate in fee simple and cannot make a title to the fee simple, I can insist upon his giving me all the title he has.

Wood v. Griffith, Wils. Ch., 44; cited by Sug. Vend., ch. 7, sec. 1, part 33, 7th Am. ed.

Not only am I entitled in such a case to have performance from the vendor, so far as he is able, but I have a right to compensation on those points which do not admit of fulfillment.

Waters v. Travis, 9 Johns., 464; cases cited by Perkins in note, and Sug., ch. 7, sec. 1, par. 33, and cases cited by Hare and Wallace to White & Tudor's Lead. Cas., Vol. II., part 2, p. 35.

These cases and many others show that the compensation is to be made by an abatement or reduction of the purchase money, when it has not been paid.

See Sugden, ch. 7, sec. 1, part 34; Jopling v. Dooley, 1 Yerg., 289-290.

The same principle governs the case of an incumbrance on the land, and even the case of an adverse title, which, when extinguished by the vendee, inures to the benefit of the vendor, he making an abatement in the purchase money equal to what it cost to clear the title.

Meadows v. Hopkins, Meigs, 181, 186; Knox v. Thomas, 5 Humph., 573; Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet., 264; See Searcy v. Kirkpatrick, Cooke, 211; Mitchell v. Barry, 4 Hayw., 136, 143.

If, before the payment of the purchase money in this case, Woodfolk discovering the incumbrance of the $12,000, had paid it to the bank, he could have had an abatement of the purchase money pro tanto. If, after the payment of the purchase money, and being put in possession, he had then for the first time discovered the fact that the land was subject to the mortgage for the $12,000, it is clear that Notrebe would have been compelled to refund or extinguish the mortgage. But it is said that Woodfolk had notice of the mortgage for $30,000.

Counsel then reviewed the circumstances of the case on this subject, and contended that it could not be claimed that Woodfolk, in his purchase, intended to or did assume the risk of the incumbrance.

In this case we have a covenant on the part of Notrebe, to make Woodfolk a good and sufficient conveyance in fee simple with general warranty. Notrebe is to cause Woodfolk to have the land usefully against all persons.

Pothier on Sales, sec. 203.

The deed must transfer the fee simple against all claims whatsoever. This is implied in the word "conveyance."

See Clute v. Robinson, 2 Johns., 612; Everson v. Kirtland, 4 Paige, 638; Carpenter v. Bailey, 17 Wend., 244; Traver v. Halsted, 23 Wend., 66; Pomeroy v. Drury, 14 Barb., 424; and other cases cited in Rawle, Cov., 464, 566.

So far from there being in this case a stipulation "in express terms" or "broadly stated," that Woodfolk should take such title as Notrebe had, exactly the reverse is broadly expressed in the covenant, to make "a good and sufficient conveyance in fee simple." Sometimes, indeed, a purchaser has waived his right to object to the seller's title. Taking possession, however, is merely evidence of intention. If possession is authorized by the contract to be taken before a title is made, the fact of possession cannot by itself be used against the purchaser, for that would be contrary to the very terms of the contract.

Sugd., ch. 8, sec. 1, part 22-24, 33, 34, &c.

It is familiar law, that the general principles of the contract of sale, both in this country and in England, recognize and enforce, while it is still executory as in this case, the right of the purchaser to a title clear of defects and incumbrances.

Rawle, Cov., 566; Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N. Y., 535, supra.

But practically, how is this to be done in a case circumstanced as the one in hand? Before the payment of the purchase money, we have seen that it can be done by an abatement of the purchase money to an amount equal to the cost of removing the incumbrance. And the vendor must discharge an incumbrance not disclosed to the vendee, whether he has or has not agreed to covenant against incumbrances, before he can compel the payment of the purchase money.

Sugden, ch. 12, sec. 2, part 2.

Although the interest money has been paid and the conveyance is executed, yet, if the defect do not appear on the face of the title deed, and the vendor was aware of the defect and concealed it from the purchaser, or suppressed the instrument by which the incumbrance was created, or on the face of which it appeared, he is in every such case guilty of a fraud; and the purchaser may either bring his action on the case or file his bill in equity.

Sugden, ch. 2, sec. 2, part 17.

In Sergeant Maynard's case, he was denied relief because he had parted with his money and taken a bond for repayment of it on a certain condition.

2 Freeman, 2.

In our case, Woodfolk took a bond to make him a good and sufficient conveyance in fee, and then paid the purchase money. And afterwards he discovers that the land is incumbered for more than its entire value, the incumbrance having been represented to him as of no validity or force, and its true nature sedulously concealed, and the deed not even shown.

Now, in these circumstances, he is entitled unquestionably to a conveyance in fee simple that shall be effectual.

If the court be of opinion that Woodfolk is entitled to "an operative conveyance—one that carries with it a good and sufficient title to the lands conveyed," as Kent said in Clute v. Robinson, 2 Johns., 612, already cited, there seems to be no practical way of effecting this, but by compelling Notrebe's heir and representatives to extinguish the mortgage, or to buy so many state bonds as shall be equal to the stock bond.

By one of the conditions of the mortgage, the land is to be discharged, if Notrebe and Cummins, or their heirs or assigns, shall well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, to whom it may be due, so much or such sum of the bonds of the State of Arkansas issued by said State in favor of the bank aforesaid, and the interest on said bonds of the State, or such part thereof as shall be equal to the stock allowed and granted to them, Notrebe and Cummins.

Now, this suggests the relief to which Woodfolk seems in reason and justice entitled. Let Notrebe's heirs and representatives buy $30,000 of the state bonds and deposit them in this court, and the land will be discharged.

Or, if it is less onerous, let them indemnify Woodfolk by granting hin a mortgage upon some other property, which may enable him to protect his land in the event the mortgage of it is enforced in favor of the holders of the state bonds.

It is plain that the heir of Notrebe cannot make a good and sufficient conveyance in fee simple, without in some way releasing the estate from the mortgage; and it is equally plain, that there is no way of releasing the estate from the mortgage but by paying a sum equal to the stock. And Woodfolk might insist upon it; but if he is willing to take such title as can be decreed out of the heir, with an indemnity against the mortgage, that is a relief which is within the power of a court of chancery. The subject will be found pretty fully discussed in Sug. Vend. & P., ch. 10, sec. 2. And the weight of the cases there stated and commented on, cannot certainly be regarded as weakened in the least by what is reported to have been said by Lord Eldon in Balmanno v. Lumley, 1 Ves. & B., 225, cited by Sugden in ch. 7, sec. 2, part 36. The case, when examined, cannot possibly have the slighest weight, seeing that it is reported in so crude a manner as to leave us wholly in the dark as to its circumstances.

The indemnity which the heir of Notrebe seems bound to make, will be as already suggested, the substitution of another estate instead of the lands sold to Woodfolk, to be held by a trustee, to save him harmless against the mortgage. When we ask this, we only ask that Notrebe's heir shall assume the burden of Notrebe's debt, and relieve the complainant against liability for it—a liability which, in his opinion, is not merely visionary, but is extremely likely to embarrass and harass him in 1861, only a year hence.

See Halsey v. Grant, 13 Ves., 73; Hornblow v. Shirley, 13 Ves., 81; Cassamajor v. Strode, Wils. Ch., 428; Warren v. Bateman, 1 Flan. & K., 443.

But if the court should see fit to refuse this relief, and should hold that complainant is obliged to take such titles as is vested in Notrebe's heir, and that the bill must be dismissed as to the Real Estate Bank and its trustees, and the personal representatives of Notrebe; yet it is indispensably necessary as to the heir of Notrebe. She is an infant and a married woman, and it is quite impossible that the equity which is vested in her can be deveested and vested in the complainant, but by a decree in equity.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee (Woodfolk) filed this bill in the circuit court against the executors and heirs of Frederick Notrebe, deceased, and the trustees of the Real Estate Bank of Arkansas.

He represents that, in 1845, he concluded an agreement with Notrebe for the purchase of fourteen hundred and seventy-eight acres of unimproved land in Arkansas, for $15,518, a portion payable in cash, and the remainder in installments, secured by his notes and bond. Notrebe and his wife obligated themselves, when the payment should be completed, to convey to him the land in fee simple, "by a good and sufficient deed, with general warranty of title, duly executed, according to law."

The appellee has established a plantation upon the land, and has greatly improved its value. He completed the payment in 1850, when the executor of Notrebe offered a deed executed by his widow and heir at law, in which there was a covenant of warranty, in fulfillment of the agreement of his testator. The appellee declined to accept this, because the land had been mortgaged to the Real Estate Bank of Arkansas, in 1837, by Notrebe, to secure the payment of his note for $30,000, payable in October, 1861, with five per cent. interest annually, which Notrebe had given for three hundred shares of the stock of that bank. The appellee charges that the existence of this mortgage was concealed from him until after the conclusion of his agreement, and that afterwards he was deceived by misrepresentations of the condition of the title, until he had paid the whole of the purchase money. He prays that the title be examined, and that the defendants be required to remove the incumbrance, or to give him effectual indemnity against it, and that the distribution of the estate of Notrebe be restrained until this be done.

The defendants answered the bill, and have successfully repelled the imputations of fraud and misrepresentation, but admit the existence of the mortgage, and fail to impair its validity.

The circuit court, upon the pleadings and proofs, declare that the "entire transaction" between Notrebe and the appellee "was bona fide and free from fraud," and that the latter had notice of the mortgage as a subsisting and operative incumbrance upon the land before he concluded his contract; but that Notrebe had agreed to convey the land free of incumbrance and with warranty of title, and that the vendee is entitled to the performance of that contract; but that the debt of the decedent, not being at maturity, and of a character not to be ascertained before that time, all that could be done would be to provide an indemnity against the peril it created.

The court proceed to require of the executors to remove the incumbrance whenever it can be done, and then to convey the land by a deed with warranty, and with the relinquishment of dower by the widow; and meanwhile, that they should deposit with the clerk of the court bonds of the State of Arkansas, for the amount of Notrebe's note and the interest ($61,500), to be held and appropriated under the order of the court as indemnity, or that the executors might, in part or for the whole, convey to the clerk unincumbered real estate of the same value, for the same object and under the same conditions.

The Real Estate Bank was established on a loan, by the State of Arkansas, of its bonds, which the bank sold to form its capital. The principal and interest of these bonds were to be paid by the bank; and its means of doing so were afforded by the securities obtained from the loan of its capital and profits of business, and the bonds and mortgages of the stockholders, to the extent of their subscription of stock. Each stockholder having given a bond and mortgage to the bank corresponding to the pro rata amount of the state bonds issued to the bank, as compared with the stock, and which were pledged for the payment of the state bonds, the sum to be paid by any shareholder on this debt depends upon the degree of the insolvency of the bank. In case of the loss of its entire capital, the stockholder becomes liable to pay his entire debt.

The pleadings and proofs in this case show that the bank has suffered a loss of a portion of its capital, but no data are afforded to ascertain the amount of the loss. The decree of the circuit court assumes that the loss may be total; and the indemnity awarded was determined as if the fact would correspond with the possibility. This appeal was made to test the validity of this decree.

A court of chancery regards the transfer of real property in a contract of the sale and the payment of the price as correlative obligations. The one is the consideration of the other; and the one failing, leaves the other without a cause. In Ogilvie v. Foljambe, 3 Mer., 53, Sir William Grant says: "The right to a good title is a right not growing out of the agreement of the parties, but which is given by law. The purchaser insists on having a good title, not because it is stipulated for by agreement, but on the general right of a purchaser to require it."

Upon this principle, a vendor is allowed a lien or privilege for the price of the property against the vendee and his assigns; and the vendee is permitted to appropriate the purchase money, to exonerate his estate from a lien or incumbrance, and in some cases to compensate for original defects in the estate, as respect its quantity, quality, or extent of vendor's interest therein.

The cases cited on the part of of the appellee support this doctrine, and confirm the argument that he was entitled, under his contract (having no reference to extrinsic circumstances), to the fee simple estate, without diminution. Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet., 264; Burwell v. Jackson, 9 N.Y., 535; Cullum v. Bank of Ala., 4 Ala., 21.

But such circumstances may very materially modify the situation of the parties, and indispose that court to interfere between them, even in cases within the jurisdiction of the court. If the contract has been executed by the delivery of possession and the payment of the price, the grounds of interference are limited by the covenants of the deed, or to cases of fraud and misrepresentation. "The cases will show," say this court, "that a purchaser in the undisturbed possession of the land will not be relieved against the payment of the purchase money on the mere ground of defect of title, there being no fraud or misrepresentation; and that in such a case he must seek his remedy at law, on the covenants in his deed; that if there is no fraud and no covenants to secure the title, he is without remedy, as the vendor, selling in good faith, is not responsible for the goodness of his title beyond the extent of the covenants in his deed. Patton v. Taylor, 7 How., 132.

This rule, experience has shown, reconciles the claims of convenience with the duties of good faith. The purchaser is stimulated to employ vigilance and care in reference to the things as to which they will secure him from injustice, while it affords no shelter for bad faith on either part.

The intermediate cases—those in which the parties have advanced in the completion of their contract, and are still willing to abide by it, and there arises a real inability or a well-founded apprehension of danger, in that stage of their proceedings, to the completion of the contract—have created much embarrasment. Some of these cases have been settled upon terms of compensation, in which the court of chancery has exercised a doubtful jurisdiction, in modifying the conditions of the contract according to the supervening circumstances. White v. Cuddon, 8 Cl. & Fin., 766; Thomas v. Dering, 1 Keen, 729; Dart, Vend. and P., 499, et seq.

We have met with no case in which a vendee, in possession under a contract of purchase or a deed with covenants, has been permitted to reclaim the purchase money already paid, to be held as a security for the completion or protection of his title. The Roman law permitted the vendee to retain the purchase money in his hands, as security against an impending danger to the title; but denied a suit for restitution, after payment, for that cause. "We must not," says Troplong, "hastily break up a contract which the vendor may at last be able to fulfill. There is no analogy between the case in which the purchaser is allowed to retain the price as security, and that in which he would force the vendee to restore it for that purpose. Between the right of retention and that of restitution of the price, there is the distance between the statu quo and rescission. Trop. de Vente, No. 614; Dalloz, Juris. gen. tit. de Vente, sec. 1170.

The decree of the circuit court does not direct the restitution of the purchase money to the vendee, nor its application by the vendor to assure the attainment of the object of the contract; but it sequestrates property of the vendor of four times the amount, to be held or disposed of by the court in its discretion, to assure the accomplishment of that object. In the case of Milligan v. Cooke, 16 Ves., 114, Lord Eldon made an order that the purchaser should be compensated for the difference in the value between the title contracted for and that exhibited; and if that difference could not be ascertained, the master was directed to settle the security to be given by the defendant as indemnity to the purchasr against disturbance or eviction; and a similar order was made in Walker v. Barnes, 3 Madd., 247. But there were conditions in the contract that authorized the order.

In Balmanno v. Lumley, 1 Ves. & B., 224, and Paton v. Brebner, 1 Bligh. P. C., 42, the cases in which such a relief could be granted appear to be limited to that class. In the latter case Lord Eldon said: "This suit is in substance or effect (allowing for dissimilarities between English and Scotch proceedings) in the nature of a suit in a court of equity in England for the specific performance of a contract. In such a suit, if it turns out that the defendant cannot make a title to that which he has agreed to convey, the court will not compel him to convey less, with indemnity against the risk of eviction. The purchaser is left to seek his remedy at law, in damages for the breach of the agreement."

In Aylett v. Ashton, 1 Myl. & C., 105, the master of the rolls, upon the authority of the cases cited, said: "Parties, no doubt, may contract for a covenant of indemnity; but if they do not, the court cannot compel a party to execute a conveyance and to give an indemnity." To the same effect is Ridgway v. Gray, 1 Macn. & G., 109.

The appellee does not seek to rescind this contract; nor does he disclose any imminent peril of disturbance or eviction, as the effect of the existence of the mortgage. The record shows that the widow and heir of Notrebe, whose covenant of warranty has been offered to the appellee, are either of them able to respond to the damages that would be awarded upon the breach of that covenant. The appellee had notice of this incumbrance when he made and performed his agreement of purchase, and did not stipulate for any additional indemnity to that resulting from the covenant of warranty. We must, therefore, conclude that he was willing to abide the settlement of the affairs of the Real Estate Bank, and to rely upon the protection afforded by the covenants in his deed. We have no reason to suppose that the vendor would have consented to deposit in the hands of a stranger four times the value of the property he sold, as a security for the fulfillment of his contract; nor can we superadd this to the other obligations he has assumed.

Our opinion is, that the decree of the district court is erroneous, and must be reversed.

The deeds tendered seem to be in conformity with the stipulation of the vendor in the agreement. The vendee may elect to take these, or he may retain the agreement.

In either case, his bill will be dismissed with costs; and for this purpose the cause is remanded.

JOSE MARIA FUENTES, Appt.,

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

(See S. C., 22 How., 443–461.)

Recitals in Mexican grants, not evidence of preliminary requirements, where there is no record —unreasonable delay to perform conditions of grant, evidence of abandonment.

It will not be presumed that the Governor of California had dispensed with the customary requirements for granting land, because there may be, in a paper said to be a grant, a declaration that they had been observed; particularly in a case where the archives do not show any record of such a grant.

The Act of 1824, and the Regulations of 1828, are limitations upon the power of the governor to make grants of land.

Where the petition, and the other requirements following it, have not been registered in the proper office with the grant itself, a presumption arises against its genuineness.

Slight testimony should not be allowed to remove the presumption.

In this case no evidence can be found on its record, to sustain the genuineness of the paper under which the land is claimed.

There is none to prove its registry, or to connect it with the book of records which was burned, or that any one of the precautionary requirements had been complied with, or that such a paper as that in question had been delivered to the claimant; and no such paper had been sent to the Departmental Assembly for its acquiescence.

Prerequisites for a grant of land should not be assumed to have been observed, on account of a recital in the paper or grant that they had been.

If none of the preliminary requirements of the Act of the Mexican Congress of 1824, and of the Regulations of 1828, are to be found in the archives, and it cannot be established by the proof that they were registered there, this court will not presume that they were preliminary to a grant, because the governor recites in the grant that they had been observed.

Opinion in Cambuston's case reaffirmed.

When it shall appear that none of the preliminary steps for granting land in California have been taken, this court will not confirm such a claim.

Where there was no proof of a survey or measurement of the land, or any performance of its conditions, it may be inferred that the grantee had abandoned his claim.

When a grantee allows years to pass, after the date of his grant, without any attempt to perform them, and without any explanation for not having done so, and then for the first time claims the land, after it had passed by Treaty from the national jurisdiction which granted it to the United States, such a delay is unreasonable, and amounts to evidence that the claim to the land has been abandoned.

Argued Dec. 20, 1859. Decided Apr. 9, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by the appellant, for the confirmation of a claim to eleven leagues of land, situated in the County of Santa Clara.

The Board of Land Commissioners entered a decree, rejecting the claim on the ground that there had been no survey or measurement of the land and no performance of the conditions by the grantee.

The district court, on appeal, having affirmed this decree, the petitioner took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. M. Blair and C. Benham, for appellant:

1. The grant is valid and ought to be confirmed, notwithstanding there was no approval of the Departmental Assembly and no judicial measurement.

U. S. v. Frémont, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 560; U. S. v. Reading, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 8; U. S. v. Cruz Cervantes, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 553; U. S. v. Vaca, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 556; U. S. v. Larkin, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 563.

2. The grant was duly recorded, and on the faith of the grant, the original is ordered to be delivered to the grantee who now produces it.

3. The proof shows that it was written and recorded in 1843, when it is conceded Governor Micheltorena had full authority to grant lands.

4. The authenticity, date and recording of the grant being clearly established, and the grant itself reciting that the grantee had petitioned for the land, and that all "the necessary steps and the precautionary proofs required by the laws and regulations" had been taken, the law will presume that the governor had performed his duty in these respects, and had not exceeded his powers.

U. S. v. Peralta, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 347; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 729; Delassus v. U. S., 9 Pet., 134; Minter v. Crommelin, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 88; Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 448.

If it is to be assumed that no grant is valid unless the grantee can show affirmatively, and independently of the recitals in the grant, that all the preliminary steps required by the Act of the Mexican Congress of Aug. 18, 1824, and the Regulation of Nov. 21, 1828, have been strictly complied with, it may be safely asserted that out of eight hundred grants made in California, scarcely one would stand such a test. All the documents, except the original grant, remained in the custody of the governor or his subordinates. To require that the grantee shall be responsible for the safe keeping of those documents, or in case of their loss, to be prepared with oral proof to establish, not only the fact of the loss or destruction of the papers, but their contents, would be to impose onerous conditions on the grantee, not only perilous to his rights, but fatal to the security of titles. When he produces a grant in due form and properly recorded, and which recites that all the preliminary steps have been performed, he may safely rest upon it as a sufficient muniment of title. He may justly claim that the government is estopped by the solemn act of its own agent from denying that those things were done which it was the duty of the governor to do, and which, under his hand and official seal, he admits were performed. Such have been regarded to be the well-considered doctrines of this court as established in a series of decisions, and no reason is perceived why this case should be deemed an exception to the general rule.

5. This grant has only the usual conditions; and they were all subsequent conditions, the non-performance of which would not, ipso facto, avoid the grant.

6. The fact that the grantee was a minor, did not invalidate the grant. There is nothing in the Act of 1824, or the Regulations of 1828, restricting the power of the governor in this respect. Under the Mexican and civil law, the age of majority was twenty-five; and the policy of the Colonization Laws was not at the variance with a grant of lands to a person under that age. The circuit judge, who delivered the opinion of the district court rejecting this claim, infers that the grantee must have imposed upon the governor by representing himself as an adult, able to fulfill the conditions of the grant. The reply to this argument is, 1st. That it is wholly unwarranted by any fact appearing in the case; 2d. Fraud is never to be presumed, but must be proved; 3d. There is not a particle of proof that the grantee was unable to fulfill the conditions; 4th. There is no proof that he did not fulfill them; 5th. Every grant made to an old and infirm person, who might afterwards appear to have been unable to fulfill the conditions, would raise the same presumption of fraud.

7. If it be conceded that the conditions were not fulfilled, this fact can raise no presumption of abandonment in this case. In the Frémont case, a failure to perform the conditions was excused because of the unsettled state of the country, and the danger arising from hostile Indians in that vicinity. In the case at bar, the country was not only in a revolutionary state from the date of the grant until about the period when the American forces took possession of the country, but the grantee was a minor, and so continued until the last-named period. We maintain that no presumption of abandonment will arise against a minor, under either the civil or common law.

Under the Spanish law in force in Mexico, the rights of minors are more fully protected than even at common law, as will appear by reference to 1 Dom. Civ. L., p. 529, Book 4, tit. 6, sec. 2, where the law relating to minors is fully collated.

In the first subdivision of this section, the author says: "The law gives relief against all acts and deeds by which their minority may have engaged them in some damage."

Under the civil law, the term "abandonment" has a technical and definite meaning, to wit: "That if a man be dissatisfied with his unmovable estate, and abandon it immediately and depart from it corporeally, with an intention that it shall no longer be his, it will become the property of him who first enters thereon.

1 Partidas Law, 50, p. 365; Escriche, p. 5, tit. "Abandono de Cosas"; Landes v. Perkins, 12 Mo., 238.

In certain cases, the doctrine of abandonment is rigidly enforced under the Spanish laws, but these are special cases, and this is not one of them.

See Escriche, p. 6.

An intention to abandon his estate will not be presumed against a minor, nor will prescription run against him.

Escriche, p. 1230, tit. "Menors"; Calvit v. Innis, 10 Mart. La., 287; 9 La., 379; Orso v. Orso, 11 La., 62.

It is evident, therefore, that under the Spanish law of abandonment, the grantee in this case did not lose his land.

But in such cases, how is the fact of abandonment to be ascertained? The only effect of it is, not to forfeit the land to the sovereign, but to enable the first occupant to claim it as his. Before his right is established, it must be done by some judicial proceeding: and no other is known to the Spanish law, than the process of "denouncement." It is a judicial proceeding, conducted with much formality and after due notice.

Rockwell's Spanish and Mexican Law, 50–56.

It is not pretended that any "denouncement" of this land occurred; nor were any proceedings had to devest the title of the grantee; so that even if he were an adult, the Spanish law of abandonment would have no application to his case; but being a minor, his land was not subject to denouncement.

The court, before denying the confirmation, must be satisfied that the grantee actually intended to abandon his claim. It is a question of intention, to be deduced from all the circumstances of the case.

Bouv. Law Dic., tit. Abandonment; Stephens v. Mansfield, 11 Cal., 363.

8. The title of the grantee is a legal, and not an equitable one. His title is a patent, and conveys the legal estate which would maintain ejectment.

Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal., 589.

In several cases before this court from California, grants similar to this have been deemed and held to be equivalent to patents. The claimant's application for a confirmation is not, therefore, addressed to the equity side of the court; but he invokes its judgment upon the question whether or not he has a valid legal title to the land; and if so, he asks that it be confirmed.

If the claimants had only an equitable title, and was appealing to a court to perfect it into a legal estate, the court might well examine into the equities, and decide whether or not it was incumbent upon a court of equity to grant a relief asked for; but if he already has the legal estate, and only asks the judgment of the court on that point, it would appear to preclude all inquiry into mere equities, unless it should appear that his legal title was fraudulently obtained, or for some reason ought to be devested. In this case no such reason appears.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., for the appellees:

This claim is for a tract called Potrero, situated within the limits of the ex-mission of San Jose, bounded on the north by the Warm Springs, on the south by Pala, on the west by the ranchos of Higueria and Galinda, and on the east by mountains, containing 11 leagues.

The claimant, Fuentes, is a nephew of Micheltorena, and a mere lad at the date of the grant, who came to California with his uncle, went away with him and never returned again, except when he came back as a witness for Limantour. His relationship to the governor is mentioned in the Limantour documents. His minority is proved by his own witness, Abrego, and that he never saw the land, or went near it, is one of the facts mentioned by Judge McAllister in his opinion.

The Board of Land Commissioners and the district court both decided against the claim. [The counsel then referred to and gave the dates of the several documents, and said:] I have set these dates carefully out, and called the special attention of the court to them, because they may become important in the discussion of the cause.

This grant is illegal, and contrary to the laws and customs of the Government of Mexico, because,

1. The grantee was a minor at the time of its date, and incapable, for that reason, of performing the conditions annexed to it.

2. It is void, because it was made by a governor who was a near relative of the grantee.

3. There was no petition; no examination into the condition of the land or the character of the applicant; no map of the land; no reference to any magistrate or officer; no report upon the case, and therefore the governor had no authority, jurisdiction or power to make the concession, even if the grantee had been a stranger to his blood.

4. There is no espedients on file, and no note or record in any book among the archives of the department.

5. Besides all this, it is fraudulent and spurious, a base and impudent forgery. For this assertion I give the following reasons:

1. The fact that no trace of this grant is to be found upon the record, is of itself conclusive evidence against its genuineness.

2. The grantee never took possession of the land nor claimed title under it, nor produced the grant, until 1852.

3. The subscribing witnesses to the execution of the grant (Jimeno) was not called, and we must presume that he was not called because it was known that he would pronounce the paper to be fraudulent.

4. The testimony substituted in place of the best evidence was that of witnesses, who, at the very most, could prove nothing beyond their own belief. One of them does not prove even so much, but only that the signatures are like those of Micheltorena and Jimeno.

5. But these witnesses, no matter what they swear to, are unworthy of belief. They are professional witnesses. No court in California where Manuel Castro's achievements as a witness are known, would pronounce a judgment upon his testimony. Abrego was incontestably proved to be guilty of perjury in the Limantour case, and the fact was so announced by the court.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant has come to this court asking for a confirmation of his claim to eleven leagues of land, called Potrero. The paper under which he claims the land purports to be a grant from Governor Micheltorena. It recites that the land is within the ex-mission of San Jose, bounded on the north by the locality called the Warm Springs; on the south by Palos; on the west by the peak of the hill of the ranchos Tulgencio Higuera and Chrysostom Galenda; and on the east by the adjoining mountains. It also recites that the governor had taken all the necessary steps and precautionary proofs which were required by the Mexican laws and regulations for granting lands, and that he had granted the land upon the following conditions to the appellant:

1. That he should inclose it without prejudice to the crossways, roads and uses; that he shall have the exclusive enjoyment of it, and apply it to such use and culture as may best suit his views.

2. That he should apply to the proper judge for judicial possession of the same, by whom the boundaries shall be marked out, and along which landmarks should be placed to designate its limits, and that fruit and forest trees shall be planted on the land.

3. That the land given should contain eleven leagues for large cattle, as is designated by a may said to be attached to the espedients. The land is to be surveyed according to the Ordinance; and should there be an overplus, it was to inure to the benefit of the nation.

The title is to be recorded in the proper book, and then to be delivered to the petitioner for the land, for his security. This paper bears date the 12th June, 1843, and has the name of Micheltorena to it, which is denied to be his signature.

The first inquiry, then, concerning it, should be into its genuineness. Was it executed by Governor Micheltorena? Has the party claiming proved it?

The testimony introduced in support of the genuineness of the paper is to be found in the depositions of Zamon De Zaldo, Jose Abrego, Manuel Castro and Joseph L. Folsom. Zaldo declares himself to be chief clerk and interpreter to arrange and classify the Spanish and Mexican archives in the custody of the Surveyor-General of California. He was not interrogated as to the signature of the paper, and says nothing about its having been executed by Micheltorena. He was asked what he knew of the book of land titles of the Mexican Government for the year 1843. He answers that he knew that a book for the year 1843 was not in the office, though he did not know of his own personal knowledge that such a book ever existed, and that all that he did know about it had been learned from a correspondence in the office, that such a book belonging to the archives had been in the possession of John L. Folsom, United States Quartermaster at the time, and that he had learned, in the same way, that it was destroyed with Folsom's papers by the fire in San Francisco of 1851. Folsom states that a book of records, containing grants of land in Upper California, had been put into his possession in the spring of 1851, to be used as evidence in the suit of Leese and Vallejo v. Clark, then pending in the Superior Court of the City of San Francisco. It was in the Spanish language, and came from the archives of the Mexican Government of California, then in the possession of the commanding general at Benicia, and was delivered to him as an officer of the army, for safe keeping. He adds: after the book was used as evidence, it was returned to me, and was deposited in my office in the City of San Francisco; and whilst there, the great fire of the 3d and 4th May, 1851, occurred, by which my office and its contents, including the said book, were destroyed. And he then concludes his deposition, saying: "I am not positive as to the date of the grants contained in the said book, but from my best recollection, my impression is that they were for the years 1843 and 1844." The purpose for which Zaldo and Folsom were made witnesses for the claimant was to connect the book which Zaldo said was not among the archives with the book which Folsom said had been burned, that it might be inferred, from the date of the paper upon which Fuentes rests his claim, that it had been recorded in that book. It is stated in the petition that the grant was issued and delivered in due form of law on the 12th June, 1843; that it was recorded at the time it was issued; that it was not found in the archives; and that he believes that the copy of the grant was burned, and on that account could not be produced. It is further stated, that the grant had been approved by the Territorial Legislature, and was in all respects formally completed according to law, but that the records of the Legislature for the year 1843 were in like manner destroyed by fire at the same time with the record of the grant, and that the claimant could not produce any evidence of the approval of the grant by the Legislature. In this recital from the petition we find a very exact anticipation of what the evidence ought to be, to prove that such a grant had been issued, and that it had been duly recorded, but none such was introduced. Zaldo believes, from a correspondence in the office, that a book belonging to it had been burned while it had been in the safe keeping of Folsom. Folsom says a book from the archives was burned, but that he cannot be positive as to the date of the grant in it, but that from his best recollection, his impression was, the grants in it were for the years 1843 and 1844; and Zaldo declares that he had no personal knowledge that such a book ever existed, but adds, that there is wanting in the office a book for the year 1843. This falls far short of the evidence which was necessary to connect the alleged grant with the archives of the office. There is no other evidence in the record to supply such deficiency. And it is admitted now that the paper was never sent to the Departmental Assembly.

In truth, between the burned book and the Fuentes paper, the testimony in the record makes no connection whatever. The mere declaration that it was dated in 1843 cannot do so. Nor can any implication of the kind be raised from the testimony of Abrego and Castro. Neither of these witnesses were interrogated concerning the burned book, nor was any attempt made to prove that any of the records of the Departmental Assembly, especially its approval of this grant, had been burned at the same time. What has been said of the insufficiency of the evidence to prove the record of the paper, applies with equal force to the certificate which is alleged to have been given by Jimeno, that the paper set out in the petition as a grant had been recorded in the proper book, which is used in the archives of the secretary's office.

The case, then, stands altogether disconnected from the archives, and exclusively upon the paper in the possession of Fuentes. It has no connection with the preliminary steps required by the Act of Mexico of the 18th August, 1824, or with the Regulations of November 28, 1828. It is deficient in every particular—unlike every other case which has been brought to this court from California. There was no petition for the land; no examination into its condition, whether grantable or otherwise; none into the character and national status of the applicant to receive a grant of land; no order for a survey of it; no reference of any petition for it to any magistrate or other officer, for a report upon the case; no transmission of the grant—supposing it to be such—to the Departmental Assembly or Territorial Legislature, for its acquiescence; nor was any espediente on file in relation to it, according to the usage in such cases.

All of the foregoing were customary requirements for granting lands. Where they had not been complied with, the title was not deemed to be complete for registration in the archives, nor in a condition to be sent to the Departmental Assembly, for its action upon the grant. The governor could not dispense with them with official propriety; nor shall it be presumed that he has done so, because there may be, in a paper said to be a grant, a declaration that they had been observed, particularly in a case where the archives do not show any record of such a grant.

The Act of 1824 and the Regulations of 1828 are limitations upon the power of the governor to make grants of land. They are, and were also considered to be, directions to petitioners for land, before they could get titles. Where the petition and the other requirements following it, have not been registered in the proper office with the grant itself, a presumption arises against its genuineness, making it a proper subject of inquiry before that fact can be admitted. It is not to be taken as a matter of course; nor should slight testimony be allowed to remove the presumption. Both the kind and quantum of evidence must be regarded. We proceed to state what they are in the record.

None can be found to establish with a reasonable probability the genuineness of the paper upon which the claimant relies. The only testimony bearing upon the genuineness of the paper is that of Abrego and Castro. Both speak of the signature of Micheltorena, and no further. Abrego says that he knew the governor; that he had frequently seen him write, and that he had examined the signature to the document presented to him, and that he knows it to be the signature of Governor Micheltorena.

Castro is more particular, but not so positive; and he gives a narrative of the origin of the paper, which is certainly peculiar, and from which a reasonable suspicion may be indulged against his own disinterestedness. He says: "An instrument in writing is now shown to me, purporting to be a grant to Jose Maria Fuentes dated June 12, 1843, and it is attached to the deposition of Jose Abrego, heretofore taken in this case, and marked H. J. T., No. 1. I know the paper; it is in my handwriting. I was at the time secretary in the prefect's office in Monterey, and being on terms of friendship with Secretary Jimeno and Mr. Arce, a clerk in his office, I frequently assisted them in their official duties at their request, and in that manner I wrote the body of this grant. It was written in June, 1843, at the time of its date. I know the signature of Micheltorena; and the signature purporting to be his, appears like his; and the signature of Jimeno on said paper also appears like his." The words of the witness have been given.

The signature of Jimeno, of which Castro speaks, purports to be a certificate from Jimeno that the grant had been recorded, the day after its date, in the proper book of the archives of the Secretary's Department. It is upon the same paper with the title, and purports to have been put upon it by the order of the governor, "that the title might be delivered to the party interested, for his security and ulterior ends."

Abrego, in a second deposition, says he knew Fuentes and his family, and that he was not of age, but was a minor, on the 7th July, 1846—more than three years after the date of the grant.

Such is all the testimony in this record to prove the genuineness of the signature of Micheltorena, unless it be the notarial certificate, given under the seal of the National College in the City of Mexico; which, as it is presented in this case, is not evidence, and of no account at all.

We will now show that the testimony of Abrego to the signature of Micheltorena is insufficient to establish that fact, and that Castro's deposition gives to it no aid. In truth, the whole case has no other evidence in support of the genuineness of the signature of the governor than what Abrego has said. In showing this, we shall have no occasion to impeach his character as a man, or his truthfulness as a witness, as there is nothing in this record, whatever there may be in others, to justify such an attack. The case must be decided upon what its own record contains, and upon nothing else.

Abrego's deposition has not that foundation which the rules of evidence require a witness to have, and enable him to prove the genuineness of an official signature to a public document, or a signature to a private writing. The document in this instance purports to be genuine; but whether so or not, it discloses the fact that there is upon it an official witness of its execution and record, who should have been called to prove it, if he was living, and if absent beyond the jurisdiction of the court, whose signature should have been proved by a witness who was familiar with his signature and handwriting, before secondary evidence could be received of his own signature, or that of the official who is said to have executed the paper.

It was the duty of Jimeno to record all grants which were made by the governor, and to give attestations of that fact, and which it is said Jimeno did give to the paper in this instance. Why was not Jimeno called? It seems that he was overlooked or not thought of.

The simplest and best proof of handwriting is the testimony of one who saw the signature actually written; and inferior evidence as to his handwriting is not competent, until it has been shown that this testimony to the execution of the paper could not have been procured. And when a document, either public or private, is without a witness, the best evidence to disprove the signature, and to prove it forged, is the testimony of the supposed writer, if he be not incompetent from interest, and can be produced. In the latter case, the next best evidence is the information of persons who have seen him write, or been in correspondence with him.

Such, however, is not this case, though it was acted upon in the court below as if it was so.

Abrego here, then, is in the attitude of an incompetent witness, who was called and permitted to testify before the party by whom he was introduced, and laid a foundation for the next best evidence, when the paper submitted to him showed the fact that the better could have been had, either primarily or secondarily in the manner we have already indicated. Abrego swears that he knew Micheltorena; that he had frequently seen him write, that he had examined the signature to the document presented to him, and that he knew it to be the signature of Governor Micheltorena. But had Secretary Jimeno been called as a witness, as it was his official duty to test the signature of the governor to grants, his would have been the best testimony to prove its genuineness in this instance, and that the grant had been transferred to him officially, for delivery to the grantee.

Castro's deposition is in the same predicament with that of Abrego, but with an aggravation of its insufficiency to prove the signature of Micheltorena, and of his incompetency as a witness. He was asked if he knew Micheltorena, or was familiar with his handwriting or with his signature, or if he had ever seen him write. He only says: "I know the signature of Micheltorena, and the signature to the paper appears like his, and the signature of Jimeno appears like his. He does not say how he had become qualified, by comparison or otherwise, to swear to the signature of Micheltorena; and notwithstanding his declared friendship with Jimeno—so much so that he was frequently asked to assist him in the duties of his office, and particularly asked to write out in his own hand the paper in question—he has left it to be inferred that he only knew enough of Jimeno's handwriting to enable him to say that the signature to the grant which he wrote out in his own hand appears like Jimeno's signature.

If such was the way of doing business in the secretary's office, which we have no cause for believing, it must have been an easy matter to get it from such a paper as that now in question, and not at all difficult to have been accomplished by one who had such familiar access to the office as Castro represents himself to have had, especially if all of the prerequisites of a grant enjoined by the Act of 1824 and the Regulations of 1828 were allowed to be disregarded.

This narrative of De Castro, instead of bringing the mind to any conclusion in favor of the genuineness of the signatures of Micheltorena and Jimeno, rather suggests caution in receiving it, and that it ought to be corroborated by other witnesses before that shall be done. It seems to us, too, somewhat remarkable that this witness, familiar as he was with the origin and object of this paper prepared by himself, should not have been questioned concerning its delivery to Fuentes, then a minor, to whom it was delivered for him, or what was done with it at the time of its date, or in whose possession it was from that time until it was presented to the Land Commissioners for confirmation, in 1852.

There is entire absence of all proof of its having been delivered to Fuentes himself, or to anyone for him; but it seems to have found its way to the City of Mexico, as the record shows, and reappears in California years after its cession to the United States, and more than eight years after it is said to have been executed. The assertion in the paper itself, that the governor had directed it to be delivered, can be no proof of that fact, until its genuineness shall have been ascertained. If the minority, too, of Fuentes is considered, in connection with the conditions upon which this grant is said to have been made, it may well be inferred that it was not delivered to the grantee, as he was not then in a situation to carry out the conditions of the grant, without the intervention of a tutor or guardian, and nothing was done to perform those conditions at any time afterward.

We do not speak now of such non-performance as a cause sufficient for denying a right claimed under a genuine grant; but only as a fact in this case accounting for the non-performance of the conditions of the grant, and making it probable that Fuentes did not receive this paper, until some time after its date, from Micheltorena, and not until after the cession of California to the United States. A delivery after the latter event, by a former governor of California, would not give a grantee a right to claim the land by any obligation imposed upon the United States by the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo.

We have given to this case a very careful examination, and have concluded that no evidence can be found on its record to sustain the genuineness of the paper under which the land is claimed. That there is none to prove its registry in the archives of the secretary's office, at the time of its date or afterwards. That no reliable proof has been given to connect it with the book of records, which had been committed to the care of the witness, Folsom, and was burned in his office. That it does not appear that anyone of the precautionary requirements, before a grant of land could be made by a governor of California, had been complied with in this case. That there is no proof whatever that such a paper as that in question had been delivered to the claimant at any time before the power of Mexico in California had ceased; and it was admitted, in the argument of the case here, that no such paper had been sent to the Departmental Assembly for its acquiescence, as a grant from the governor.

• It was, however, urged in the argument, that such prerequisites for a grant of land should be assumed to have been observed, on account of a recital in the paper or grant that they had been. Several cases from the reports of this court were cited, being supposed by counsel to support the position. None of them do so. We have not been able to find a case reported from this court, either under the Louisiana or Florida cession, that does. U. S. v. Peralta, in 19 How., 343, does not do so. The decision there is, that when a claimant of land in California produced documentary evidence in his favor, copied from the archives in the office of the Surveyor-General, and other original grants by Spanish officers, the presumption is in favor of the power of those officers to make the grants. There, the authenticity of the documents was admitted, and the validity of the petitioner's title was not denied, on the ground of any want of authority of the officers who made the grant. This court then said, that the public acts of public officers, importing to be exercised in an official capacity and by public authority, shall not be presumed to be usurped, but that a legitimate authority had been previously given or subsequently ratified.

In the case of Minter v. Crommelin, 18 How., 88, it was ruled that when a patent for land has been issued by the officers of the United States, the presumption is in favor of its validity, and passes the legal title, but that it might be rebutted by proof that the officers had no authority to issue it, on account of the land not being subject to entry and grant. In Delassus v. U. S., 9 Pet., 117, 133, the inquiry was, whether the concession was legally made by the proper authority; but the concession, being in regular form, carried prima facie evidence that it was within the power of the officer to make it, and that no excess or departure from instructions should be presumed, and that he who alleges that an officer intrusted with an important duty has violated it, must show it. But there was no question in that case about the genuineness of the concession. That was admitted. The genuineness of the grant in U. S. v. Arredondo, 9 Pet., 691, was not questioned. Nor was the genuineness of the patent in Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 437, a subject of controversy. This court ruled in that case, that a patent for land from the United States was conclusive in an action at law, and those who claim against it must do so on the equity side of the court. It is not, however, to be supposed that no title in California can be valid, which has not all of the preliminary requirements of the Act of the Mexican Congress of 1824, and of the Regulations of 1828. But if none of them are to be found in the archives, and it cannot be established by the proof that they were registered there, this court will not presume that they were preliminary to a grant, because the governor recites in the grant that they had been observed. In what we have said upon this point, we are reaffirming this court's opinion in U. S. v. Cambuston, 20 How., 59. And we now take this occasion to repeat, that when it shall appear that none of the preliminary steps for granting land in California have been taken, this court will not confirm such a claim. For the reasons already given, we shall affirm the decree of the district court in this case.

But we also concur with that court in its rejection of this claim, supposing it to be genuine, upon the ground that there was no proof of a survey or measurement of this land, or any performance of its conditions, from which it may be inferred that the grantee had abandoned his claim. It is said that these were conditions subsequent, the non-performance of which do not necessarily avoid the grant. This is the case as to some of them; but even as to such, when a grantee allows years to pass after the date of his grant without any attempt to perform them, and without any explanation for not having done so, and then for the first time claims the land, after it had passed by treaty from the national jurisdiction which granted it to the United States, such a delay is unreasonable, and amounts to evidence that the claim to the land has been abandoned, and that a party under such circumstances, seeking to resume his ownership, is actuated by some consideration or expectation of advantage, unnconnected with the conditions of the grant, which he had not in view when he petitioned for the land, and when it was granted. The language just used was suggested in Frêmont v. U. S., 17 How., 542. The occasion has arisen in this case, when it becomes necessary to affirm it as a rule, to guide us in all other cases hereafter which may be circumstanced as this is.

The decree of the district court in this case is affirmed.

Acts respecting pay of collectors of ports—repeal by implication not favored—repugnancy must be clear—acts in pari materia construed together—construction of Act of March 3, 1841—additional compensation—amounts of salaries.

The 10th section of the Act of May 7, 1822, is not repealed by any subsequent Act.

By the Act of May 7, 1822, $3,000 was the maximum which could be allowed to the office held by the defendant.

Under that Act, collectors of seven enumerated ports might receive an annual compensation of $4,000, provided their respective offices produced that amount from all sources of emolument recognized and prescribed by the existing laws, after deducting the necessary expenses incident to the offices.

On the same principles, and subject to the same conditions, the collectors of the non-enumerated ports might receive an annual compensation of $3,000.

Repeal by implication, upon the ground that the subsequent provision upon the same subject is repugnant to the prior law, is not favored in any case.

Where such repeal would operate to reopen accounts at the Treasury Department long since settled and closed, the supposed repugnancy ought to be clear and controlling, before it can be held to have that effect.

Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet., reaffirmed.

All of these additional compensation Acts are in pari materia with the several Acts prescribing the sources of emolument, and the whole must be construed together.

When they are so considered, there is no repugnancy. By the true construction of the Act of March 3, 1841, every collector is required to include in his quarter-yearly account, all sums received by him for rent and storage of goods, wares and merchandise, stored in the public stores, for which rent is paid beyond the rents paid by him as collector; and if, from such accounting, the aggregate sums received from that source exceed $2,000, he is directed and required to pay the excess into the Treasury, as part and parcel of the public money.

When the sums so received from that source in any year do not in the aggregate exceed $3,000, he may retain the whole to his own use; and in no case is he obliged to pay into the Treasury anything but the excess beyond the $2,000.

Collectors of the enumerated ports may receive $4,000, from the sources of emolument recognized in the Act of the 7th of May, 1822, and they may also receive $2,000 from rents and storage.

But there is nothing in the Act to show that the prior Act is repealed, so far as it is applicable to the collectors of the non-enumerated ports. No new maximum is fixed to their compensation, and there is nothing in the new provision, inconsistent with the 10th section of the prior Act.

Collectors of the non-enumerated ports may receive, as an annual compensation, $3,000 from the sources of emolument recognized and prescribed by the Act of the 7th of May, 1822, provided their respective offices yield that amount from those sources, after deducting the necessary expenses incident to the office; and in addition thereto, they are also entitled to whatever sum or sums they may receive for rent and storage, provided the amount does not exceed $2,000.

Argued Feb. 23, and Mar. 19, 1860. Decided Apr. 16, 1860.

ERRORS to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Alabama.

The complaints in these cases were filed in the court below, by the plaintiffs in error, upon the official bond of Walker, as Collector of the Customs for the district, and Inspector of the Revenue of the port of Mobile.

The trials below having resulted in verdicts and judgments in favor of the defendants, the United States sued out these writs of error.

The cases were heard together in this court.

A further statement of the cases appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black and J. M. Campbell, for plaintiffs in error:

The only question is as to the true construction of the Act of 1841, and its effect upon the Act of 1822.

1. The purpose of the Act of 1841 was plainly not to increase, but to limit the compensation of collectors. All over $2,000 per annum received from the sources specified in the commencement of the 5th section, was to be part and parcel of the public money, and paid over as such, and no collector was to retain for himself, by the latter part of the section, under any pretense, more than $6,000 per annum, including every possible item of charge or claim. Congress might have aggregated into one, all the sources from which collectors could derive compensation, and then limited the amount to be enjoyed from the whole; but it has not done so.

2. The true construction of the Act of 1841 being ascertained, its operation on the Act of 1822 appears at once.

By the 9th section of that Act (3 Stat. at L., 694), the maximum compensation of collectors at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, Savannah and New Orleans, is fixed at $4,000 per annum, and by the 10th section, of all other collectors at $3,000 per annum, payable, as this court ruled in Hoyt's case, out of the fees and commissions allowed by the Act of 1802.

10 How., 135.

The mention, therefore, in the Act of 1841, of a maximum of $6,000 from all sources, is explained by the fact, that while it limited a maximum of $2,000 as regarded certain particulars, the Act of 1822, in regard to the sources of emolument with which it dealt, had already prescribed a maximum of $4,000 for the collectors of the seven ports enumerated in it. But no construction can possibly stand, which makes the denial of more than $6,000 per annum to the collectors of ports of the first class, amount to an increase of the compensation of those officers in other ports. The Act of 1822 still operates in putting a limit to the collector's compensation, as regards the items which it contemplated, and fixes that limit at $4,000 per annum for the collectors of the seven ports mentioned in it, and to $3,000 per annum for all other collectors, including the Collector of Mobile; while the Act of 1841, limits all of whatever class to a maximum of $2,000 per annum from the items specified by it.

Mr. R. H. Smith, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Alabama. It was an action of debt brought by the United States upon the official bond of the defendant as Collector of the Customs for the district and Inspector of the Revenue for the port of Mobile. He gave the bond, with sureties, on the 7th day of September, 1850, conditioned that he had truly and faithfully executed and discharged, and that he would continue truly and faithfully to execute and discharge, all the duties of the office according to law. Neglect and refusal on the part of the defendant to pay to the plaintiffs certain sums of money received by him as such collector before the commencement of the suit, beyond what he was entitled to retain as compensation for discharging the duties of the office, constituted the breaches of the condition of the bond, as assigned in the declaration.

Those balances, as claimed by the plaintiffs, amounted to the sum of $13,184.42; and the charge was, as alleged in the declaration, that the defendant had wholly failed and refused to pay the same. As appears by the transcript, the defendant pleaded the general issue, and that he had fully performed the conditions of the writing obligatory set forth in the declaration.

To maintain the issue on their part, the plaintiffs introduced a certified copy of the bond given by the defendant, and two duly certified copies of transcripts from the Treasury Department, showing that the official accounts of the defendant had been examined and adjusted by the accounting officers of that Department. According to those transcripts, the respective balances claimed by the plaintiffs, as the accounts are there stated, had not been paid by the defendant and remained due and payable at the time the suit was commenced.

No evidence was adduced by the defendant. He was charged in the account against him, as collector of the customs, with the sums collected from duties on merchandise, tonnage duties, hospital money, and for all sums received for rent and storage of goods, wares and merchandise, stored in the public storehouses, for which a rent was paid beyond the rents paid by the collector. On the other side, he was credited, in the account of official emoluments with the sum of $3,000 as the maximum rate of the annual salary or compensation allowed to the collector of that port. Further details of those accounts are omitted, for the reason that the charge for rent and storage in the account of customs, and the credit for salary in the account of official emoluments, are the only two items which come in review at the present time.

Reference to the 9th section of the Act of the 7th of May, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 695), will show that Mobile is not one of the seven ports enumerated in that provision, and consequently that the maximum rate of annual compensation or salary allowed to the office under that law was $3,000, as limited by the 10th section, which includes all the ports not enumerated in the previous provision. All of the accounts of the defendant were adjusted at the Treasury Department upon the principle that the Act of the 7th of May, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 695), was still in force, and that the maximum rate of compensation belonging to the collector was $3,000, as therein prescribed. It was insisted by the defendant that the provision in question had been repealed by subsequent acts upon the same subject, and that the maximum compensation allowed by law to the office was $6,000.

Assuming that the theory of the defendant was correct, then his accounts had been improperly adjusted, and there was nothing due to the plaintiffs. On the other hand, if the charge for rent and storage in his customs account was properly made, and the maximum rate of compensation belonging to the office was only $3,000, then he was justly indebted to the plaintiffs for the whole amount of the respective balances as stated in the transcripts.

After argument, the court instructed the jury, among other things, that "the Act of 3d March, 1841 (5 Stat. at L., 432), was the last and controlling law as to the amount of compensation which collectors are allowed annually to retain; and that, under that enactment, the collector of this port was entitled to a compensation of $6,000 per annum, provided the same was yielded from the office from commissions for duties and fees for storage, and fees and emoluments, and any other commissions and salaries now allowed and limited by law, or so much from those sources, not exceeding $6,000, as the office yielded."

fendant, under the Act of the 3d of March, 1841 (5 Stat. at L., 432), to a compensation of $6,000 per annum, or so much thereof, not exceeding that sum, as the office yielded from commissions of every description, fees and emoluments, including rents and storage, and salaries, as allowed and limited by law. Beyond question, it assumed that the 10th section of the Act of the 7th of May, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 695), was repealed. Prayers for instruction were then presented by the district attorney, who was counsel for the plaintiffs. He requested the court to instruct the jury to the effect that the provisions of the Act of the 7th of May, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 695), respecting the maximum compensation allowed to collectors of the customs, were not repealed by the Act of the 3d of March, 1841 (5 Stat. at L., 432), or by any other Act, but that the same were in full force; 2. That the only effect the Act of the 3d of March, 1841 (5 Stat. at L., 432), had upon the former Act, in so far as the same applied to a case like the present, was to create a new and additional source of emolument to such collectors, allowing them to retain not exceeding $2,000 for rent and storage of goods, wares and merchandise, stored in the public stores, and for which a rent was paid beyond the rents paid by such collectors. Each of these prayers was separately presented, and separately refused by the court.

Another prayer for instruction was then presented by the district attorney. It affirmed, in effect, that it was the duty of the defendant, as collector, whenever his emoluments in any one year exceeded $3,000, after deducting the necessary expenses incident to the office, to pay the excess into the Treasury, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for all such balances, thus ascertained, as were shown to be due from the evidence. Apply the first and third requested instructions to the facts of the case, and it will be seen that they affirmed the principles adopted by the accounting officers of the Treasury, in restating the accounts of the defendant; and if correct, then the whole amount as the respective balances, as stated in the transcript, was due to the plaintiffs.

Taken together, they assume that the 10th section of the Act of the 7th of May, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 695), is in full force, and that the defendant had no right, under the Act of the 3d of March, 1841 (5 Stat. at L., 432), to retain any portion of the amount received for rent and storage. Those prayers for instructions having been refused, the district attorney then prayed the court to instruct the jury as follows:

"That under those Acts, it was the duty of the defendant, as collector of the customs, whenever his emoluments exceeded $3,000 in any one year, after deducting the necessary expenses incident to his office, to pay the excess, if any, into the Treasury, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount of any such surplus or surpluses, if any, as may be shown by the evidence; but, in ascertaining the amount of the defendant's emoluments as such collector, the jury must exclude all moneys derived by him from fines, penalties and forfeitures, and also all moneys derived by him from rent and storage of goods, wares and merchandise, which may have been stored in the public storehouses, and for which a rent was paid beyond the rents paid by him as collector, unless the proceeds of such rents and storage exceed $2,000; in which event, the excess over and above that sum must be taken into account by them, in computing the value of the annual emoluments."

That prayer was also refused by the court. To understand its precise effect, it is necessary that it should be read in connection with the first and second prayers, which had previously been presented and refused. When considered together, those three prayers disclose the second theory of the plaintiffs, as assumed at the trial.

Like the one assumed in the third prayer, it affirmed that the 10th section of the Act of the 7th of May, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 695), was unrepealed, but conceded that the defendant had a right to retain to his own use the moneys received for rent and storage, to an amount not exceeding $2,000. Under the instruction of the court the jury returned their verdict for the defendant; and the plaintiffs excepted to the charge, and to the several refusals of the court to give the requested instructions. Three questions are presented in the case for decision, which will be briefly and separately considered:

1. Whether the 10th section of the Act of the 7th of May, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 695), is repealed by any subsequent Act; and if not, then,

2. What is the true construction of the Act of the 3d of March, 1841, so far as the same applies to the present case.

3. Whether, by the true construction of the two Acts, the defendant had a right to retain to his own use the moneys received from rent and storage, to an amount not exceeding $2,000.

1. It is insisted by the defendant that the maximum prescribed by the 10th section of the Act of the 7th of May, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 695), is repealed, and that, under the law regulating his compensation, the legal capacity of the office he held was $6,000, subject to the condition that $2,000 only could be received from rent and storage. Six thousand dollars, he maintains, is the maximum under the law of the 3d of March, 1841 (5 Stat. at L., 432), applicable to every collector, and that the compensation of each, within that limit, and subject to the before named condition, is regulated solely by the amount of labor performed.

To show that the 10th section of the Act of the 7th of May, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 695), is repealed, his counsel at the argument, referred to various Acts of Congress, passed subsequently to the Tariff Act of the 14th of July, 1832 (4 Stat. at L., 583), entitled "An Act to alter and amend the several Acts imposing duties on imports."

They are as follows: 1833, 4 Stat., 629; 1834, 4 Stat., 698; 1836, 4 Stat., 771; 1836, 5 Stat., 113; 1837, 5 Stat., 175; 1838, 5 Stat.. 264; 1840, 6 Stat., 815, private Act; 1841, 5 Stat., 431, sec. 2.

By the first of those Acts, usually called additional compensation Acts, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized, among other things, to pay to the collectors, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as would give those officers respectively the same compensation in that year, according to the importations of the year, as they would have been entitled to receive if the Tariff Act of the preceding year had not gone into effect. That provision, with certain additions and modifications, which will presently be noticed, was annually re-enacted to the year 1840, when it was made permanent. For the most part, it was inserted in some one of the annual appropriation Acts, and was designed to accomplish the precise object which its language describes, and nothing more.

Compensation to collectors, from the organization of the government to the present time, has been derived chiefly from certain enumerated fees, commissions and allowances, to which has been added a prescribed sum, called salary, and which is much less than the compensation to which the officer is entitled. Provision for such fees, commissions and allowances, was first made by the Act of the 31st of July, 1789, which also allowed to collectors certain proportions of fines, penalties, and forfeitures. 1 Stat., at L., 64.

More permanent provision, however, was made by the Act of the 18th of February, 1793, by the Act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed on the 2d of March, 1799, and by the Compensation Act passed on the same day. 1 Stat., 316, 627, 786.

By these several Acts, certain enumerated fees and commissions are made payable to collectors. They are also entitled to certain proportions of fines, penalties and forfeitures. Accurate accounts were required to be kept by them of all fees and efficient emoluments by them received and of all expenses for rent, fuel, stationery, and clerk hire, which they were required annually to transmit to the Comptroller of the Treasury; but they were allowed to retain to their own use the whole amount of emolument derived from that source, without any limitation. Maximum rate of compensation was first prescribed by the Act of the 30th of April, 1802 (2 Stat. at L., 172). That limit was $5,000, and it was applicable to all collectors.

By that Act, it was provided, that whenever the annual emoluments of any collector, after deducting the expenses incident to the office, amounted to more than $5,000, the surplus should be accounted for and paid into the Treasury. 2 Stat. at L., 172.

Further regulations, as to fees, commissions, other emoluments, and salaries, were made by the Act of the 7th of May, 1822, as therein prescribed.

One of those regulations was, that whenever the emoluments of any collector, for seven enumerated ports, after deducting the necessary expenses incident to the office, should exceed $4,000, the excess should be paid into the Treasury for the use of the United States. By the 10th section, it was also provided that, whenever the emoluments of any other collector of the customs should exceed $3,000, after deducting such expenses, the excess should be paid into the Treasury for the same purpose. They were also required to account to the treasury for all emoluments and for all expenses incident to their offices, and those accounts were to be rendered upon oath. Neither of the two last mentioned Acts extended to fines, penalties and forfeitures. 3 Stat., 695. Under that Act, $3,000 was the maximum which could be allowed to the office held by the defendant; and it is conceded by his counsel that it remained in full force to the time when the additional Compensation Acts before mentioned were passed. Large additions had been made to the free list by the Tariff Act of the 14th of July, 1832, and the rate of duties on imports so far reduced that the sources of emolument to collectors would not yield sufficient to give them an adequate compensation. To supply that deficiency, those additional Compensation Acts were passed. Much reliance is placed by the counsel of the defendant upon the last proviso, which appears in nearly the same form in several of the Acts. Take, for example, the one in the Act of the 7th of July, 1838, which is the Act that was subsequently made permanent. It provides that no collector shall receive more than $4,000. That sum is the maximum rate of compensation allowed to collectors of the enumerated ports in the Act of the 7th of May, 1822; and inasmuch as the limit of $3,000, therein prescribed as applicable to the non-enumerated ports, was not reproduced in the new provision, it is insisted it was repealed, so that every collector, whether of the enumerated or non-enumerated ports, may now claim to receive an annual compensation of $6,000 from the sources of emolument recognized by that Act, provided his office yields that amount, after deducting the necessary expenses incident to the office. To that proposition we cannot assent. On the contrary, when we look at the language of the new provision in connection with that of the prior law, and consider the mischief that existed, the remedy provided, and the true reason of the remedy, we are necessarily led to a different conclusion. Commercial ports, where the revenue is collected, were divided by the prior law, so far as respects the compensaton of collectors, into two classes, enumerated and non-enumerated. Collectors of the seven enumerated ports might receive an annual compensation of $4,000, provided their respective offices produced that amount, after deducting the necessary expenses incident to the offices, from all the sources of emolument recognized and prescribed by the existing laws.

On the same principles, and subject to the same conditions, the collectors of the non-enumerated ports might receive an annual compensation of $3,000. No one could receive more than that sum, and his lawful claim might be much less.

Ten years' experience under that law, prior to the passage of the Tariff Act of the 14th of July, 1832, had witnessed but few complaints respecting the classification of the ports, or the standard of compensation to collectors of customs, and had called for no important alteration in the laws upon that subject. Throughout that poriod, the rates of duties on imports were high, and nearly every article of consumption imported from other countries was taxed. Change of policy in that behalf, as carried out in the legislation of the succeeding year, affected the emoluments of collectors, and reduced the amount of net income from the sources of their emolument below the standard of a reasonable compensation. To remedy that mischief, and restore their compensation to what it would have been if no change had taken place, was the purpose for which those additional compensation Acts were passed. They had the effect to change the basis of computation, so as to augment the estimated net income from the authorized sources of emolument to what it would have been if the Tariff Act had not passed; but they were not intended to make any change, either in the sources from which the emoluments were derived, or the maximum rate of compensation. Mention was made of the largest maximum prescribed in the prior law, not with any view to repeal or modify the other, which was applicable to the non-enumerated ports, but to exclude the conclusion that it was the intention of the provision to increase the compensation of the collectors of the principal ports beyond what it would have been if the free list had not been augmented, and there had been no diminution in the rates of duties on imports.

Suppose there was nothing in the language of the Act to qualify the provision, and nothing in the history of the legislation upon the subject to aid in the exposition; still we would not think it so clearly inconsistent with the prior law as to operate as a repeal. Repeal by implication, upon the ground that the subsequent provision upon the same subject is repugnant to the prior law, is not favored in any case; but where such repeal would operate to reopen accounts at the Treasury Department long since settled and closed, the supposed repugnancy ought to be clear and controlling before it can be held to have that effect. Such was the doctrine substantially laid down by this court in Wood v. United States, 16 Pet., 363; and we have no hesitation in reaffirming it as applicable to the present case. Aldridge et al. v. Williams, 3 How., 23; U. S. v. Packages of Dry Goods, 17 How., 93; 2 Dwarris on Stat., 583

All of these additional compensation Acts are in pari materia with the several Acts prescribing the sources of emolument, and the whole must be construed together. When they are so considered, there is no such repugnancy as is supposed by the defendant. Collectors, as before, were still required to render an account; and the new provision expressly provides that no officer shall receive, under that law, a greater annual salary or compensation than was paid to him for the year the before-mentioned Tariff Act was passed.

2. Having disposed of the proposition chiefly relied on by the defendant, we come now to consider the second question presented for decision. That question cannot be understood without referring to previous legislation upon the subject, and the practice that had grown up under it. Importers were allowed by the Act of the 14th day of July, 1832, to place certain goods in the public stores, under bond, at their own risk, without paying the duties. Duties on goods so stored were required to be paid one half in three months, and the other half in six months; but while the goods remained in the public stores, they were subject to customary storage and charges, and to the payment of interest at the rate of six per cent. Goods thus deposited might be withdrawn at any time, in whole or in part, by paying the duties on what were so recalled, together with customary storage and charges and the interest. Public stores were accordingly rented; and as the business increased, the storage received by the collector from the importers exceeded the amount paid to the owner of the stores, and there was no law requiring collectors to account for the excess, which was retained by the collectors to their own use, and went to swell the amount of their compensation.

To correct that supposed abuse, the Act of the 3d of March, 1841, was passed. By that Act, every collector was required to render a quarter-yearly account in addition to the account previously directed by law. That additional account, as prescribed in the Act, was to include all sums collected or received from fines, penalties or forfeitures; or for seizure of goods, wares and merchandise; or upon compromises made upon seizures; or on account of suits instituted for frauds against the revenue; or for rent and storage of goods, wares and merchandise, which were stored in the public stores, and for which a rent was paid beyond the rents paid by the collector. As originally framed, the provision required the collector, in case the sums received by him from all those sources exceeded $2,000, to pay the excess into the Treasury as part and parcel of the public money. After it was introduced, however, it was so amended and changed in its passage, that while it still directs the account to be rendered, it requires no part of the money derived from those sources to be paid into the Treasury, except what is received for rent and storage as aforesaid, and for "fees and emoluments." Every collector was required to account for fees and emoluments by previous laws; and as the account to be rendered under this Act is expressly declared to be one "in addition to the account now required," there is nothing left for that part of the section directing the payment of the excess into the Treasury to operate upon, except the sums received for rent and storage.

By the true construction of the Act, therefore, every collector is required to include in his quarter-yearly account, as directed in the first part of the section, all sums received by him for rent and storage of goods, wares and merchandise, stored in the public stores for which rent is paid beyond the rents paid by him as collector; and if, from such accounting, the aggregate sums received from that source exceed two thousand dollars, he is directed and required to pay the excess into the Treasury, as part and parcel of the public money. When the sums so received from that source in any year do not in the aggregate exceed $2.000, he may retain the whole to his own use; and in no case is he obliged to pay into the Treasury anything but the excess beyond the $2,000.

It is insisted, in one of the printed arguments filed in this case, that the Act now under consideration has the effect to repeal the maximum prescribed in the prior Act, and that every collector, under this Act, is entitled to $6,000 as an annual compensation, provided the office yields that sum from all the sources of emolument, including rent and storage. Collectors of the enumerated ports undoubtedly may receive four $4,000 from the sources of emolument recognized in the Act of the 7th of May, 1822, and they may also receive $2,000 from rents and storage. Those two sums are equal to the new maximum rate created by the Act under consideration, which provides that no collector, under any pretense whatever, shall receive, hold, or retain, more than $6,000 per year, including all commissions for duties, and all fees for storage, or fees, or emoluments, or any other commissions or salaries which are now allowed and directed by law. But it is quite clear that there is nothing in the Act having the slightest tendency to show that the prior Act is repealed, so far as as it is applicable to the collectors of the non-enumerated ports. No new maximum is fixed to their compensation, and there is not a word in the new provision inconsistent with the 10th section of the prior Act.

To suppose that the new maximum applies to the collectors of the non-enumerated ports, would be to impute an absurdity to the Act, for the reason, that under no possible state of things can such collectors lawfully retain, hold, or receive, more than $5,000 as their annual salary or compensation, from all the sources of emolument recognized and prescribed by the two Acts. It may be $5,000 or it may be much less than $3,000, according to the state of the importations and the amount received from rent and storage.

3. It only remains to apply the principles already ascertained, in order to determine the third question presented for decision. Collectors of the non-enumerated ports may receive, as an annual compensation for their services, the sum of $3,000 from the sources of emolument recognized and prescribed by the Act of the 7th of May, 1822, provided their respective offices yield that amount from those sources, after deducting the necessary expenses incident to the office, and not otherwise; and in addition thereto, they are also entitled to whatever sum or sums they may receive for rent and storage, provided the amount does not exceed $2,000; but the excess beyond that sum they are expressly required to pay into the Treasury, as part and parcel of the public money.

Charges against the defendant for rent and storage must be settled in accordance with these principles. It follows, that the instruction given by the presiding justice was erroneous; and we also think that the first, second and fourth prayers for instruction ought to have been given to the jury.

Suits were also instituted against the sureties of the defendant. Judgment was entered in the court below for the respective defendants in those suits, and the causes were removed into this court by writs of error, sued out by the plaintiffs. Those causes were submitted at the same time with the one just decided. They depend upon the same principles, and must be disposed of in the same way.

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, reversed in each of the three cases, and the respective cases are remanded, with directions to issue new venires.

Sale of lands for taxes in Washington City—not necessary to exhaust personal property first—laches—power to sell, is from Congress—ordinances.

By the Charter of 1820, of Washington City, as amended by the Act of 1824, it is not a condition to the validity of the sale of unimproved lands for taxes, that the personal estate of the owner should have been previously exhausted by distress.

In this case, the owners of the tax title have had the possession, paid the taxes, built and made valuable improvements on the lot, in the presence of the former owners, for near twenty years.

Under such circumstances, a court of justice should be unwilling to exercise any judicial ingenuity to forfeit even a tax title, where the former owners have been so slow to question its validity.

The power to sell the lands for taxes, is to be found in the Acts of Congress, not in the ordinances of the Corporation.

The latter can neither increase nor vary it, nor impose any terms or conditions, which can effect the validity of a sale made within the authority conferred by the statute.

The purchaser of a tax title is not bound to inquire further than to know that the sale has been made according to the provisions of the statute which authorized it.

The instructions or directions given by the Corporation to its officers cannot have the effect of conditions to affect the validity of the title.

Argued Mar. 30, 1860. Decided Apr. 16, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

This is an action of ejectment brought in the court below, in the name of the devisees of Daniel Carroll, as lessors of the plaintiff, to recover a certain lot in the City of Washington.

The jury found for the plaintiff. Judgment was rendered on their verdict for him, subject to the defendant's exceptions to the instructions of the court.

The point at issue here, is stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Geo. E. Badger and J. M. Carlisle, for the plaintiff in error:

The principal question in the case, is whether, upon the true construction of the Charter of 1820, amended by the Charter of 1824, it was a condition to the validity of the sale of unimproved land for taxes, that the personal estate of the owner should have been exhausted by distress.

1. The construction of the charter upon the question above stated.

a. By the 10th section of the Charter of 1820 (3 Stat., 589), "real property, whether improved or unimproved, might be sold for taxes."

NOTE.—Sale of lands for taxes; strict compliance with the statute, necessary. See note to Williams v. Peyton, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.), 77.

The only restriction was in the proviso (p. 590), "that no sale shall be made in pursuance of this section, of any improved property whereon there is personal property of sufficient value to pay the said taxes."

By the 12th section (p. 590), power is given to collect taxes by "distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the person chargeable therewith."

Both these sections contemplated that the property should be assessed to the true owner. The 10th section distinguished the term of notice required between resident and non-resident owners. The 12th section subjected to the payment of taxes, the "goods and chattels of the person chargeable therewith."

No person could be "chargeable" with the taxes, except by their being assessed to him. The Corporation charged by assessment.

These provisions were found to be practically inefficient for the collection of taxes. It was absolutely necessary that the Corporation should be relieved from the duty of ascertaining the true owner, and assessing the land to him. Accordingly, the Act of Congress of 1824 (4 Stat., 75), supplementary and amendatory to the Act of 1820, was passed.

By its 1st section, the provisions of the Act of 1820, so far as "inconsistent with the provisions of this Act," are repealed.

By its 2d section, it is provided that "no sale of real property for taxes hereafter made, shall be impaired or made void by reason of such property not being assessed or advertised in the name or names of the lawful owner or owners thereof."

The same section abolished the distinction between residents and non-residents in respect to the advertisement, and prescribed a uniform term in all cases, irrespective of ownership.

The provisions of the Act of 1820, requiring the Corporation to ascertain the person chargeable with the taxes, was inconsistent with the provision of the Act of 1824, which made it unnecessary to assess the property of the "lawful owner or owners thereof;" and therefore the former were repealed.

The effect of the Act of 1824 was to authorize the Corporation to proceed in rem, the tax being assessable directly and exclusively upon the lands, and not to any person.

This is understood to be the construction upon which this court proceeded in Holroyd v. Pumphrey, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 69, where this court declared in effect, that under the charter of 1824, it was immaterial to what person, or whether to any existing person, the land was assessed.

It would seem to be hardly defensible to assert that, there being but one assessment, and that being sufficient to pass the land irrespective of the true ownership, there is, nevertheless, to be included to the Corporation another assessment, ascertaining "the person chargeable with the taxes, so as to compel a resort to the personalty, or otherwise to avoid the sale.

In our apprehension, the changes in the amended Charter of 1824 are conclusive of the matter, even if, by the true construction of the Charter of 1820, it was imperative that recourse should be first had to the goods and chattels of the first owner.

But was such preliminary recourse required by the Act of 1820 itself? It is submitted that it was not. Nor, in the multitude of tax titles which have been tried in the court below, was the point ever suggested, until the present case in 1857.

The whole argument in its support depends upon the assumption, that the language of the 12th section, declaring that "the person or persons appointed to collect," &c., "shall have authority to collect the same by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the person chargeable therewith," if mandatory upon the corporation, requiring a distress in all instances. This is assumed because of the well settled law, that in certain cases the word "may" and other equivalent expressions, will be construed "must," in order to give effect to the intention of the Legislature; as in Mason v. Fearson, 9 How., 248.

But is this such a case?

In Mason v. Fearson, 9 How., 248, the charter had provided for the sale of one lot, to pay the taxes on all; and this court held that the corporation was bound to exercise the power so conferred; and that, the first two lots having produced more than enough to pay the taxes on the whole, the subsequent sales were void. This is not at all analogous to the present case, which is that of the express grant of co-ordinate remedies to be exercised optionally. The sale of one lot for the taxes due on all those owned by the same person, instead of unnecessarily selling them all, each for its own taxes, is manifestly for the benefit of the owner; but is it manifestly for his benefit that the summary remedy of a distress warrant shall be applied to his household furniture, rather than that a vacant lot lying in commons shall be sold?

This precise matter has been adjudicated by the Supreme Court of New Jersey, in the case of Martin v. Carron, 2 Dutch., 230. There, the clauses in the Charter of Newark were identical with those in this Charter of 1820. This same objection was taken. But the court held that "the remedies are co-ordinate. It is not necessary that the goods and chattels of the owner or occupant of the lot be exhausted before proceeding against the land."

[Points II and III of the counsel for the plaintiff in error, related to the construction of the ordinance of the Corporation; but as the court held that these ordinances could not affect the power to sell the land for taxes, they are omitted as immaterial.]

Messrs. J. Marbury, W. Redin, Sam'l Tyler and R. J. Brent, for the defendant in error:

After citing and quoting from the sections of the Acts of Congress, and the ordinances of the corporation bearing upon the question at issue, the counsel said: Was, then, the instruction so given by the court below, and excepted to by the defendants, right?

It was urged by the defendants, that it was discretionary with the Corporation and their officers to take and sell, either unimproved real property, or the personal property of the owner, for the taxes; on the contrary, the plaintiff urges, and now submits, that under the 10th and 12th sections of the Charter of 1820, there is no discretion in the Corporation or collector; but that it is mandatory upon them, under the provisions of that Act, first to take the personal property of the owner possessed by him within the corporation for the taxes claimed, before resorting to his real estate.

The 10th and 12th sections of the Charter of 1820 relate to the same subject, and must be taken together. The 10th section (which authorizes the sale of real property) is not independent, but must be construed in connection with the 12th section, which provides for the seizure and sale of the goods of the owner; and thus taken and construed, the two sections mean, that if the owner of the real property has personal property upon the premises, or anywhere else in his possession within the corporate limits, sufficient to pay the taxes claimed, it shall be taken for them, and the real property, whether improved or unimproved, saved from sale therefor. The taxes to be collected were those which should be "imposed by virtue of the powers granted by the Act." The taxes which the Act authorized to be imposed were taxes on unimproved as well as improved lots. And all the taxes so imposed on all descriptions of property, were, by the terms of the Act, to be collected out of the goods of the persons chargeable with the tax. The person appointed to collect any tax, by virtue of the powers granted by this Act, shall have authority to collect the same by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the person chargeable therewith." If he had goods upon the property on which the tax was imposed, they were to be taken there If he had no goods thereon, but possessed them elsewhere within the corporate limits, it was not meant that the real property upon which the tax was imposed should be sold, but that goods should be taken, wherever they were found in his possession within the jurisdiction of the corporation. It is the same as to both descriptions of property, improved and unimproved—taxes are imposed equally upon both, "by virtue of the same Act," and are, as to both, to be alike collected in the same way out of the goods of the person chargeable with the tax. The real property might be resorted to, in the contingency of there being no personal property; but not "until all the other means of collection prescribed in the Act" had been tried and failed. The 12th section may be read as a further proviso to the previous 10th section. And the 2d proviso of the 10th section, as to improved property, may be considered to have been inserted merely from abundance of caution as to that particular description of property, and not as any restriction upon the duty required in the 12th section, viz.: to take goods for all taxes imposed by virtue of the Act, wherever the party possessed them within the corporate limits. The 12th section of itself was sufficient to protect both descriptions of property, improved as well as unimproved. This construction produces harmony and protects all the real property from sale, where the owner possessed personal property sufficient for the taxes claimed within the corporation, which the collector could find; and which, when taken, would be protected from replevin by the last clause of the 12th section. It effects, it is submitted, the intent, and secures the rights of all parties, the Corporation as well as the citizen; whereas, a contrary construction, limiting the protection from sale to the improved property only, would leave the unimproved exposed, although the owner might have abundant personal property for all the taxes claimed, and would violate the intent.

Similar sections of the Act of Congress of the 14th of July, 1798, to lay and collect a direct tax, were thus placed together and construed by this court in the case of Parker v. Rule's Lessee, 9 Cranch, 67.

The policy of the law has ever been, to make the personal estate the primary fund for the payment of debt, and especially of incumbrances and charges for taxes. The authorities are numerous; but in addition to Parker v. Rule's Lessee, and the Act of Congress of 1798, reference is merely made to Blackwell on Tax Titles, pp. 205, 209–213; Scales v. Avlis, 12 Ala., 617; the Tax Acts of Maryland, 1785, ch. 83, sec. 8, 1797, ch. 90, sec. 1, and Mayor of Baltimore v. Chase, 2 Gill & J., 376; all going to establish that personal property must be resorted to before the real estate. In the case at bar, the lot was unimproved, and the owner at the time of the sale, and at all times, possessed abundant personal property. The fact that he had such, was known to the Corporation and its officers; quantity, value and description, and the particular locality where to be found, being all entered upon their own books. The fact that he possessed such, and that the collector could have taken it, is found by the jury.

"Taking the whole statute together," therefore, and "looking to the policy required," the duty to take such personal property and abstain from sale of the unimproved real property, was imperative and mandatory upon the Corporation and collector under the provisions of this Charter of 1820.

Mason v. Fearson, 9 How., 248, is a direct authority in support of the view that it was mandatory. The duty, if not percisely the same, was of the same character in both cases, and the words are equivalent.

Upon these sections 10 and 12, then, of the Charter of 1820, alone, and independent of the corporation Ordinance of July 1824, we submit that it was imperative first to take the personal property possessed by Mr. Carroll at the time of the sale; and that there was no discretion in Corporation or collector first to resort to the unimproved real estate.

But if there was any discretion under the Charter of 1820, the Ordinance of July 3, 1824, taken in connection with those sections, places the matter beyond all doubt as to the duty of the collector. By that ordinance the Corporation, if there was any discretion, made their election and exercised it.

[Counsel further discussed the effect of this Ordinance of July 3d, and the claim of the defendants, that Carroll gave consent to the creditors to resort to his real estate rather than his personal.]

There can be no presumption to support a tax title, or in favor of a collector's proceedings. There is no estoppel, legal or equitable, in its favor against the true owner. All the substantial and essential requisites, as fixed by law, must be proved.

Especially is this so where the transaction is recent, and the possession of the purchaser under the tax deed has scarcely exceeded, as in the case at bar, 12 or 13 years.

Early v. Doe, 16 How., 615; Williams v. Peyton, 4 Wheat., 77; Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat., 119; Porter v. Whitney, 1 Me., 306.

Some remark was made below on the expression in the Charter of 1820, sec. 10, in relation to the tax deed. The proper explanation of this is given in Lyon v. Hunt, 11 Ala., 315,

The general principle is, that titles derived under tax sales, depend on a strict execution of a naked power, uncoupled with an interest.

Hubbell v. Welden, H. & D. Sup., 139; Williams v. Peyton, 4 Wheat., 77; Early v. Doe, 16 How., 618.

The Act of 1820, ch. 104, sec. 10 (3 Stat. at L., p. 589), gives the Corporation of Washington no power to sell real estate, until after two years' taxes are due and in arrear; but no such limitation is found in regard to the liability of personal property for taxes, which may be distrained on and sold the moment they are assessed, and upon ten days' notice, according to the 12th section of this Act.

The 7th section of the Act of 1820 authorizes the Corporation "to lay and collect taxes upon the real and personal property within the city."

It is therefore clear, that Congress looked to the personal property of the debtor, as the primary fund for the immediate and available revenues of the city, and to the realty as only secondarily or ultimately chargeable.

The power to collect taxes by distress on the goods, &c., is compulsory, and not optional, on the part of the city.

Mason v. Fearson, 9 How., 248; Parker v. Rule, 9 Cranch, 67.

The only difficulty is occasioned by the 3d proviso of the 10th section of the Act of 1820, which forbids a sale of improved property whereon there is personal property sufficient to pay the taxes.

An argument is based on this proviso, to the effect that recourse need not be had to personal property primarily, except where it is found on improved real estate; but we consider this proviso as merely designed to subject primarily all personal property on the real estate, irrespective of its ownership.

The Corporation of Washington had the right of pursuing at its election, either the remedy by distress, or by sale of unimproved real estate, and this is held on the authority of the adverse case cited on the other side.

Martin v. Carron, 2 Dutch., 228.

The Ordinance of July 3, 1824 (Rothwell's Laws, p. 169), is a conclusive election by the city, to require the collector to exhaust the personal effects of debtors, before selling the real estate.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The lessors of the plaintiffs below claim to recover a lot of ground in the City of Washington, the title to which was admitted to have been in their ancestor in 1835. In that year it was sold for taxes by the corporate authorities. The plaintiffs in error claim through mesne conveyances of the tax title.

The lot in question was assessed as vacant and unimproved; but the owner, Mr. Carroll, resided in Washington City. He owned a large number of unimproved lots, the taxes on which amounted to $5,690. He had personal property in and about his house, estimated at between five and six thousand dollars.

On the trial, but a single defect was alleged against the tax title, which raised the question. "Whether, upon the true construction of the Charter of 1820, as amended by the Charter of 1824, it was a condition to the validity of the sale of unimproved lands for taxes, that the personal estate of the owner should have been previously exhausted by distress."

The court instructed the jury: "That if Carroll resided within the limits of the Corporation of Washington, and had in his possession personal property sufficient to pay all taxes due by him, which might have been seized and subjected to distress and sale, it was the duty of the corporation, through their collector, to resort first to such personal property; which not being done, the sale of the lot in question was illegal and void."

The correctness of this instruction is the only question presented by the record for our consideration.

The authority granted to the city and the mode of its exercise is to be found in the 10th section of the Act "to incorporate the City of Washington," passed on the 15th of May, 1820 (2 Stat. at L., 583). It provides "that real property, whether improved or unimproved, on which two or more years' taxes shall have remained unpaid, may be sold at public sale, to satisfy the Corporation therefor;" with this proviso, that no sale "shall be made in pursuance of this section of any improved property, whereon there is personal property of sufficient value to pay the taxes," &c.

It is the obvious intent of this law, that the thing or property shall be held liable for the tax assessed upon it, and that the tax is a lien in rem, which may be sold to satisfy it. It seems to assume, also, that the property should be assessed to some person as owner, for it provides for a longer or shorter notice by advertisement, according to the residence of the owner, whether in or out of the district or of the United States. Where the owner is out of the jurisdiction of the Corporation, the assessment can impose no personal liability on him. But where he resides in the city, he may be considered as personally liable for the taxes assessed against his property, and "charged to him;" and though not liable to an action of debt, the 12th section of the Act provides an additional remedy for the Corporation. Besides that of proceeding in rem, under the provisions of the 10th section, it enacts that "the person or persons appointed to collect any tax imposed by virtue of the powers granted by this Act shall have authority to collect the same by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the person chargeable therewith," &c.

The Act of May 26th, 1824 (4 Stat. at L., 75), which modifies and changes some of the provisions of this Act, provides, among other things, "that no sale for taxes shall be void by reason of such property not being assessed or advertised in the name of the lawful owner."

Without inquiring whether this Act repeals the 12th section of the previous Act by implication, it shows plainly that the property assessed is considered as primarily liable for the tax, without regard to ownership. But assuming that the owner, residing in Washington, is still personally liable for taxes assessed on his unimproved lots, there is nothing to be found in this law that, by any fair construction, requires that the remedy against the person must be exhausted before that against the property charged with the tax can be resorted to. It is not necessary to the validity of the assessment and sale of the property taxed that the name of the true owner be ascertained. The collector, therefore, cannot be bound to search for him, or to distrain the personal property of one who may or may not be the owner, even when named as such in his assessment list.

The remedy given, by the 12th section, to the Corporation is co ordinate or cumulative, but is not imperative as a condition precedent to the exercise of the authority to sell the property assessed. It is a power conferred on the officer, to be used at his discretion—not a favor to the owner. If he is unable to pay the taxes assessed on his property, it may not be a very desirable measure for him to have his household furniture distrained and sold on ten days' notice, when the remedy against his land cannot be pursued till two years' taxes are due and unpaid: and the owner has then two years more to redeem his land after the sale. A construction of this Act, which made it the imperative duty of the collector to distrain the personal property, might be ruinous to the proprietor, and deprive him of an important privilege.

The City of Washington was laid out on an immense scale. But a very small portion of the lots and squares were improved or productive. Their value to the owners was, in a great measure, prospective, while the present burden of taxes, to those who owned large numbers of them, was oppressive. As we see in the present case, if the collector had levied on the personal property of the owner for the taxes charged on his vacant and unproductive lots, it would have left him without furniture in his house, or servant to wait on him. Hence, a four years' delay was to him a valuable privilege. It demonstrates, too, the evident policy of the Act of Congress in not compelling a sale of the owner's personal property, before the lands charged could be sold. In Georgetown and Alexandria, old settled towns, where the lots were nearly all improved, and yielding profit to the owners, the statute adopted a different policy. By the proviso to the 8th section of the Act of 1824, which applies exclusively to those towns, the collector is not permitted to sell real property where the owner charged with the tax has sufficient personal estate, out of which to enforce the collection of the debt due.

The case of Mason v. Fearson, 9 How., 248, has been urged in the argument as an example of the construction of this Statute, which should be followed in this case, and where the word "may" is construed to mean "must." But that case has no analogy to the present. It is only where it is necessary to give effect to the clear policy and intention of the Legislature, that such a liberty can be taken with the plain words of a statute. But there is nothing in the letter, spirit or policy of this Act, which requires us to put a forced construction on its language, or interpolate a provision not to be found therein.

In this case, the owners of the tax title have had the possession, paid the taxes, built and made valuable improvements on the lot, in the presence of the former owners, for near twenty years. That which was of comparatively small value at first, has now become valuable. Under such circumstances, a court of justice should be unwilling to exercise any judicial ingenuity to forfeit even a tax title, where the former owners have been so slow to question its validity.

The counsel for the appellees have endeavored to support this instruction of the court, by reference to certain ordinances of the Corporation, which, among other things, direct the collector to levy first on the personal property of the person charged with the tax, unless such person shall give consent in writing to the contrary. This direction to the collector is a very proper one. It leaves the election of this remedy to the person charged, and not to the officer. But the power to sell the lands for taxes is to be found in the Acts of Congress, not in the ordinances of the Corporation. They can neither increase nor vary it, nor impose any terms or conditions (such as evidence of the owner's election), which can affect the validity of a sale made with in the authority conferred by the statute.

The purchaser of a tax title is not bound to inquire further than to know that the sale has been made according to the provisions of the Statute which authorized it. The instructions or directions given by the Corporation to their officers may be right and proper, and may justly be presumed to have been followed; but the observance or non-observance of them cannot have the effect of conditions to affect the validity of the title.

The question argued by the counsel of appellees, again bringing up the endless controversy as to the terminus a quo, in the computation of time, and which was noticed by this court in the case of Griffith v. Bogert, 18 How., 162, is not in the case as presented by the record, and we cannot anticipate its decision.

Judgment reversed and venire de novo.

JOHN GREENWAY AND GEORGE C. DICKSON, Libts.

(See S. C., 22 How., 491-503.)

Master of vessel must acquaint himself with the laws of the country with which he is trading—appellants responsible for miscarriage of their master and agent—delivery of cargo into custom house not sufficient delivery.

It is the duty of the master of a vessel to acquaint himself with the laws of the country with which he is trading, and to conform his conduct to those laws.

He cannot defend himself under asserted ignorance, or erroneous information on the subject.

It is the habit of every nation to construe and apply their revenue and navigation laws with exactness; and every ship master engaged in a foreign trade, must take notice of them.

In this case the master was informed of his duties upon his arrival at the port of destination, by the officers of the customs, and his embarrassment and loss can be attributed to nothing but his inattention.

Appellants are responsible for the miscarriage of their master and agent. Their contract is an absolute one, to deliver the cargo safely; the perils of the sea, only, excepted.

Under such a contract, nothing will excuse them for a non-performance, except they have been prevented by some one one of those perils, the act of libelants, or the law of the country.

No exception of a private nature, not contained in the contract itself, can be engrafted upon it by implication, as an excuse for its non-performance.

It was for the libellees to furnish the evidence to discharge themselves for the failure to perform their contract.

The delivery of the cargo into the custom-house, under the order of the officers, and the payment of the duties by the consignees, was not a right delivery, and the consignees are not responsible for their safety afterwards.

Where the delivery contemplated by the contract was a transfer of the property into the power and possession of the consignees, the surrender of possession by the master must be attended with no fact to impair the title, or affect the peaceful enjoyment of the property.

Argued Mar. 21, 1860. Decided Apr. 16, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, by the appellees, on a contract of affreightment.

The district court entered a decree in favor of the libelants. This decree having been affirmed, on appeal, by the circuit court, the claimants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. O. S. Halstead and O. S. Halstead, Jr., for appellants:

The bark arrived at Rio, Jan. 28, 1858. She had a manifest, authenticated by the Brazilian Consul at New York, open, in the hands of the master, and a duplicate one, sealed up by the Brazilian Consul at the port of sailing, and directed to the inspectors of the custom-house at Rio. She was boarded by the custom-house officer immediately on her arrival. Greenway & Co. were immediately, and before giving entry, applied to by the master to act as consignees of the bark, and agreed and assumed the duties of such consignees.

Greenway & Co., by their Shipping Clerk Magalhaer, when giving entry, received the open manifest from the visiting officers, for the purpose of completing the necessary formalities. He examined that manifest, and says there was no entry in it of 132 boxes. He says it was two or three days after her arrival that the bark commenced discharging at the custom-house wharf. Greenway & Co. had the open manifest some two days, at least, before the bark commenced discharging. We submit that the testimony shows that Greenway & Co. then learned that the boxes were omitted in the manifest.

The testimony shows that the omission of the boxes, in the open manifest, was observed by Greenway & Co., in time to supply the omission and avoid all difficulty; and (so far as it may have any bearing upon a view of the whole case) that the same is true in reference to Abranches & Co. The consignees failed to notify the master of the omission. It could then have been supplied by the master, and all difficulty avoided. The supplying it then would be the same, in effect, as if it had been supplied by the master before delivering the manifests to the custom-house officers. On this open manifest, the master could then have supplied the omission. It was on this only that he could have ever before supplied it. The omission by the consignees, after discovering the error in time to have it corrected, to notify the master of it, was a gross failure of duty as consignees, and is proof of intended fraud.

We are nowhere told when and how the omission first came to the knowledge of the custom-house, nor when the goods were seized nor when they were sold.

What could more strongly give the character of fraud to the omission of the consignees to notify the master of the omission, at the time when it could have been supplied by him?

We submit that this testimony of the value was insufficient. It was, in the nature of things, impossible for us to give any proof whatever of the value. The chairs and furniture were inclosed in boxes; how many boxes contained chairs, and what kind of chairs; and how many contained tables, and what kind; and how many other furniture, and what kind, it is impossible for us to show. The boxes contained 2,613 cubic feet, freight fifteen cents per foot. A space eighteen feet square by eight feet high would contain two thousand five hundred cubic feet, within twenty-one feet of the cubic feet in these boxes. How could chairs and furniture that could be in these boxes be worth $5,000 or $6,000? There is no evidence that the chairs and furniture contained in the boxes were worth that.

As to damages. This libel is in a cause of contract, and the libel prays damages for the non-delivery of the goods. The actual damage to the libelants, is the measure of damages to be awarded.

The court, we trust, will not permit these consignees to make a speculation out of a case such as the testimony shows this to be, and where no fraud could have been intended, the boxes and every article of cargo being actually delivered into the custom-house.

Again; the charge in the libel, that the boxes or goods were confiscated by the Brazilian Government to its use, is wholly unsustained. There is no evidence that they were subject to such confiscation, and if they were so subject, there is no proper evidence of any act of confiscation by the said government.

"The laws of the port of Rio do not authorize the seizure of goods after they have been discharged into the custom-house, for omission of entry in the manifest"

Messrs. H. G. De Forest and G. Gifford, for appellees:

1. The ship was bound by the bill of lading, to deliver the goods to the consignees.

The general rule is, that the delivery must be to the consignee in person, and this rule is always applicable, unless some other mode of delivery is sanctioned by the usage of trade or express contract.

Ang. Carr., secs. 297, 298; 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 153; Price v. Powell, 3 N. Y., 325, and cases cited; Gibson v. Culver, 17 Wend., 305.

2. In the case of sea-going vessels, the usages of most ports make a delivery on the wharf, with reasonable notice to the consignee, a sufficient delivery. If the consignee cannot be found, or declines to receive the property, the carrier is not justified in leaving it on the wharf, even after notice. It is his duty, in such a case, to place it in a proper and safe place, where the consignee can obtain it.

Ostrander v. Brown, 15 Johns., 42; Fisk v. Newton, 1 Den., 45; Ang. Carr., sec. 300; 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 155, note.

3. In the present case, the goods were never delivered to the consignees.

It does not appear that Greenway & Co. ever received notice from the master that the goods were being discharged, or that they were ever invited to receive them. On the contrary the testimony shows that the goods were landed on the custom-house wharf, and deposited in the custom-house, and were there seized before any attempt was made by the master to make delivery, and while they were still in the custody of the officers.

4. The clause in the bill of lading, stating that the goods were "to be delivered at the ship's tackles," does not vary the obligation of the carrier to make such a delivery as shall give to the consignee the actual possession of the property.

5. The non-delivery of the goods not having been occasioned by the accepted perils, the ship and owners are clearly liable for their value.

Even if the seizure had been the arbitrary and merely capricious act of the Brazilian Government, the failure to deliver would not have been excused.

Gosling v. Higgins, 1 Camp., 451; Spence v. Chodwick, 10 Q. B., 517; S. C., 10 Ad. & E., N. S.; Evans v. Hatton, 4 Man. & G., 954.

But the seizure was directly occasioned by the culpable neglect and omission of the master.

6. Even if the goods had come into the possession of Greenway & Co., the ship would not have discharged herself. Her duty was to deliver possession clear of all claims and liens incurred by the fault of her master and owners. Anything short of this would not have been the delivery contracted for under the bill of lading.

7. The commissioner did not err in his computation of damages.

The value of the property at Rio was sworn by Abranches to be $6,000, and the invoice value at New York was stated by Magalhaer to be between $5,000 and $6,000, which, with the addition of freight, &c., harmonize, the testimony. The claimants had the opportunity of cross-examining Mr. Davison, who purchased the goods in New York; but they deliberately refrained from doing so.

8. This court will not, on this hearing, consider any exception as to the admissibility of any of the depositions or exhibits.

The depositions were filed and opened, and notice thereof given to the claimant's proctors, Jan. 13, 1855.

See the 118th Rule of the District Court, Southern District of New York.

Rule 33, of the Supreme Court, however, disposes of this question, providing that where an exception to the admissibility of a deposition, &c., does not appear on the record, it will be disregarded.

Rule 33 Feb. Term, 1824, re-enacted as Rule 13, Dec. Term, 1858.

9. The decree of the circuit court should be affirmed with costs.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a libel in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, against the bark Griffin and her owners, on a contract of affreightment by the appellees. The libel stated, that in November, 1852, at New York, there was shipped on that barque, of which the appellants are owners, one hundred and thirty-two boxes of chairs and furniture, to be delivered at the ship's tackles at the port of Rio de Janeiro, to the appellees, according to the terms of a bill of lading. That the regulations of the port of Rio de Janeiro require the owner or master of a vessel arriving there, to submit to the officers of the customs a manifest of the cargo on board; and that cargo not mentioned in the manifest cannot be passed through the custom-house, but is liable to seizure and confiscation for that omission.

That the master of the barque omitted to enter the said consignment on the manifest rendered by him on his arrival, and in consequence the boxes were seized and confiscated, and so were lost to the consignees. The libellees answer that the goods referred to in the libel were discharged in accordance to the bill of lading, under the laws and regulations of the port, and under the order of the proper government officers, and went into the custom house under the direction of the libelants, they paying the duties thereon.

That after the delivery at the ship's tackles of the said shipment, the consignees became responsible for their safety; and that they were not confiscated or forfeited to the government, nor abandoned by the consignees to the owners of the ship. Upon the pleadings and proofs, a decree was rendered against the libellees in the district court, which was affirmed in the circuit court, on appeal.

It appears from the testimony that it is the duty of a master of a foreign vessel, upon her arrival at the port of Rio de Janeiro, to deliver to the proper officer (Guarda Mor), upon his visit to the vessel, his passport, manifest, and list of passengers. He is required, "at the end of the manifest," to make such "declarations or statement for his security by adding any packages that may be omitted or exceeded in his manifest, giving his reasons for such omissions; no excuse will afterwards be admitted for any omissions or error."

That, "when it is proved that the vessel brought more goods than are specified or contained in the manifest, and not declared by the the master, such goods will be seized, and divided among the seizors, the master also paying into the National Treasury a fine of one half their value, besides the customary duties thereon." It further appears, that The Griffin reached the port of Rio de Janeiro in January, 1853, and that her master rendered her passport, manifest, and list of passengers, and was required to make any statement or declaration in addition, and informed that no other opportunity would be afforded to him. The master answered, that he had no addition to make or declaration to record. The goods were discharged according to the custom of the port, under the direction and orders of the revenue officers, into the custom-house, and while there, and before the entry had been completed, they were seized aud confiscated under the regulation before stated. In a petition by the master to the Brazilian Government for a remission of the forfeiture and penalty he had incurred, he says: "That on the last voyage of the vessel a seizure was made of one hundred and thirty-two packages of furniture, more or less, on the ground that they were not entered in the manifest, and, although the petitioner acknowledges that the custom-house officers have acted according to the instructions of the department, still there are reasons of equity which render this seizure contrary to law."

These reasons were, that the Brazilian Consul at New York was a novice in his office, and had failed to give him accurate information, and had approved of a manifest full of mistakes; and that the master had acted in good faith, and was obviously free from any suspicion of a design to defraud the revenue. This petition was referred to the director-general of the revenue, who returned for answer: "That taking into consideration the quantity of the packages seized (130 cases), and the quality of the goods therein contained (furniture), and more particularly the circumstances which occurred before the seizure thereof (the packages having been landed, and the duties paid), there is no plausible reason to ascribe to fraud or bad faith the omissions of the said packages in the manifest of the vessel in which they were imported; but, on the other hand, the circumstance of the proof of fraud, or even of its presumption, is not essential in order to render the seizure a legal one in the present hypothesis. It is expressed in the case before mentioned, in the articles 155, 156, of the General Regulations of the 22d June, 1836, that the stmple fact of finding either more or less packages is punishable with the penalties therein decreed; and the seizure to which the petition refers, having been made and adjudged in conformity with the provisions of the said article 155, I am of the opinion that the decision of the custom-house ought to be confirmed." The decree was entered accordingly. The testimony shows that the packages were sold by the inspector of the customs as forfeited, and that the consignees sustained a total loss. There is no testimony to show that they contributed to produce this result. It was the duty of the master of the barque to acquaint himself with the laws of the country with which he was trading, and to conform his conduct to those laws. He cannot defend himself under asserted ignorance, or erroneous information on the subject. It is the habit of every nation to construe and apply their revenue and navigation laws with exactness, and without much consideration for the hardship of individual cases. The magnitude and variety of the interests depending upon their efficient administration compel to this, and every ship master engaged in a foreign trade must take notice of them.

The Vixen, 1 Dod., 145; The Adams, Edw., Adm. 310.

In the case before us the master was informed of his duties upon his arrival at the port of destination by the officers of the customs, and his embarrassment and loss can be attributed to nothing but his inattention. The question arises, whether the appellants are responsible for the miscarriage of their master and agent. Their contract is an absolute one to deliver the cargo safely, the perils of the sea only excepted. Under such a contract, nothing will excuse them for a non-performance, except they have been prevented by some one of those perils, the act of the libelants, or the law of their country. No exception of a private nature, which is not contained in the contract itself, can be engrafted upon it by implication as an excuse for non-performance. Atkinson v. Ritchie, 10 East, 533. In Spence v. Chodwick, 10 Q. B., 516, the defendants pleaded, "that the ship, in the course of her voyage to London, called at Cadiz; and while there, the goods were lawfully taken out of the ship by the officers of the customs on a charge of being contraband under the laws of Spain, without default on the part of the officers of the ship. The court affirm the rule, that when a party by his own contract, creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may, nothwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract." It was for the libellees to furnish the evidence to discharge themselves for the failure to perform their contract.

They insist that the delivery of the cargo into the custom-house under the order of the officers, and the payment of the duties by the consignees, was a right delivery, and that the consignees are responsible for their safety afterward. We do not concur in this opinion. The delivery contemplated by the contract was a transfer of the property into the power and possession of the consignees. The surrender of possession by the master must be attended with no fact to impair the title or affect the peaceful enjoyment of the property. The failure to enter the property on the manifest was a cause of confiscation from the event, and rendered nugatory every effort subsequently to discharge the liability of the ship and owners.

The appellants complain that the proof does not support the decree in respect of the damage assessed. One witness testifies to the market value of the packages in Rio de Janeiro, and another approximates their costs in New York, and upon this testimony the assessment was made. It was competent to the appellants to introduce testimony in the circuit court, or in this court, upon that subject, but none has been submitted.

We should not be justified in concluding the decree to be erroneous under the circumstances.

Decree affirmed.

HENRY DALTON, Appt.,
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

Evidence of alienage of grantee of Mexican title —loose conversations—presumptions from grant.

In this case, it is held that there is not sufficient evidence to establish the fact of alienage of the grantee of a Mexican title, against the strong presumption of the contrary, arising forom the face of the espediente and definitive title.

In all cases, the testimony of admissions or loose conversations, should be cautiously received, if received at all.

Such testimony ought not to be received, to outweigh the prima facie (if not conclusive) presumptions arising from the espediente and definitive title.

Argued Dec. 6, 1859. Decided Apr. 23, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by the appellant, for the confirmation to him of a claim to a certain tract of land.

The Board of Land Commissioners entered a decree confirming the claim. On appeal, by the United States to the District Court, this decree was reversed; whereupon the petitioner took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. R. J. Brent, for appellants:

1. Pio Pico, as governor ad interim, had the general power to grant. His official character cannot be questioned. Every presumption of law is in his favor, nor can he be styled a revolutionary governor. The court will judicially notice the history and laws of California, under the Mexican Government, as much as the laws of the State of the Union.

Frémont v. U. S. 58 U. S., (17 How.), 557.

When Governor Micheltorena left the Department, driven out, it is true, by a revolutionary party, the office of governor devolved by law upon the senior member of the Departmental Assembly (Art. 20, law of March 20 1837; Arrillaga's collection of decrees, Jan. to Dec., 1837); so that Pico became governor de jure as well as de facto. He made this grant as governor ad interim.

Arredondo's case, 6 Pet., 727.

The Supreme Court have already recognized the power of Governor Pico, and it would be strange that after recognizing his official character, it should now hold that the presumption is not in favor, but against the authenticity of his acts.

U. S. v. Vaca, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 556; U. S. v. Sutherland, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 363.

This case is totally different from that of The U. S. v. Cambuston, for here there can be no doubt about the bona fides of the grant.

2. It is submitted that there is no sufficient evidence in the record to show that he was an alien to Mexico.

None of the declarations of Dalton are in a positive form. They were made to third parties under circumstances not affecting this litigation, and they are not sufficient to rebut the presumption that he was a Mexican citizen. If the court deem that a material presumption to sustain this grant against these loose declarations of his, we have the positive patent of the Mexican authorities, not issued improvidently by the governor, but after nearly two months' consideration, and after due report from the municipal authorities, that there was no impropriety in the grant.

3. But if the court should be satisfied that the fact of the alienage of Dalton is sufficiently proved, then it is submitted that this fact does not constitute, by the Mexican law, an absolute incapacity on his part to take lands in California.

Phillips v. Rogers, 5 Mart., 700–745; 1 White's New Recop., 588; Article 1 of Law of 1824; 1 Rockwell, 451; and Regulations of 1828, art. 1, p. 453.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., for the appellee:

After stating the evidence, and the proceedings under which the land in this case was alleged to have been granted, the counsel proceed:

I object to the allowance of this claim, because,

1st, the execution of the grant by the governor, and its delivery to the grantee, are unsatisfactory and illegal. To sustain the first objection, there needs but a reference to that funddamental principle of evidence, which forbids the admission of any evidence which is not the best that the nature of the case will admit of.

2. The certificate of approval by the Departmental Assembly is fraudulent, and voids the whole title.

3. Henry Dalton, being a British subject, never naturalized under the laws of either Mexico or the United States, as is shown by the evidence, was, and is, incapable of receiving or holding a title to the property in controversy.

Constitutional Law of Mexico, Dec. 15, 1835, art. 13; decree of March 1842, 1 Rockwell, 611; Colonization Law of 1824, 2 Whites Recop., pp. 59, 62; Arguello's case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 547.

4. Pio Pico, at the date of this grant, had no power to devest the nation of its title in the public domain, and bestow it upon any individual.

Upon this point the counsel reviewed the order of the events connected with the expulsion of Micheltorena and the accession of Pico.

5 The grant was coupled with the condition to pay $500, which has never been complied with.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The title of Dalton is found in the archives, and its authenticity is not disputed. The espediente exhibits:

1st. A petition of Henry Dalton, dated March 12th, 1845, at Los Angeles, setting fourth that he is a resident of that city; that he is endeavoring to increase the number of cattle on the premises which he possessed, called Azusa, but that he lacked more land for that purpose; that the mission of San Gabriel owned a large plain adjoining his tract of Azusa, which was useless to them. It was accompanied with a diseno or map of the land. The quantity desired was two sitios.

On the 13th of March, Pio Pico, acting governor, makes the usual marginal order for information, referring the petition to Father Thomas Estinega, minister to the mission of San Gabriel, to report.

March 26th. Estinega reports, that the tracts solicited is one of those which the mission cannot cultivate, because it is deficient in water; and considering that Dalton offers to deliver him, as a gift for the Indians, $500, he consents that a grant of the land be made to Dalton.

This petition was referred also to the municipal counsel of Los Angeles, who reported in favor of the grant, and on the 14th of April certified their approval to the governor.

On the 26th of May, 1845, Governor Pico orders a grant to be made out for two sitios, and sent to the Departmental Assembly for their approval.

June 9th, 1845. The Departmental Assembly, upon report of the committee on waste lands, to whom the espedients had been referred, approve the grant in conformity with the Law of August 18th, 1824, and the Regulations of 21st of November, 1828.

In pursuance of this grant, judicial possession was delivered to Dalton, February 14, 1846, in due form, with a regular survey of the boundaries.

The only objection urged in this court to this title, as justifying its rejection, is, that Henry Dalton was a foreigner, and had not been naturalized, and was, therefore, incapable of taking a grant of land.

The counsel for the plaintiff in error deny both the law and the fact, as assumed in this objection.

1st. They contend that it was no part of the policy of Spanish or Mexican Government to exclude foreigners from holding lands; and that the Colonization Law of 1824 invites foreigners to "come and establish themselves within the Mexican Territory, and gives them privileges against taxation," &c., &c.; and provides that, until after 1840, the General Congress shall not prohibit any foreigner as a colonist, unless imperious circumstances should require it with respect to individuals of a particular nation.

2d. They contend, also, that the Regulations of 1828 require the governor to obtain the necessary information as to whether the petitioner is a person within the conditions required to receive a grant; that the espedients found in the record shows a full compliance with the law; that the definitive title, which is a valid patent, recites that the petitioner was "in the actual possession, by just title, of a rancho" known by the name of Azusa; that this is a legislative adjudication of the fact of the grantee's capacity to hold land, and per se a naturalization, if he had previously been an alien; that, at least, it affords a prima facie, if not a conclusive presumption, of the grantee's capacity to receive a further grant of land.

3d. They contend, also, that any legislation repugnant to this policy of the Government of Mexico since that time originated in, perhaps, a just jealousy of their American neighbors, and was aimed wholly at them, and intended to apply only to the colonies bounding on the United States; that this is apparent from the edict of Santa Anna of 1842, which permits foreigners not citizens, residing in the republic, to acquire and hold lands, and excepts only the departments "upon the frontier and bordering upon other nations;" that California was never treated as within this category, as the colonized and settled portion of it is separated a thousand miles from the frontier or border of any nation, and was at that time almost a terra incognita to the rest of the world.

4th. They contend that, by the Spanish as well as by the common law, a foreigner is not incapable of taking a grant of land, but holds it subject to be denounced in the one case, and forfeited by an inquest of escheat in the other; that the grant in this case being complete, neither the United States Land Commissioners, nor the courts authorized to adjudicate the Mexican title under the Treaty, can exercise the functions either of denouncers or escheators.

5th and lastly. It is contended, that even if the court considered itself bound to declare this grant void by reason of the alleged incapacity of the grantee to take or hold, yet that there is no sufficient evidence to establish the fact of alienage against the strong presumption of the contrary, arising from the face of the espediente and definitive title.

The court do not intend to express any opinion upon the first four of these propositions, as the last suggests a sufficient reason for the confirmation of this grant.

In all cases, the testimony of admissions or loose conversations should be cautiously received, if received at all. They are incapable of contradiction. They are seldom anything more than the vague impressions of a witness of what he thinks he has heard another say—stated in his own language, without the qualifications or restrictions, the tone, manner, or circumstances, which attended their original expression. If a complete record title, with ten years' possession, could be devested by such testimony, its tenure would be very precarious, especially where the owner is surrounded by a population of settlers interested in defeating it. All the evidence on the record on the subject of alienage, besides that of a brother who proved himself an alien, is in the deposition of two witnesses. One states that Dalton, in order to avoid serving as a juryman, said "he did not claim to be an American or Mexican citizen." He might well have been a citizen, although he was not desirous of setting up such a claim on that occasion. The other states that in 1847, during the war, when the country was occupied by the American forces, he said "he was not a Mexican, and never intended to become an American citizen." At such a time, he may have had many motives prompting him to make such a representation. The Mexican Government had ceased to protect him, and the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo had not then made him an American citizen.

Now, assuming that these witnesses have remembered and reported the precise words used by the claimant in these loose conversations, they contain no positive assertion that he had never been naturalized, or was born out of Mexico. Such testimony ought not to be received to outweigh the prima facie (if not conclusive) presumptions arising from the espediente and definitive title.

In this respect, this case closely resembles the case of United States v. Reading, 18 How., 1.

The decree of the district court is reversed, and the title of the claimant to the land in question is hereby confirmed.

THE NEW YORK AND BALTIMORE TRANSPORTATION COMPANY, Appts.,

v.

THE PHILADELPHIA AND SAVANNAH STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, Owners of the Steamship KEYSTONE STATE.

(See S. C., 22 How., 461-473.)

What are sufficient lookouts on vessels—steamers meeting sailing vessels must keep out of their way—propellers not governed by rule of sailing vessels—rule of steamers meeting each other.

Collision between a steamer and a barge, in tow of the propeller, on the River Delaware.

Lookouts stationed in positions where the view forward, or on the side of the vessel, is obstructed by the lights, or any part of the vessel, do not constitute a compliance with the requirements of law.

To constitute such a compliance, they must be persons of suitable experience, properly stationed on the vessel, and actively and vigilantly employed in the performance of duty.

Steamers are required to keep out of the way of sailing vessels, upon the ground that their power and speed are far greater than vessels of the latter class, and those in charge of them can more readily and effectually command that power and speed, so as to avoid a collision, when it would be impossible for a sailing vessel to keep out of the way.

None of the reasons on which the rule is founded, as applied to sailing vessels, exist in case of propellers, which have nearly the same speed as side-wheel steamers, and quite as much power.

If they take other craft in tow, those in charge of them ought to augment their vigilance, in proportion to the embarrassments they have to encounter, especially when they do not see fit to slacken their speed.

The law is well settled, that steamers approaching each other from opposite directions, are respectively bound to port their helms and pass each other on the larboard side.

Where both vessels, as they approached each other, were near mid-channel, and the propeller starboarded her helm, and attempted to cross the bows of the steamer, that movement of the propeller was a direct violation of the rules of navigation, and was entirely without excuse.

Argued Mar. 26, 1860. Decided Apr. 23, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, by the appellants, to recover damages resulting from a collision.

The district court entered a decree dismissing the libel. This decree having been affirmed, on appeal, by the circuit court, the libelant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. Wm. Schley and G. M. Wharton, for appellant:

1. The Artisan and her tow were not on an equality with The Keystone State, and the rules, whether statutory or judicial, applicable to vessels on an equality with respect to the capacity of self-management, are not applicable to the former.

The Act of Congress of Aug. 30, 1852 (10 Stat. at L., 61-72), applies only to passenger steamers.

So, also, the rules of the inspectors under the authority of the 29th section, in the matter of vessels passing each other, signal lights, &c., embrace only the same class of steamboats, and are intended to avoid collisions between such vessels.

Those rules were, however, obligatory on The Keystone State.

The 5th rule of the supervising inspectors, adopted Oct. 29, 1852, provides that it shall not be lawful for an ascending boat to cross a channel, when a descending boat is so near that it would be possible for a collision to ensue therefrom.

This rule was violated by the steamer.

Although not bound by the statute, the propeller did adopt the dictates of prudence and good seamanship, by keeping in to the Jersey side of the channel, and leaving the center of it free.

A tug with a tow in charge, is at least as helpless, in comparison with a steamer, as a sailing vessel; and with respect to the latter, the rule is well settled, that the steamer meeting such an one must give way

See Fashion v. Wards, 6 McLean, 153; New York and Liverpool Mail Steamship Co. v. Rumball, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 372; The Oregon v. Rocca, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 570; St. John v. Paine, 10 How., 583; The Genesee Chief, 12 How., 451.

There is nothing in our case to make it an exceptional one, or subject it to other rules of navigation.

The Keystone State could have avoided the collision; and by the Law of 1852 and the decisions of this court, she was bound to avoid the collision if possible.

2. It being night, and the steamer approaching the harbor, it was her duty to proceed slowly and with caution; not having done so, she is responsible for the consequences.

3. Even if the libelants committed any fault (which is, however, denied), a small exertion on the part of the respondents being sufficient to have prevented a collision, they were bound to make it.

The Genesee Chief, 12 How., 461; St. John v. Paine, 10 How., 557; Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How., 586.

4. If both vessels were in fault, it was an error to throw the whole loss on the libelants; the damages should have been divided.

The barge followed the course of The Artisan, and obeyed her movements. She was entirely under her control. There is no evidence of any fault imputable to the barge; her being, therefore, the thing which actually came in collision with the steamer, makes no difference.

The James Gray, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 194.

Messrs. Charles S. Keyser, St. George T. Campbell and P. McCall, for appellees:

1. The Act of Congress of 1852 (10 Stat. at L., 661-672), and the rules of the supervising inspector appointed under the same, were applicable to The Keystone State as a passenger steamer, and to the propeller also, if carrying passengers as set forth in the libel, so far as respects lights and movements.

2. The Admiralty rules are imperative—they are obligatory upon vessels approaching each other, from the time necessity for precaution begins, and continue so long as they advance. N. Y. & L. & U. S. S. Co. v. Rumball, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 383.

3. The rule laid down is, that when two steam vessels are approaching each other, each shall port and go to the right, passing each other larboard and larboard.

This rule is imperative in English courts of Admiralty, and fully adopted by the United States courts.

4. A propeller, whether carrying passengers or engaged and used only for towing, and when having a tow in charge, is still a steamer, subject to all the general rules applicable to steamers. And the rule of law makes no such distinction as would require them to be considered, with respect to other steamers, as sailing vessels; on the contrary, a steamer with a tow in charge, is bound to adopt the same rules with regard to a sailing vessel as a passenger steamer —no distinction is recognized between them. The New York v. Rea, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 223. They are required also to have a lookout, charged specially with the duty.

Chamberlain v. Ward, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 571.

5. It was the duty of the propeller to have a competent and vigilant lookout stationed at the forward part of the steamer, actually and vigilantly employed in the performance of that duty. St. John v. Paine, 10 How., 557; Chamberlain v. Ward, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 548; The James Gray v. The John Fraser, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 192.

6. No such condition of things existed at the time and place of the collision, as required the speed of the steamer to be reduced more than that stated in the evidence. The distance from the port of Philadelphia was twenty miles, and there were no vessels at anchor or otherwise, to interfere with the full use of the whole channel. The New York v. Rea, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 223; Culbertson v. Shaw, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 584; The James Gray v. The John Fraser, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 185.

7. The 5th rule of the supervising inspectors, adopted Oct. 29, 1852, cited in appellant's brief, refers exclusively to boats navigating the rivers falling into the Gulf of Mexico and their tributaries.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, in a cause of collision, civil and maritime.

It was a suit in rem against the steamship The Keystone State, brought by the appellants as the owners of the barge known as The A. Groves, Jr., to recover damages on account of a collision which took place on the 18th day of August, 1857, between the steamer and the barge on the River Delaware, whereby the barge was sunk in the river, and her cargo was greatly damaged.

At the time of the disaster the barge was in tow of a propellor, called The Artisan, which was also owned by the appellants, and to which the barge was attached by a hawser, about one hundred and seventy feet in length. It occurred between one and two o'clock in the morning, about twenty miles below the City of Philadelphia, to which port the steamer was bound on her return trip from Savannah, in the State of Georgia.

According to the case made in the libel, the propeller, with the barge in tow, was on her way from the City of New York to the City of Baltimore, with her usual complement of freight. She was proceeding down the river, on the eastern side of the channel, and the steamer was coming up the river, on the opposite side of the channel, with ample room to have kept clear of the barge.

To show that neither the propeller nor the barge was in fault, it is alleged by the libelants that both those vessels had proper lights, and that the propeller had sufficient lookouts properly stationed on the vessel, and that they were vigilantly employed in the performance of their duties. They also allege that the steamer, when about three quarters of a mile distant from the propeller, changed her course more out into the stream of the river, heading diagonally across the channel, in the direction of the descending vessels, and ran with great force and violence against the barge, striking her on the starboard side, near the after gangway, and cutting her down to such an extent that she immediately sunk in the river. In this connection they also allege that the barge, at the time of the collision, was laden with a cargo of merchandise, valued at $70,000, and that the goods were damaged by the disaster to an amount equal to half their estimated value.

It is denied by the respondents that the circumstances attending the collision are truly stated in the libel. On the contrary, they aver that it was occasioned wholly through the fault and gross negligence of those in charge of the descending vessels. To lay the foundation for that theory, they allege that while the steamer was proceeding up the river at mid-channel, in the regular course of her voyage, and when about four miles below Marcus Hook, the second mate, pilot, and lookout of the steamer, discovered lights directly ahead, which appeared to be about three miles distant; that the steamer continued her course up the channel, keeping the lights on her larboard bow, but as near ahead as was practicable; that after continuing that course for some time, and when about a mile distant from the lights, they were found to be the lights of the propeller, and appeared to be at mid-channel. Orders were then given by the pilot of the steamer to port her helm, so as to bring the lights of the propeller a point on the larboard bow of the steamer; and the order was forthwith obeyed. At that time the steamer, as alleged in the answer, was heading northeast by east; and she continued on that course, keeping the lights of the propeller one point on her larboard bow, until she approached within three hundred yards of the lights, when the propeller suddenly starboarded her helm, and attempted to cross the bows of the steamer. On seeing the propeller change her course in that direction, the pilot of the steamer gave the signal to slow and stop in immediate succession, and the orders, as alleged, were promptly obeyed. Those orders were so far carried into effect that the propeller passed on her course without injury; but the barge was dragged by the hawser directly against the bows of the steamer, and thereby received the damage, as alleged in the libel.

Such is the substance of the pleadings, respecting the circumstances attending the collision, so far as it is necessary to examine them at the present time.

After the hearing in the district court, a decree was entered for the respondents, dismissing the libel; and on appeal to the circuit court, that decree was affirmed—whereupon the libelants appealed to this court.

As appears by the proofs, the steamer, at the time of the collision, was well manned and equipped, and was in charge of a branch pilot, fully qualified to conduct and manage steam vessels on that river. She was a side-wheel steamer, of fifteen hundred tons burden, engaged in carrying freight and passengers, and had proper lights and sufficient and vigilant lookouts. They discovered the lights of the propeller when she was three miles distant, and continued to watch the lights till the collision occurred. On the other hand, the propeller was a vessel of one hundred and twenty-two tons burden, and the tonnage of the barge was about the same.

Three men, the master, the wheelsman, and one of the watchmen, were on the deck of the propeller at the time of the collision. All of the other hands, including the pilot, were below. Of those on deck, the master was standing forward of the pilot house, but the watchman was standing aft the house, which he admits was higher than his head, so that he could not see over it. His position for a lookout was clearly an improper one, as the view forward was entirely obstructed by the house of the vessel. Chamberlain v. Ward, 21 How., 570. Lookouts stationed in positions where the view forward, or on the side of the vessel to which they are assigned, is obstructed by the lights or any part of the vessel, do not constitute a compliance with the requirement of the law.

To constitute such a compliance, they must be persons of suitable experience, properly stationed on the vessel, and actively and vigilantly employed in the performance of that duty.

In this case, however, it appears that the steamer was actually seen by the master, who was in charge of the deck, in season to have adopted every necessary precaution to have avoided the disaster, but he admits that he did not pay much attention to the approaching vessel. When he first saw her, he says she was proceeding right up the river, but adds, that in the course of five minutes she changed her course, and ran from the western towards the eastern shore, which is the theory set up in the libel. According to the evidence, the speed of the steamer was nine or ten miles an hour, and that of the propeller was seven or eight miles an hour, with an ebb tide. At the place where the collision occurred, the channel of the river is about three fourths of a mile wide, and the evidence shows that there is a cove or bend in the river below, so that a vessel coming up the river in the night time would appear to an inattentive or casual observer, standing on the deck of a descending vessel, as being near the western shore, when in point of fact she was at mid-channel. Witnesses on both sides were examined as to the character of the night, and they generally agree, that while it was somewhat cloudy, there were intervening stars, and that it was not unsually dark.

Two propositions were chiefly relied on by the libelants. In the first place it was insisted in their behalf, that the propeller, with the barge in tow, ought to be regarded in the same light as a sailing vessel, and that it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way. No authority was cited in support of the proposition, and we are not aware of any decided case that favors that view of the law. Steamers are required to keep out of the way of sailing vessels, upon the ground that their power and speed are far greater than vessels of the latter class, and because those in charge of them can more readily and effectually command and appropriate that power and speed so as to avoid a collision, when it would be impossible for the sailing vessel to keep out of the way. St. John v. Paine, 10 How., 583; The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 463; Steamship Co. v. Rumball, 21 How., 384. None of the reasons on which the rule is founded, as applied to sailing vessels, exist in a case like the present. Propellers have nearly the same speed as side-wheel steamers, and quite as much power. Whether they obey the helm as readily or not, may admit of a question, but there is not sufficient difference in that behalf to justify any discrimination whatever in the application of the rules of navigation. If they take other craft in tow, those in charge of them ought to augment their vigilance in proportion to the embarrassments they have to encounter, especially when they do not see fit to slacken their speed.

It is insisted, in the second place, that the collision was occasioned through the fault of the steamer; that she changed her course and attempted to pass the bows of the propeller, as is alleged in the libel.

On the part of the respondents, this proposition of facts is denied, and they insist that the fault was committed by the propeller, in omitting to port her helm and go to the right. Beyond question, the law is well settled that steamers approaching each other from opposite directions are respectively bound to port their helms and pass each other on the larboard side.

No attempt was made at the argument to controvert the proposition, and it is too firmly established by decided cases to require any argument in its support.

The Duke of Sussex, 1 Wm. Rob., 285; The Gazelle, 1 Wm. Rob., 471; The James Watt, 2 Wm. Rob., 271; St. John v. Paine, 10 How., 558; The Oregon v. Rocca, 18 How., 572; Wheeler v. The Eastern State, 2 Curt. C. C., 142.

Much testimony was introduced on the one side and the other upon this point, and it is somewhat conflicting. All that can be done under the circumstances with any possible advantage to either party will be to state our conclusions upon the evidence. After a careful examination of the depositions, we think it is clearly proved that both vessels as they approached each other were near mid-channel. Most of the witnesses on board the steamer expressly affirm that she was near mid-channel when the lights of the propeller were first discovered, and they all agree that her helm was not changed, except for the purpose of bringing the lights of the propeller one point on her larboard bow, until the propeller starboarded her helm, and attempted to cross the bows of the steamer. That movement of the propeller was a direct violation of the rules of navigation, and was entirely without any excuse. Her master may have been deceived as to the course of the steamer, by the slight bend in the river; but if so, it is the misfortune of those who employed him that he was not better acquainted with the navigation, or more attentive to his duty.

The decree of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

CASES REPORTED IN VOL. 64.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT

DECEMBER TERM, 1859.

REUBEN MIDDLETON, Plff. in Er.,

v.

WILLIAM McGREW.

(See S. C., 23 How., 45-49.)

Aliens could not inherit in Mexico or Texas.

By the laws of Mexico, heirs, being aliens, could not inherit an estate.

This law of descent is applicable to the landed property of Texas.

Argued Dec. 7, 1859. Decided Dec. 19, 1859.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas.

This action was brought in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, to recover a certain tract of land. The trial having resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Robert Hughes, for plaintiff in error:

The question for the consideration of this court is, could an alien, or to speak more properly in the language of the Mexican law, was a foreigner, not domiciliated in Mexico, in the year 1835, capable of taking real estate as an heir from a Mexican domiciliated in Mexico.

To this question we think there is but one answer, and that in the affirmative. The grant in question purports to be to Joshua Davis, a "Mexican by law;" in other words, a naturalized foreigner, as to whom the Supreme Court of Texas have determined that he was a competent to acquire by purchase under the 24th article of the Colonization Law of the 24th of March, 1825, as a native Mexican.

Ruis v. Chambers, 15 Tex., 586.

It follows that the grantee had capacity to constitute an heir by testament, for he stood in the position of a native. The only question, then, is as to the capacity of the heirs being foreigners; upon this question the counsel entered into a lengthy discussion of, and quotations from, the Mexican authorities.

2. But it is supposed that the question raised here has been settled in four adjudged cases, recited by brief of defendant's counsel.

We think we have shown grave and important differences between foreigners and Mexicans as contained in the Colonization Laws of March 24, 1825, and that they did not come within the rule of the colonization established by that law, and as a consequence were not subject to the extraordinary penalty of the 30th article. Again; in the court below it was contended that, granting that all the colonization laws which were ever in force in Coahuila and Texas had been repealed, yet the National Colonization Law of Aug. 18, 1825, was in full force and effect, and that the 15th article of that law declares, that "no person who, by virtue of this law, acquires a title to lands, shall hold them, if he is domiciliated in a foreign country.

1 White's Recop., 602.

The Supreme Court of Texas have solemnly determined that everything in relation to the right to a disposition and grant of the vacant lands in the State of Coahuila and Texas, and the other States of the confederation only, properly belonged to the States, and that as a consequence, art. 12, which purports to limit the quantity of land which might be granted to each individual, had no operation within the limits of Coahuila and Texas; and so in regard to the 15th art. That was a matter in regard to which the States only had power to act; but even were this not so, the law contained in the 15th art. could not operate in Texas, because the title to the land in question was not acquired by virtue of that law, but only by virtue of the Colonization Law of March 24, 1824, under which the grant of it was made. And besides, the general Colonization Law was made in August 1824; and afterwards, in 1828, another Congress of the Republic established a general Naturalization Law, one provision of which was in conflict with the former law.

NOTE.—Alienage, effect of as to title to real estate. See note to Governeur v. Robertson, 24 U. S. (11 Wheat.), 332. Title and transfer of lands governed by lex loci rei sitae. See note to Clark v. Graham, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.), 577; note to Elmendorf v. Taylor, 23 U. S. (10 Wheat.), 152; note to Darby v. Mayer, 23 U. S. (10 Wheat.), 465, and note to Jackson v. Chew, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.), 153.

We think we have established:

1. That by the laws of Spain and by the Indias, a foreigner domiciliated in a foreign country in all times past, at least from the time of Allonso L. Sabeo, in the 13th century, during whose reign the Siete Partidas was compiled, could take as an heir to a person dying in Spain.

2. That this rule is not limited or changed by reason of anything in the Colonization-Laws of Coahuila and Texas, or in the judgments of the courts of Texas; whence, it follows that—

3. The plaintiff ought to have recovered in the court below, having derived his title from the brothers and heirs of the grantee, Joshua Davis.

All of which proves that the court below erred in the instructions given to the jury, and the judgment should be reversed.

Mr. W. P. Ballinger, for the defendant in error:

No principle is more conclusively settled in the law of Texas, than that aliens prior to the adoption of the Constitution, in 1836, could not take lands by descent.

Holliman v. Peebles, 1 Tex., 678; Yates v. Iams, 10 Tex., 168; Hornsby v. Bacon, 20 Tex., 556; Blythe v. Easterling, 20 Tex., 565.

Art. 15, law of 1824, provided that "no person who, by virtue of this law, acquires a title to lands, should hold them if he is domiciliated out of the Republic. This general law remained in force, and has always been recognized as the basis of the power to grant lands by the state government, and as imposing imperative restraints on that power.

Republic v. Thorn, 3 Tex., 608; Blount v. Webster, 16 Tex., 618, 619.

This law was repealed before the grant to Davis; but no change was to be made on the concession to the purchasers under the former law, and purchasers were required to enter into possession of the land granted them, within 18 months.

See art. 16, Laws of 1832, art. 30, Laws of 1834; Jenkins v. Chambers, 9 Tex., 234.

The grant to Davis, on its face issued under the Law of 1825, and requires of the grantee compliance with its provisions.

But the State Law of 1832, and of 1834, arts. 8 and 9, are equally stringent in requiring Mexican domiciliation in order to acquire lands, and there is no single provision, throughout the entire Colonization Laws, departing from this fundamental policy.

Horton v. Brown, 2 Tex., 78; Hornsby v. Bacon, 20 Tex., 556.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted for the recovery of land in the Colony of Power and Hewetson, in Texas, in the possession of the defendant, and claimed by the plaintiff through a conveyance by the brothers of Joshua Davis, deceased, a colonist, who died in June, 1835, intestate, and without issue. These brothers were citizens of the United States, and assumed to be the heirs at law of the decedent. The only question presented for the examination of this court is, whether the brothers were capable of taking by inheritance real property within the limits of Mexico, or were they disabled by their condition as aliens. The solution of this question must be found in the jurisprudence of Mexico, as it is understood and applied to cases as they have arisen with the State of Texas. If there is found, in the decisions of the Supreme Court of that State, clear and consistent testimony to the existence of a rule of descent, under such circumstances the duty of this court will be performed in ascertaining and enforcing that rule in this case.

The defendant has referred the court to a series of decisions as containing such testimony.

The case of Holliman v. Peebles, 1 Tex., 678, was that of heirs claiming the land of a colonist in the settlement of Austin, who after his location had returned to the United States and died, leaving heirs who were citizens of them. The court intimate, that by the laws of Spain, as adopted in Mexico, these heirs had no heritable blood, and proceed to say: "Whatever may be the true construction of the laws of Spain or of colonization on the subject-matter, there can be no doubt that the capacity of aliens to hold lands in the Republic of Mexico, if it ever existed under the laws of Spain, was extinguished by the decree of the 12th March, 1828." 4 vol. Ordenes y Decretos, p. 155. The 6th article of this decree is expressed in the following terms, viz.:

"Foreigners introduced and established in conformity with the regulations now prescribed, or which shall be hereafter prescribed, are under the protection of the laws, and enjoy the civil rights conferred by them upon Mexicans, with the exception of acquiring landed rural property, which, by the existing laws, those not naturalized cannot obtain. * * * This provision covers all acquisitions of real property, whether by purchase or inheritance, and is so understood by the Mexican editor of Murillos de Testamentos."

The case of Yates v. Iams, 10 Tex., 168, was that of a citizen of the United States claiming through an ancestor who had died in 1827 in Texas, holding land by a head right acquired in 1824. The court announce their conclusion, "that, upon general principles pervading the law of 1823, under which this grant was made, and upon the general policy of the government in relation to the right of property in lands (granted for the purpose of colonization) at the time of the death of the intestate, an heir domiciliated out of the Republic of Mexico could acquire no right, by inheritance, to lands of persons dying in the Province of Texas."

The case of Hornsby v. Bacon, 20 Tex., 556, was that of citizens of the United States claiming to share as heirs in real property of a citizen of Texas, who died in 1835, with other relations of the same degree, who were citizens of Texas. The court say: "The right of the plaintiff's vendors (the alien heirs) to claim this land by inheritance must be tested by laws anterior to the Constitution of the Republic; and by them, as appears from our previous decisions, such right cannot be sustained. The plaintiff claim nothing through them by his conveyance."

The case of Blythe v. Easterling, 20 Tex., 565, is that of heirs claiming the landed estate of an immigrant to Texas, who died in November, 1833, they being aliens and non-residents. The court decide, "that it is too well settled by repeated decisions of this court to be longer regarded as an open question, that at the period of the death of the decedent, his heirs, being aliens, could not inherit his estate."

We understand these decisions to declare a law of descent applicable to the landed property of Texas generally, and not to lands in a particular colony, or settled under a particular act of colonization. The case before the court falls within the control of these decisions.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

Maryland Statute of Limitations—eviction, what is—seisin of executor in Louisiana—when right of action passes to heirs.

The Statute of Maryland of the years 1715, ch. 23, and 1818, ch. 216, constituted a bar to a recovery by the plaintiffs, as more than three years had elapsed after their right of action had accrued, before the plaintiffs brought their suit.

Where one had been judicially declared not to be entitled to land, by the decree of the Supreme Court, that, of itself, was an eviction under the law of Louisiana, though the court postponed giving a writ of possession.

In that State, it is not necessary to constitute an eviction, that the purchaser of land should be actually dispossessed.

An eviction may take place when the vendee continues to hold the property under a different title from that transferred to him by his vendor.

The Civil Code of Louisiana provides that a testator may give the seisin of the whole or of a part of his estate to his executor. The seisin usually continues for a year and a day, but may be prolonged by an act of the court.

The seisin of the executor is distinct from and paramount to the seisin which the law vested in the heir, immediately on the death of his ancestor; and the heir can only deprive the executor of it by providing security for the performance of his obligations.

When the testamentary executor submitted to the title of others, and paid them for it, that was an eviction, which gave to him a right of action in behalf of the succession against the warrantors of his testators.

His right of action passed to the heirs when he delivered the succession to them, or whenever it came to their hands by due course of law.

Where the heirs seek, by this suit in assumpsit, to recover damages for the failure of their warranty, the suit having been commenced between eight and nine years after the right of action had accrued; held, that the Statute of Limitations of Maryland prevents a recovery.

Argued Dec. 12, 1859. Decided Dec. 27, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by a breach of warranty, contained in a deed of certain lands in Louisiana.

The trial having resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Robert J. Brent and Charles E. Phelps, for the plaintiff in error:

We contend:

1. That a valid contract of warranty was made binding upon Keller & Foreman, the warrantors. The letter of attorney from the defendant and his deceased copartner must be construed according to the law of Louisiana, the place where the authority was to be executed.

Owings v. Hull, 9 Pet., 627.

The law of Louisiana implies a general warranty against eviction, as a necessary incident to every sale.

Civil Code La., 2450, 2477, 2479, 2482; Preston v. Keene, 14 Pet., 133.

It follows that Keller & Foreman were bound by the contract made by them, through their agent, Armstrong, it being no more than the lex loci would have implied, had no such contract been expressed.

Le Roy v. Beard, 8 How., 451.

II. That said contract was broken, giving a right of action to the plaintiff.

III. (Upon the defense of limitations.) That such action accrued within three years prior to the institution of the suit.

These two points will be considered together.

The contract was concerning land situated in Louisiana. It was made in Louisiana, and there it was to be performed. The inquiry, therefore, is, what, by the lex loci, was necessary to constitute a breach of the contract.

By the civil law, the remedy upon the obligation of warranty is two-fold, and each remedy has respect to a distinct and independent cause of action.

The more usual remedy in the French and Louisiana practice, is the one which was originally resorted to in the present case, while pending in the Louisiana court. By it the warrantor is formally vouched or cited in to defend his vendee's title, as soon as proceedings are commenced against the latter. If the seller thus called in cannot defend, "the judge condemns him to indemnify the defendant, by the same sentence by which he pronounces in favor of the original plaintiff."

In this form of proceeding, the cause of action may be said to arise as soon as the vendee is troubled in his possession by a suit, for at that moment his right to call in his vendor in warranty accrues.

Pothier des Ventes, part 2, ch. 1, sec. 2, art. 5, sec. 2; Domat., lib. 1, tit. 2, sec. 10.

The other remedy is the one now being prosecuted, and which was rendered necessary by the fact that the first was ineffectual—the court which gave judgment not having jurisdiction over the absent parties.

In substance, this remedy corresponds to the ordinary common law action of covenant, and like it is not available until final sentence is pronounced, and cannot be brought before the vendee has sustained an eviction, either actual or constructive.

Pothier des Ventes, part,, 2, ch. 1, sec. 2, art. 5, sec. 2; Domat, lib. 1, tit. 2, sec. 10.

In the present case, therefore, the cause of action did not accrue until eviction was consummated.

"Eviction" is defined to be "the loss suffered by the buyer of the totality of the thing sold, or a part thereof, occasioned by the right or claim of a third person."

Civil Code, art. 2476.

It is decided that this text does not require actual dispossession. Any holding by the vendee of a title different from that acquired from his warrantor, falls within its terms.

Pothier des Ventes, No. 96; Landry v. Gamet, 1 Rob., 362; Thomas v. Clement, 11 Rob., 397.

If the instruction given below can be supported upon the facts disclosed by the record evidence, consisting alone of the certified transcript of proceedings of the District Court of Rapides Parish, in the suit of Calvit v. Mulhollan, we concede that it is unobjectionable in point of form. If, however, it is predicated in any, the least degree, upon the parol testimony, it is fatally defective, and for this plain reason, that it takes the testimony from the jury who are the sole judges of its credibility, by a peremptory charge that the Statute of Limitations constituted a bar.

The law should have been given to the jury hypothetically, leaving them to find the facts.

Budd v. Brooks, 3 Gill., 198; Calvert v. Coxe, 1 Gill, 95; Charleston Ins. Co. v. Corner, 2 Gill, 410; Ragan v. Gaither, 11 Gill & J., 472.

In an action for breach of warranty, the record of the suit in which the title paramount was litigated, is conclusive evidence of the eviction in cases where the warrantor had notice and an opportunity to defend his vendor's title. Where no such title was given, the record is still prima facie evidence, not only of the validity of the paramount claim, but of its extent, &c.

Civ. Code, arts. 2493, 2494; Clark v. Carrington, 7 Cranch, 308.

It may well be argued that in the present case the defendant had such notice.

Field v. Gibbs, Pet. C. C., 155; Roberts v. Caldwell, 5 Dana, 512; Wernwag v. Pawling, 5 G. & J., 500.

But whether notice or not, the record is properly in evidence.

Hanson v. Buckner, 4 Dana, 251; Owings v. Hull, 9 Pet., 627.

Now, first examine the facts of this case as they appear from the record evidence (the record in the suit of Calvit v. Mulhollan), independent of the parol testimony, to determine whether these facts alone do not give the plaintiff a right of action to which the Statute of Limitations is not a bar.

The litigation upon the paramount title commences in 1838. In 1843 the district court renders an adverse judgment, and the defeated claimants appeal. In 1845 the appellate court affirms this judgment as to two of the claimants, but reverses it as to the two youngest, and decides that they are each entitled to recover an undivided eighth.

This decree, even if it had been in terms a final judgment, would not, by the law of Louisiana, have per se amounted to an eviction.

Murray v. Bacon, 7 Mart, N. S., 271.

The decision of the appellate tribunal was not a final decree, but on the contrary, preliminary and prospective merely, contemplating future proceedings and prescribing future action, as a condition precedent to a complete eviction.

So far, then, there is no eviction; therefore no breach of warranty; therefore no right of action; and hence we may safely assume that down to November 1845, limitations have not commenced to run against us.

From the time the decree of the appellate tribunal was filed in the district court, in Nov., 1845, nothing appears which has the remotest relation to an eviction, until 1853.

On May 30, 1853, the present plaintiff, with his now deceased co-plaintiff, for the first time appear in the cause, make themselves parties in their capacity as "heirs and universal legatees" of the original defendant, adopt his answers and defenses, and ask for judgment over against the warrantors, in case judgment be rendered in favor of plaintiffs."

And on the next day (31st May) there is an entry of what purports to be a final judgment of the district court, reciting the decree of the court above, and also reciting the fact which for the first time appears, that "the legal representatives of Charles Mulhollan have purchased the claims of said Calvits for the sum of $2,400."

Within the principles laid down, this recital furnishes at once a state of facts such as, by the lex loci, amounts to an eviction, and gives a right of action upon the warranty.

See cases before cited, 1 Rob., 362, and 11 R., 397.

The record, however, does not furnish the date at which the purchase was made. That it does not do this expressly is certain. That it does not fix the exact date by implication, is equally clear.

It is not for us to supply the omission caused by the silence of the record with respect to time. It is for the defendant, who relies upon limitations, to show that we are barred. It is enough for us to show that at all events on May 31, 1853, we had a cause of action, without being required to prove how long before we might have had it.

If, then, it appears by the record alone that upon the 31st May, 1853, the litigation upon the paramount title was brought to a close by final judgment, and that upon that day we stood as purchasers of the paramount claims, with nothing in the record to show that we were such purchasers long anterior to that time, we submit that the instruction given by the court below that we were barred by limitations was erroneous, inasmuch as we commenced one suit within less than three years from said date, to wit: on Nov. 3, 1855.

We now proceed to consider the case, as it may be modified by parol testimony.

The depositions of J. A. Calvit and Judge Ogden disclose the fact that the relinquishment of the paramount claims was made November 14, 1846, and that the purchase was made by Thos. O. Moore, the acting executor of Mulhollan.

Upon this evidence, the attempt is made to set up the bar of limitations against the heirs, by dating their right of action back to the time when a volutary payment was made by the executor.

Until adopted by the heirs, the purchase of Calvit's claims by Moore, although doubtless made in "good faith," and as the "best arrangement that could be made for the estate," yet, not being within the scope of his executorial powers, was no more the act of the heirs than if made by an entire stranger for purposes of speculation.

Brush v. Ware, 15 Pet., 93-111; Code La., art. 1652; Anderson's Executors v. Anderson's Heirs, 10 La., 35.

The doctrine is well settled, that an action upon warranty may be brought by the executors, provided the breach be during the lifetime of the testator; but if the breach occur after his death, the action can only be maintained by the heirs.

1 Pars. Cont., 109; Rawlings v. Adams, 7 Md., 49.

It is plain, therefore, that no right of action accrued upon this contract of warranty, until May 31, 1853. The executors could not have sued; 1st, because the payment by them did not constitute an eviction at all, they not being authorized to represent the land; and 2d, because, even if such payment did constitute an eviction, the breach was not until after the death of Mulhollan, the warrantee, in which case the heirs alone could maintain an action.

Nor could the heirs have sued, for they had not then ratified the voluntary and gratuitous act of the executors, and made the payment their own.

There being no parties competent to sue, limitations could not run.

Fishwick v. Sewall, 4 Harr. & J., 393.

But if the preceding views be erroneous, and it should be held that the breach of warranty occurred Nov. 14, 1846, by the executor's purchase of the paramount claims, it still by no means follows, of necessity, that limitations commenced to run from that time.

The circumstances of this case are peculiar. The paramount claim was in process of litigation from 1838 to 1853. During the whole of these fifteen years the rights of all parties were held in suspense. The decision of the Supreme Court in 1845 was in no sense a final determination of the controversy. On the contrary, it was in terms merely prospective and interlocutory.

That such decree was not final, see Perkins v. Fourniquet, 6 How., 208.

That it was preparatory only, see Thompson v. Mylne, 4 La. Ann., 211.

During all the intervening time up to May 31, 1853, the paramount claims were exposed to the contingent and unliquidated offsets and abatements indicated by the decision of the appellate court.

During all this time, also, that the suit remained open, it was not only the right, but it was the duty of Keller & Foreman to have intervened, either in proper person or by attorney, for the protection of the threatened title which it was within the scope of their obligation, not merely to "warrant," but also actively to "defend."

These facts, we submit, clearly bring this case within the principle laid down by this court in Montgomery v. Hernandez, 12 Wheat., 129, affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in 2 New Ser., 422.

See, also, Salisbury v. Black, 6 H. & J., 293; Walker v. Bradley, 8 Pick., 261; Franklin v. Depriest, 18 Grat., 257; King v. Baker, 29 Pa., 200; Martin v. Ihmsen, 62 U.S. (21 How.), 894.

Messrs. George W. Brown and F. W. Brown, Jr., for the defendant in error:

The power of attorney, which is the cause of action in this case, is a simple contract under seal. It does not, in terms, authorize the attorney to execute a deed with the general warranty, and was not intended to do so by the constituents, but that question is not now before this court. The defendant in error will contend that the instruction of the circuit court was correct.

I. The cause of action of the plaintiff in error, if any he had, accrued, and limitations began to run Nov. 14, 1846, when payment was made by the executor of Mulhollan in behalf of the estate. More than three years had elapsed before the bringing of this action, Nov. 8, 1855, and the claim is barred by the Acts of Limitation of the State of Maryland of 1715, ch. 23, sec. 2, and 1818, ch. 216, sec. 1.

Beatty's Admrs. v. Burnes' Admrs., 8 Cranch, 98; Murdock v. Winter, 1 H. & G., 471; Frey v. Kirk, 4 Gill & J., 509; Sprague v. Baker, 17 Mass., 291; Lomis v. Bedel, 11 N. H., 74; Day v. Chism, 10 Wheat., 452; 2 Greenl. Ev., sec. 244; Foote v. Burnet, 10 Ohio, 330.

II. The judgment of the District Court of the State of Louisiana, in favor of Charles H. Flower and Alice Flower against Christopher Keller and Francis Forman for $850, with interest from Nov. 14, 1846, the date of the payment by Mulhollan's executor, is void, the court below having no jurisdiction in the case, the defendants never having been served with process, and never having had notice or knowledge of the case. The judgment against Keller is by a wrong name. His true name was, Christian, not Christopher, Keller, and he was in fact, dead at the time when it was rendered, although that fact does not appear by the record. But the plaintiff in error does not sue on this judgment nor claim thereunder. If the judgment were valid, his cause of action would be merged therein, and suit would have to be brought on the judgment, and the form of action would be debt, not assumpsit.

Harris v. Hardeman, 14 How., 339.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

We shall cite such facts in this record as are necessary to show the relations and obligations of the parties to it, under the laws of the State of Louisiana, and in that of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, from which it has been brought here by writ of error.

The plaintiffs are the heirs and universal legatees of Charles Mulhollan, to whom Keller & Foreman sold a tract of land, with an obligation of warranty. On the same day that the conveyance was executed to Mulhollan, he conveyed by deed a part of the land to Reuben Carnal, with a like clause of general warranty.

Afterwards, William J. Calvit, Elizabeth G. Calvit, James A. Calvit and Coleman W. Calvit, filed their petition in the District Court for the Parish of Rapides, alleging that they were the heirs of their mother, the lawful wife of their father, Anthony Calvit, and that they were entitled to half of the land, as it had been purchased by their father during their mother's coverture with him, which superinduced between them a community of acquests or gains —there having been by them no stipulation to the contrary. And they allege, also, that their father, as their natural tutor, had sold the land, for a part of which they petitioned, while they were minors, in violation of their rights.

They further state, that Charles Mulhollan and Reuben Carnal were in possession of the land, and ask that one half of it might be adjudged to them, as the heirs of their mother.

Being thus brought into court, Mulhollan and Carnal filed their answers. Each deny the allegations of the plaintiffs—Carnal citing Mulhollan into court as his warrantor; and Mulhollan alleges in his answer, that he had purchased the land from Keller and Foreman, with a general warranty. He asks that they might be cited, to defend him in his title and possession; and that, as they were absentees from the State of Louisiana, he prayed for the appointment of curators ad hoc, to represent them in the case.

George K. Waters was designated by the court as their curator; and, upon being summoned, appeared in that relation, and, assuming to be the atttorney of Keller & Foreman, filed an answer for them. Keller & Foreman, however, never had any knowledge of the suit nor any notice of the appointment of Waters as curator.

Waters, in his answer, cited in warranty the legal representatives of A. J. Davis, deceased, from whom Keller & Foreman had bought the land.

The legal representatives of Davis appeared, by George Purvis, their curator, and in their turn cite in warranty Anthony Calvit, their ancestor's vendor, who was the father of the plaintiff, by whom the land had been sold to Davis. Anthony Calvit appeared by attorney, denying the petitioner's allegations.

After several continuances, the case was brought to trial in the district court, and judgment was entered for the defendants. The plaintiff carried it by appeal to the Supreme Court of Louisiana. The judgment of the court below was reversed, on the 26th November, 1845. That court decided that the two youngest petitioners, James and Coleman Calvit, were each entitled to one undivided eighth of the land in controversy, but that William J. Calvit and Elizabeth G. Calvit were excluded from recovering, on account of the prescription of ten and twenty years, which Mulhollan had pleaded in his answer. The court then remanded the cause to the district court, for further proceedings on the question of improvements, costs and profits, and of damages between the warrantors.

Afterwards, on a rehearing, the Supreme Court directed a further inquiry to be made, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the price received for the land by the father and tutor of the plaintiff, had been applied to the payment of the debts of the community of their father and mother; " and it ordered, if any of it had been, that James and Coleman Calvit should contribute in proportion to their rights in the land; and that, in the mean time, no writ of possession should issue until they had paid the amount which the court below might determine to be due by them."

After the rendition of the Supreme Court's decree, Charles Mulhollan died. His will was admitted to probate on the 11th July, 1846. On the same day his death was suggested, and an order was passed to renew the suit in the names of his legal representatives. Three days afterwards, Thomas O. Moore, the executor of Mulhollan, paid to James and Coleman Calvit $2,400 for a relinquishment of their claims to the land in controversy, and of all their rights in the judgment which had been rendered in their favor.

No further proceedings were had in the suit from the 11th November, 1846, to the 30th May, 1853, when the plaintiffs in this suit made themselves parties, as heirs and universal legatees of their uncle, Charles Mulhollan, the original defendant. They adopted his answers and defenses, and ask for judgment against his warrantors, Keller & Foreman, which was given on the following day, in the district court, to which the cause had been remanded, for those purposes only heretofore stated.

Such have been the relations of the parties named in the record, in the District and Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. Whatever was the liability of Keller & Foreman, as warrantors of Mulhollan, they never were subjected to the jurisdiction of the district court by any valid proceeding from it, to enable that court to carry that liability into a judgment in favor of Mulhollan, their vendee, or in favor of his representatives, Charles and Alice Flowers.

When Mulhollan answered the petition of the Calvits, and asked that Keller & Foreman should be cited into court as his warrantors, no citation for that purpose was served upon them to do so. One was issued for and served upon Waters, to represent them as curator ad hoc; but that was insufficient to give to the district court jurisdiction to pronounce judgment against them, though that court did do so. Hence it is that this action of assumpsit was instituted to recover damages alleged to have been sustained upon a breach of the warranty of Keller & Foreman to Mulhollan.

In the declaration in this action, it is recited that Keller & Foreman had conveyed to Mulhollan a tract of land, with warranty, and that the Supreme Court had adjudged that James and Coleman Calvit were each entitled to an undivided eighth of the same. They were declared to have entered into the same, and evicted Mulhollan from it; in consequence of which, Mulhollan, to regain his possession, had paid to James and Coleman Calvit $2,400 for the relinquishment of their claims to the land. To this action, the defendant pleaded non assumpsit; and it was agreed in writing, by the counsel in the cause, that, under such issue, all errors in pleading should be mutually waived, and that the defendant was to be permitted, under it, to rely upon the Statute of Limitations.

Upon the trial of the case, that point was urged. The Statutes of Maryland of the years 1715, ch. 23, and 1816, ch. 216, entitled, "Acts to avoid suits at law," were insisted upon, as constituting a bar to the recovery of the plaintiffs. Such was the instruction given by the court.

There is no error in the instruction. More than three years had elapsed after their right of action had accrued, before the plaintiffs brought their suit. Their uncle had been judicially declared not to be entitled to a part of the land by the decree of the Supreme Court. That of itself was an eviction under the Law of Louisiana, though the court postponed giving a writ of possession to the parties in whose favor its decree was made, for the purpose of having certain points ascertained in which all the parties to the cause were interested—no one of them more so than Mulhollan himself. The date of the Supreme Court's decree in favor of the two Calvits, is 26th November, 1845, shortly after Mulhollan died. The district court had not then adjudged those points for which the case had been remanded to it.

Before that was done by the court, and soon after Mulhollan's death, his acting executor, Moore, on the 14th November, 1846, bought from the two Calvits their claim to that part of the land which had been decreed to them by the Supreme Court. This itself was an eviction, though the Supreme Court, in deciding upon these rights to the land, had withheld from the Calvits a writ of possession. It is not necessary, to constitute an eviction, that the purchaser of land should be actually dispossessed. 11 Rob. La., 897. It was also ruled, in the same case, that an eviction may take place when the vendee continues to hold the property under a different title from that transferred to him by his vendor. In this instance, Mulhollan's representatives held the title to a part of the land, originally bought by him from Davis as a whole, by the purchase of James and Coleman Calvit's undivided eighth.

The same conclusions had been previously ruled by the same court in Landry v. Gamet, 1 Rob. La., 362. The court's language is: "It is true that, by the authorities to which we have been referred, the doctrine is well established, that, in order to constitute an eviction, it is not absolutely necessary that the purchaser should be actually dispossessed. That eviction takes place, although the purchaser continues to hold the property, if it be under a title which is not that transferred to him by his vendor, as if he should extend the property, or should acquire it by purchase from the true owner." Pothier, Vente, No. 96; Troplong, Vente, No. 415; Touiller, Vol. XVI., continuation by Duvergier, Vol. I., Nos. 309, 313. Other cases in the Louisiana Reports have the same conclusions, but we do not think it necessary to cite them. The rulings in 1 and 11 Robinson announce it to be the uncontested doctrine in the Louisiana courts, that actual dispossession is not necessary to constitute an eviction, and that, if the purchaser holds under another title than that of his vendee, an eviction may take place. Those decisions cover the case in hand in both particulars, and they show that the purchaser of the land had suffered an eviction by the decree of the Supreme Court, in the meaning of that term in the law of Louisiana, though a writ of possession had not been issued. But if that was doubtful, it is certain that the eviction was accomplished when the executor of Mulhollan bought, for the benefit of of his testator's estate, the claim to the land which James and Coleman Calvit had acquired.

Mulhollan, by his will, granted to his executors, immediately on his death, full and entire seisin and possession of all his estate, to hold and manage the same until all the legacies given by him were paid over and fully discharged. The signification of a delivery of seisin to an executor will be found in articles 1652, 1664, 1666, 1667, of the Civil Code, and in 35 of Revised Statutes, 3. These articles provide that a testator may give the seisin of the whole or of a part of his estate to his executor, accordingly as he may express himself. The seisin usually continues for a year and a day, but may be prolonged by an act of the court, and may be terminated whenever the heirs shall deliver to the executor a sum sufficient to pay the movable legacies. The seisin of the executor is distinct from and paramount to the seisin which the law vested in the heir, immediately on the death of his ancestor, and the heir can only deprive the executor of it by providing security for the performance of his obligations. The executor represented the reception, in so far as respects creditors and legatee. Bird v. Jones, 5 La. Ann., 645. When the testamentary executor submitted to the title of the Calvits, and paid them for it, that was an eviction, which gave to him a right of action in behalf of the succession against the warrantors of his testator. His right of action passed to the heirs of Mulhollan when he delivered the succession to them, or whenever it came to their hands by due course of law. It was delivered to them, and the executor's seisin terminated in the year 1847, though the precise day does not appear in the record. The heirs, upon its termination, were reinstated in all the rights which had been temporarily administered by the executor. Those rights will be found in articles 934-936, of the Code. One of the effects of those rights is to authorize the heir to institute all the actions which the testator could have done, to prosecute to a conclusion such as had been commenced by the testamentary executor, and to commence all actions which he had failed to institute belonging to the succession. 15 La., 527; 7 Rob. La., 188; 2 La. Ann., 339; 7 La. Ann., 867. In such a suit by the heirs, the same defenses may be made which could have been applied if the executor's seisin had been continued. But in this instance, neither the executor nor the heirs, the plaintiffs in the suit, took any legal step to carry to a judgment Mulhollan's citation of Keller & Foreman in warranty in the District Court of the Parish of Rapides, until the 30th May, 1853, more than fourteen years after the eviction of Mulhollan had occurred, and after the rights of the Calvits had been bought. The heirs now, however, seek by this suit in assumpsit in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland to recover damages from Foreman, the survivor of his partner, Keller, for the failure of their warranty to Mulhollan, the suit having been commenced between eight and nine years after their right of action had accrued. The defendant relies upon the Statutes of Limitation of Maryland as his defense to prevent a recovery. We think it must prevail, and that the court below, in giving to the jury such an instruction, committed no error.

We therefore direct its judgment to be affirmed.

What is a full cargo—how determined.

Submitted Dec. 21, 1859. Decided Jan. 3, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, by the appellees, against the appellant, in personam, to recover damages for an alleged breach of a charter-party of the ship Hemisphere, which was hired by the appellant.

The libel claimed $4,950, including $700 for demurrage and interest. The district court entered a decree for the libelants for the whole amount of the charter money, less certain allowances, but excluding anything for demurrage. The final decree was or $5,159.34, with costs.

On appeal by the respondents to the circuit court, this decree was reduced $1,200, and affirmed as to the remainder; whereupon the respondent took an an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Owen and Vose, for appellant.

Messrs. S. M. Parson and C. Donohue, for appellees:

An interested witness is incompetent in admiralty.

Where a witness is called who appears on the record to be interested, and he is objected to, he cannot be sworn until that interest is revoked.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The libelants let the ship Hemisphere by charter-party to David Ogden on a voyage from Liverpool to New York. The covenants which are the subject of this litigation are, briefly, as follows: "Ogden, to furnish a full cargo of general merchandise, and not exceeding 513 passengers, to pay £1,500 for the use of the ship, to have fifteen running lay days, and for every day's detention beyond that to pay $100."

The libel demands $700 as demurrage for seven days, and for a balance yet due on the contract.

The answer denies any liability for demurrage, admits that the whole amount of £1,500 has not been paid, and charges libelants with breaches of their charter-party, and damages in consequence thereof, exceeding the balance claimed by them.

1st. "Because that they carelessly, wrongfully, and contrary to usage, stowed portions of the cargo where it ought not to have been stowed," and thereby deprived respondent "of the full and lawful use of the ship," by having room for only 350 passengers instead of 513.

2d. That libelants would not take and receive "a full cargo of general merchandise."

The district court decided against the charge for demurrage, but allowed the respondent no damages for the alleged breaches of the charter-party by libelants.

On appeal by respondent to the circuit court, the sum of $1,200 was allowed him by that court for the breach first mentioned with regard to the number of passengers received.

From this decree the respondent has appealed to this court.

As the libelants have not appealed from the decree of either the district or circuit court, the only question now to be considered is, whether the respondent has shown himself entitled to more damages than were allowed him by the circuit court.

The judge of the circuit court being of opinion, from the evidence, that the cargo might and ought to have been stowed so as to admit the full number of passengers (513) made a calculation from admitted data of the damage to respondent on that account, without referring the case again to a master, and deducted the sum of $1,200 from the amount of the decree of the district court. Of this the appellant does not complain, but insists that the owners had refused to receive a "full cargo of merchandise."

The registered tonnage of the ship was 1,030 tons; the cargo of general merchandise received was 1,297 tons.

The charty-party covenants for no specific amount to be received. What was "a full cargo" under all the circumstances, and whether the ship could have been loaded to a greater depth than 18 feet 10 inches with safely to the lives of the passengers, was a question which could be solved only by experienced ship masters. Where experts are introduced to testify as to opinions on matters peculiar to their art or trade, there is usually some conflict in their testimony. What was a full cargo for this ship to carry with safety was not a fact which could be settled by any rule of law or mathematical computation, and the court must necessarily rely upon the opinions of those who have experience, skill and judgment in such matters. At least three competent witnesses of this character testify that the ship was loaded as deep as prudence would permit, under all the circumstances. Both the district and circuit court were of the same opinion, and we do not find in the evidence anything to convince us that they have erred.

Let the decree of the circuit court be affirmed, with costs.

In such case, equity does not refuse to lend its assistance. McBlair v. Gibbes, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 232, affirmed.

Submitted Dec. 19, 1859. Decided Jan. 3, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Iowa.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellees, to enjoin an action at law which was pending in said court against him.

The court below decreed a perpetual injunction in favor of the complainant, and that the defendants convey the premises in dispute to him, whereupon the defendants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. James Grant, for appellants.

Mr. Platt Smith, for appellee.

The argument of counsel, being largely devoted to the facts, is not here given.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee filed this bill to enjoin the appellants from prosecuting a suit to recover a parcel of land in his possession, and to quiet his title against their claim as heirs at law of Sarah A. Blakely, deceased. He charges in his bill that he purchased the land from William B. Beebe, and paid to him the purchase money, and that Mrs. Blakely made him a deed at the request of Beebe, who was her son-in-law, and for whose use and benefit it had been conveyed to her with her consent. At the time of her conveyance she was a married woman, and the bill avers that by error, ignorance, or oversight, her husband failed to join in her deed.

The defendants admit that they claim as heir at law of Mrs. Blakely, and insist that she was under a disability to convey land without the consent of her husband.

They deny that she held the land in trust for Beebe, but insist that even if that were the case the trust was illegal, for that Beebe was an insolvent debtor, and the sole design of such a conveyance was to defraud and delay his creditors.

They object that Beebe is a necessary party in the cause. The district court granted relief according to the prayer of the bill. The testimony sufficiently establishes the case made by the bill. It appears that Beebe purchased the land from the tenants in fee simple, and that it was conveyed to Mrs. Blakely by his directions, and that this was done because he was in debt, and did not desire the exposure of his property.

That he sold the land to the appellee, and that Mrs. Blakely executed to him titles without joining her husband in the conveyance. The question arises, whether the heirs at law of Mrs. Blakely, can contest the validity of her conveyance. There is no incapacity in a married woman to become a trustee, and to exercise the legal judgment and discretion belonging to that character. A trustee in equity is regarded in the light of an instrument or agent for the cestui que trust, and the authority confided to him is in the nature of a power. It has long been settled that a married woman may execute a power without the co-operation of her husband. Sug. on Pow., 181. Some doubt has been expressed whether, at law, a married woman could convey an estate vested in her in trust, and inconveniences have been suggested as arising from her asserted incapacity to make assurances which a court of law would recognize as valid. And it has been determined that she could not defeat a right of her husband, or impose a legal responsibility upon him, by her unassisted act. Lewen on Trusts and Trustees, pp. 89, 90; Sug. on Pow., 192, 196; 2 Spence, Eq., 31. But within the scope of her authority a court of equity will sustain her acts, and require those whose co-operation is necessary to confirm them. In the present instance, her deed was within the scope of her authority and duty. She did not defeat an estate to which her husband was equitably entitled, nor does he claim adversely to it. The complainants are her own children, her heirs at law, who are seeking to devest of his estate a bona fide purchaser, and to acquire one for themselves—one to which their mother had no claim in equity or good conscience. Nor can the appellants avail themselves of the illegality of the consideration on which their mother became the trustee for Beebe. The trust has not only been constituted, but carried into execution. The appellee is not a mere volunteer seeking to enforce its terms, nor does his equity depend upon the validity of the trust for its support. He has an independent equity, arising from his purchase from persons professing to hold a legal relation to each other and to the subject of the contract, and to enforce his right there is no need for any inquiry into the consideration or motives that operated upon these parties to assume their relation of the trustee and cestui que trust. In such a case, equity does not refuse to lend its assistance.

McBlair v. Gibbes, 17 How., 232.

The objection that Beebe is a necessary party to the bill cannot be supported. Beebe has not claimed adversely to the title of the appellee. The legal title has never been invested in him, nor do the appellants recognize any privity or connection with him. They claim the property discharged of any equity either in his favor or that of the appellee.

Upon the whole case, the opinion of the court is in favor of the appellee, and the decree of the district court is affirmed.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Iowa.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court. See, also, the preceding case.

Mr. James Grant, for appellants.

Messrs. T. S. Wilson and Platt Smith, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was commenced in the District Court of Jackson County, Iowa, by the appellees, under articles 2025 and 2026 of the Code of Iowa, to quiet their title and possession to certain lands in that county against the impending and adverse claim of the appellants, the heirs at law of Sarah A. Blakely, deceased.

The appellants appeared, and answered the petition, and procured the removal of the cause to the District Court of the United States for Iowa, under the 12th section of the Judiciary Act of September, 1789. 1 Stat. at L., 78. After the removal of the suit to the district court, the appellants commenced a cross suit, asserting therein their own title to the lands in controversy, and praying for a decree of delivery of the possession to them, and an account of the mesne profits. The original and cross suit were "consolidated" on the motion of the appellants, and were heard as one suit.

The proceedings in these causes seem to have been framed upon the course of practice prevailing under the Code of Iowa; and we have found some difficulty in entertaining the suit, as not conforming to the mode of proceeding prescribed for courts, of the United States in chancery proceedings; but as we are enabled to ascertain, from the pleadings and proofs, the matter in dispute between the parties, we shall proceed to adjudicate the questions they present.

The facts disclosed by the proofs show that William B. Beebe, an insolvent debtor, in order to carry on business without interruption, made purchases and sales of property on his own account, in Iowa, but under the shelter of the name of Sarah A. Blakely, the mother of his wife, a resident of Missouri. To enable him to do so with facility, he procured from her powers of attorney, which conferred authority for that purpose.

The land described in the petition was purchased by Beebe with his own money, and the titles were made for his use to Mrs. Blakely. Subsequently he sold them to one of the parties to the cross suit (Mr. Wells) for a valuable consideration, and, as attorney in fact for Mrs. Blakely, executed to her a deed; and the appellees, Westbrook and Guager, claim as purchasers from this person.

At the time of the execution of the deed of Mrs. Blakely, and of her death, she was a feme covert. The appellants insist, that the conveyance to Mrs. Wells in the name of Mrs. Blakely is void, and that they are entitled to hold the lands as heirs at law.

We discover no material variation between the principles applicable in this cause and that of the same appellants and Wynant, which we have just decided.

Upon the authority of that case, we determine that the decree of the district court must be affirmed.

Delivery by carrier, what is—where consignee must receive goods—valid delivery on wharf—goods not accepted, duty of carrier as to—liability for loss by fire—delivery on holiday—custom, as controlling.

Where the contract is to carry by sea, from port to port, an actual or manual tradition of the goods into the possession of the consignee, or at his warehouse, is not required in order to discharge the carrier from his liability as such.

The carrier by water shall carry from port to port, or from wharf to wharf.

He is not bound to deliver at the warehouse of the consignee; it is the duty of the consignee to receive the goods out of the ship or on the wharf.

But to constitute a valid delivery on the wharf, the carrier should give due and reasonable notice to the consignee, so as to afford him a fair opportunity of providing suitable means to remove the goods, or put them under proper care and custody.

Such a delivery, to be effectual, should not only be at the proper place, which is usually the wharf, but at a proper time.

When goods are not accepted by the consignee, the carrier should put them in a place of safety; and when he has so done, he is no longer liable on his contract of affreightment.

Carriers are not liable, on their contract of affreightment, for the loss by fire of goods, where they delivered the goods at the place chosen by the consignee, and where he agreed to receive them and did receive a large portion of them, after full and fair notice.

Where the goods were deposited for the consignees in proper order and condition, at mid-day, on a week day, in good weather; this constituted a good delivery.

Carrier has a right to discharge cargo on a voluntary holiday, such as a day appointed by the governor for fasting and prayer, and to demand the acceptance of his freight by the consignee on that day.

There is no law of Massachusetts which forbids the transaction of business on that day.

There is no general custom or usage which forbids the unlading of vessels, and a tender of freight to the consignee, on the day set apart for a church festival, fast, or holiday.

There is no special custom in the port of Boston which prohibits the carrier from unlading his vessel on such a day, and compels him to observe it as a holiday.

Argued Dec. 30, 1859, and Jan. 4, 1860. Decided Jan. 16, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, by the appellees, on a contract of affreightment, to recover damages resulting from an alleged failure to deliver a part of a consignment of cotton.

The district court entered a decree dismissing the libel.

The circuit court, on appeal, reversed this decree and entered a decree in favor of the libelants, whereupon the claimants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. Choate and G. T. Shepley, for appellants:

The question may be presented under two aspects.

First. Assuming Thursday, April 10, to have been an ordinary working day, can the libel be maintained?

Second. If not, then does the fact that Thursday was a fast day maintain it?

I. Upon the first assumption that Thursday is to be deemed an ordinary working day, the respondents established a full defense upon this proposition; that before the destruction of the cotton by accidental fire, and before one o'clock on Thursday, April 10, they had unladen it upon a suitable wharf, and one selected by the libelants, and made it ready for delivery under a full and reasonable notice to the libelants, thus legally tendering a delivery.

This involves two propositions.

First. That in point of law, such an unlading after such a notice, is such a delivery as terminates the liability of the carrier, as carrier.

Second. That, in point of fact, they had no unladen on such notice.

The propositions of law may be thus stated:

II. The unlading of goods upon a suitable wharf and at a usual time for unlading after reasonable notice to the consignee, accompanied with a readiness and present ability to deliver, is such a tender of delivery as discharges the ship owner from his liability as carrier.

The case of Gatliffe v. Bourne, 4 Bing. N. C., 314, S. C., 3 Man. & Gr., 643, is not in conflict, for that was a case of landing without any notice whatever.

III. The law, as thus completely established, rests upon this excellent reason: that if, by the universal usage, the ship owner ceases to carry at the wharf, and does not truck the goods to the owner, and the owner himself conveys them from the wharf, the liability of the carrier ceases when and where the duty to carry ceases; and it is the universal evidence in this cause, and is now judicially known to the court, that by uniform usage the ship owner, in no form and by no vehicle, ever carries beyond the wharf.

Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. v. The Tangier, 6 Am. Law Reg., 504; The Mary Washington v. Ayres, 5 Am. Law Reg. N. S., 692; The Eddy, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.), 481.

The consignments must be separated. The Middlesex, 11 Law Rep. N. S., 14.

Consignee cannot object that goods were placed on wharf at the usual dinner hour of truckmen. Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. v. The Tangier, 1 Cliff., 396.

The master of the ship has a reasonable time to find out the freight due, but he has no right meantime to store goods at the owner's expense. The Diadem, 4 Ben., 247.

The custom of the port, brought to the knowledge of the parties, may, in the absence of a special contract, vary the rule as to delivery on wharf: The Tybee, 1 Woods, 358.

IV. The distinction between domestic and foreign vessels is inapplicable to this case. It is inapplicable in all cases where the ship or railroad does not directly or by trucks carry beyond the wharf or depot.

Fisk v. Newton, 1 Den., 45; Chickering v. Fowler, 4 Pick., 371; Hemphill v. Chenie, 6 Watts & S., 62.

V. Under special circumstances, after the liability of the carrier, as carrier, has determined, a duty of bailee as wharehouseman or custodian may be eo instants or subsequently imposed on the carrier; but on the facts in this case, if any such modified duty were imposed upon the carrier, there was no breach of it, the fire having an origin without his fault.

The only question is, was there a landing on a wharf, usual or assented to, of the libelants' cotton, separately or accessibly placed, under notice, before it was burned.

The answer to this question we make in these three propositions:

1st. The place of delivery was a proper one. It was on a wharf, usual and selected by the libelants.

2d. The notices given were sufficient for all, and for unlading on Thursday, as well as on previous days.

3d Before the fire the cotton was all unladen and that of the libelants was separated, and so accessibly placed as to make it the duty of the consignee to take charge of it.

Each of these propositions seems to be proved by the testimony in the case.

The next question is, whether the fact that Thursday was a fast day, rendered the act of unlading under notice ineffectual to terminate the carrier's liability.

To show this, it must be made to appear upon the whole evidence—that is, upon the evidence which the court judicially possesses or notices, and upon the evidence given at the trial—that it is the universal usage in the port of Boston not to unlade goods, not liable to injury by weather, upon the forenoon of fast day, from a vessel whose unlading had begun and been interrupted by the neglect of the consignee.

The argument upon which this proposition is maintained is this:

1. Thursday, April 10, 1856, was, prima fronte, a day proper for the discharge of cargo. The fact that the Governor of Massachusetts recomends it to be observed as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, cannot be judicially known to this court to render it per se a day improper for the unlading of a half discharged vessel. That is a mere recommendation addressed to each man's free will, and which the respondents were legally at liberty to disregard, and as they did disregard it, all their rights remain unaffected under the general law.

2. It must appear, then, to the court upon the whole evidence, that there is a usage to do no work like this under circumstances like these, to wit: the discharging of a half discharged cargo under such circumstances as these, so universal as to the bind the respondents.

The sources of this evidence are said to be—

1. The judicial knowledge of the court.

2. The proofs in the cause.

But hereunder the following propositions are submitted:

1. The court will not act upon any evidence except that of the witnesses in the cause.

The point to be proved is a pure and mere fact, to wit: the existence and the limits of an actual usage at that particular time in the port of Boston.

It is a question of how men of business meet the governor's proclamation in fact.

Now, this is wholly out of the sphere and scope of judicial notice.

2. The court judicially or personally knows some facts which will determine it to rely upon no evidence but that which is produced at these several trials.

If the day is a usual one for unlading goods, the unlading vests in the carrier all the right pertaining to unlading with notice. Whether it is a usual one for removing them from the wharf, is wholly immaterial.

It is the custom of unlading a half unladen vessel which is in question.

Customs are limited, peculiar and adapted to particular states of fact. Our rights depend on our case. The custom for our exact case is the only relevant one.

Our legal right to unlade on that day is clear—that is, no law prohibits it. To strike from our week one of its legal working days, and compel us to a fast or a rest to which law does not, a universal usage is demanded.

1 Duer on Ins., 258, 261, 262, 265; The Paragon, Ware, 322.

The proof, so far from establishing such a usage not to unlade, establishes the universal usage to unlade.

The following points of fact are established by the evidence:

1. That the discharge of vessels begun to be unladen before fast day, continues on that day.

2. Cargoes are moved on that day from the wharf.

3. Labor is generally done on that day by all to whom it is necessary or highly convenient to do it.

4. Expresses, freight and passenger trains go on that day.

5. It is a working day in all charter-parties.

6. Public worship is not observed.

If the practice be for the carrier to unlade under such circumstances, even if the consignee may refuse to take, he cannot, by such refusal, impose upon the carrier any greater liability than that of bailee for reasonable care.

2. If such a usage, as is contended for by libelants, be established, it is one which may be waived. It was waived by Solis, the clerk, who had full power to represent the consignees respecting the unlading and delivery, as their agent, and he waived all objection to a delivery on fast day.

3. It is the duty of consignees to remove goods from the place where landed, so soon as not to occasion delay, and this they engaged to do in this case by Solis, their clerk.

They neglected to do so, and thereby made it necessary to complete unlading on fast day. They cannot have damages occasioned by fire which would not have injured their property, if they had not been guilty of neglect which subjected it to that injury.

Messrs. C. Cushing and C. B. Goodrich, for appellees:

1. The bills of lading in this case import one full and complete obligation to deliver as well as to carry.

Such is the general law of carriers by sea or land.

Ang. Carr., sec. 322.

And such is the special law of carriage by sea.

Fland. Ship., secs. 507, 513; see, also, Stevens v. Boston and Maine Railroad, 1 Gray, 277; Pars. Merc. L., 202, 207; Miller v. Steam Nav. Co., 13 Barb, 361.

2. The only exception to this rule in marine carriage is of perils of the sea.

Fire on the wharf, after landing, is not within the exceptions.

Oliver v. Memphis Ins. Co., 60 U. S. (19 How.), 312; Airey v. Merrill, 2 Curt. C. C., 8.

3. Delivery is either actual or constructive.

Actual delivery is to the consignee or his authorized agent, the deliveree receiving the goods in fact.

Constructive delivery consists of notice, tender, readiness, and present ability to deliver according to the contract, all such conditions being reasonable as to time and place, and so constituting duty to receive.

Ad. Cont., 798; Fland. Ship., sec. 811; Ang. Carr., sec. 323.

4. Unlading and delivery are, or may be, distinct facts, as well in constructive as in actual delivery.

Thus, the fact of landing on a wharf is not, necessarily, the fact of delivery.

5. Separation of the goods to be delivered from others, is of the essence of the question of the readiness to deliver and the duty to receive, so as to establish constructive delivery.

Brittan v. Barnaby, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 582.

6. Tender of delivery in such quantities relatively to time as may make reception and removal for storage practicable, is of the essence of constructive delivery.

7. Due relation of notice of delivery to the time or times of delivery, so as to impose on the consignees no unreasonable consumption of time in the reception of the goods, is of the essence of constructive delivery.

Gatliff v. Bourne, 4 Bing. N. C., 321.

8. Proffer of delivery on and for a lawful day, is of the essence of constructive delivery.

Notice on the Lord's day and landing next morning are bad.

Generally, dies festi and holidays are not days for the execution of contracts.

As to such days, the following things are to be noticed, viz.:

(a) In common contracts not negotiable, if day of performance falls due on a holiday, it is performable the next day.

(b) In negotiable contracts, or with grace, the day before.

(c.) National or local usages as to holidays have the same effect as statutes.

Story, Prom. N., sec. 222; Chit. Bills, 11th Am. ed., 378 a n.; City Bank v. Cutler, 8 Pick., 414.

9. In constructive delivery, the conditions of reasonableness are affected and sometimes determined by the usage of business, which usage is a question of fact, regulated, however, by legal doctrines.

10. Under such delivery, actual or constructive, the ship's liability under the bill of lading continues.

Story, Bail., sec. 538; 3 Kent's Com., 168-167; Price v. Powell, 3 N. Y., 322; Miller v. Steam Nav. Co., 13 Barb, 361; Hill v. Humphreys, 5 Watts & S., 123; Harman v. Clarke, 4 Camp., 159; Goold v. Chapin, 10 Barb., 612; Gatliff v. Bourne, 4 Bing. (N. C.), 314; S. C., 3 Man. & Gr., 643; S. C., 11 Clark & F., 45; Fisk v. Newton, 1 Den., 45; Thomas v. Bos. & Prov. R., 10 Met., 472; Lewis v. Western Railroad, 11 Met., 509; Norway Plains v. Bos. & Maine, 1 Gray, 263.

It appears proved in the present case, that so far as any usage exists to supply the elements of reasonableness in the evidence of constructive delivery, it is to haul up to some suitable wharf and land the goods to be received there; that is conceded to be a lawful usage.

It appears in the present case conclusively, that the libelants used all due deligence to take away their gooods as soon as the landing commenced, and so long as it continued prior to Thursday; libelants' agents and servants worked on Monday and on Tuesday, so long as they could find any cotton.

So far as regards men and teams and storage, they could have removed all their cotton on Wednesday, but the parcels were not separated or set apart by the ship on being landed, and were not, according to law, made by the master ready for delivery, and so there could be no constructive delivery beyond the actual amount received in part, and receipted for by libelants' agent.

This consideration applies to so much of the cotton burned, if any, as was landed before Wednesday.

Fast day, by proclamation, is a lawful holiday in Massachusetts, on which libelants were not bound to receive, and therefore all goods landed that day remained at the risk of the ship.

Stat. of Mass., Act of 1838, ch. 182, makes bills of exchange falling due on fast day payable the day before, with notice of protest the day after.

Act of 1856, ch. 113 (April 15, 1856), forbids courts and public offices to be open on fast day.

It is a dies non by immemorial usage in Massachusetts.

It is a much stronger case of dies non by usage than that in City Bank v. Cutler, 8 Pick., 414, which was of Commencement Day at Harvard College.

Conclusion.

1. There was no actual delivery in this case.
2. The goods were destroyed before the time of lawful reception arrived, and there was no constructive delivery.
3. The ship is, therefore, liable for the goods.
4. And to the full value.

And the decree of the circuit court must be affirmed.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The barque "Tangier, a foreign vessel in the port of Boston," is charged in the libel with a failure to deliver certain bales of cotton, according to her contract of affreightment. The answer admits the contract, and alleges a full compliance with it, by a delivery of the cargo on the wharf; and that after such delivery, a part of the cargo was consumed by fire, before it was removed to the consignees.

The libelants amended their libel, admitting the receipt of 168 bales, and setting forth, as a reason for not receiving and taking away from the wharf that portion of the cargo which was unladen on Thursday, "that, by the appointment of the Governor of Massachusetts, that day was kept and regarded by the citizens as 'a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer,' and that from time immemorial it has been the usage and custom to abstain from all secular work on that day;" and consequently, that the libelants were not bound to receive the cargo on that day; and that such a delivery, without their consent or agreement, is not a delivery or offer to deliver in compliance with the terms of the bill of lading.

Three questions of law were raised on the trial of this case below:

1. Whether the master is exempted from liability for a loss occasioned by accidental fire, after the goods are deposited on the wharf, by the Act of Congress of March 3d, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 635).
2. Whether the master is liable, under the circumstances of this case, for the loss of the cotton, on the general principles of the maritime law, excluding the fact of fast day.
3. If not, whether the right of the carrier to continue the discharge of his cargo is affected by the fact that the governor had appointed that day as a general fast day.

As our decision of the second and third of these points will dispose of this case, we do not think it necessary to express any opinion on the first.

We will first inquire whether there was such a delivery of cargo in this case as should discharge the carrier under this contract of affreightment, irrespective of the peculiar character of the day.

The facts in evidence, so far as they are material to the correct decision of this point, are, briefly, as follows:

The barque Tangier arrived in the port of Boston on the 8th of April, with a cargo of cotton, intending to discharge at Battery wharf; but at the request of the consignees, and for their convenience, she "hauled up" at Lewis' wharf. She commenced the discharge of her cargo on Monday, the 7th, and on the same day day the master gave notice to the consignees of his readiness to deliver the goods. The unlading was commenced in the afternoon, and was continued through the forenoon of Tuesday, when, the cotton not being removed, the wharf became so full that the work was suspended. Notice was again given to the consignees; and they still neglecting to remove their cotton, a third notice was added on Wednesday morning. On the afternoon of that day, all the cotton which had been unladen on Monday and Tuesday was removed, excepting 325 bales, which remained on the wharf over night. On Thursday morning, the wharf was so far cleared that the unlading was completed by one o'clock P. M. On that day, the libelants took away about five bales, and postponed taking the rest till the next day, giving as a reason that it was fast day. About three o'clock of this day, the cotton remaining on the wharf was consumed or damaged by an accidental fire.

The contract of the carrier, in this case, is "to deliver, in like good order and condition, at the port of Boston, unto Goddard & Pritchard."

What constitutes a good delivery, to satisfy the exigency of such a contract, will depend on the known and established usages of the particular trade, and the well known usages of the port in which the delivery is to be made.

A carrier by wagon may be bound to deliver his freight at the warehouse of the consignee; carriers by railroad and canal usually deliver at warehouses belonging to themselves or others. Where the contract is to carry by sea, from port to port, an actual or manual tradition of the goods into the possession of the consignee, or at his warehouse, is not required in order to discharge the carrier from his liability as such.

There is no allegation of a particular custom as to the mode and place of delivery, peculiar to the City of Boston, which the carrier has not complied with. The general usages of the commercial and maritime law, as settled by judicial decisions must, therefore, be applied to the case. By these, it is well settled that the carrier by water shall carry from port to port, or from wharf to wharf. He is not bound to deliver at the warehouse of the consignee; it is the duty of the consignee to receive the goods out of the ship or on the wharf. But to constitute a valid delivery on the wharf, the carrier should give due and reasonable notice to the consignee, so as to afford him a fair opportunity of providing suitable means to remove the goods, or put them under proper care and custody.

Such a delivery, to be effectual, should not only be at the proper place, which is usually the wharf, but at a proper time. A carrier who would deposit goods on a wharf at night or on Sunday, and abandon them without a proper custodian, before the consignee had proper time and opportunity to take them into his possession and care, would not fulfill the obligation of his contract. When goods are not accepted by the consignee, the carrier should put them in a place of safety; and when he has so done, he is no longer liable on his contract of affreightment.

Applying these principles to the facts of this case, it is clear that (saving the question as to the day) the respondents are not liable on their contract of affreightment for the loss of the goods in question. They delivered the goods at the place chosen by the consignees, and where they agreed to receive them, and did receive a large portion of them, after full and fair notice.

The goods were deposited for the consignees in proper order and condition, at mid-day, on a week day, in good weather. This undoubtedly constituted a good delivery; and the carriers are clearly not liable on their contract of affreightment, unless, by reason of the fact next to be noticed, they were restrained from unlading their vessel and tendering delivery on that day.

II. This inquiry involves the right of the carrier to labor on that day, and discharge cargo, and not the right of the consignee to keep a voluntary holiday, and to postpone the removal of the goods to his warehouse to a more convenient season. The policy of the law holds the carrier to a rigorous liability; and in the discharge of it, he is not bound to await the convenience or accommodate himself to the caprice or conscientious scruples of the consignee. The master of a ship usually has a certain number of lay days. He is bound to expedite the unlading of his vessel, in order to relieve the owners from the expense of demurrage, and to liberate the ship from the onerous liability of the contract of affreightment as soon as possible. He has six days of the week in which to perform this task, and has a right to demand the acceptance of his freight by the consignee. The consignee may think it proper to keep Saturday as his Sabbath, and to observe Friday as a fast day, or other church festival, or he may postpone the removal of the goods because his warehouse is not in order to receive them; but he cannot exercise his rights at the expense of others, and compel the carrier to stand as insurer of his property, to suit his convenience or his conscience.

Let us inquire, then, 1st, whether there is any law of the State of Massachusetts which forbids the transaction of business on the day in question. 2d. If not, is there any general custom or usage engrafted into the commercial or maritime law, and making a part thereof, which forbids the unlading of vessels and a tender of freight to the consignee on the day set apart for a church festival, fast, or holiday? and 3d. If not, is there any special custom in the port of Boston which prohibits the carrier from unlading his vessel on such a day, and compels him to observe it as a holiday?

1. There is no Statute of Massachusetts which forbids the citizen to labor and pursue his worldly business on any day of the week, except on the Lord's day, usually called Sunday. In the case of Farnum v. Fowle, 12 Mass., 89, it is said by Chief Justice Parker: "There are no fixed and established holidays in Massachusetts, in which all business is suspended," except Sunday.

2. The observance of Sunday as a Sabbath or day of ceremonial rest was first enjoined by the Emperor Constantine as a civil regulation, in conformity with the practice of the Christian church. Hence it is a maxim of the civil law, "Diebus dominicis mercari, judicari vel jurari non debet." This day, with others soon after added by ecclesiastical authority (such as "Dies natalis," or Christmas, and "Pascha," or Easter), were called "Dies festi," or "Feria," which we call festivals, saints' days, holy days, or holidays. In the thirteenth century, the number of these festivals enjoined by the church was so increased that they exceeded the number of Sundays in the year. The multiplication of them by the church had its origin in a spirit of kindness and Christian philanthropy. Their policy was to alleviate the hardships and misery of predial slaves and the poor laborers on the soil who were compelled to labor for their feudal lords. But afterwards, when these vassals were enfranchised and tilled the earth for themselves, they complained that "they were ruined" by the number of church festivals or compulsory holidays. In 1695, the French King forbid the establishment of any new holidays, unless by royal authority; and the church went further, and suppressed a large number of them, or transferred their observance to the next Sunday. See Dalloz, Vol. XXIX., Tit. "Jour ferie," and 2d Campeaux droit civil, page 168.

The same observance of these festivals was required by the ecclesiastical authorities as that which was due to Sunday. Men were forbidden to labor or to follow their usual business or employments. But to this rule there were many exceptions of persons and trades, who were not subjected to such observance.

Without enumerating all the exceptions, we may mention that, by the canon law, the observance of these days did not extend "to those who sold provisions; to posts or public conveyances; to travelers; to carriers by land or water; to the lading and unlading of ships engaged in maritime commerce."

Thus we see that in those countries where these holidays had their origin, and the sanction both of church and state, they were not allowed to interfere with the necessities of commerce, or to extend to ships, or those who navigate them. And it would certainly present a strange anomaly, if this country, in the nineteenth century, should be found re-establishing the superstitious observances of the dark ages with increased rigor, which both priest and sovereign in the seventeenth have been compelled to abolish as nuisances.

In England and other Protestant countries, while a more strict observance of the Lord's day is enforced by statute, the other fasts and festivals enjoined by the church have never been treated as coming within the category of compulsory holidays. Every man is left free to follow the dictates of his conscience in regard to them. Formerly their courts sat even on Sunday; nor were contracts made on that day considered illegal or void till the Statute of 29 Charles II., ch. 27, was enacted, whereby "no person whatever is allowed to do or exercise any worldly labor or work of their callings on the Lord's day." But this prohibition was never extended, either by statute or usage, to other church fasts, festivals or holidays. It is true that there are three days in the year, to wit: "Candlemas, Ascension, and St. John the Baptist," in which the courts do not sit, and the officers are allowed a holiday. But there is no trace of any decision by their courts that worldly labor was prohibited on those days, or any usage that ships should not be unladen and freight delivered and received on such days. These saints' days and church fasts or festivals are treated as voluntary holidays, not as Sabbaths of compulsory rest.

In the case of Figgins v. Willie, 2 W. Black., 1186, where a public officer claimed a right of holiday on the feast day of St. Barnabas, Chief Justice De Grey says: "I by no means approve of these self-made holidays; the offices ought to be open." And in Sparrow v. Cooper, 2 W. Black., 1315, the same judge observes, in reference to the same day: "There is no prescriptive right to keep this as holiday. It is not established by any Act of Parliament. The boards of revenue, custom-house, and excise, may act as they please, and pay such compliment to their officers and servants as they shall judge expedient by remitting more frequently the hard labor of their clerks, but they are no examples for the court." And the justices, Gould and Blackstone, severally observe: "My objection extends to all holidays, as well as St. Barnabas day."

It may be observed in passing, that there, as well as here, the class of persons most anxious to multiply holidays were the public officers, apprentices, clerks, and others receiving yearly salaries.

It is matter of history that the State of Massachusetts was colonized by men who fled from ecclesiastical oppression, that they might enjoy liberty of conscience, and that while they enforced the most rigid observance of the Lord's day as a Sabbath, or day of ceremonial rest, they repudiated with abhorrence all saints' days and festivals observed by the churches of Rome or of England. They "did not desire to be again brought in bondage, to observe days and months, and times and years." And while they piously named a day in every year which they recommended that Christians should spend in fasting and prayer, they imposed it on no man's conscience to abstain from his worldly occupations on such day, much less did they anticipate that it would be perverted into an idle holiday. The proclamation of the governor is but a recommendation. It has not the force of law, nor was it so intended. The duties of fasting and prayer are voluntary, and not of compulsion, and holiday is a privilege, not a duty. In almost every State in the Union a day of thanksgiving is appointed in the fall of the year by the governor, because there is no ecclesiastical authority which would be acknowledged by the various denominations. It is an excellent custom, but it binds no man's conscience or requires him to abstain from labor. Nor is it necessary to a literal compliance with the recommended fast day that all labor should cease, and the day be observed as a Sabbath, or as a holiday. It is not so treated by those who conscientiously observe every Friday as a fast day.

III. Does the testimony in this case show that from time immemorial there has been a well-known usage, having the force and effect of law in Boston, which requires all men to cease from labor, and compels vessels engaged in foreign commerce to cease from discharging their cargoes, and hinders consignees from receiving them?

We do not know this fact judicially, for (except in this case) there is no judicial decision, or course of decisions, in Massachusetts, which establishes the doctrine that carriers must cease to discharge cargo on this day in the port of Boston, but rather the contrary. And after a careful examination of the testimony, we are compelled to say that we find no sufficient evidence of such a peculiar custom in Boston, differing from that of all other commercial cities in the world.

The testimony shows this, and no more: that some persons go to church on that day; some close the windows of their warehouses and shops, and either abstain from work or do it privately; some work half the day and some not at all. Public officers, school boys, apprentices, clerks, and others who live on salaries, or prefer pleasure to business, claim the privilege of holiday, while those who depend on their daily labor for their daily bread, and cannot afford to be idle, pursue their occupations as usual. The libelants appear to have had no conscientious scruples on the subject, as they received goods from other ships, and some from this. But the testimony is clear, that however great the number may be who choose to convert the day into a voluntary holiday for idleness or amusement, it never has been the custom that vessels discharging cargo on the wharves of Boston ceased on that day; that like the canon law regarding church festivals and holidays of other countries and former ages, the custom of Boston (if it amount to anything more than that every man might do as he pleased on that day) did not extend to vessels engaged in foreign commerce, or forbid the carrier to continue the delivery of freight on that day.

On the whole, we are of opinion that the barque Tangier has made good delivery of her cargo to the consignees according to the exigency of her bill of lading, and that the decree of the circuit court should be reversed, and the libel dismissed, with costs.

Duties on foreign merchandise, how computed.

The duties upon foreign merchandise are to be computed on their value on the day of the sailing of the vessel from the foreign port, and the value for the computation is the wholesale market price there on such day.

Submitted Jan. 18, 1860. Decided Jan. 23, 1860.

ON a certificate of division between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought in the court below, by the plaintiffs against the defendant, as late Collector of Customs of the United States at the port of New York. The defendant pleaded the general issue of non assumpsit.

When the case came on to be argued, there being a division of opinion between the judges, the case was certified to this court.

The question, upon which the judges were divided in opinion, appears in the opinion of the court.

The case was submitted on the transcript, without argument in this court.

Messrs. McCulloh and Vallandigham, for plaintiffs.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., for defendant.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes to this court under a certificate of division of opinion from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of the State of New York.

The point made is, "whether, by the period of exportation of merchandise from a foreign country to the United States, as used in the Act of Congress entited 'An Act to amend the Acts regulating the appraisement of imported merchandise, and for other purposes,' approved the 3d March, 1851, was to be taken to mean the time when the merchandise had been laden aboard a general ship, and the bill of lading therefor given in the foreign port, or at the time when said ship actually departed from said foreign port, destined to the United States."

The facts in the record are, that the ship Henry Buck was a general ship at the port of Glasgow, in Scotland, in the month of May, 1855, destined for the port of New York, in the United States. That the plaintiff, on the 9th May, 1855, bought three hundred tons of Coltness pig iron, at the then wholesale market price of sixty-four shillings sterling per ton, and immediately commenced to load the same aboard the ship, and that the iron was all laden and bills of lading given for it on the 22d May, 1855, on which day the market price of such iron had risen to sixty-nine shillings per ton; that the ship remained in port, and sailed from Glasgow on the 4th June, 1855, on which day the market price of such iron had risen to seventy-four shillings and sixpence sterling per ton; and that, on the arrival of the ship in the United States, the iron was appraised at the custom-house at the market price of twenty-four shillings and sixpence sterling per ton. On that valuation the defendant collected duty, and twenty per cent. on such value, in conformity with the 8th section of the Act of Congress entitled, "An Act reducing the duty on imports, and for other purposes," approved the 30 July, 1846 (9 Stat. at L., 42).

This court considered two years since in the case of Sampson v. Peaslee, 20 How., 571, the meaning of the Acts of Congress of the 30th July, 1846 (9 Stat. at L., 42), and that of the 3d March, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 629), for the collection of duties upon imported goods, and when and upon what twenty per centum should be charged upon an under valuation made by an importer in his entry of merchandise. It announced then, that if the appraised value of imports which have actually been purchased shall exceed by ten per centum or more the value of them declared upon the entry, then, in addition to the duties imposed by law upon the value of the same, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem on such appraised value. That the additional value of twenty per centum could only be levied upon the appraised value, and not upon charges and commissions added to it. Also, that the day of the sailing of a vessel from a foreign port is the true period of exportation of the goods; and that the Secretary of the Treasury had given a proper interpretation of the statute, in directing it to be done on the market value of the goods imported on the day of the sailing of the vessel, and that he was authorized by law to give such a direction.

We see no cause now for a different interpretation of the statute, and direct that the question certified to this court be answered, "that the duties on foreign merchandise are to be computed on their value on the day of the sailing of the vessel from the foreign port, and that the value for the computation is the wholesale market price there on such day."

Remedies in U. S. courts—not modified by state laws or practice—creditor of an estate may sue—proceedings in state court do not prevent suit in U. S. court—sureties of administrator—equity jurisdiction of circuit court to reach assets.

In the organization of the courts of the United States, the remedies at common law and in equity have been distinguished, and the jurisdiction in equity is confided to the circuit courts, to be exercised uniformly through the United States, and does not receive any modification from the legislation of the States, or the practice of their courts having similar powers.

In the court of chancery, executors and administrators are considered as trustees, and that court exercises original jurisdiction over them, in favor of the creditors, legatees, and heirs, in reference to the proper execution of their trust.

A single creditor may sue for his demand in equity, and obtain a decree for payment out of the personal estate, without taking a general account of the testator's debts.

The fact of the pendency of proceedings in insolvency in a state probate court, will not oust the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States.

A foreign creditor may establish his debt in the courts of the United States against the representatives of a decedent, notwithstanding the local laws relative to the administration and settlement of insolvent estates, and the court will interpose to arrest the distribution of any surplus among the heirs.

No one can proceed against the sureties on an administration bond, at law, who has not recovered a judgment against the administrator.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity to enforce the bond, arises from its jurisdiction over administrators, to prevent multiplicity of suits, and its power to adapt its decrees to the substantial justice of the case.

Where the original debtor has died insolvent, and his surety has died insolvent, and a portion of the assets belonging to the estate of the latter is in hands of the surety of this administrator, and a discovery of the assets in hand and their application to the payment of the debt are required—the circuit court was authorized to entertain the suit.

Submitted Jan. 10, 1860. Decided Jan. 30, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of U. S. Circuit Court depending on parties and residence. See note to Emory v. Greenough, 3 U. S. (3 Dall.), 369.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the intestate of the appellant, to reach assets alleged to belong to the estate of Amos Whiting, deceased.

The court below having dismissed the bill for want of jurisdiction, the complainant took an appeal to this court.

The question of jurisdiction is the only one before this court for consideration.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. John D. Freeman, for appellant:

All the allegations of the bill are sustained by the answers and proofs in the case, from which it clearly appears that the complainant is the sole distributee of Wheeler C. Green, deceased, who died intestate in Claiborne County, Mississippi, June, 1836; that Albert Tunstall administered on said estate, gave an administration bond in the penalty of $60,000, with Amos Whiting as his surety; that Tunstall wasted the whole estate and defaulted to the amount of $61,000; that complainant, by a lawful suit for that purpose in the Probate Court of Claiborne County, obtained a final decree against Tunstall for that amount, in June, 1841; that Amos Whiting was his surety and had departed this life in said county in the year 1837; that George Lake and Whiting's wife administered on Whiting's estate until March, 1839, when J. M. Rhodes intermarried with Whiting's wife, and administered in her right until Oct., 1841, when Lake and Rhodes and wife were removed from the administration of Whiting's estate for maladministration; that defendant, Creighton, became administrator de bonis non of Whiting's estate, on the removal of Lake, Rhodes and wife; that said Creighton is now insolvent; that defendant, Jonathan McCaleb, became his surety on his administrative bond in the penalty of $100,000, all of which bonds are sued upon and set forth in full; that Creighton has received a large amount of the assets of the estate of Amos Whiting, equitable or otherwise, which he has failed to inventory and account for, and which he refuses to render an account of in this court, insisting that he has accounted in the Probate Court of Claiborne County, and that such accounting is a bar to an account in this court.

The defendants admit the rendition of the decree against Tunstall for $61,000, but fail to make good their defense, or in any manner to invalidate the same, nor do they prove any claims against the estate of Green to have been paid by Tunstall.

That Whiting, as surety of Tunstall on his administration bond, is liable for the amount of this decree, cannot admit of a doubt.

Tunstall died insolvent; the money could not be made out of him. Amos Whiting, his surety, had died in 1837, and the only way to establish his liability as surety for Tunstall to pay the amount of Tunstall's defalcation to the estate of Green, was to proceed against the administrator of Whiting. But it is said that Whiting's administrator is not liable in equity to account until judgment had been first obtained against him at law. To this I reply, that it was the duty of Whiting, as surety of Tunstall, to see that he administered the estate of Green according to law. He neglected this duty; the court of probate had full jurisdiction to ascertain and decree the amount of Tunstall's indebtedness to the estate of W. C. Green, as administrator of the same; this decree was had in accordance with law, as shown by the pleadings and proof, and the amount of this decree could have been enforced on Tunstall by attachment and imprisonment, if he had been possessed of the means to pay it. The decree of the probate court was, therefore, a lawful and final assessment of the damages against Whiting's principal in the administration bond, by the only tribunal in the State of Mississippi having jurisdiction of that subject, and must, therefore, be regarded as conclusive evidence of the amount of Whiting's liability for Tunstall, and with which his estate is chargeable.

The jurisdiction of this court over executors and administrators is not affected by the Constitution and laws of Mississippi—its jurisdiction is not derived therefrom nor limited thereby, but only by the Constitution and laws of the United States; and these confer upon this court the same jurisdiction over administrators as that of the Chancery Courts of England.

From these authorities it is evident that this court has full jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the bill, the objects of which are to obtain a discovery of assets in the hands of the administrator not inventoried, and to reach equitable assets of the estate in the hands of his surety, Jonathan Mc Caleb and others, and to marshal the assets of the estate of Whiting, if the administrator does not admit sufficient assets to pay complainant's demand.

1 Story, Eq. Jur., 601, 602, sec. 543.

"A creditor may file his bill for the payment of his own debt, and seek a discovery of assets for this purpose only. If he does so, and the bill is sustained, and an account is decreed to be taken, the court will, upon the footing of such an account, proceed to make a final decree in favor of the creditor, without sending him back to law for the recovery of his debt; for this is one of the cases in which a court of equity, being once in rightful possession of a case for discovery and account, will proceed to a final decree on all the merits.

1 Story, Eq. Jur., 603, 604, sec. 546.

The defendant, Jonathan McCaleb, is not only a surety on the bond of Creighton, but is charged with having in his hands equitable assets of the estate of Whiting, which a judgment against Creighton would not reach, and this fact is admitted by the answer of defendants. Creighton is alleged to be insolvent, and the charge is not denied; McCaleb, his surety, has money of the estate which Creighton refuses to collect; he is, therefore, a proper party, for all these reasons.

In the case of The Ordinary v. Snooks, it was held that the probate court was the proper tribunal to assess damages on an administration bond.

5 Halst., N. J., 65; 1 Halst., cited as above.

But a court of equity has jurisdiction of a bill by a distributee or legatee against an administrator and his sureties, or either of them alone, on their bond, without any previous suit at law.

If Mississippi has deprived her chancery court of a portion of its original jurisdiction, it does not follow that the jurisdiction of the federal courts is thereby abridged in like degree.

See Const. of U. S., art. 3, sec. 2; sec. 11, Judiciary Act; also, U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat., 108; Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat., 212; Livingston v. Story, 9 Pet., 655; Pratt v. Northam, 5 Mason, 105; Gordon v. Hobart, 2 Sumn., 401; Gaines v. Relf, 15 Pet., 13; Ford v. Douglas, 5 How., 168; Taylor v. Benham, 5 How., 260.

The question of jurisdiction having been settled, alike as to parties and subject-matter, and it appearing by the answers and proofs that Amos Whiting was the surety of A. Tunstall on his bond as administrator of W. C. Green, deceased—that said Tunstall defaulted to the amount of $61,000, which remains unpaid, for which a final decree was rendered against him by a tribunal having full authority to render such decree, and that defendants have failed in their attempt to invalidate said decree on a charge of fraud, it follows, as a matter of course, that complainant is entitled to a decree charging the estate of Amos Whiting, in the hands of his administrator de bonis non, with the amount of said decree of the probate court to the extent of the penalty of the administration bond of A. Tunstall, which is $60,000.

Messrs. Geo. S. Yerger and T. J. & F. A. R. Wharton, for appellee:

The purpose of the complainant in filing this bill was to relieve himself from the necessity of pursuing the only course which, under the operation of the Constitution and laws of Mississippi, it was competent for him to pursue, as well as to evade the force and effect of decisions of the high court of errors and appeals, made in this very cause and between the same parties.

It will be borne in mind that this suit is an attempt to enforce the decree of the Probate Court of Caliborne County, Mississippi, which was rendered in the plenary proceedings instituted in that court by the complainant herein against Tunstall, the administrator appointed by that court, of Wheeler C. Green. The case is first brought to the attention of the said high court of errors and appeals in Green v. Tunstall, 5 How. Miss., 638. It was then and there held, that the probate court has not jurisdiction which will enable it to proceed against the sureties in an administrator's bond, on a plenary proceeding by bill. The sureties in the administrator's bond must be sued at law, after proceeding to fix the liability of the administrator. Being liable only on the administraton bond, not being officers of the probate court, the only recourse against the sureties is by action at law against them, after the liability of the administrator has been ascertained by a proper proceeding in this behalf, and after final settlement by him, and a decree of the court fixing the amount of his liability and directing him to pay it.

The same rule is held in Alabama and South Carolina, as may be seen by reference to the cases cited by the high court, viz.:

1 Porter, 70; 3 Stew. &. P., 263, 348; 2 Bailey, S. C., 60; 1 Bailey, S. C., 27; 1 Nott & McC., 587; 4 Nott & McC., 113, 120.

It will be recollected that Whiting was only a security of Tunstall in his administration bond, and survived the grant of letters to Tunstall only about ten months. The defendant, Creighton, is administrator of Whiting and executor of defendant, McCaleb, who was a security on the bond of defendant, Creighton, as administrator of Whiting. The case cited from 5th How., apart from being an adjudication between the same parties of the same subject-matter, would be an authority upon general principles for the appellees.

The next that we hear of these parties and this litigation in Mississippi, is in 7 Sm. & M., 197.

The high court there decided "that in an action at law on the bond of an administrator, the bond is but inducement to the action, and no recovery can be had on it without proof of damages. It is only security for such damages as the parties interested in the estate sustain. To make it a valid claim against an insolvent estate or against anyone, it must be accompanied by proof of damages; if not so accompanied, it is not a claim. There must be proof that the condition has been broken, for it is only on such a contingency that a right of action accrues." And again, ".instead of allowing the penalty of the bond as a claim, the referees should have allowed the amount of damages sustained by a breach of the condition."

We again meet with this same claim in Green v. Creighton, 10 Sm. & M., 159. Now, however, the forum is changed, and instead of proceedings in the Probate Court of Claiborne County, it is a bill filed in the Superior Court of Chancery of Mississippi, and we ask attention to the striking similarity of the prayer as set out in the report of the case, and the prayer of the present bill. The objects of the bill are very clearly specified in the opinion of the court, and are the same precisely in legal intendment and effect with the objects of this bill. An injunction had been granted to restrain defendant, Creighton, from paying a certain other claim against the estate of Whiting. The Chancellor dissolved the injunction, and from that order an appeal was taken to the high court of errors and appeals.

The following is the emphatic language of the court in affirming the degree of the Chancellor:

"Nothing, certainly, is better settled in this court than that the court of chancery does not possess the jurisdiction which it is here asked to exercise. The administration of estates and the settlement of the accounts of the administrators, falls peculiarly and exclusively under the cognizance of the probate court. * * * Suits upon the bonds of administrators pertain to the circuit court."

In that bill it was alleged that the administrators had practiced fraud in their settlement with the probate court, of which, however, no proof was offered or attempted, and the high court held that if the charge were established, a court of equity would have jurisdiction of the bill, to set aside the settlements and order new ones to be made in the probate court. They also noticed the objection taken by the appellant's counsel, "that there was no demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court below, and that it was too late to raise the objection in the high court, and beside that, that rule is only applicable in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, not where there is an entire want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter."

The foregoing summary will serve to show that this is no new case in the courts of Misisippi, either in name or principle, and will also serve to show a reason for the change of forum.

Precisely similar in all its features is the case of Buckingham v. Owen, 6 Sm. & M., 502.

After reviewing the authorities cited for the appellee, some of the very same cited by appellants in this case, particularly Spotswood v. Dandridge, 4 Munf., 289, they wholly deny the principle attempted to be established by them. They admit that in some of the States of the Union, in suits against executors and administrators, courts of equity have concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law, and that it is upon that principle a court of chancery in Virginia exercises it; but they quote, with approbation, the language in 2 Rob. Pr., 38, showing the strong inclination of the court of appeals in that State to restrict parties to their remedy at law, when it is full and adequate, and referring to the case before cited by us.

Green v. Tunstall, 5 How. Miss., 688.

They say that was a bill filed against the administrator and his sureties for a discovery and account of assets and for distribution. The object was similar to that in view in this case.

Buckingham v. Owen.

The very authorities cited to sustain this bill were cited in the argument of that cause. The court decided that the remedy upon the bond was exclusive in a court of law. So they held that the Chancellor erred in overruling the demurrer; they reversed his decree and dismissed the bill for want of jurisdiction in the chancery court to entertain it.

The 4th art. sec. 18, of the Constitution of the State of Mississippi, provides for the establishment of the probate court. Its language is, "That a probate court shall be established in each county of this State, with jurisdiction in all matters testamentary, and of administration of orphans' business, and the allotment of dower, in cases of idiocy and of lunacy, and of persons non compos mentis." In construing the powers of that court, derived from that clause of the constitution, the High Court of Errors and Appeals of Mississippi have repeatedly held that its jurisdiction was exclusive in reference to the matters committed to it. And thus the superior court of chancery of said State has no jurisdiction whatever of the subjects confided to the probate court. Accordingly, on a bill filed in said chancery court to review in a matter of administration the proceedings of the probate court, it was held that the chancery court had no jurisdiction of the case; that it belonged exclusively to the probate court, and the bill was, therefore, dismissed.

See Blanton v. King, 2 How. Miss., 856; Carmichael v. Browder, 3 How. Miss., 252.

Again. When the probate court has full jurisdiction of a matter, its judgment is final and cannot be disturbed, unless fraud is charged and proved.

Stubblefield v. McRaven, 5 Sm. & M., 130; Jones v. Coon, 5 Sm. & M., 751.

The utmost that a court of chancery can do is, where fraud is charged against a settlement of an administrator in the probate court, to set aside a settlement in the probate court and direct a new settlement there—its jurisdiction does not extend beyond that as was held between the parties to this record in 10 Sm. & M., 159.

If this be true, as we have shown, that the probate court has exclusive jurisdiction within the sphere of its delegated powers; and if, further, it is true, both as a general rule of law and as settled by judicial decisions in this State, that the probate court could not proceed against the sureties on the bond after ascertaining and fixing by its decree the amount for which the administrator is responsible, but could only direct that as to them the bond should be put in suit in a court of law, upon what foundation does a complainant rest his claim?

We cite a few cases, to show what deference this court has always paid to the decisions of the state courts in sustaining their local laws.

McKeen v. DeLancey, 5 Cranch, 22, 23; Polk's Lessee v. Wendal, 9 Cranch, 87; Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Watts, 1 Wheat., 279; Shipp v. Miller's Heirs, 2 Wheat., 316; Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat., 152; Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat., 361.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The inestate of the plaintiff, as an heir of Wheeler Green, deceased, and claiming, by assignment of the remaining heirs, the entire estate, filed this bill against the defendant, in his capacity of administrator of Amos Whiting, deceased, and of executor of the will of Jonathan McCaleb. He states, that Albert Tunstall became the administrator of the estate of Wheeler Green by the appointment of the Court of Probate of Claiborne County, Mississippi, in 1836; that he gave bond for the faithful performance of his duties, with Amos Whiting as his surety; that Tunstall received a large amount of property belonging to the estate, and committed a devastavit; that in the year 1841, his inestate summoned Tunstall before the probate court to make an account, and upon that accounting he was found to be indebted to him, as heir, $61,194.76; which sum he was required to pay by the decree of the court, and authority was given to prosecute a suit on the administration bond. The bill avers that Tunstall and Whiting, his surety, are both dead, and that all of his other sureties are insolvent. It charges that the defendant, Creighton, as administrator of Whiting, has assets in his hands for administration, and that a portion of the assets is in the hands of McCaleb, who is the surety of Creighton on his bond to the probate court, as administrator of Whiting.

The object of the bill is to establish the claim of the inestate and his representative arising from the judgment against Tunstall and the breach of his administration bond, on which Whiting is a surety, against the administrator of Whiting and his surety, and to obtain satisfaction from them to the extent of the assets in their hands belonging to that estate, and for this purpose they seek a discovery of the assets, and account and payment.

The defendants appeared to the bill, and allege that the estate of Whiting has been regularly administered; and that returns have been made to the Probate Court of Claiborne County, Mississippi, of whatever property came to the hands of the administrator, Creighton, whose character as administrator is admitted; and that he was then engaged in administering the estate under the laws of Mississippi; that the estate had been reported to the probate court as insolvent several years before this suit was instituted, and that commissioners had been appointed by that court to receive and credit the claims; which commission was still open for the proof of claims. They contest the validity of the judgment recovered against Tunstall, and the truth of the account preferred against them, and deny the jurisdiction of the circuit court to entertain this bill. The connection of McCaleb with the bond of Creighton is admitted, and also that a portion of the money of the estate of Whiting had been deposited with or lent to him. Upon the hearing of the cause on the pleadings and proofs, the bill was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and by the agreement of the parties the record has been up so as to present that question only. None other will, therefore, be considered. In the organization of the courts of the United States, the remedies at common law and in equity have been distinguished, and the jurisdiction in equity is confided to to the circuit courts, to be exercised uniformly through the United States, and does not receive any modification from the legislation of the States, or the practice of their courts having similar powers. Livingston v. Story, 9 Pet., 632.

The Judiciary Act of 1789 conferred upon the circuit courts authority "to take cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and * * * the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another state."

The questions presented for inquiry in this suit are, whether the subject of the suit is properly cognizable in a court of equity, and whether any other court has previously acquired exclusive control of it. The court has jurisdiction of the parties. In the court of chancery, executors and administrators are considered as trustees, and that court exercises original jurisdiction over them, in favor of creditors, legatees, and heirs, in reference to the proper execution of their trust. A single creditor has been allowed to sue for his demand in equity, and obtain a decree for payment out of the personal estate, without taking a general account of the testator's debts. Atty-Gen. v. Cornthwaite, 2 Cox, 43; Adams, Ex., 257. And the existence of this jurisdiction has been acknowledged in this court, and in several of the courts of chancery in the States. Hagan v. Walker, 14 How., 29; Pharis v. Leachman, 20 Ala., 663; Spottswood v. Dandridge, 4 Munf., 289. The answer of the defendant contains an assertion that, prior to the filing of the bill, the estate of Whiting was reported to the Probate Court of Claiborne County as insolvent, and thereupon that court had appointed commissioners to audit the claims that might be presented and proved, as preparatory to a final settlement, and that the commission was still open for the exhibition of claims.

But of this statement there is no sufficient proof. Neither the report nor any decretal order founded on it is contained in the record, and the proceedings referring to one are of a date subsequent to the filing of the bill.

The question arises, then, whether the fact of the pendency of proceedings in insolvency in the probate court will oust the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the United States. In Suydam v. Broadnax, 14 Pet., 67, a similar question was presented. A plea in abatement was interposed in the Circuit Court in Alabama, in an action at law against administrators, to the effect that the decedent's estate had been reported as insolvent to a court of probate, and that jurisdiction over the persons interested and the estate had been taken in that court. This court declared that the 11th section of the Act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, carries out the constitutional right of a citizen of one state to sue a citizen of another state in the Circuit Court of the United States. "It was certainly intended," say the court, "to give to suitors having a right to sue in the circuit court remedies co-extensive with those rights. These remedies would not be so, if any proceedings under an Act of a State Legislature to which a plaintiff was not a party, exempting a person of such state from suit, could be pleaded to abate a suit in the circuit court."

In Williams v. Benedict, 8 How., 107, this court decided that a judgment creditor in a court of the United States could not obtain an execution and levy upon the property of an estate legally reported as insolvent in the State of Mississippi to the probate court, and which was in the course of administration in that court. The court expressly reserve the question as to the right of a state to compel foreign creditors, in all cases, to seek their remedies against the estates of decedents in the state courts alone, to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

The cases of Peale v. Phipps, 14 How., 368, and Bank of Tenn. v. Horn, 17 How., 157, are to the same effect.

The case of The Union Bank v. Jolly, 18 How., 503, was that of a judgment creditor who recovered a judgment against administrators, who subsequently reported the estate of their decedent insolvent. After administering the estate in the probate court, it was ascertained that there was a surplus in their hands. The creditor had not made himself a party to the settlement in the probate court; and the administrators contended that his claim was barred.

This was a suit in Mississippi. This court determined that the creditor had a lien upon the assets thus situated.

Thus it will be seen, that under the decisions of this court, a foreign creditor may establish his debt in the courts of the United States against the representatives of a decedent, notwithstanding the local laws relative to the administration and settlement of insolvent estates, and that the court will interpose to arrest the distribution of any surplus among the heirs. What measures the courts of the United States may take to secure the equality of such creditors in the distribution of the assets, as provided in the state laws (if any) independently of the administration in the probate courts, cannot be considered until a case shall be presented to this court.

The remaining question to be considered is, whether the debt described in the bill entitles a plaintiff to come into a court of equity, under the circumstances. It is well settled, that no one can proceed against the sureties on an administration bond, at law, who has not recovered a judgment against the administrator. 5 How., Miss., 638; 6 Port., 393. But this rule is not founded upon the supposition that there is no breach of the bond until a judgment is actually obtained. The duty of the administrator arises to pay the debts when their existence is discovered; and the bond is forfeited when that duty is disregarded. The jurisdiction of a court of equity to enforce the bond arises from its jurisdiction over administrators, its disposition to prevent multiplicity of suits, and its power to adapt its decrees to the substantial justice of the case. Moore v. Waller, 1 A. K. Marsh., 488; Moore v. Armstrong, 9 Port., 697; Carew v. Mowatt, 2 Edw. Ch., 57.

In this case, the original debtor, Tunstall, has died insolvent. Whiting, his surety, has died insolvent. A portion of the assets belonging to the estate of the latter is in the hands of the surety of this administrator. A discovery of the amount and nature of the assets in hand, and their application to the payment of the debt, are required, if they are subject to the application.

We conclude that the circuit court was authorized to entertain this suit, and that the decree dismissing the bill is erroneous.

Decree reversed.

v.

EDWARD F. BULLARD.

(See S. C., 23 How., 172-190.)

Circuit courts, power of to nonsuit—one of several defendants—separate verdict—co-defendant as a witness—evidence in cases of fraud—positive proof—circumstantial—liability of partners—instructions to jury—when subject of error.

Circuit courts have no power to grant a peremptory nonsuit against the will of the plaintiff.

At common law, there cannot regularly be a nonsuit as to one and a verdict as to others; whenever it appears that there is evidence in a case to charge one or more of the defendants, which was proper to be submitted to the jury, as matter of law, it was not error to overrule the motion for nonsuit, even if the authority to grant it was conceded.

If a defendant, who is a material witness for the other defendants, has been improperly joined in a suit for the purpose of excluding his testimony, the jury will be directed to find a separate verdict in his favor; in which case, the cause being at an end with respect to him, he may be admitted as a witness for the other defendants.

But if there be any evidence against him, then he is not entitled to a separate verdict. His guilt or innocence must await the general verdict of the ury, who are the sole judges of the fact.

Courts are not agreed as to what stage of the trial the party thus improperly joined may insist upon a verdict in his favor.

In cases of fraud, other wrongful acts of the defendant are admissible in evidence, as tending to show the intent in respect to the matters immediately involved in the issue on trial.

Positive proof of fraudulent acts is not generally to be expected, and for that reason, among others, the law allows a resort to circumstances, as the means of ascertaining the truth.

Whenever the necessity arises for a resort to circumstantial evidence, objections to testimony on the ground of irrelevancy are not favored.

Circumstances altogether inconclusive, if separately considered, may, by their number and joint operation, especially when corroborated by moral coincidences, be sufficient to constitute conclusive proof.

Where the goods were in the custody of partners, for sale on commission, and one of the partners made false and fraudulent representations as to the party to whom they were to be sold by them, the partnership is liable, if, in consequence of such representations, the plaintiff consented to the sale to that party, and the sale was actually made by the firm to the party.

Instructions given by the court at the trial are not, as a general rule, to be regarded as the subject of error on account of omissions not pointed out by the excepting party.

If the defendants had asked that further and more explicit instructions should be given, and the prayer had been refused, this objection would be entitled to more weight.

Where explanations immediately preceded the instructions embraced in the exceptions, the instructions excepted to must be considered in connection with those explanations.

Argued Jan. 19, 1860. Decided Jan. 30, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

This action was brought in the court below, by the defendant in error, to recover damages resulting from an alleged breach of trust. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $2,983.32, with costs amounting to $251.72, whereupon the defendants sued out this writ of error.

The facts of the case are very fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. T. Lyle Dickey, for the plaintiffs in error:

1. There is no proof that defendant, Granger, had anything to do with the sale by Ballard, or was in any way connected with the firm of Filkins, Phillips & Co. Defendant in error refers, in his brief, to a letter by E. H. Castle, and printed business card attached, as connecting Granger with this firm. In relation to that, I say it was no part of plaintiff's evidence in chief.

2. It does not sustain the declaration. It shows a different firm, with a different style and different partners from that alleged, and last, that Granger is in no way connected by proof with, or responsible for, that letter and card, and never saw it in his life. The act of one alleged partner is no proof against another, until the partnership is proved.

No attempt is made to show that at the time of Ballard's sale, E. S. Castle had ever failed to meet an engagement, or pay a debt at maturity, or that he was not in good credit, or that any one of the recommendations given him were untrue; in fact, we deny that his failure to pay his debts three months after, tends to show that he was unfit to be trusted. November 8, 1855.

6 Mon , 119.

It is conceded that the condition of a man's affairs may be shown by a comparison of all his assets with his liabilities. But before any comparison can be made, you must find some evidence showing that you probably have all his assets. Now, no one of the witnesses pretended that he even supposed that he had given all of E. S. Castle's effects at any one place. Now, the burden lies on the plaintiff to show the want of means of E. S. Castle, and he produces witnesses who do not pretend to have any knowledge of his affairs, and the court allows them to swear that they do not know of his having more than $5,000 of goods in Dubuque, in January, and the like.

This evidence was baseless and deceptive, and ought to have been excluded.

The refusal to allow a separate verdict as to Granger, against whom there was no proof, in order that the other defendant might use him as a witness, was erroneous. There was once some difference of opinion as to this right, but in Phil. Ev., 8th ed., 59, it is said: "It is now well settled by the unanimous opinion of all the judges, that a defendant (in torts) against whom plaintiff adduces no proof, is entitled to a separate verdict at once on the close of the plaintiff's case."

See, also, 2 Stark. Ev., 11, 798, 799.

Whether there be any evidence is a question of law (1st Greenl., sec. 49; Phil. Ev., 513), and while it is true that this court will not review a question of fact, yet no court can review the law of a case, without looking to the facts to which it is to be applied.

All the extraneous evidence in any event was irrelevant, until plaintiff had laid a foundation for such proof by giving evidence of the contract set up in the declaration between plaintiff and defendants as partners; and to do this, the partnership embracing Granger had to be proved.

In an action of tort, where a contract is alleged as ground of the supposed duty violated, such contract must be proved as laid.

Phil. Ev., 856; 2 Saund. Pl. & Ev., part 1st, 582.

Letters written to E. S. Castle were irrelevant and not material to the issue. We next insist that the proof of them was incompetent. Proof that a witness knows the signature of E. H. Castle, is not proof that the witness knows the handwriting so as to be competent to express an opinion as to whether the body of letters are in E. H. Castle's handwriting.

Copies of these letters were allowed, when the proof did not tend to show that the originals were lost.

The defendants offered to prove that whilst the goods of plaintiff were at 100 Randolph Street, they were in the possession of E. H. Castle, and that whilst E. H. Castle had possession, he said that he did not hold the goods on sale, but was taking care of them for the owner.

This evidence the court excluded, and we allege, erroneously. The question whether the goods were in the possession of E. H. Castle or in the possession of the firm, was material to the issue. The declarations of Castle were competent to explain the nature of his possession. The same question in another form was made and ruled the same way, and defendants excepted on page 73.

Lastly, the charge of the court was erroneous. The court said:

1st. "If the goods were in the custody of the defendants, for sale on commission, and one or more of the partners made false or fraudulent representations as to the party to whom they were to be sold by the defendants, then the partnership would be liable; if, in consequence of such representations, the plaintiff consented to the sale to that party, and the sale was actually made by the firm to the party."

This, clearly, is not a sound proposition, unless you add to it that the party to whom the sale was made was actually unworthy of the credit, and by reason thereof, the debt was likely to be lost. The fact is, the whole record shows that the plaintiff and the court assumed, without proof, that E. S. Castle, at the time of the sale, was unfit to be trusted, and that E. H. Castle and Filkins knew this to be so, and by the hearing, and finally the charge of the court, the jury were taught to assume the same thing. It is only on this assumption that proof of mere purchases of goods by E. S. Castle were treated as so many frauds actually perpetrated, and every favorable word about E. S. Castle, spoken by E. H. Castle and by Filkins, were assumed on the trial by the plaintiff as so many willful lies for some dishonest purpose; and the court, by its general course of ruling, gave sanction to the assumption, and led the jury to do so.

The error in the second article of the charge consists in a false and erroneous idea expressed in the exception. The court says that upon a certain hypothesis the defendants are not liable, unless the firm, as a firm, were "party to such representations."

If the goods were not in defendant's possession for sale, but were there merely for safe keeping, and one of the partners made false representations touching the solvency of a proposed purchaser, and thus plaintiff was induced to sell and did make the sale himself, it is not perceived how it is possible that the firm, as a firm, could be "a party to the representations."

Mr. E. F. Bullard, in person, and Mr. R. H. Gillet, for defendant in error:

The defendant's exceptions present but two substantial law questions.

1. Whether evidence of other acts was admissible.

2. Whether the defendants were liable as partners.

1. The plaintiff may prove subsequent acts of fraud and collusion to obtain goods from other persons, in order to show the previous intent of the defendant, and which the jury might infer from circumstances.

Allison v. Matthieu, 3 Johns., 235; 2 H. Black., 288; Van Kirk v. Wilds, 11 Barb., 526.

Such acts, prior or subsequent about the same time, are admissible with a view to the quo animo.

Cary v. Hotailing, 1 Hill, 316.

See English cases, cited by Cowen, J., same principle, approved by the Court of Appeals of New York.

Hall v. Naylor, 18 N. Y., 589.

2. It was competent to prove the amount of goods on hand in store of E. S. Castle, the amount of his debts, his general embarrassment, and all acts to show his pecuniary condition, with a view to show the defendant's statements to be false and fraudulent.

This answers defendant's exception and others of that class.

The judgment in favor of Filkins, against E. S. Castle, was admissible on same ground, and also to prove that Filkins had knowledge when he made representations to the contrary.

Allen v. Addington, 7 Wend., 9.

3. The defendants being partners, and as such having sold the goods and received the $135 commission and freight, were jointly liable.

Story, Part., sec. 131.

The act was within their regular business as commission merchants.

"If one of a firm of commission merchants should sell goods consigned to the partnership fraudulently, or in violation of instructions, all the partners would be liable for the conversion, in an action of trover.

Story, Part., sec. 166; Coll. Part., sec. 6, pp. 304, 306, 2d ed.; Nicoll v. Glennie, 1 Maule. & S., 588; Olmsted v. Hotailing, 1 Hill, 317.

4. Upon the merits the defendants were clearly liable, and the first instruction is correct.

3 Johns., 235; 7 Wend., 9; Bean v. Remway, 17 How. Pr., 90; Zabriskie v. Smith, 13 N. Y. 322.

5. The loss of the original letters was sufficiently shown.

There is no doubt that the originals were in the handwriting of defendant, Castle, and that these were correct copies, so that the defendants were not injured by the absence of the originals.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

Edward F. Bullard, a citizen of the State of New York, complained in the court below of Joseph Filkins, J. P. Phillips, Elihu Granger, and Edward H. Castle, in a plea of trespass on the case, alleging, at the same time, that they were partners, doing business as commission merchants at Chicago, in the State of Illinois, under the style and firm of Filkins, Phillips & Company.

According to the transcript, the declaration was filed on the 7th day of July, 1856. As amended, it contained five counts, setting forth, in various forms, two distinct grounds of complaint against the defendants, which may be briefly stated as follows:

In the first place, it is alleged that the defendants, on the 8th day of November, 1855, fraudulently sold on credit, at Chicago, to one Edward S. Castle, certain goods belonging to the plaintiff, and which he had previously intrusted to them, as commission merchants, for sale; and that the purchaser, at the time of the sale, was in failing circumstances and irresponsible; charging, in the same connection, that the defendants, at the time of the transaction, well knew that the purchaser was insolvent, and wholly unfit to be trusted; and that they negotiated the sale with intent to deceive and defraud the plaintiff, whereby he suffered loss to an amount equal to the value of the goods so sold and delivered.

He also alleged, in other counts, that the defendants, prior to the sale of the goods, and at the time when it was made, represented to him that the said Edward H. Castle was worth at least eight thousand dollars above all his liabilities; that he was not embarrassed in his business affairs, or much indebted, and that he was a safe, cautious business man, and every way worthy of credit. Those representations, the plaintiff alleged, were false, and that the defendants well knew they were so at the time of the negotiation, and when the goods were delivered; and that they were so made by the defendants with intent to deceive and defraud him in the premises, and had the effect to induce him to consent to the sale, and to deliver the goods, whereby he suffered loss, as is alleged in the other counts.

To those charges, as more formally set forth in the several counts of the declaration, the defendants jointly pleaded that they were not guilty; and on the 3d day of January, 1857, the parties went to trial on that issue.

Testimony was introduced by the plaintiff in the opening, showing that Filkins, Phillips & Co., were commission merchants at the time of this transaction, doing business at Chicago, in the State of Illinois, and that they received the goods in question a short time prior to the sale, from one William H. Adams, of that city, to whom the goods had previously been sent by the plaintiff to be sold on commission. He also proved the sale of the goods by one of the firm of Filkins, Phillips & Co., to Edward H. Castle, on credit, substantially as alleged in the declaration, and that two of the partners and the clerk of the firm were present at the time the sale took place.

Facts and circumstances were also adduced by the plaintiff, tending strongly to show that the purchaser was largely indebted and in failing circumstances at the time of the negotiation, and that two or more members of the firm must have known that he was insolvent and utterly unworthy of credit.

Five per cent. was charged as commissions on the sale of the goods, amounting to the sum of $135; and the plaintiff introduced testimony tending to show that the purchaser, as a part of the transaction, gave his promissory note to the firm, payable in forty-five days, to secure that amount.

Evidence was also introduced by the plaintiff, showing that representations as to the business circumstances and pecuniary responsibility of the purchaser were made to him at the time of the sale, by one or more of the defendants, substantially in the manner as alleged in the declaration. And it was clearly shown that two or more of the firm well knew that those representations were false, and that the subject of them was wholly unfit to be trusted for that amount.

Proof was also introduced by the plaintiff, showing that the purchaser was a relative of one of the firm, and that he had repeatedly been assisted by others in obtaining credit. And many of the circumstances were of a character to afford a ground of presumption that all the defendants must have known the true state of his affairs, and that he was insolvent.

When the plaintiff rested his case, in the opening, the counsel of the defendants moved the court to order a nonsuit as to the defendant (Granger), upon the ground that the evidence offered by the plaintiff did not tend to charge him with a participation in the fraud alleged in the declaration. At that stage of the cause, there was no evidence immediately connecting him with the transaction, except what might properly arise from the fact of his being one of the partners. But the court overruled the motion for a nonsuit, and the defendants excepted.

They then requested the court, that the jury might be permitted to retire, and consider whether the evidence introduced was sufficient to charge this defendant; and if not, that the jury might be directed to find him not guilty, urging, as a reason for the motion, that they desired to examine him as a witness for the other defendants; but the court overruled the application, and the defendants excepted.

After these motions were overruled, evidence was introduced by the defendants, and further evidence was given by the plaintiff; all of which was submitted to the jury, who returned their verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

Numerous exceptions were taken by the defendants in the progress of this trial to the rulings of the court, in admitting and rejecting evidence, and they also excepted to two of the instructions given by the court to the jury.

1. As the facts have been found by the jury, the questions to be determined are those that arise upon the exceptions. Of these, the first in the order of the argument at the bar is the one founded upon the refusal of the court to order a nonsuit as to the defendant (Granger), as requested by counsel at the close of the plaintiff's testimony.

Several answers may be given to this complaint, each of which is sufficient to show that the exception cannot be sustained. In the first place, circuit courts have no power to grant a peremptory nonsuit against the will of the plaintiff. It was expressly so held by this court in Elmore v. Grymes, 1 Pet., 497, and the same rule was also affirmed in De Wolf v. Rabaud, 1 Pet., 497. In the case last named, the defendants at the trial, after the evidence for the plaintiff was closed, moved the court for a nonsuit; which was denied, and the defendant excepted, and sued out a writ of error; but this court held that the refusal to grant the motion constituted no ground for the reversal of the judgment, remarking at the same time, that a nonsuit cannot be ordered in any case without the consent and acquiescence of the plaintiff.

Repeated decisions have been made to the same effect; and as long ago as 1832 it was declared, as the opinion of this court, in Crane v. Morris, 6 Pet., 609, that this point was no longer open for controversy. See, also, Silsby v. Foote, 14 How., 222.

Another answer to this complaint arises from the fact that the motion for nonsuit is inappropriate in a case like the present, where there are other defendants to whom it cannot be applied. In actions of this description, where there is more than one defendant, the charge, beyond question, as a general rule, is joint and several, and consequently, one may be found guilty and another not guilty; but at common law there cannot regularly be a nonsuit as to one, and a verdict as to others, and for that reason, whenever it appears that there is evidence in the case to charge one or more of the defendants, a nonsuit is never granted at common law, even in jurisdictions where the authority to grant the motion in a proper case is acknowledged to exist. Revett v. Brown, 2 M. & P., 18; Collier on Part. (Am. ed., 1848), sec. 809, p. 698.

But a more decisive answer to this ground of complaint arises from the fact that there was evidence in the case tending to charge this defendant, which rendered it proper that the question of his guilt or innocence should be submitted to the jury. He was a member of the firm of Filkins, Phillips & Co., as appears by the bill of exceptions. All of the goods in question were deposited in their warehouse, and the jury have found that the goods were sold by the firm. Two of the partners and the clerk of the firm were present at the sale, and the commissions earned in transacting the business went to the benefit of all the partners of which the firm was composed.

In view of all the circumstances, as disclosed in the evidence, it would be impossible to say, as matter of law, that it was error in the court to overrule the motion, even if the authority to grant it were conceded.

We come now to examine the second exception, which arises out of the refusal of the court to permit the jury to retire at the close of the plaintiff's case, and consider whether the evidence offered in the opening was sufficient to charge this defendant with a participation in the alleged fraud.

Upon this subject the general rule is, that if a defendant, who is a material witness for the other defendants, has been improperly joined in the suit, for the purpose of excluding his testimony, the jury will be directed to find a separate verdict in his favor; in which case, the cause being at an end with respect to him, he may be admitted as a witness for the other defendants. This course, however, can be allowed only where there is no evidence whatever against him, for the reason that then only does it appear that he was improperly joined in the suit, through the artifice and fraud of the plaintiff. If there be any evidence against him, then he is not entitled to a separate verdict, because, under such circumstances, it does not appear that he was improperly joined, and his guilt or innocence must wait the general verdict of the jury, who are the sole judges of the fact. 1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 358; Brown v. Howard, 14 Johns., 122.

Courts of justice are not quite agreed as to what stage of the trial the party thus improperly joined in the suit may insist upon a verdict in his favor—whether at the close of the evidence offered by the plaintiff in the opening, or whether he must wait until the case is closed for the defendants. Mr. Greenleaf regards it as the settled practice, that if, at the close of the plaintiff's case, there is one defendant against whom no evidence is given, he is entitled instantly to be acquitted; and it must be admitted that the decision of the court in Child v. Chamberlain, 6 C. & P., 213, favors that view of the law. But Lord Denman held, in Sowell v. Champion, 6 Ad. & Ell., 415, that the application to a judge in the course of a cause, to direct a verdict for one or more defendants in tresspass, is addressed to his discretion, and that the discretion was to be regulated, not merely by the fact that, at the close of the plaintiff's case, no evidence appears to affect them, but by the probabilities whether any such will arise before the whole evidence in the cause closes. There is, says the learned judge, so palpable a failure of justice, where the evidense for the defense discloses a case against a defendant already prematurely acquitted, that such acquittal ought never to take place until there is the strongest reason to believe that such a consequence cannot follow.

Some courts hold that the application, in all cases, is addressed to the discretion of the court. Brotherton v. Livingston, 3 Watts & S., 334; 1 Holt. (N. P.), 275. Other courts have held, that where there is no evidence to affect a particular defendant in actions ex delicto against several, a separate verdict is demandable as a matter of right, and that a refusal to grant the application is the proper subject of exceptions. Van Deusen v. Van Slyck, 15 Johns., 223; Bates v. Conkling, 10 Wend., 389.

Whatever diversities of decision there may be upon this point, all agree that the application ought not to be granted, unless it appear that there is no evidence to affect the party in whose favor it is made. Brown v. Howard, 14 Johns., 122. Now, it has already appeared that there was evidence in this case affecting this defendant; and upon that ground, we hold that the circuit court was fully warranted in refusing to grant the application.

8. After a careful consideration of the several exceptions to the rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence, we are of the opinion that none of them can be sustained. Considering the great number of the exceptions, their separate examination at this time will not be attempted, as it would extend this investigation beyond reasonable limits. One class of them arises out of objections to the admissibility of evidence offered by the plaintiff, tending to show that the defendants, or some of them, had aided the purchaser in this case in committing similar acts of fraud in the purchase of other goods, about the same time, from other persons. According to the evidence, some of those purchases were prior and others subsequent to the period of the sale of the goods in this case. All of this class of exceptions may well be considered together, as they involve the same general principles in the law of evidence. Decided cases have established the doctrine that cases of fraud like the present are among the well recognized exceptions to the general rule, that other wrongful acts of the defendant are not admissible in evidence on the trial of the particular charge immediately involved in the issue. Similar fraudulent acts are admissible in cases of this description, if committed at or about the same time, and when the same motive may reasonably be supposed to exist, with a view to establish the intent of the defendant in respect to the matters charged against him in the declaration. Assuming the proposition, as stated, to be correct, of which there can be no doubt, it necessarily follows, that no one of this class of exceptions is well taken. Some of the decided cases go farther, and hold that such evidence is admissible, as affording a ground of presumption to prove the main charge; but, whether so or not, it is clearly competent, as tending to show the intent of the actor in respect to the matters immediately involved in the issue on trial. Cary v. Hotailing, 1 Hill, 316; Irving v. Motley, 7 Bing., 543; Rowley v. Bigelow, 12 Pick., 307. Another class of the exceptions arises out of objections made by the defendants to the admissibility of evidence introduced by the plaintiff, which, it is insisted, was irrelevant and immaterial. Some twelve exceptions are embraced in this class, and they are addressed to a large portion of the testimony introduced by the plaintiff.

In the course of the trial, the plaintiff offered evidence tending to show the pecuniary circumstances of the purchaser of these goods, his acts and conduct in respect to the goods after the purchase, and that he was largely in debt and insolvent.

He also introduced evidence tending to show that two or more of the defendants had represented to other persons, about the same time, that the purchaser of the goods in question was in good standing, and that they had likewise assisted him in obtaining credit with other dealers in merchandise.

To all, or nearly all, of this evidence, as more fully detailed in the transcript, the defendants objected, and those objections constitute the foundation of the several exceptions included in this class. Much of the evidence was of a circumstantial character; and it is not going too far to say, that some of the circumstances adduced, if taken separately, might well have been excluded. Actions of this description, however, where fraud is of the essence of the charge, necessarily give rise to a wide range of investigation, for the reason that the intent of the defendant is, more or less, involved in the issue. Experience shows that positive proof of fraudulent acts is not generally to be expected, and for that reason, among others, the law allows a resort to circumstances, as the means of ascertaining the truth. Great latitude, says Mr. Starkie, is justly allowed by the law to the reception of indirect or circumstantial evidence, the aid of which is constantly required, not merely for the purpose of remedying the want of direct evidence, but of supplying an invaluable protection against imposition. 1 Stark. Ev., p. 58.

Whenever the necessity arises for a resort to circumstantial evidence, either from the nature of the inquiry or the failure of direct proof, objections to testimony on the grounds of irrelevancy are not favored, for the reason that the force and effect of circumstantial facts usually and almost necessarily depend upon their connection with each other. Circumstances altogether inconclusive, if separately considered, may, by their number and joint operation, especially when corroborated by moral coincidences, be sufficient to constitute conclusive proof. Applying these principles to the several exceptions under consideration, it is clear clear that no one of them can be sustained.

Other exceptions to the rulings of court were taken during the progress of the trial; but it is so obvious that they are without merit, that we think it unnecessary to give them a separate examination at the present time, and they are accordingly overruled.

At the argument, it was supposed by the counsel of the original defendants that the circuit judge had allowed the plaintiff to introduce parol proof of the contents of a writ of attachment, referred to by one of the witnesses; but, on examination of the transcript, we find that no such evidence was admitted.

4. Exceptions were also taken to certain portions of the charge of the court. On this branch of the case, most reliance was placed upon certain objections to the first instruction given to the jury, which is as follows:

"If the goods were in the custody of the defendants, for sale on commission, and one or more of the partners made false and fraudulent representations as to the party to whom they were to be sold by the defendants, then the partnership would be liable, if, in consequence of such representations, the plaintiff consented to the sale to that party, and the sale was actually made by the firm to the party."

Some criticisms were also made in the printed argument for the defendants upon the second instruction, which, like the former, was duly excepted to; but, inasmuch as it is not essentially different in principle from the other, and as the questions presented in each depend upon the same general considerations, it will not be reproduced.

Both instructions were framed upon the theory that the defendants were not liable, unless the jury found from the evidence that the goods were actually sold by the firm; which, to say the least of it, was a theory sufficiently favorable to the defendants. Judge Story says, in his valuable work on partnerships, that torts may arise in the course of the business of the partnership, for which all the members of the firm will be liable, although the act may not, in fact, have been assented to by all the partners. Thus, for example, if one of the partners should commit a fraud in the course of the partnership business, all the partners may be liable therefor, although they may not all have concurred in the act. So, if one of a firm of commission merchants should sell goods consigned to the firm, fraudulently, or should sell goods so consigned in violation of instructions, all the partners would be liable. Story on Part., sec. 166; Collier on Part. (Am. ed., 1848), secs. 445 and 457; Nicoll v. Glennie, 1 Maule & S., 588.

In precise accordance with this view of the law, it is said, and well said, by the court, in Olmsted v. Hotailing, 1 Hill, 318, that it does not lie with one to claim property through the fraudulent act of another, whether partner or agent, without being affected by that act the same as if it were his own; and we think the same principle must apply in a case like the present, where a firm doing business as commission merchants have received the fruits of the fraud in the commissions earned for transacting the business.

Where one, assuming to be an agent, had committed a fraud in a sale, it was held, in Taylor v. Green, 8 Car. & P., 316, that the mere adoption of the sale and the receipt of the money, by the person for whom the sale was made, rendered him liable for the fraud.

Suffice it to say, without any further reference to authorities, that the theory of the instructions was sufficiently favorable to the defendants.

5. Complaint is also made that the instructions excepted to were not sufficiently comprehensive; that they did not embrace all the elements which constituted the charge, as laid in the declaration. Strong doubts are entertained whether this point is properly raised by the bill of exceptions; but whether so or not, we are satisfied that the exception cannot be sustained. Instructions given by the court at the trial are entitled to a reasonable interpretation; and if the proposition as stated is correct, they are not, as a general rule, to be regarded as the subject of error, on account of omissions not pointed out by the excepting party. Seven requests for instructions to the jury were presented by the counsel for the defendants, every one of which was given by the court, without any qualification. If the defendants had supposed that the instructions given were either indefinite or not sufficiently comprehensive, they might well have asked that further and more explicit instructions should be given; and if they had done so, and the prayer had been refused, this objection would be entitled to more weight.

But another answer may be given to this objection, which is entirely conclusive against it. On recurring to the transcript, we find that the court, before the instructions excepted to were given, explained to the jury the nature and character of the charge, describing substantially the two forms in which it was presented in the several counts of the declaration; and, in effect, instructed them that it must be proved in the one or the other of those forms, in order to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict in his favor. Those explanations immediately preceded the instructions embraced in the exceptions, and, in fact, may be regarded as a part of the same. Beyond question, the instructions excepted to must be considered in connection with those explanations; and when so considered, it is obvious that this objection cannot be sustained.

In view of the whole case, we think the defendants have no just cause of complaint, and that there is no error in the record.

The judgment of the circuit court, therefore, is affirmed, with costs.

WILLIAM H. SHELDON, Claimant of a Quantity of Cotton, &c., Appt.,

v.

JOHN CLIFTON.

(See S. C., 23 How., 481–484.)

Jurisdiction dependent on amount—separate amounts adjudged against two defendants—when both must bring appeal.

Where a libel was filed to recover freight on cotton, and a decree rendered, in favor of the libelant, for the amount of the freight, $2,338.06, and that B. pay to the libelant $583.84 thereof, and that S. pay $1,754.22 thereof, and S. appealed from the decree to this court, the court dismissed the appeal, on the ground that the decree against S. is less than $2,000.

The freight was separately awarded against the claimants, in proportion to the cotton shipped by each one, and the rights of each were distinct and independent.

But if it were otherwise, and the whole of the freight was jointly decreed against the claimants, the appeal must still be dismissed, as then both the claimants should have joined in it.

Argued Jan. 27, 1860. Decided Feb. 6, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States of the Southern District of New York.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

On motion to dismiss for want for jurisdiction.

Messrs. Owen & Vose, for appellant:

The "matter in dispute" in this action was the freight upon the entire cargo, which, according to the decree, amounted to $2,338.06, exclusive of costs. Unless the apportionment of this sum between the claimants, which the circuit court assumed to make, operates as a severance of the action, the motion must be denied.

The decree of the circuit court directs Sheldon to pay $1,754.22, together with $586.79 costs, amounting in the aggregate to $2,341.01.

The "matter in dispute" on this appeal, is the sum so decreed to be paid for damages and costs.

The costs referred to in the Judiciary Act are not those which have entered into and become a part of the judgment appealed from, but those which may accrue on the appeal. Such appears to have been the views of this court in the case of Olney v. The Falcon, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 19.

Mr. C. Donohue, for appellee:

The record shows that Mr. Sheldon is ordered and decreed to pay between $1,800 and $1,900, besides costs, and that Mr. Brower does not complain of the decree below.

No appeal lies unless the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum of $2,000.

Udall v. The Ohio, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 17; Olney v. The Falcon, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 19; Allen v. Newberry, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 248.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, in admiralty. A motion has been made, on the part of the appellee, to dismiss the appeal, for the want of jurisdiction.

A libel was filed by Clifton, in the district court, to recover freight on the 269 bales of cotton and 9 bags of wool. Brower and Sheldon appeared as claimants, and contested the claim for the freight. Brower claimed sixty-seven of the 269 bales, and Sheldon two hundred and two bales. The district court dismissed the libel.

On appeal to the circuit court this decree was reversed, and decree rendered in favor of the libelant for the amount of the freight, $2,338.06; that J. W. Brower, claimant of a portion of the cotton, pay to the libelant the sum of $583.84, being the freight on the cotton claimed by him in the suit, and that the claimant, W. H. Sheldon, pay for the portion claimed by him the sum of $1,754.22. Sheldon appealed from the decree to this court.

The motion is now made to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the decree against Sheldon is less than $2,000, and which is apparent from a perusal of the decree. The sum decreed against him is only $1,754.22.

The freight was separately awarded against the claimants, in proportion to the cotton shipped by each one. The rights of each were distinct and independent.

But if it were otherwise, and the whole of the freight jointly against the claimants, the appeal must still be dismissed, as then the claimants should have joined in it.

Motion to dismiss, granted.

v.

ALEXANDER A. CASSIDY ET AL.

(See S. C., 23 How., 109-117.)

Limit of surety's obligation—judgment against, obtained by artifice, relief from.

The natural limit of the obligation of a surety is to be found in the obligation of the principal; and when that is extinguished, the surety is, in general, liberated.

Where the obligation of the principal has been ascertained by the decree of the court, upon proof conceded to be sufficient, and has been fully discharged, and the surety has been "lulled into security," by the delusive promises of his creditor, and has been the victim of artifice and circumvention; and judgment against him was obtained in contempt of the injunction of the court; held, a proper case for his relief and for perpetuating the injunction.

Argued Jan. 20, 1860. Decided Feb. 13, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. J. Brent, H. May and Chas. E. Phelps, for appellants:

Why had not the Tennessee court full jurisdiction over the case?

Cassidy was in Tennessee, and Cage was suing in the state court to enforce equitable claims to a reduction of the note held by Cassidy in his individual character as payee thereof.

Cage was not enjoining by state process,

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of U. S. Supreme Court dependent on amount. Interest cannot be added to give jurisdiction. How value of thing demanded may be shown. What cases are reviewable, without regard to sum in controversy. See note to Gordon v. Ogden, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.), 33.

judgments in the federal courts. He was proceeding in the ordinary case in personam upon a personal contract. It is true that Cassidy, being a citizen in neither State, had a claim to evade the state jurisdiction; but conceding such a right, he waived it by not adopting a course required by the Act of Congress to remove the case to the federal courts in Tennessee. Undoubtedly, the federal courts could not have enjoined suit in the Tennessee courts.

Diggs v. Wolcott, 4 Cranch, 179.

Nor have the state courts power to enjoin judgments in the federal courts.

McKim v. Voorhies, 7 Cranch, 279.

Cassidy, even if he had any right to the protection of the federal courts, should have removed the case; but as Cage was not a citizen of Tennessee, there was no right to remove the case from the state court.

1 Stat. at L., p. 79.

Courts of chancery have jurisdiction in personam in cases of contract, fraud, trust, &c., even over real estate in foreign countries.

See 2 Story, Eq. Jur., sec. 743; Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves., Sr., 454; 3 Gill & J., 504; Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 148; Indiana R. R. v. Michigan et al., 15 How., 233.

They have jurisdiction over all contracts where a person is within the territory.

Storys, Confl. of Laws, secs. 539, 541, 543.

Here is no case of conflict jurisdiction between the state and federal courts. It is true they appear to have decided differently; that is, the federal court held the decree of distribution to be binding, and Cage as creating a cause of action when collaterally impeached by him, and the state court afterwards reversed the same decree on direct appeal. But the state court had undoubted authority to reverse the decree of its own probate court. The effect of that reversal on any and all courts of equity upon the judgments of the federal court which were predicated on that erroneous decree, is a new and distinct inquiry, certainly competent for the consideration of the federal court upon this bill of injunction, and in reference to the cases therein stated. It is clear that the decree of distribution alone, entitled the distributees to sue the surety (5 How. Miss., 651), and equally clear that the distribution was illegally made after the letters of administration were revoked.

8 Sm. & M., 219.

It further appears, that while the case was pending in the Tennessee State Court, having competent jurisdiction thereof, for the purpose of abating and avoiding the note, and in defiance of the injunction of that court, Cassidy instituted a suit in the Circuit Court of the United States for the State of Mississippi against Cage, and recovered judgment on this very note, which was in litigation between the parties in Tennessee, notwithstanding the effort of Cage to defend himself in the premises, when sued at law.

The Tennessee court had jurisdiction, and if so, there can be no judicial inspection behind the decree, except by appellate power.

Grignon v. Astor, 2 How., 341; 10 Pet., 449; 2 H. & G., 42; 6 H. & J., 182; 4 H. & J., 394.

The true test of jurisdiction is, whether a demurrer would lie to Cage's bill in Tennessee.

Tomlinson v. McKaig, 5 Gill, 256.

Even if this were a case of covenant jurisdiction, the court first having cognizance has exclusive jurisdiction.

1 Md. Ch., 351; 1 Md. Ch., 295; 2 Md. Ch., 42; 7 Gill, 446.

Under the Constitution that decree is just as conclusive in Mississippi as in Tennessee.

A recovery on same cause of action in a sister State pendente lite, may be pleaded against further maintenance of suit, though this suit was brought first.

7 Gill, 426.

Defendant at law after judgment may enjoin judgment on grounds not known or not available at trial in court of law.

Gott v. Carr, 6 G. & J., 309; 12 G. & J., 365.

Surely the abatement on cancellation of that note and its injunction from suit on grounds of mistake, or fraud, or failure of consideration, was a mere personal demand against Cassidy, and to be enforced anywhere he was found, on familiar principles of equity.

15 Pet., 233; 1 Wheat., 440; 1 Pet., 1; 4 Cranch, 306.

Here it is conceded that the Tennessee decree, establishing fraud in Cassidy throughout, was supported by evidence;

3 Pet., 210,

And fraud vacates the judgment, as against the party.

Simms v. Slacum, 3 Cranch, 300.

Even after judgment on a note, the defendant may enjoin on ground of fraud in obtaining the note.

4 Pet., 210; 1 Pet., 68.

Jurisdiction once attaching, the court, to do complete justice, decides even a legal claim.

5 Pet., 264; 12 Pet., 178.

At law, the failure of consideration in a note must be total, and here it was partial, as conceded.

2 Wheat., 13.

Even if the note of Cage had been given to Cassidy, in his character of administrator, it was the mere personal chose in action, and his title of administrator would have been surplusage.

Graham v. Fahnestock, 5 Gill, 215.

Messrs. J. H. Bradley and J. M. McCalla, for appellees:

First. The decree of the probate court, ascertaining the amount due by the administration, remains unreversed.

The court had exclusive and conclusive jurisdiction over the subject-matter of controversy;

Gildart v. Starke, 1 How. Miss., 450; Griffith v. Vertner, 5 How. Miss., 736, Provided the proper parties were before them or due notice was given.

Hall v. Cassidy, 25 Miss., 48.

Second. The court of Tennessee had no jurisdiction to settle the accounts of administrators, deriving their authority from the State of Mississippi.

Vaughan v. Northup, 15 Pet., 1; Bell v. Suddeth, 2 Sm. & M., 582.

And the appearance of Cassidy could not give them jurisdiction, whether he had admitted or denied it.

There was no fraud charged, nor any contract or agreement set up in the Tennessee bill, which gave that court jurisdiction over Cassidy, so as to prevent his proceeding in the federal court in Mississippi to coerce the payment of this note.

The Circuit Court in Mississippi had exclusive jurisdiction over that question, and was open to the complainant, Cage.

McKim v. Voorhies, 7 Cranch, 279.

Third. The reversal of the decree of distribution on the probate court, neither satisfies the equity between these parties nor destroys the consideration which was the foundation of that note, because the amount ascertained by the only competent authority to be due still stands a judgment, and in the absence of creditors, belongs to the distributees of the estate.

2d. The note was given by Cage with full knowledge of the circumstances, and when he might have resorted to his present application for relief, when he might have convened the parties in the Probate Court of Madison County, and have had the decree on the account opened, if there was jurisdiction to do so.

But there was no such jurisdiction, either in that court or in a court of equity.

Hendricks v. Huddleston, 5 Sm. & M., 422, 426; Turnbull v. Endicott, 3 Sm. & M., 802 Griffith v. Vertner, 5 How. Miss., 736.

The settlement of that account is final and conclusive.

Finally. If Cassidy procured the decree for account by fraud, or especially if consideration on which the note was given was fraudulent, and the note was given on false and fraudulent representations of Cassidy, these defenses would have been good defenses in the suit at law on the note. They were not set up; Cage, therefore, has by his own laches lost his equity, if he had any.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

R. H. Cage, the testator of the appellants, filed his bill in the circuit court, to be relieved from a judgment rendered there in favor of the appellee (A. A. Cassidy), in November, 1852.

The pleadings and proofs contained in the record disclose that the testator, in 1841, became surety to the Probate Court of Madison County, Mississippi, for William Douglass and William Hall, on their bond, as administrators of the estate of Henry L. Douglass, deceased. In 1848, their letters of administration were revoked; and Cassidy, the husband of Mary Douglass, the widow of Henry L. Douglass, and the guardian of Henrietta Douglass, their only child, was appointed administrator de bonis non.

In 1849, the probate court cited the administrators to account, and upon their non-appearance rendered a decree against them for $6,822.87, and subsequently ordered, that payment should be made to Cassidy and wife and Henrietta Douglass—one moiety to each, being their legal share; and in default of payment authorized a suit on the administration bond. In 1850, suits were instituted on the bond against Cage, the surety, in the circuit court, by Cassidy and Henrietta Douglass; but no suit was commenced against the principals, who resided in Tennessee. Judgments were rendered in 1851 against Cage, for the amount of the decree; and these were settled by his giving a note to Cassidy for their amount, payable one year after date, and by paying the costs.

During the year 1851, Cage visited Tennessee, with a view to have a settlement between Douglass and Hall, his principals, and Cassidy, and to obtain an indemnity from those who had induced him to sign their bond. His negotiations were unproductive; and he filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in Sumner County, Tennessee, to which Cassidy and wife, Henrietta Douglass, and Douglass and Hall, and others, were made parties.

In this bill he stated his relation as surety, and his legal claim to be exonerated from his obligation, and from his impending danger of loss. He insisted that his creditors, the distributees, and his principals, the administrators, should adjust their accounts, and that the balance should be settled. He charged that he had not made defense against the judgments in Mississippi, because the defendant, Cassidy, had assured him that he was not to be vexed or injured, and the suit was simply to serve as an instrument to bring his absent principals to a fair settlement. He charges that the account stated in the probate court was erroneous, within the knowledge of Cassidy, who had procured it, and that the balance was subject to credits that he knew to be just. He obtained an injunction against Cassidy, requiring him not to transfer his note or to commence any suit upon it pending the injunction.

The several defendants answered the bill; and in 1854 the cause came on for a hearing upon pleadings, proofs, orders, and a report upon the administration accounts.

Before this time the administrators had obtained a writ of error upon the judgment rendered in the probate court; and in January, 1853, this judgment was annulled by the Court of Errors and Appeals of Mississippi.

The defendant, Cassidy, in 1852, notwithstanding the injunction in Tennessee, commenced a suit upon the note of the surety (Cage), in the circuit court, and in November, 1852, recovered a judgment for the full amount, and sued out execution for its collection. Thereupon Cage filed the bill for injunction and relief with which the proceedings in the cause before this court were commenced.

In this bill he charges that the account, as stated in the probate court, is unjust. That Cassidy was aware of the injustice of the charges when they were made. That he had quieted the mind of the plaintiff, by assurances that he meditated no harm to him; but merely expected to bring the administrators to a fair settlement by that course, and only expected to hold the claim against him for that purpose. He specifies the errors in the account, and the efforts he had made to bring the parties to a settlement, and the pendency of his suit in Tennessee. Cassidy answered the bill, taking issue upon some of the material averments.

Thus the cause stood when the Court of Chancery in Sumner County, Tennessee, rendered its final decree in 1854. The court declared that the settlement in the probate court, the judgments in the circuit court on the bond, and the execution of the promissory note by Cage in liquidation, were superinduced by the promises and assurances of Cassidy to Cage, that he was not to be held personally, but they were to be used to bring the principals to a fair accounting. That Cassidy knew that the statement of the account in the probate court was erroneous, and unjust to the administrators, and that the recovery of the judgment on the note of Cage was a breach of the injunction, and a fraud upon him.

The court finds, that instead of a debt of $6,822.87, as reported against the administrators in 1849, there was only due the sum of $850.37. It charges against this sum the costs paid by Cage in the litigation to which he has been subjected, and required the remainder to be paid into court; and thereupon entered a decree against Cassidy, enjoining him from proceeding further upon the judgment in the circuit court on the note.

This decree was presented to the Circuit Court in Mississippi, in suitable pleadings, and was considered by that court under a stipulation of the solicitors of the respective parties to this effect: "It is admitted that proof before the Chancery Court of Tennessee was sufficient to establish the state of accounts of Hall and Douglass, as administrators of H. L. Douglass, in Mississippi and Tennessee, as decreed by the Chancellor in the Tennessee case, filed in this cause as an exhibit. This agreement is made, in order to dispense with obtaining a copy of the proof before the Chancery Court of Tennessee, or retaking the despositions of the witnesses. In other words, all that is intended to be admitted hereby, and that is admitted, is that the decree of said chancery court was supported by the proof."

Upon the hearing in the circuit court, that court determined that the injunction which had been granted in the preliminary stage of this cause was improvidently allowed, and that the bill must be dismissed. From this decree this appeal is taken.

The natural limit of the obligation of a surety is to be found in the obligation of the principal; and when that is extinguished, the surety is, in general, liberated. In some codes, the obligation of a surety cannot extend beyond or exist under conditions more onerous than that of his principal. The obligation of the administrators, Douglass and Hall, has been ascertained by the decree of the Court of Chancery in Tennessee, upon proof, conceded to be sufficient, and has been fully discharged by its order. Notwithstanding this, the appellee (Cassidy) seeks to enforce a judgment for nearly ten times the amount of the debt found to be due in that decree, and now discharged. It is apparent that the effort is unconscionable, and can only be allowed under the influence of some inflexible and imperious rule of the court, that deprives the appellants of any title to its interposition. But the Court of Chancery of Tennessee, upon sufficient proof, has declared that the surety had been "lulled into security" by the delusive promises of his creditor, and that he has been the victim of artifice and circumvention; that the judgment against him was obtained in contempt of the injunction of the court, and that the assertion of any right under it would be fraudulent. This decree remains in full force and effect.

These circumstances furnish additional motives for the intervention of the equitable powers of the court for the relief of the appellants.

It is the opinion of this court, that the decree of the circuit court is erroneous, and must be reversed. The cause is remanded, with directions to the circuit court to enter a decree perpetuating the injunction.

THE PHILADELPHIA, WILMINGTON AND BALTIMORE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appts.,

v.

THE PHILADELPHIA AND HAVRE DE GRACE STEAM TOWBOAT COMPANY.

(See S. C., 23 How., 209-220.)

Jurisdiction in admiralty—in contracts and torts—injury to steamer by pile in river channel—injury on Sunday recoverable for—Sunday laws.

The jurisdiction of courts of admiralty in matters of contract, depends upon the nature and character of the contract; but in torts, it depends entirely on locality.

If wrongs be committed on the high seas, or within the ebb and flow of the tide, they come within the jurisdiction of that court.

The definition of the term "torts," when used in reference to admiralty jurisdiction, is not confined to wrongs or injuries committed by direct force.

It includes, also, wrongs suffered in consequence of the negligence or malfeasance of others, where the remedy at common law is by an action on the case.

Where injury to a steamer was caused by her coming in contact with a sight pile, driven into the channel of a river by contractors, and left, defendants held liable for this injury, because the pile was left in the channel by their contractors.

The case is not altered by the fact that the contractors were directed to do so by the engineers, who were the servants of defendants.

When they dismissed the contractors from the further fulfillment of their contract, it became their duty to take care that all obstructions to navigation, which had been placed in the channel by their orders, and for the purpose of their intended erection, should be removed.

Although this collision took place on Sunday, and a statute of Maryland forbids persons "to work" on the Lord's day, and the master and mariner of a ship or steamboat are liable to the penalty of the Act for commencing their voyage from a port in Maryland on Sunday, it does not follow that the defendants can protect themselves from responding to the owners of the vessel for the damages suffered in consequence of the nuisance.

Courts have no power to add to this penalty the loss of a ship, by the tortious conduct of another, against whom the owner has committed no offense.

Vessel leaving a port on Sunday does not infringe the state laws with regard to the observance of that day.

This court will not reverse a decree, merely upon a doubt created by conflicting testimony as to damages.

Argued Jan. 24, 1860. Decided Feb. 13, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, by the appellee, to recover damages for an injury alleged to have been sustained by a towboat belonging to the appellee, by her running against a sight pile in the Susquehannah River, left in said river by the agents of the appellant.

NOTE.—To what places the jurisdiction of admiralty is confined. See note to Allen v. Newberry, 62 U. S. 110.

The district court entered a decree in favor of the appellee, for $7,000.36, damages. The circuit court, on appeal, having affirmed this decree, the defendant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Wm. Schley and Thomas Donaldson, for appellant:

1. The District Court of the United States has no jurisdiction in a case like the present.

The cases show that "Marine Torts," over which courts of admiralty have jurisdiction, are trespasses done and committed on navigable waters, as in the case of a collision between two vessels.

The placing and leaving the pile in the bed of the Susquehannah and within the body of a county, was a nuisance at common law, and the appellee's remedy was in the state courts, in an action on the case for particular damage caused by that nuisance.

The question is not one of mere locality. The subject-matter itself is not within the admiralty jurisdiction; and it is believed that none of the decisions of this court have gone to an extent which would include it.

2. The appellees could not recover in this case, because they were engaged in an unlawful act at the time when the accident occurred.

It is the law of Maryland, that no person whatever shall work or do any bodily labor, or willingly suffer any of his servants to do any manner of work or labor on the Lord's day, works of necessity and charity excepted.

There is nothing in this provision inconsistent with any of the laws of the United States regulating commerce, and the federal courts would, therefore, take notice of and conform to the law of the State.

3. It was the duty of the contractors to remove these sight piles when done with; and the act of the contractors or of their servants in sawing off those piles below the surface, and leaving them so as to obstruct the navigation, was in no sense the act of the appellant.

There is nothing to show that the appellant ever had knowledge of the fact that these piles were sawed off, instead of being removed, as the contract required; and the termination of the contract could not make the appellants liable for the consequences of a previous wrongful act of the contractors, the appellants not consenting either to making or continuing the nuisance.

The sinking of The Superior after striking on the sight pile, was owing to the mismanagement of her captain, and the appellees cannot be entitled to recover the damages consequent upon her sinking, for the cost of raising her, or the loss of time while she was under water.

4. The amount of the decree is greater than the actual loss, which naturally or necessarily resulted from the injury; and greater, indeed, than the total value of the injured boat.

Mr. Geo. W. Dobbin, for appellee:

1. The steamer "Superior," the subject of the injury being, at the time of the wrong committed, a licensed vessel sailing in her lawful business on waters within the ebb and flow of the tide, a court of admiralty has jurisdiction to redress any trespass upon her, notwithstanding an action at law might have been maintained for the same injury.

L., 475; De Lovio v. Boit, 2 Gall., 437; Judge Winchester, 1 Pet., Ad. Dec., 234.

2. The Act of Assembly of Maryland did not contemplate a restraint on the sailing of vessels engaged in foreign commerce or in the coasting trade, and if it did, such restraint is repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States. The "Superior" being a vessel duly enrolled and licensed in the District of Philadelphia, for the coasting trade, had a right to pursue such trade without any restraint thereon by the laws of the State of Maryland, in respect to the time within which such coasting trade might be prosecuted.

3. The Railroad Company, and not the contractors under them, are responsible for the injury.

The whole work was done under the direction and superintendence of the Company, the contractors undertaking to do only as directed by the Company' engineers; and there being no proof that the contractors violated their instructions, the presumption is that all that was done was by the order of the Company's superintendent.

The pile, upon which the steamer ran, was not such an one as is contemplated by the contract, where it speaks of "scaffolding and piles that may be used while building."

At the time of the accident, the Company had discharged the contractors and taken possession of all that was built of the bridge, in its then unfinished condition.

4. The captain of the steamer exercised the utmost prudence, skill and judgment after the accident, as the record abundantly shows; but even if this were less apparent as a question in fact, it having undergone full examination in the district court, and the circuit court on appeal, this court will not disturb the decree unless in a clear case of mistake.

Walsh v. Rogers, 13 How., 284.

5. The sum decreed against the appellant in the district court and affirmed in the circuit court on appeal, is less than the proof shows to have resulted from the injury.

Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How., 110.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

A brief statement of the facts of this case will be sufficient to show the relevancy of the questions to be decided.

The appellants were authorized by a statute of Maryland to construct a railway bridge over the mouth of the Susquehanna River, at Havre de Grace. They entered into an agreement with certain contractors, to prepare the foundations and erect the piers. In pursuance of their contract, these persons drove piles into the channel of the river, under the direction of the engineers employed by the apellants. Before the completion of the contract, the appellants abandoned their purpose of building the bridge, and discharged the contractors. During the progress of the work, the contractors had driven certain piles, called sight piles, into the channel of the river, which were not removed or cut off level with the bottom, but were cut a few feet under the surface of the water, so that they became a hidden and dangerous nuisance. The steamboat Superior, engaged in towing boats between Philadelphia and Havre de Grace, left a port in Maryland on Sunday morning, and soon after came into forcible collision with one or more of these piles; in consequence whereof she suffered great damage, and for which this libel was filed.

The appellants have, in this court, insisted chiefly on three points of defense to the charges of the libel:

I. It is contended that the "marine torts," over which courts of admiralty have jurisdiction, are trespasses done and committed with force on the sea and navigable waters, such as collision of vessels, assaults, &c., and that the placing and leaving the piles in the bed of the river, and within the body of a county, is a nuisance at common law, and the remedy of the appelles should have been by an action on the case.

The jurisdiction of courts of admiralty, in matters of contract, depends upon the nature and character of the contract; but in torts, it depends entirely on locality. If the wrongs be committed on the high seas, or within the ebb and flow of the tide, it has never been disputed that they come within the jurisdiction of that court. Even Lord Coke (4 Inst., 134) declares, "that of contracts, pleas, and querels, made upon the sea or any part thereof, which is not within any county, the admiral hath and ought to have jurisdiction."

Since the case of Waring v. Clarke, 5 How., 464, the exception of "infra corpus comitatus" is no longer allowed to prevail. In such cases, the party may have his remedy either in the common law courts or in the admiralty. Nor is the definition of the term "torts," when used in reference to admiralty jurisdiction, confined to wrongs or injuries committed by direct force. It includes, also, wrongs suffered in consequence of the negligence or malfeasance of others, where the remedy at common law is by an action on the case. It is a rule of maritime law, from the earliest times, "that if a ship run foul of an anchor left without a buoy, the person who placed it there shall respond in damages." See Emerigon, Vol. I., page 417; Consulat de la Mer., chap. 243; and Cleirac, 70.

In the resolution of the Twelve Judges, in 1632, it was determined in England, "that the courts of admiralty may inquire of and redress all annoyances and obstructions that are or may be any impediment to navigation, &c., and injuries done there which concern navigation on the sea."

Hence, "the impinging on an anchor or other injurious impediment negligently left in the way," has always been considered as coming within the category of maritime torts, having their remedy in the courts of admiralty. See 2 Brown Civ. and Adm., 203.

The objection to the jurisdiction of the court is, therefore, not sustained.

II. The testimony showed that the injury to the steamer was caused by her coming in contact with one of the sight piles, driven into the channel by the contractors, and left in the situation already stated.

This contract is set forth at length. It showed that the contractors were bound to "provide all necessary machinery, &c., and to furnish (and remove when done with) all scaffolding and piles that may be used while building."

It is contended by the appellants that they are not liable for the negligence which caused this injury, because the piles were not placed in the channel by their servants, but by those of the contractors; and that the case was not altered by the fact that the contractors were directed to do so by the engineers, who were the servants of appellants.

If the contractors had proceeded to complete their contract, and left the piles in the condition complained of, this defense to the action might have availed the appellants. But as the driving the piles for the legitimate purpose of the erection was by authority of the law and in pursuance of the contract, the contractors had done no wrong in placing them there. The nuisance was the result of the negligence in cutting off the piles, not at the bottom of the river, but a few feet under the surface of the water. This the contractors were bound to do, after the piles had served their legitimate purpose in the construction of the bridge, and after they had completed their contract. But before this, the Railroad Company determined to discontinue the erection of the bridge. They dismissed the contractors from the further fulfillment of their contract. Under such circumstances, it became the duty of the appellants to take care that all the obstructions to the navigation, which had been placed in the channel by their orders, and for the purpose of their intended erection, should be removed. The nuisance, which resulted from leaving the piles in this dangerous condition, was the consequence of their own negligence or that of their servants, and not of the contractors.

III. The appellants urge, as a further ground of defense, that this collision took place on Sunday, shortly after the steamboat had commenced her voyage from the wharf, "parcel of the territory of Harford County, in the State of Maryland; that the boat was used and employed by her owners in towing canal boats; and that, when entering on her voyage, those who had her control and management were engaged in their usual and ordinary work and labor—the same not being a work of necessity or charity—contrary to the laws of the State of Maryland."

A statute of Maryland forbids persons "to work or do any bodily labor, or to willingly suffer any of their servants to do any manner of work or labor, on the Lord's day—works of necessity and charity excepted;" and a penalty is prescribed for a breach of the law.

It has been urged, that there was nothing in this provision inconsistent with any of the laws regulating commerce, and that the federal courts should, therefore, take notice of and conform to the laws of the State.

But assuming this proposition to be true, the inference from it will not follow as a legitimate conclusion; for, if we admit that the master and mariner of a ship or steamboat are liable to the penalty of the act for commencing their voyage from a port in Maryland on Sunday, it by no means follows that the appellants can protect themselves from responding to the owners of the vessel for the damages suffered in consequence of the nuisance.

The law relating to the observance of Sunday defines a duty of a citizen to the State, and to the State only. For a breach of this duty he is liable to the fine or penalty imposed by the statute, and nothing more. Courts of justice have no power to add to this penalty the loss of a ship, by the tortious conduct of another, against whom the owner has committed no offense. It is true, that in England, after the Statute of 29—ch. 2d, forbidding labor on the Lord's day, they have, by a course of decision perhaps too obsequiously followed in this country, undertaken to add to the penalty, by declaring void, contracts made on that day; but this was only in case of executory contracts, which the courts were invoked to execute. It is true, that cases may be found in the State of Massachusetts (see 10 Metc., 363, and 4 Cush., 322), which, on a superficial view, might seem to favor this doctrine of set-off in cases of tort. But those decisions depend on the peculiar legislation and customs of that State, more than on any general principles of justice or law. See the case of Woodman v. Hubbard, 5 Fost., 67.

We would refer, also, to a case very similar in its circumstances to the present, in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in which this subject is very fully examined by the learned Chief Justice of that court; and we concur in his conclusion: "That we should work a confusion of relations, and lend a very doubtful assistance to morality, if we should allow one offender against the law, to the injury of another, to set off against the plaintiff that he, too, is a public offender." See Mohney v. Cook, 26 Pa. St., 342.

We do not feel justified, therefore, on any principles of justice, equity, or of public policy, in inflicting an additional penalty of $7,000 on the libelants, by way of set-off, because their servants may have been subject to a penalty of twenty shillings each, for breach of the statute.

Moreover, the steamboat in this case was sailing on a public river, within the ebb and flow of the tide; she had a coasting license, and was proceeding from a port in one State to a port in another. Has it ever been decided that a vessel leaving a port on Sunday infringes the state laws with regard to the observance of that day?

We have shown, in an opinion delivered at this term, that in other Christian countries, where the observance of Sundays and other holidays is enforced by both church and state, the sailing of vessels engaged in commerce, and even their lading and unlading, were classed among the works of necessity, which are excepted from the operation of such laws. This may be said to be confirmed by the usage of all nations, so far, at least, as it concerns commencing a voyage on that day. Vessels engaged in commerce on the sea must take the advantage of favorable winds and weather; and it is well known that sailors (for peculiar reasons of their own) give a preference to that day of the week over all others for commencing a voyage.

In the case of Ulary v. The Washington, Crabbe, 208, where a sailor justified his departure from a ship in port, because he was compelled to work on Sunday, Judge Hopkinson decided, "that, by the maritime law, sailors could not refuse to work on Sunday—the nature of the service requires that they should do so."

We have thus disposed of the questions of law raised in this case, and concur with the district and circuit court in their decision of them.

Some objections have been urged to the assessment of damages, and their amount.

On this subject there was much contradictory testimony, as usually happens when experts are examined as to matters of professional opinion. The judges of the courts where this question was tried can better judge of the relative value of such conflicting testimony, from their knowledge of places and persons, and they may examine witnesses ore tenus, if they see fit.

There was evidence to support the decree; and we can see no manifest error into which the court below has fallen. Appellants ought not to expect that this court will reverse a decree, merely upon a doubt created by conflicting testimony.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed, with costs.

JOSEPH PENNOCK AND NATHAN F. HART, Appts.,

v.

GEORGE S. COE, Trustee of the CLEVELAND, ZANESVILLE & CINCINNATI RAILROAD CO.

(See S. C., 23 How., 117-132.)

Mortgage on after-acquired property of railroad.

when valid—when it attaches—right of mortgagee—is prior to that of creditors, when—rights of bondholders—construction of charter.

The after-acquired rolling stock of a railroad company placed upon the road, attaches in equity, to a mortgage, if within the description, from the time it is placed there, so as to protect it against the judgment creditors of the railroad company.

There is no rule of law or principle of equity that denies effect to such an agreement.

Whenever a party undertakes, by deed or mortgage, to grant property, real or personal, in presenti, which does not belong to him or has no existence, the deed or mortgage, as the case may be, is inoperative and void, and this either in a court of law or equity.

But the principle has no application to a case where the mortgagee does not undertake to grant, in præsenti, property of the company not belonging to it, or not in existence at the date of the mortgage.

Where the terms of the grant or conveyance are: "all present and future to-be-acquired property of the parties of the first part, including iron rails and equipments, procured or to be procured," &c., the law will permit the grant or conveyance to take effect upon the property when it is brought into existence, and belongs to the grantor, in fulfillment of an express agreement, founded on a good and valuable consideration.

If the company, after having received the money upon the bonds and given the mortgage security, had undertaken to divert the fund from the purpose to which it was devoted, namely: the construction of the road and its equipment, and upon which the security mainly depended, a court of equity would have interposed, and enforced a specific performance; one of the covenants being, that the money should be faithfully applied to the building and equipment of the road.

Or if, after the road was put in operation, the company had undertaken to divert the rolling stock from the use of the road, a like interposition might have been invoked, in order to protect the security of the bondholders.

And if a court of equity would thus have compelled a specific performance of the contract, it would sanction the voluntary performance of it by the parties themselves, and give effect to the security as soon as the property is brought into existence.

The mortgage attached to the future acquisitions, as described in it, from the time they came into existence.

As to the claim of the judgment creditors, the mortgage being a valid and effective security for the bondholders of prior date, they present the superior equity to have the property in question applied to the discharge of the bonds.

If the property covered by the mortgage constitutes a fund more than sufficient to pay their demands, the court may compel the prior encumbrancer to satisfy the execution; or, on a refusal, the mortgage having become forfeited, compel a foreclosure and satisfaction of the bond debt, so as to enable the judgment creditor to reach the surplus.

Or the court might, upon any unreasonable resistance to the claim of the execution creditor, or inequitable interposition for delay, and to hinder and defeat the execution, permit a sale of the rolling stock sufficient to satisfy it.

But if the whole of the property mortgaged is insufficient to satisfy the mortgage, any interference of the judgment creditors, with a view to the satisfaction of their debts, consistent with the superior equity of the bondholders, would work only inconvenience and harm to the latter, without any benefit to the former.

To permit one of the bondholders under a second mortgage to proceed at law in the collection of his debt upon execution, would disturb the pro rata distribution, and give him an inequitable preference, and prejudice the superior equity of the bondholders under the first mortgage, which possesses the prior lien.

Power under the charter to construct the road from Hudson to Millersburg, and consequently to borrow money and pledge the road for this purpose, is to be found in the charter.

Argued Jan. 31, 1860. Decided Feb. 20, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellee, mortgagee of the road of the Railroad Company, in trust for securing the payment of its bonds, to enjoin the execution of a judgment recovered at law against the Company by the appellants. The said court having entered a decree granting the injunction as prayed, the respondents took an appeal to this court.

NOTE.—The lien of a mortgage on after-acquired property.

At common law nothing can be mortgaged that does not belong to the mortgagor at the time when the mortgage is made. Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H., 484.

Where a railroad company executed a mortgage upon its road "constructed and to be constructed," &c., and real estate then owned, &c., or which should thereafter be owned by them, &c; held, that the mortgage embraced, and was a valid lien upon, all the property therein described, whether the same was then owned by the company or was acquired subsequently for the purpose of its railroad. Seymour v. Can. & Niagara Falls R. R. Co., 25 Barb., 284; S. C., 14 How. Pr., 531.

A railroad mortgage to secure bonds which provides that all subsequently acquired property shall, upon the acquisition thereof, become subject to the lien, and operation of the mortgage makes rails subsequently acquired for the use of the road a part of the security in equity, against persons buying them with knowledge of the facts or without parting with value for them. Weetjen v. St. Paul & Pac. R. R. Co., 4 Hun, 529.

A railroad mortgage as against the company and its privies, though given before the road is built, attaches thereto as fast as it is built, and to all property covered by its terms as fast as it comes into existence as property of the company. Galveston R. R. v. Cowdrey, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.), 459.

A railway mortgage expressed to cover after-acquired property, should not be allowed to overrule a lien given upon the purchase of such property for the price thereof. U. S. v. New Orleans R. R. Co., 79 U. S. (12 Wall.), 362.

A mortgage on a crop not sown, cannot at the time operate as a mortgage, but after the seed is sown and the crop grown, the mortgage lien attaches. Butt v. Ellett, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.), 544. Aff'g Ellett v. Butt, 1 Woods, 214.

A railroad mortgage covering all subsequently acquired property, was held to include a railroad and appurtenances afterwards leased by the mortgagors. Barnard v. Norwich, &c., R. R. Co., 14 Bank. Reg., 469.

A similar mortgage was held to include rolling stock; Pullan v. Cincinnati R. R. Co., 4 Biss., 35; and where they are named in mortgage, cars, engines and machinery in existence at time of foreclosure. Shaw v. Bill, 95 U. S., 10.

Where no rule of law is infringed, and the rights of third persons are not prejudiced, courts of equity will, in proper cases, give effect to mortgages of subsequently acquired property. Beall v. White, 94 U. S., 382.

Where a contract provides that cars furnished shall be property of person furnishing them, till paid for, his claim is prior to the lien of a mortgage covering after acquired property. Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235; Fosdick v. Car Co., 99 U. S., 256.

After acquired lands which cannot be regarded as accretions to the road itself, will not pass under a general mortgage of a railroad as parcel thereof. Calhoun v. Paducah, &c., R. R. Co., 9 Cent. L. J., 66; 8 Reporter, 395.

Lands subsequently acquired, and not essential to the operation of the road, do not pass by implication under such a mortgage. They should have been described with reasonable certainty to be included. Calhoun v. Paducah, &c., R. R. Co., supra.

Claims, for right of way acquired by a railroad after it has executed a mortgage, are subject to the prior rights of mortgagees. Baylis v. La Fayette, &c., R. R. Co., 8 Reporter, 579.

Mortgage of future additions to a stock of goods in a particular shop, is a valid mortgage of such goods as fast as they are put into the shop by the mortgagor. Brett v. Carter, 2 Low., 458.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Spaulding & Parsons and E. M. Stanton, for the appellants:

First. It is insisted, on the part of the appellants, that so much of the indenture made between the Akron branch of the Cleveland & Pittsburgh Railroad Company and George S. Coe, trustee, on the 1st day of April, 1852, as purports to put in pledge or mortgage "future acquisitions," is inoperative and void.

Yelverton v. Yelverton, Cro. Eliz., 401; 4 Com. Dig., 310, Grant, D; Mogg v. Baker, 3 Mees. & W., 195; Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met., 481; Moody v. Wright, 13 Met., 17; Otis v. Sill, 8 Barb., 102; Rose v. Bevan, 10 Md., 466.

Second. The indenture of April 1, 1852, is void for uncertainty as to the nature and extent of the grant.

It purports to convey "all the foregoing, present, and future to-be-acquired property of the said parties of the first part." "Dolus versatur in generalibus."

Doddington's case, 2 Co., 32.

"A grant shall be void if it be totally uncertain; as, if a man grant as many trees as can be spared in his manor."

4 Com. Dig., 317; Grant, E, 14.

In the case at bar it will appear that the grantors reserve to themselves the right to "sell, hypothecate or otherwise dispose of" any bonds or other property of the Company not necessary to be retained for their railroad, nor required for the construction or convenient use of their road.

Third. The indenture of April 1, 1852, so far as the same purports to be a mortgage of the personal property, is fraudulent and void as against judgment creditors, for the reason that it provides for a continuing possession in the hands of the mortgagors, with power to sell and dispose of the property at their own discretion.

Divver v. McLaughlin, 2 Wend., 596; Paget v. Perchard, 1 Esp., 205.

Fourth. The Railroad Company had no authority as a corporate body to make a railway from "Hudson to Millersburg," and as a necessary consequence, had no power to borrow money for that purpose. The charter only authorized the construction of a railroad from Hudson in Summit County, to Wooster, in Wayne County, or some other point in the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad between Massillon and Wooster.

See Ohio Local Laws, Vol. XLIX., p. 468.

"A right cannot be claimed by a corporation under ambiguous terms."

Justice McLean in Charles River Bridge case, 11 Pet., 559.

Fifth. The complainant does not show himself entitled to call upon a court of equity, "to stay the hand" of the judgment creditors of the Railroad Company.

When complainant has full and adequate remedy at law, equity will not interfere.

2 How., 383; 3 J. J. Marsh., 274; Waterman's Eden, Inj., 69.

Sixth. The appellants are judgment creditors of the R. R. Co., and are seeking satisfaction of their judgment by a proceeding at law. The equitable relations between them and other bondholders are not properly before the court for adjudication. The great question to be met and decided is this:

Can the rolling stock of a railroad company be seized and sold on execution?

Seventh. The Railroad Company had the possession and legal ownership of the chattels levied on, and a legal title and interest in them that might be sold on execution.

Mr. W. S. C. Otis, for appellees:

1. The Act of February 19, 1851, conferred upon such persons as may have subscribed to the stock of the Akron branch, the franchise of being and acting as a corporation, with power to construct a railroad within the limits specified within the said Act, to borrow money for such purpose, and to mortgage "all or any part of the said railroad, or of any other real or personal property belonging to said company, or of any portion of the tolls and revenue of said company which may thereafter accrue, for the purpose of raising money to construct said railroad, or to pay debts incurred in the construction thereof."

The counsel examined this Act at length, and cited the following authorities:

Ang. & Ames. Corp., secs. 76, 77, 78; Queen v. Poor Law Commissioner, 6 Adol. & E., 68; Gordon v. Preston, 1 Watts, 385; Union Bank v. Jacobs, 6 Humph., 515; Rex v. Lordale, 1 Burr., 447; Act regulating R. R. Cos., Feb. 11, 1848; Act to provide for the creation and regulation of incorporated companies within the State of Ohio, May 1, 1852.

2. The Act of February 19, 1851, conferred upon the Company power to construct their road south of the Ohio and Pennsylvania R. R., and to connect the same with any railroad running in the direction of Columbus.

See Bellville, &c., R. R. Co. v. Gregory, 15 Ill., 20.

3. Neither the right of way, road bed, superstructure, nor the machinery and cars upon the road for transportation, or the repair of the track, are subject to levy and sale upon judgment and execution, irrespective of the lien created by the mortgages to Coe.

This proposition, so far as it relates to the right of way, road bed and superstructure, will not be controverted. It rests upon too solid a foundation of reason and authority to admit it.

Tippets v. Walker, 4 Mass., 595. 597; Winchester and Lex. Turnpike Co. v. Vimont, 5 B. Mon., 1; Macon & Western R. R. Co. v. Parker, 9 Ga., 377; Ammant v. The New Alex. and Pittsburgh Turnpike Co., 13 S. & R , 210; Leedom v. The Plymouth R. R. Co., 5 Watts. & S., 265; The Susquehanna Can. Co. v. Bonham, 9 Watts. & S., 27; Seymour v. Milford & Chill. Turnp. Co., 10 O. R., 477.

An examination into the reasons of this exemption of the right of way, road bed and superstructure from levy and sale, will show that they extend to and embrace the machinery and cars upon the road, as well as the road itself.

4. The Legislature intended that the cars and machinery placed upon the road should become a part of it, by accession, in the same manner and to the same extent as buildings or other improvements annexed to land become a part of it, by accession.

Farrar v. Stackpole, 6 Me., 154; Voorhis v. Freeman, 2 Watts. & S., 116; Pyle v. Pennock, 2 Watts. & S., 390; Gray v. Holdship, 17 S. & R., 413; Heaton v. Findley, 12 Pa , 304; Winslow v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 4 Met.. 306, 314; Bishop v. Bishop, 11 N. Y., 123; Snedeker v. Warring, 12 N. Y., 170; Morgan v. Mason, 20 O. R., 401; Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. v. Hendrickson, 25 Barb., 484.

Not only the public convenience but public justice requires, that the machinery and cars upon the road should be exempt from levy and sale upon execution.

If the machinery and cars placed upon the road for the purpose of transportation and the repair of the track, became annexed to the road as a part of it under the charter of the Company, then, as accessions to the original subject of the mortgage to Coe, they would be covered by it, by the rule of the common law.

Pettingill v. Evans, 5 N. H., 54; Southworth v. Isham, 3 Sandf., 448; Holly v. Brown, 14 Conn., 251, 265.

The power to mortgage the future to be acquired tolls and revenues of the Company, carries with it, by necessary implication, the power to mortgage the future to-be-acquired equipment necessary to earn such tolls and revenues.

It is a fundamental principle, that when a right is expressly given to an individual or a corporation, all powers necessary to the enjoyment of the right are also given.

Leavitt v. Blatchford, 5 Barb., 9; Morgan v. Mason, 20 O. R., 401.

5. The mortgage to Coe is a lien upon the machinery and cars levied upon, though the same were not in existence at the time said mortgage was executed, and though the same did not become a part of the road by accession when placed upon it.

It is the general rule of the common law, that nothing can be mortgaged which is not in existence and does not belong to the mortgagor at the time the mortgage is executed.

Winslow v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 4 Met.. 306; Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met., 481; Lunn v. Thornton, 1 Mon., Gr. & S., 379; Otis v. Sill, 8 Barb., 102.

But these very authorities also establish the fact that this rule is founded solely upon a technicality.

The rule of the civil law is the very reverse of that of the common law in this particular.

1 Domat., Cush. ed., 649, art. 5; 650, art. 7.

There is, therefore, no inherent difficulty in making a mortgage which shall extend to after acquired property, or property not in esse. And courts of equity which are not trammeled by the technical rules of the common law in the administration of justice, both in England and in this country, uphold such mortgages in pursuance of the rule of the civil law, when necessary to carry into effect the honest and just contracts of parties, according to their real intentions.

On page 644 of the case of Mitchell v. Winslow, above cited, Judge Story states the rule to be, "that wherever the parties by their contract intended to create a positive lien or charge, either upon real or upon personal property, whether then owned by the assignor or contractor or not, or if personal property, whether it is then in being or not, it attaches in equity as a lien or charge upon the particular property, as soon as the assignor or contractor acquires a title thereto against the latter, and all persons asserting a claim thereto under him, either voluntarily or with notice, or in bankruptcy."

And the particular question raised in this case has been determined in the following cases:

It is sufficient in law, if the thing granted be so described that it can be distinguished from all other things of the same kind, even though resort must be had to extrinsic circumstances or parol proof to identify it.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio.

The bill was filed in the court below, by Coe, mortgagee of the road of the Railroad Company, in trust, for securing the payment of its bonds, to enjoin the execution of a judgment recovered at law against the Company, by Pennock and Hart, two of the defendants.

The facts of the case are these: the Cleveland, Zanesville and Cincinnati Railroad Co., created a body politic and corporate by the laws of Ohio, to make a railroad between certain termini in that State, in pursuance of authority conferred by law, issued bonds to the amount of $500,000, payable ten years from date, with interest at the rate of seven per cent., payable semi-annually, on the first day of April and October in each year, and, to secure the payment of the same, executed a mortgage of the railroad and its equipments to the complainant, in trust for the bondholders, the description of which is in the words following: "All the present and future to be acquired property of the parties of the first part; that is to say, their road, made or to be made, including the right of way, and the land occupied thereby, together with the superstructure and tracts thereon, and all rails and other materials used therein, or procured therefor, with the above described bonds, or the money obtained therefor, bridges, viaducts, culverts, fences, depots, grounds and buildings thereon, engines, tenders, cars, tools, machinery, materials, contracts, and all other personal property, right thereto, or interest therein, together with the tolls, rents, or income, to be had or levied therefrom, and all franchises, rights and privileges, of the parties of the first part, in, to, or concerning the same." At the time of the issuing of these bonds, and the execution of the mortgage, the railroad was in the course of construction, but only a small portion of it finished. It was constructed and equipped almost entirely by means of the funds raised from these bonds, together with a second issue to the amount of $700,000. The road cost upwards of $1,500,000. The stock subscribed and paid in amounted only to some $869,000.

The mortgage securing the payment of the second issue bears date the 1st of November, 1854, and was made to one George Mygatt, in trust for the bondholders, and the property described in and covered by it is the same as that described in the first mortgage. The road was finished to Millersburg, its present terminus south, in May, 1854, and the whole of the rolling stock was placed on it previous to the date of the second mortgage. This stock was purchased and placed on the road from time to time, as the locomotives and cars were needed in the progress of its construction.

The mortgage to the complainant contained a covenant on the part of the Company, that the money borrowed for the construction and equipment of the road should be faithfully applied to that object, and that the work should be carried on with due diligence until the same should be finished.

In case of default in the payment of the principal or interest of the bonds, the trustee was empowered to enter upon and take possession of the road, or, at the election of a moiety of the bondholders, to sell the same at public auction, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the bonds.

The defendants, Pennock and Hart, being the holders of sixteen of the bonds issued under the second mortgage, recovered a judgment on the same, May, 1856, against the Railroad Company, issued execution, and levied on a portion of the rolling stock of the road, and caused the same to be advertised for sale.

This bill was filed to enjoin the sale, and a decree was rendered perpetually enjoining it in the court below, which is now before us on appeal.

The first two grounds of objection taken to this decree may be considered together. They are: 1, that the mortgage to the trustee of the 1st April, 1852, is void or inoperative, as respects the locomotives and cars which were levied on under the execution of the defendants, inasmuch as they were not in existence at the date of it, but were constructed and placed on the road afterwards, being subsequently acquired property of the Company. And 2, that the mortgage is void, on the ground of uncertainty as to the property described or attempted to be described therein and conveyed to the mortgagee. The description begins by conveying "all the following present and future acquired property of the said parties of the first part;" and after specifying the road and the several parts of it, together with the rolling stock, there is added, "and all other personal property, right thereto, and interest therein." This clause, probably, from the connection in which it is found, was intended to refer to property appurtenant to the road, and employed in its operation, and which had not been enumerated; and if so, the better opinion, perhaps, is, that it would be bound by the mortgage even as against judgment creditors.

But it is unimportant to express any opinion upon the question, as the property in this case (the locomotives and cars) levied on are articles specifically enumerated; and the only uncertainty existing in respect to them arises out of their non-existence at the date of the mortgage. An uncertainty of this character need not be separately examined, as it will be resolved by a consideration of the first question, which is, whether or not the after acquired rolling stock of the Company placed upon the road attaches, in equity, to the mortgage, if within the description, from the time it is placed there, so as to protect it against the judgment creditors of the Railroad Company.

If we are at liberty to determine this question by the terms and clear intent of the agreement of the parties, it will be found a very plain one. The Company have agreed with the bondholders (for the mortgagee represents them), that if they will advance their money to build the road, and equip it, the road and equipments thus constructed, and as fast as constructed, shall be pledged as a security for the loan. This is the simple contract, when stripped of form and verbiage; and in order to carry out this intent most effectually, and with as little hazard as possible to the lender, the Company specially stipulate that the money thus borrowed shall be faithfully applied in the construction and equipment of the road. And in further fulfillment of the intent, the Company agree, that in case of default in the payment of principal or interest, the bondholders may enter upon and take possession of the road, and run it themselves, by their agents, applying the net proceeds to the payment of the debt.

The bondholders have fulfilled their part of the agreement—they have advanced the money on the faith of the security; the Company have also fulfilled theirs—they have made the road and equipped it; it has been partially in operation since January, 1852, and in operation upon the whole line since May, 1854. The road, therefore, as described in the mortgage, from Hudson to Millersburg, and which was in the course of construction at the date of the instrument, has been finished, and the rolling stock, locomotives, tenders and cars also described in it, and which were to be afterwards acquired, have been brought into existence, and placed upon it—all in conformity with the agreement of the parties; and the question is, whether there is any rule of law or principle of equity that denies effect to such an agreement.

The main argument urged against it is founded upon the maxim, that "a person cannot grant a thing which he has not:" ille non habet, non dat; and many authorities are referred to at law to prove the proposition, and many more might have been added from cases in equity, for equity no more than law can deny it. The thing itself is an impossibility. It may, at once, therefore, be admitted, whenever a party undertakes, by deed or mortgage, to grant property, real or personal, in presenti, which does not belong to him or has no existence, the deed or mortgage, as the case may be, is inoperative and void, and this either in a court of law or equity.

But the principle has no application to the case before us. The mortgage here does not undertake to grant, in presenti, property of the Company not belonging to them or not in existence at the date of it, but carefully distinguishes between present property and that to be afterwards acquired. Portions of the road had been acquired and finished, and were in operation, when the mortgage was given, upon which it is conceded it took effect; other portions were acquired afterwards, and especially the iron and other fixtures, besides the greater part of the rolling stock.

The terms of the grant or conveyance are: "all present and future to-be-acquired property of the parties of the first part;" that is to say, "their road, made or to be made, and all rails and other materials, &c., including iron rails and equipments, procured or to be procured," &c. We have no occasion, therefore, of calling in question, much less denying, the soundness of the maxim, so strongly urged against the effect of the mortgage upon the property in question, as its force and operation depend upon a different state of facts, and to which different principles are applicable. The inquiry here is, not whether a person can grant in presenti property not belonging to him, and not in existence, but whether the law will permit the grant or conveyance to take effect upon the property when it is brought into existence, and belongs to the grantor, in fulfillment of an express agreement, founded on a good and valuable consideration; and this, when no rule of law is infringed or rights of a third party prejudiced. The locomotives and cars were all placed upon the road as early as February, 1854, when, at the furthest, the mortgage attached to those in question, according to its terms, if at all, and the judgment of the defendants was not recovered till May, 1856.

We think it very clear, if the Company, after having received the money upon the bonds and given the mortgage security, had undertaken to divert the fund from the purpose to which it was devoted, namely: the construction of the road and its equipment, and upon which the security mainly depended, a court of equity would have interposed, and enforced a specific performance. One of the covenants was, that the money should be faithfully applied to the building and equipment of the road, or if, after the road was put in operation, the Company had undertaken to divert the rolling stock from the use of the road, a like interposition might have been invoked, and this in order to protect the security of the bondholders. And if a court of equity would thus have compelled a specific performance of the contract, we may certainly with confidence conclude that it would sanction the voluntary performance of it by the parties themselves, and give effect to the security as soon as the property is brought into existence.

The case of Langton v. Horton, 1 Hare, Ch., 549, supports this view. The mortgage security in that case was the assignment of the ship Foxhound, then on her voyage to the South seas, together with all and singular her masts, &c., "and all oil and head matter, and other cargo, which might be caught or brought home on the said ship, on and from her then present voyage." The cargo was levied on by a judgment creditor on the arrival of the ship at home. A bill was filed to have the mortgage declared a good and valid security for the money advanced, and that the complainants be entitled to the benefit of the security, in preference to the judgment creditor.

The Vice-Chancellor, in giving his opinion, observed: "Is it true that a subject to be acquired after the date of a contract cannot, in equity, be claimed by a purchaser for value under that contract?"

And, in answer to the question, he said: "It is impossible to doubt, for some purposes at least, that by contract an interest in a thing not in existence at the time of the contract may, in equity, become the property of the purchaser for value." And, after reviewing the cases in the books, he concludes: "I cannot, without going in opposition to many authorities which have been cited, throw any doubt upon the point that Bixnie, the contracting party, would be bound by the assignment to the plaintiffs."

There are many cases in this country confirming this doctrine, and which have led to the practice extensively of giving this sort of security, especially in railroad and other similar great and important enterprises of the day. 2 Seld., 179; 3 Green, Ch., 377; 32 N. H., 484; 25 Barb., 286; 25 Barb., 284; 18 B. Mon., 431; Redfield on Railways, 590, and note; 2 Story, 630; Tapfield v. Hillman, 7 Jur., 771.

In the case of Tapfield v. Hillman, Tindall, Ch. J., seems inclined to the opinion that, even at law, a mortgage security of future acquisitions might have effect given to it, if the terms indicated an intent to comprehend them.

The counsel for the appellee referred to the case of Chapman v. Weimer, 4 Ohio St., 481, as denying effect to a mortgage upon after acquired property. But that was a case at law; and even there the court held that the mortgage attached after the property was acquired, from the time the right was asserted by the mortgagee.

In conclusion upon this point, we are satisfied that the mortgage attached to the future acquisitions, as described in it, from the time they came into existence. As to the claim of the judgment creditors, there are several answers to it.

In the first place, the mortgage being a valid and effective security for the bondholders of prior date, they present the superior equity to have the property in question applied to the discharge of the bonds. It is true, if the property covered by the mortgage constituted a fund more than sufficient to pay their demands, the court might compel the prior incumbrancer to satisfy the execution, or, on a refusal, the mortgage having become forfeited, compel a foreclosure and satisfaction of the bond debt, so as to enable the judgment creditor to reach the surplus. Or the court might, upon any unreasonable resistance of the claim of the execution creditor, or inequitable interposition for delay, and to hinder and defeat the execution, permit a sale of the rolling stock sufficient to satisfy it. But no such ground has been presented, or could be sustained upon the facts before us. On the contrary, it cannot be denied but that the whole of the property mortgaged is insufficient to satisfy the bondholders under the first mortgage, much less when those under the second are included. To permit any interference, therefore, on the part of the judgment creditors, with a view to the satisfaction of their debt, consistent with the superior equity of the bondholders, would work only inconvenience and harm to the latter, without any benefit to the former. 3 Hare, Ch., 416; 9 Ga., 377; Redfield on Railw., 506; 5 Ohio St., 92.

In the second place, the judgment sought to be enforced by the defendants was recovered upon bonds of the second issue, and secured, in common with all the bonds of that issue, upon this property, by virtue of the second mortgage. These bondholders have a common interest in this security, and are all equally entitled to the benefit of it; and in case of a deficiency of the fund to satisfy the whole of the debt, in equity, a distribution is made among the holders pro rata. The payment of the bonds of the second issue are also postponed until satisfaction of the issue comprehended within the first mortgage, as the second was taken with a full knowledged of the first. To permit, therefore, one of the bondholders under the second mortgage to proceed at law in the collection of his debt upon execution, would not only disturb the pro rata distribution in case of a deficiency, and give him an inequitable preference over his associates, but also have the effect to prejudice the superior equity of the bondholders under the first mortgage, which possesses the prior lien.

As the judgment creditors can have no interest in the management or disposition of the property, except as bondholders, on account of the deficiency of the fund, it is unimportant to inquire whether or not the court was right in refusing a receiver, or to direct a sale of the road, with a view to a distribution of the proceeds. For aught that appears, the road has been managed, under its present directors, with prudence and fidelity, and to the satisfaction of the bondholders, the parties exclusively interested.

Another objection taken to the validity of the mortgage is, the want of power under the charter to construct the road from Hudson to Millersburg, and consequently to borrow money and pledge the road for this purpose. There is certainly some obscurity in the statutes creating this corporation as to the extent of the line of its road; but we agree with the court below, that, upon a reasonable interpretation of them, the power is to be found in their charter. They were authorized to construct the road from some convenient point on the Cleveland and Pittsburg road, in Hudson, Summit County, through Cuyahoga Falls, and Akron, to Wooster, or some point on the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad, between Massillon and Wooster, and to connect with said Ohio and Pennsylvania Road, and any other railroad running in the direction of Columbus. It was clearly not limited, in its southern terminus, to its connection with the Ohio and Pennsylvania road, for there is added, "and any other railroad running in the direction of Columbus." The extension of the road to the Ohio Central road at Zanesville, or at some other point on this road, comes fairly within the description.

We have not referred particularly to the authority of the Company, under the statute laws of Ohio, to borrow money and pledge the road for the security of the payment, as no such question is presented in the brief or was made on the argument. Indeed, the authority seems to be full and explicit.

ANN R. DERMOTT, Plff. in Er.,
v.
ZEPHENIAH JONES.

(See S. C., 23 How., 220-235.)

Contract, alterations in —time of performance—condition precedent—concurrent promises—averment not proved—acceptance—special contract—recoupment of damages.

Where a special contract for erection of buildings had been departed from in the course of its execution, by defendant insisting that alterations and additions should be made in the buildings after they were begun, contrary to the specifications of the contract, although it may have delayed their completion, yet it having been assented to by the plaintiff, without any stipulation that the time for the performance of the whole was to be delayed, it must be presumed to have been undertaken by the plaintiff to be done, as to time, according to the original contract.

A failure by the plaintiff to finish and deliver on the day agreed, is fatal to a recovery upon the special contract, where it was the intention of the parties that the performance of the work was to be a condition precedent to payment.

Whether contracts are dependent or independent, considered.

Where the agreements go to the whole of the considerations on both sides, the promises are dependent, and one of them is a condition precedent to the other.

Concurrent promises are those where the acts to be performed are simultaneous; and either party may sue the other for the breach of the contract, on showing, either that he was able, ready and willing to do his act at a proper time and in a proper way, or that he was prevented by the act or default of the other contracting party.

Where an installment was to be paid on an appointed day, if the work should then be finished, and the plaintiff avers that he had complied with the contract, and he gave no proof to sustain the averment: held, that the evidence entitled the defendant to a verdict on that count.

The acceptance of the buildings by the defendant as they had been constructed by the plaintiff, was not any relief of the plaintiff from his undertaking to finish them in the time specified in the contract.

While a special contract remains unperformed, the party whose part of it has not been done, cannot recover a compensation for what he had done, until the whole shall be completed.

Where something has been done under a special contract, but not in strict accordance with that contract, the party cannot recover the remuneration stipulated for in the contract.

Still, if the other party has derived any benefit from the labor done, the law implies a promise on his part to pay such a remuneration as the benefit conferred is really worth; and to recover it, an action of indebitatus assumpsit is maintainable.

In the trial of such an action, the defendant may be allowed a recoupment from the damages, claimed by the plaintiff, for such loss as he shall have sustained from the negligence of the plaintiff.

But such recoupment cannot be claimed unless the defendant shall file a definite statement of his claims, with notice of it to the plaintiff.

Argued Jan. 26, 1860. Decided Feb. 20, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

This was an action of debt, brought in the court below by the defendant in error to recover the second installment of $5,000, and for the value of certain extra work done and materials furnished under a certain contract.

The trial below resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A very full statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Robert J. Brent and John Prentiss Poe, for the plaintiff in error:

1st. The plaintiff in error will contend that the court below erred in receiving and filing the amended narratio, for the following reasons:

1. Because neither the said declaration nor any of the counts therein contained come within the terms and intent of the general leave and allowance of amendment granted by the court in this cause, under color of which they have been filed by the plaintiff.

2. Because the 3d and 4th counts are quite beyond the court's power, authority, and competency.

3d. The court below also erred in sustaining the demurrer of plaintiff to the defendant's 3d plea, and in overruling the demurrer filed by the defendant to the 2d count of amended narratio, and in rejecting the defendant's 5th prayer. The question here is, whether by the true construction of the contract declared upon, it was agreed between the parties that the finishing and completing the building on or before October 1st, 1851, was a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right of recovery for the installment sued for; the plaintiff in error maintaining that the day named was of the essence of the contract, and that a failure to complete upon that day was a breach fatal to the recovery upon the contract, and that there is nothing in the record to show a valid excuse for such failure, or waiver of her rights by plaintiff in error, which will authorize a judgment in this case against her. To decide this question, we must look at the contract itself, and decide "on the reason and sense of the thing, as it is to be collected from the whole contract."

2 Pars. Cont., 39; Ritchie v. Atkinson, 10 East, 295.

The words of the contract for payment are, "in consideration of the covenants," &c. These have always been held apt words to create a condition.

1 Tidd Pr., 442; Watchman v. Crook, 5 Gill & J., 258; Thorpe v. Thorpe, 1 Ld. Raym., 665; Acherley v. Vernon, Willes, 157.

Courts lean against construing covenants as independent.

Dakin v. Williams, 11 Wend., 67.

There can be no doubt that before the defendant in error could recover upon this contract for the 2d installment, it was incumbent upon him to aver and prove that he had finished and delivered over the buildings as required by the specifications This, it is believed, is not denied.

Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund., 320.

But it is said that though performance was necessary before an action would lie, yet performance on or before the 1st of October was not necessary to authorize a recovery upon the contract, inasmuch as the money was to be paid in installments, the first installment being due before the completion of the buildings. This, however, we deny, and sound reason and the weight of authority, it is submitted, fully establish that this is a condition precedent.

The case of Terry v. Duntze, 2. H. Bl., 389, though it has been several times followed, has been much oftener repudiated, and is not now regarded as an authority.

The next question is, whether the alleged departure of the plaintiff in error from the terms of the said agreement, and her requiring of the defendant in error to perform additional work and furnish additional materials, and the sinking in of the earth foundations under said buildings, were a sufficient excuse for his not completing the buildings by the time specified, which, as we have seen, was of the essence of the contract.

Now, if time is material, it can no more be dispensed with by parol than any other portion of the contract; and if, therefore, the defendant in error completed the work, but not in strict conformity to the requirements of the contract, he must show some better reason for such failure than extra work required. The alterations and suggestions made during the progress of the work were assented to by him, and amounted, therefore, to a new contract, not a performance of the old, or a sufficient obstacle to its performance. If the defendant in error agreed to do the extra work required without obtaining, as he might have done, an extension of the time for the stipulated original work, he undertook to do the work, as modified, within the stipulated time or to run the risk of so doing. The original contract remains in force in every point where not modified. The sinking of the earth foundations clearly is not a valid excuse for non-performance, for "the accident to excuse the not doing must not be only unavoidable, but must render the act physically impossible, and not merely unprofitable and inexpedient by reason of an increase of labor or cost."

Competent skill being implied, Jones was obliged to construct a building which was fit for use and occupation: and it is no defense that it was made according to the plan of the specifications.

It may next be inquired whether the acceptance by plaintiff in error, of the buildings six months after the time when they should have been delivered, was a waiver of the condition precedent as to performance within the time. Under the circumstances, no stress can be laid upon this acceptance. The plaintiff in error was obliged to accept the buildings, for they were upon her own land. The authorities are uniform and clear, that if a party seeking has not performed the work in exact accordance with the stipulations of the contract, and the failure has not been produced by the act of God or the wrongful conduct of the other party, and there has been no waiver, he is remitted to indebitatus assumpsit, upon a quantum meruit for his labor and a quantum valebant for his materials. Many of the cases do not even permit a recovery at all.

The demurrer of plaintiff in error to the 2d count of the amended narratio should also have been sustained, because the installment sued for is not recoverable in an action of debt, but if recoverable in any form of action, it should have been an action of covenant.

Debt will not lie on a sealed contract for any installment but the last, unless there is a penalty.

4th. The court below erred in refusing to allow the plaintiff in error to give evidence of the failure of the defendant in error to put up the granite front steps, with the view of recouping against his claim the damages occasioned by such failure.

Sickles v. Pattison, 14 Wend., 257.

Messrs. Bradley, Badger and Carlisle, for defendant in error:

1. As to the form of action.

It was contended below, that the sum of $5,000 demanded in the 1st and 2d counts was a mere installment of one entire debt, and that in such case there can be but one action of debt, and only after all the installments have fallen due. But so long ago as March v. Freeman, 3 Lev., 383, it was held, that where the nature of the case imported that the parties looked to distinct and several payments in view of the character of the consideration for the whole sum, there debt would lie for such several payments as they fall due.

See, also, Faw v. Marsteller, 2 Cranch, 10; Raborg v. Peyton, 2 Wheat., 385; Woods v. Russell, 5 Barn. & Ald., 942; Laidler v. Burlinson, 2 Mees. & W., 614; Cunningham v. Morrell, 10 Johns., 205.

The question as to whether these covenants are mutual and independent, or dependent, and whether the completion of the stores and warehouse by the 1st of October was a condition precedent to the payment of the money, depends upon the intention of the parties, to be derived from the contract itself, the subject matter, and the surrounding circumstances under which it was made.

The case of Terry v. Duntze, 2 H. Bl., 389, is in point, and if that case is law, there can be no doubt that this action is properly brought. It is said to have been overruled in 10 Johns., 203; 5 Gill & J., 254; 5 Wend., 496; 1 Seld., 257; 9 Mass., 78; 1 Cush., 279; 4 Conn., 4; 21 Vt.,

301; but the principle will be found fully supported in Heard v. Wadham, 1 East, 625, 631; Seers v. Fowler, 2 Johns., 272,387; Wilcox v. Ten Eyck, 5 Johns., 78; Gardiner v. Corson, 15 Mass., 500; Reab v. Moor, 19 Johns., 341; Webster v. Warren, 2 Wash. C. C., 456; see, also, P. W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Howard; 13 How., 338, 339.

The non-performance by the day does not go to the whole consideration of the contract, and therefore they are not dependent.

Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl., 273, note; 1 Wm. Saund., 320.

If the time of completing the stores and warehouse was material, and he was delayed by the defendant beyond the 1st of October, she cannot avail herself of that delay.

Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 1 Pet., 467; Fannen v. Beauford, 1 Bay, 237; Clendennen v. Paulsel, 8 Mo., 230.

And in such case performance need not be averred.

Marshall v. Craig, 1 Bibb, 379; Couch v. Ingersoll, 2 Pick., 292.

And if averred, proof of such acts will support the averment.

Farnham v. Ross, 2 Hall, 167.

2. Under this point the counsel first examined the exceptions to the evidence, and then the prayers of defendant for instructions.

The 2d prayer for instruction contains the proposition that the plaintiff could not recover upon the 1st count, unless the jury should find that in point of fact the stores and warehouse were delivered on the 1st of October.

The 5th prayer contains the proposition that if the plaintiff, Jones, had constructed the stores and warehouse "in strict conformity to the specifications made a part of said contract," yet, nevertheless, he was bound for the defects, if any, which were occasioned by such "conformity," if in fact the stores and warehouse were not delivered fit for occupation on the 1st of October.

Both these propositions, it is submitted, are untenable. The first goes to the root of the 1st count.

It assumes that the time was of the essence of the contract.

It will be observed that the time is laid in this count under a scilicet. This would not vary the case if the time were material, but if the time had been stated without the videlicit, it might have been held necessary to prove it as laid, although otherwise immaterial. The materiality cannot consist in the precise day in this case, so that a delivery on the morning of the next day would not support the action; nor if delivery on the stipulated day and a single brick and unlaid, or a single nail undriven, would the action be defeated. The language "the said stores and warehouse being then finished, &c.," shows that the meaning was, that if they were not done on that day, the money should not be due then; but if done within a reasonable time thereafter, the money should then be due. But above all, the evidence shows that a strict compliance was prevented by the defendant. She was "the cause wherefore the condition could not be performed, and therefore shall never take advantage for non-performance thereof."

Co. Litt., 206, B.

3. We contend that even if there be error as to the 1st count, the 2d count is good. It is in accordance with the rules, that the execution of the work being a condition precedent to the right to demand the money, the plaintiff must show either, first, a performance; or second, an offer to perform rejected by the defendant; or third, his readiness, until the defendant discharged him or prevented the execution of the matter to be performed.

Chit. Cont., 737, 7th Am. ed; 1 Chit. Pl., 326, 367, ed. 1851.

The secound count avers performance in reasonable time and acceptance by the defendant.

This is admitted by the demurrer, and is also proved.

See Van Buren v. Digges, 11 How., 470.

The count was in debt for a sum certain. It was confessed by the demurrer and left nothing uncertain; but the right of the plaintiff below appeared thereon with judicial certainty.

Judgment should be given here, according to the right as it appears upon the whole record.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

This record shows that the plaintiff and the defendant entered into a building contract, under seal with specifications annexed, on the 22d April, 1851. It was agreed between them, that Jones, the plaintiff, should do, in a good, substantial and workmanlike manner, the houses, buildings, and work of every sort and kind described in a schedule annexed to the contract, of which it was a part; that he should procure and supply all the materials, implements and fixtures, requisite for executing the work in all its parts and details; and that the stores fronting on Market Space, and the warehouse on Seventh Street, should be finished and ready for use and occupation, and be delivered over to the defendant, on the first day of October after the date of the contract, and all the rest of the work on the first day of December afterward. The defendant agreed, upon her part, to pay the plaintiff for the peformance of the work, and for the materials furnished, $24,000 by installments: $5,000 on the 1st day of July, 1851; $5,000 on the 1st day of October following; it being expressed in their contract, that the stores and warehouse were then to be delivered to the defendant ready for use and occupation; and that the residue of the $24,000 was to be paid to the plaintiff on the 1st day of January, 1860, with interest upon $4,000 of it from the 1st day of May, 1851, and with interest on $10,000 from the 1st day of December, 1851. We do not deem it necessary to notice the other covenants of the contract, as they have no bearing upon the case as we shall treat it.

The suit, as originally brought, is an action of debt for the recovery from the defendant of the second installment of $5,000, and for the value of certain extra work done and materials furnished by the plaintiff for the defendant's use. The original declaration contains four counts: first, charges the defendant in the sum of $5,000 for work and labor done, and materials furnished and used by her in the erection and finishing certain stores and buildings in the City of Washington; second, for a like sum paid by the plaintiff for the defendant; third, for a like sum had and received; and fourth, for a like sum sum paid, laid out, and expended by the plaintiff for defendant at her request. The defendant pleaded to the declaration four pleas: first, that she was not indebted as alleged; second, a special plea setting out in detail a contract under seal, with the plaintiff, for the erection of such buildings as are mentioned in it, and for the completion of them—protesting that the plaintiff had not complied with the terms of the same, and declaring that the sum of $5,000 claimed by the plaintiff was the second installment, which, by the contract, was to be due and payable to the plaintiff on the 1st day of October, 1851, and denying that the buildings were done by that day, or that any claim for the $5,000 had accrued before the bringing of the suit, by reason of any contract or agreement different from the special contract, or for any consideration other than the $5,000 claimed in the declaration. In the third plea, the identity of the sum sued for with the second installment is reaffirmed, payable on the 1st of October, 1851, upon condition that the buildings and stores should be completed and ready for use by that day—averring performance on her part of the conditions and covenants of the contract, and non performance on the part of the plaintiff, especially his failure to complete and have ready for use the warehouse and stores by the time specified. The fourth plea refers to the special contract, avers performance on her part, nonperformance on the part of the plaintiff, and especially, that he had not finished and completed the buildings and stores by the day specified in the contract, or at any time, either before or after that day. At this point of the pleading the plaintiff applied to be permitted to amend his declaration, and added to it four counts. The first sets out in detail the special contract referred to in the defendant's second, third and fourth pleas; avers performance generally, on his part, and non-peformance on the part of the defendant. The second count is the same as the first, down to the averment of performance by plaintiff inclusive, and then it avers that the defendant departed from the stipulations of the contract, and required the plaintiff to do additional work, and to furnish additional materials, whereby the defendant delayed the plaintiff, and prevented him from completing the buildings by the time agreed, which the plaintiff would otherwise have done. It is then averred, that notwithstanding the additional labor, the plaintiff had completed the work in a reasonable time after the 1st day of October, 1851, to wit: on the 4th of December following, and that the defendant then accepted the same, whereby the second installment of $5,000 became payable. The third count is substantially a repetition of the original declaration, and the fourth claims $10,000 for work and labor done, and for a like sum laid out by the plaintiff for the defendant, from all of which his right of action had accrued before it was instituted.

The defendant filed three pleas to the first count of the amended declaration: 1st, that she was not indebted as was alleged; 2d, that the plaintiff had not performed the special agreement; and 3d, that he had not performed the condition precedent of the contract, to complete the building, which he had agreed to do by the 1st day of Ocober, 1851. To the rest of the count the defendant demurred. As the verdict of the jury and the judgment rendered for the plaintiff are upon the first amended count, contrary to instructions asked of the court by the defendant, we shall not notice the subsequent pleadings and proceedings in the case, and will confine ourselves to what we consider to have been the legal rights of the parties under the original declaration and the first amended count. The evidence shows that the three stores and the warehouse were not finished by the 1st of October, 1851. It is also proved that the special contract had been departed from in the course of its execution; that the defendant insisted that alterations and additions should be made in the buildings after they were begun, contrary to the specifications of the special contract, and that the plaintiff had yielded to her requirements. It may have delayed the completion of the stores and warehouse, as it increased the work to be done; but it having been assented to by the plaintiff without any stipulation that the time for performance of the whole was to be delayed, it must be presumed to have been undertaken by the plaintiff to be done, as to time, according to the original contract. The sinking of the wall probably caused the delay, but that cannot give to the plaintiff any exemption from his obligation to finish the stores and warehouse on the 1st of October, without further proof as to the cause of it; nor could it, in any event, entitle him to an instruction from the court that he might recover under a count or a special contract, in which he avers that the work had been completed by him on the 1st of October in conformity with it. The defendant in the court below, plaintiff in error here, to maintain the issues on her part, and to reduce the damages claimed by the plaintiff, introduced witnesses to show that the work, though it had been done, had not been so in a skillful and workmanlike manner, and that the materials used for it were of an inferior kind, especially in the construction of the store wall, and that it was so deficient in other particulars, that she had been put to a large expense to make the buildings fit for use and occupation, which amounted to $10,000. The plaintiff gave rebutting testimony, and then the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that if the three stores and warehouse were not finished fit for use and occupation, and delivered to her on the 1st of October, 1851, but were at the time when they were delivered wholly unfit and unsafe for occupation, with the walls of some of them sunken out of plumb, and cracked, and in danger of falling, so as to be utterly untenantable, then the plaintiff was not entitled to demand and recover in this order the said sum of $5,000, as the stipulated installments which the special contract purports to make payable on the 1st October, 1851, but that the plaintiff was entitled to recover only the value of his work, after deducting the cost and expense incurred by the defendant in repairing the stores and warehouse, to render them fit for occupation, but that the plaintiff, as claimant, was entitled only to nominal damages.

Also, if the defendant did not, at any time whatever, execute and finish, ready for use and occupation, and deliver in that state and condition to the defendant, the stores and warehouse, but had delivered them over to the defendant in a state wholly unsafe and unfit for use, and untenantable, &c., &c., and that the defendant had been obliged to reconstruct the walls, and to refix the buildings, so as to fit them for use and occupation, at her own costs and charges, then that the defendant may recoup or deduct the same against the plaintiff's claim for the said installment of $5,000 claimed in the suit, or the value of the work done by the plaintiff upon the stores and warehouse; but that, in all events, the plaintiff could only recover nominal damages.

These instructions the court refused to give, without the following qualifications:

"If the jury shall find from the evidence that the plaintiff, Jones, has executed the work according to the specifications forming a part of the contract, in a skillful, diligent, and careful and workmanlike manner, and that his performance of it was with the knowledge and approbation of the defendant, then they should find for the plaintiff the said sum of $5,000, with interest from the date of the delivery of the stores and warehouse to the defendant."

The defendant excepted to the refusal of the instructions as they had been prayed for, and to the qualifications of them as they were given to the jury

There is error in this instruction. The count and the plea of the defendant, and the instruction asked, raised the construction of the special contract, whether or not the right of the plaintiff to recover the second installment did not depend upon the completion of the stores and warehouse by the 1st of October, 1851; whether that was not a condition precedent, or a case in which the parties had agreed —one to deliver the buildings finished, according to the special contract, and the other to pay the second installment concurrently, if they were then so delivered. A failure by the plaintiff to finish and deliver on that day is fatal to a recovery upon the special contract. The plaintiff in the first amended count declares upon it as such, avers his performance accordingly, and the proof is that he had not so performed. We infer, from the whole contract, that it was the intention of the parties that the performance of the work was to be a condition precedent to the payment of the second installment. There is no word in the contract to make that doubtful.

The plaintiff undertook to furnish the materials and to construct the buildings, according to specifications. Part of them were to be finished, and to be delivered to the defendant, on the 1st of October, 1851, and the residue on the 1st December afterwards. For the whole, the defendant was to pay $24,000—$5,000 on the 1st of July, 1851; $5,000 on the 1st of October, 1851, if the stores and warehouse were then finished for use and occupation, and delivered over on that day to the defendant; and if that was done, then the balance of the $24,000 was to be paid on the 1st of January, 1860, with interest, as mentioned in the special contract.

The words of the contract for payment are, "in consideration of the covenants, and their due performance." Such words import a condition. It is difficult at all times to distinguish whether contracts are dependent or independent; but there are rules collected from judicial decisions, by which it may be determined. We have tested the correctness of them by an examination of several authorities.

"When the agreements go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, the promises are dependent, and one of them is a condition precedent to the other." Such is the case with the special contract with which we are now dealing. "If the agreements go to a part only of the consideration on both sides, the promises are so far independent. If money is to be paid on a day certain, in consideration of a thing to be performed at an earlier day, the performance of that thing is a condition precedent to the payment; and if money is to be paid by installments, some before a thing shall be done and some when it is done, the doing of the thing is not a condition precedent to the former payments, but is so to the latter. And if there be a day for the payment of money, and that comes before the day for the doing of the thing, or before the time when the thing from its nature can be performed, then the payment is obligatory, and an action may be brought for it, independently of the act to be done. Concurrent promises are those where the acts to be performed are simultaneous; and either party may sue the other for a breach of the contract, on showing, either that he was able, ready and willing to do his act at a proper time and in a proper way, or that he was prevented by the act or default of the other contracting party." 2 Pars. Cont. ch. 3, 189.

The first installment was to be paid on an appointed day, in consideration of the work to be begun; and the second installment was to be paid on a subsequent day, if the work should then be finished and delivered over to the defendant, ready and fit for use and occupation. Before that day it could not have been demanded; on that day, the work having been performed, it might have been. The evidence shows that the work had not been done on the 1st of October, 1851, and was not finished until the 1st of December.

The plaintiff avers in his first amended count that he had, on his part, complied with his undertaking in the special contract. The issue upon it is, that he had not done so, and he gave no proof to sustain the averment.

The evidence entitled the defendant to a verdict on that count; but the court, without regard to the time fixed upon for the work to be finished, instructed the jury, that if the work had been done according to the specifications forming a part of the contract, in a skillful and workmanlike manner, or if his execution of it was with the knowledge and approbation of the defendant, then they were to find for the plaintiff the sum of $5,000, with interest from the date of the delivery of the stores and warehouse. It must be obvious that this instruction makes between the parties a different contract from that into which they had entered, and one different from that the plaintiff had declared upon.

The plaintiff gave no evidence to support the count; but there was evidence showing the reverse of performance on his part. For this error in the court's instruction to the jury upon the first amendment count, we shall remand the case for another trial upon the plaintiff's original declaration in debt with the common counts, as in indebitatus assumpsit.

We do not consider that the plaintiff's right to recover upon that declaration was in any way affected by the extra work which was done upon the requisition of the defendant, or by the increase of materials which he furnished for that purpose; or that the sinking of the foundation of the buildings excused him from finishing the work by the time specified; or that the acceptance of the buildings by the defendant as they had been constructed by the plaintiff was any release of the plaintiff from his undertaking to finish them in the time specified in the contract. But after that time had passed, the plaintiff continued, with the knowledge and permission of the defendant, and also with the knowledge of her superintending architect, to do the work specified in the contract, and also to do the extra work, and to furnish the materials necessary for both. And when the work was done by the plaintiff, however imperfectly that may have been, the defendant accepted it.

The law in such a case implies, that the work done and the materials furnished were to be paid for. The general rule of law is, that while a special contract remains open—that is, unperformed—the party whose part of it has not not been done cannot sue in indebitatus assumpsit to recover a compensation for what he has done, until the whole shall be completed. This principle is affirmed and acted upon in Cutter v. Powell, 6 T. R., 320; also in Hulle v. Heightman, 2 East, 245, and in several other cases.

But the exceptions from that rule are in cases in which something has been done under a special contract, but not in strict accordance with that contract. In such a case, the party cannot recover the remuneration stipulated for in the contract, because he has not done that which was to be the consideration of it. Still, if the other party has derived any benefit from the labor done, it would be unjust to allow him to retain that without paying anything. The law, therefore, implies a promise on his part to pay such a remuneration as the benefit conferred is really worth; and to recover it, an action of indebitatus assumpsit is maintainable.

Such is the law now in England and in the United States, notwithstanding many cases are to be found in the reports of both countries at variance with it. It was recognized by this court to be the existing rule in the case of Slater v. Emerson, 19 How., 224, 239.

The difference between the rule now and in earlier times, it is believed, has caused much of the difficulty in the establishment of the present rule. Formerly it was held, that whenever anything was done under a special contract not in conformity with it, the party for whom it was done was obliged to pay the stipulated price; but that he might resort to a cross action, to indemnify himself for the deficiency in the consideration. Blair v. Davis, 1794, cited in 7 East, 470. See Smith's L. cases, in the notes following the case of Cutter v. Powell, 2d. vol., for a full description, historical and chronological, of the rule as it now prevails and as it formerly was.

The rule, as it now exists, has been recently discussed and affirmed in the Queen's Bench, in the case of Munro v. Phelps, 8 El. & B., 789; 92 Eng. C. L.

It has been the rule in the courts of New York for more than thirty years. In the case of Jewell v. Schroeppel, 4 Cow., 564, it was decided, that if there be a special contract under seal to do work, and it be not done pursuant to the agreement, whether in point of time or in other respects, the party who did the work may recover upon the common counts in assumpsit, for work and labor done. If, when the time arrives for performance, the party goes on to complete the work, with the knowledge of his employer, it was evidence of a promise to pay for the work. So if the employer does not object.

This rule prevails, also, in Massachusetts, in Pennsylvania, and in several of the other States. Also in Alabama, as may be seen in the case of McVoy v. Wheeler, 6 Port., 201. It is discussed, with a very accurate discrimination of its application, in the 2d vol. of Professor Parsons upon Contracts.

In the trial of such an action, where the defense is not presented as a matter of set-off, arising on an independent contract, but for the purpose of reducing the plaintiff's damages, because he had not complied with his cross obligations arising on the same contract, the defendant may be allowed a recoupment from the damages claimed by the plaintiff for such loss as she shall have sustained from the negligence of the plaintiff. Such evidence is allowed to prevent circuity of action, and to prevent further litigation upon the same matter. It may be well to say, that the court allowed a recoupment in Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat., 1, to a disseisor, who was a bona fide occupant of land, for the improvemement made by him upon it, against the plaintiff's damages. But such recoupment cannot be claimed unless the defendant shall file a definite statement of his claims, with notice of it to the plaintiff, sufficiently in time before the trial term of the case to enable the latter to meet the matter with proof on his side.

We have pursued the case in hand further than may have been necessary, but it was thought best to do so, as the points now here ruled have not before been expressly under the consideration of this court.

The judgment given in the court below is reversed; and we shall order that the case shall be remanded to it, with directions for its trial again, pursuant to our rulings in this opinion.

THE UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
JOHN ROSE AND GEORGE KINLOCK.
(See S. C., 23 How., 262-273.)

Sutter's general title—Colonization Laws of 1824 and 1828—title, when protected by treaty with U. S.

The "general title of Sutter" was considered by the court at its last term, and its operation declared in the cases of The U. S. v. Nye and The U. S. v. Bassett, reported in 62 U. S. (21 How.), 408, 412.

The authority of Micheltorena to distribute the lands of the Department is found in the Colonization Laws of 1824 and 1828.

The claims under "the general title of Sutter" exhibit a wide divergence from the essential rules prescribed in the Colonization Laws. They are not valid claims under the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo.

Every species of title that originated in the rightful exercise of legitimate authority, and existed under the safeguard of Mexican laws at the date of the acquisition of California by the United States, is protected by the Treaty of Cession.

But it is the duty of the court to distinguish between rights acquired under the laws and usages of Mexico, and claims depending upon the mere pleasure of those who were in power.

Argued Feb. 7, 1860. Decided Feb. 20, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose on a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by the appellees, for the confirmation to them of a claim to six square leagues of land.

The Board of Land Commissioners entered a decree confirming the claim.

The district court, on appeal, having affirmed this decree, the United States took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., E. M. Stanton and H. S. Foote, for appellants.

Messrs. J. J. Crittenden, J. P. Benjamin and R. Johnson, for appellees:

The claim is founded on what is known in California and to this court as the "General Title," granted by Governor Micheltorena.

The reason for making this title general—that is, to a described class instead of to individuals—is stated on the face of the grant, namely: that because of other occupations the government had not then time to make grants severally and to each individual entitled thereto.

John Smith was one of the class entitled under the general grant of Dec. 22, 1844. It is proved that before that date in the year 1844, he had presented to the governor, Micheltorena, his petition with a map or diseno, for the six leagues of land in question—called or marked on the map, "Rancho de Yuba."

Smith was put in possession by Sutter, and within twelve months after date of the "General Title," he was in the occupation of the land, "made improvements and built an adobe house, and had upon the said land about four hundred head of cattle, with some horses."

Bidwell's testimony is, that Smith settled on the land in the fall of 1844, or early in 1845, and continued to live on it until he sold, in 1848. He had previously lived on adjoining land, which he had purchased of Sutter. Smith's petition for the land in question, and the favorable report thereon by Sutter, were made to the governor in September, 1844, and in that year, according to his own testimony, he not only made improvements, but "had about six hundred cattle and a few horses on this land." He was a Canadian by birth, was naturalized as a Mexican, and had been in California since 1835.

It does not appear that he was ever engaged in the military service, or that the grant was made to him otherwise than in the due administration of the Colonization Laws of Mexico.

It is contended, on the part of the appellees, that these latter circumstances distinguish their case from the cases of Nye and Bassett, decided by this court at the last term, and reported in 62 U. S. (21 How.), 408, et seq; and further, it is also most respectfully urged, that those cases were erroneously decided and ought not to be followed.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees were confirmed in a tract of land in Yuba County, California, containing six square leagues, bounded north by the Yuba River, west by the eastern line of Captain Sutter's land, south of Johnson's rancho, and easterly for quantity.

The original claimant is John Smith. He was examined as a witness and testifies that he was a naturalized citizen of Mexico. That in September, 1844, he petitioned the Governor of California for the land and obtained a favorable report from Captain Sutter, and in 1845 received from the latter a copy of the "general title," which the governor had authorized him to give. Then in 1844 he built a house upon the land, planted an orchard of fruit trees, and in that and the following year inclosed a field by ditches, and cultivated it, and that he had there a stock of cattle. He says he resided on the land until 1848, when he sold it to persons under whom the claimants derive their claim.

To account for the non-production of any documentary evidence, he says that the petition and report, with a copy of the general title, were lost in the Sacramento River in 1845; that subsequently he obtained another copy, and this, with his naturalization papers, was sent to Monterey, to be laid before the Departmental Assembly, but they were never returned to him. Bidwell testifies that he prepared a petition for Smith to Sutter, representing the loss of his papers, and asking for another copy of the title, and that Sutter admitted the claim. He testifies that Smith cultivated the land.

The two depositions of Sutter show that he recognized the claim of Smith to have the benefit of the general title, and that he gave him copies as stated by other witnesses. Other testimony in the record disproves the statements of those witnesses in reference to the improvement of the land, and shows satisfactorily that they were made on a different tract of land, and in no connection with this claim.

The "general title of Sutter" was considered by the court at its last term, and its operation declared in the cases of U. S. v. Nye, 21 How., 408, and U. S. v. Bassett, 21 How., 412. The opinion of the court in those cases has been examined in the argument at the bar, and has been re-examined by the court.

The testimony of Sutter in the case of Nye was, that the general title was inclosed to him in a letter by Micheltorena, the governor, by his request. That the governor was blockaded at Monterey, and was in need of military aid, the general title was sent to him upon his advice. That he executed the trust conferred upon him, by giving copies of the title to those "who had rendered meritorious service to the country, and who applied to him." The general title was issued before his men marched from New Helvetia to join Micheltorena, and, in some cases, copies were given before and some after his return from the expedition, "but only to such as he thought deserved it." Governor Micheltorena made a speech to the soldiers, and promised to deliver grants to all "whom he should recommend," "referring as well to those to whom copies had been delivered as to those to whom he should deliver them."

In the cases of U. S. v. Nye and U. S. v. Bassett, it was proved that the claimants were soldiers in the war of Micheltorena, and had taken possession of the land within their claim under a temporary license from the governor. There is no evidence of the kind in this case. The statement of facts in this testimony, and the inferences drawn from it by the court, are corroborated by public documents existing in the archives of California. These show, that in the autumn of 1844 there was an insurrection against the authority of Micheltorena, which terminated in a compact signed at Santa Teresa, the 1st December of that year, by the contending chiefs. Micheltorena agreed to disband and send away a battalion of infantry (presidiarios), "with some vicious officers," within three months, and should himself retire to Monterey; that the headquarters of the opposing forces should be at San Jose, and that their expenses should be charged to the department. In that month, both parties recommenced preparations for renewing hostilities. On the 24th of December, Alvarado asked Sutter for explanations "in relation to the assembling of men" at his fort, and charged him with the design of "invading the Californians."

He transmitted to Micheltorena a copy of this letter, and arraigned Sutter "for preparing to attack the forces of the north, under the pretext of placing himself in the defense of Micheltorena's government, claiming to have relations with him for this purpose." He says: "Considering the movement of Sutter and his conduct as an arbitrary act of his own, unauthorized by the government, and knowing positively that he is organizing a force, composed of adventurers and Indians, to attack this garrison I assure Your Excellency that I am in a condition to make a defense, and to attack him as soon as he marches against this place, to carry out his dark designs."

On the 28th December, Micheltorena replied to a letter from Sutter, in which he says: "I approve in its whole what you say to me in your last. What you may do, I approve: what you may promise I will fulfill; what you may spend, I will pay. * * * The country calls for our services; our personal security requires it, and the government will know how to recompense all. * * * If you have not left, owing to some event, without the necessity of a new order, when you learn that I am moving from Monterey to San Juan, you will move at once; for I will have well calculated the time to act against them."

On the 12th January, 1845, he addressed a letter to an officer, in which he says: "All which is said to you under this date by Senor Don Sutter, who is now, with arms in hand, defending the rights of the nation, and, supporting the Departmental Government that I exercise, will be duly obeyed by you."

Sutter, under these orders, reached Santa Barbara in the early part of February, with two companies, and placed them under the command of Micheltorena.

On the other hand, Alvarado and Castro, in January, 1845, denounced the governor to the Departmental Assembly, "that he appointed as commander of armed adventurers the same Sutter, of whom there is sufficient evidence that he seeks to possess himself of the department, attacking the national integrity; a proof that the country is in danger; and the presumption is, that Governor Micheltorena does not deserve the public confidence." They arraign him, because he had called "to promote civil war in the country the foreigner (Sutter), accused before the Supreme Government of the country as a conspirator against the national integrity, and because united to more than one hundred adventurous hunters, proceeding from the United States, without more fortune than the muzzles of their rifles, he has increased his files, and causing devastation," &c., &c. They asserted to the Departmental Assembly, as the only legal authority which they and their party recognized, "that General Micheltorena is a traitor to his country, and as such he ought to be presented to the tribunals of the Republic, to be judged in accordance with the laws. 2d. That the Assembly should, in the interim, regulate all the branches of the administration. 3d. That they should transmit the charges against the Governor of Mexico, by a commission, and ask that the government of the department may be committed to its natives and residents, of sufficient capacity and knowledge for its management.

This communication was referred to a committee of the Assembly, who reported that the governor had repudiated the compact of Santa Teresa, and prepared himself to chastise those who had demanded its conditions; that his connection with Sutter was dangerous to the safety of the department, and had deprived him of the support of the citizens, "for there is not a single individual therein," they say, "who, at seeing Don John Auguste Sutter commence a campaign in California, that does not remember that this gentleman has expressed his fatal design of subduing the country."

On the 15th February, the Departmental Assembly disavowed the authority of the governor, pronounced his office vacant, and called upon Pio Pico, the first member of the Assembly, to take charge of the Departmental Government in the interim.

On the 22d February, 1845, a Treaty was concluded between the commissioners of the Assembly and of the governor, which was sanctioned by the respective chiefs, in which it was stipulated "that, from this date, the political command of the department is delivered to the first member of the most excellent Departmental Assembly, because it was so disposed by said body, agreeably to the laws; for which purpose, His Excellency, General Micheltorena, will deliver a circular order in the hands of the chief of the division of the opponents, that the same be published throughout the limits of the department."

It is acknowledged that the governor "could no longer contend, with his small forces and scanty resources, against the general outbreak of the country;" and therefore he obligates himself to march to San Pedro, thence to be conveyed to Monterey, and thence to some port in the Republic of Mexico.

Sutter remained a prisioner in the hands of his enemies. On the 26th of the month (February), he addressed a letter to Pio Pico, as governor, in which he speaks of his detention in the city, and attributes it to his connections with Micheltorena. He refers to his relations and duties as an officer, protests that he was ignorant, and deceived as to the cause of the insurrection against Micheltorena, and that he was then convinced of his delusion, and repented of his credulity. He promises obedience to the authorities, offers to place his fort at the disposal of the government, and prays for his release. It does not appear that he was able to return home until the 1st of April, about which time Micheltorena sailed from Monterey.

Pio Pico remained in charge of the government, as senior member of the Assembly, until the 15th day of April, 1846, when he was installed as constitutional governor of the department, pursuant to an appointment made in consequence of the memorial of the Assembly on the 27th of June of the previous year.

We have entered into this minute statement of the relations of Sutter to the authorities of Mexico, and especially those in the Department of California, in order to estimate with exactness the import of his acts, under the power conferred by Micheltorena, and how far they imposed an obligation upon the public faith of those governments, and upon this government, as their successor.

The authority of Micheltorena to distribute the lands of the department arises in the Colonization Laws of 1824 and 1828. The object of those laws was to secure for the Republic a population composed of industrious, obedient and loyal citizens who might contribute to its strength and prosperity.

In the distribution of the public domain for this purpose, the political chief was directed to inform himself particularly of the circumstances and condition of every applicant for land; and that his power of selection should not be inconsiderately or corruptly used, he was required to preserve a record of his acts of administration, and to submit reports to the Departmental Assembly and the Supreme Government the approval of one or the other being necessary for their definitive validity.

The claims presented to the Land Commission of the United States in California, and to this court on appeal by the claimants, under the "general title of Sutter," exhibit a wide divergence from the essential rules prescribed in the Colonization Laws. The petition is not preserved in the archives, but was retained by the applicant. The governor declined to act, until he could examine the country of which the colonization is proposed. In the absence of the petition, and without the desired information, under a "supreme pressure of business," he decides suddenly to send to a subordinate and suspected officer the authority to determine the most serious question of administration confided to his care—that of selecting persons who should own and occupy the soil of the department. He does not preserve a record of this act, nor a copy of the paper he issues, nor did he present it to the Departmental Assembly for its ratification.

We are compelled to seek an explanation of this anomalous exercise of authority, and to examine the conditions attached to this unusal mode of administration; to inquire of the relation which the proposed objects of the favor occupied and were to occupy to the department and its authorities, and the consequences contemplated by the governor and his agent to ensue from their use of this title, to ascertain its signification. We have no doubt that the court may employ this medium of proof for this purpose.

We learn that the Treaty concluded at Santa Teresa was an armistice merely, and that Micheltorena, immediately after, concluded to use the agency and influence of Sutter to punish his enemies and sustain his power; and, to increase that influence, issued this "general title." Their alliance was regarded by the Departmental Assembly as treasonable, and justifying the deposition and expulsion of the governor from the department. Sutter became their prisoner, and was compelled to renounce his connection with his chief to make his peace. His companies were regarded as public enemies, and were disbanded and dispersed. The Supreme Government acquiesced in the decisions of the Assembly, and recognized and commissioned the governor of their appointment.

No indemnity was granted to the adherents of Micheltorena, nor provision made for the fulfillment of his promises to them; nor have we discovered an instance in which their accomplishment was demanded of the succeeding government. Our opinion, consequently, is, that these acts and promises were not considered in California or Mexico as valid obligations, binding the conscience of the Republic; and therefore they are not valid claims under the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo.

In some of the instances, Micheltorena granted a permission to the applicant to occupy the land provisionally, until he could visit that portion of the department to act upon their petition. It is contended that this license is so far a recognition of the merit of the application, as to impose upon the United States the obligation to accede to it; that it confirmed an interest in the land, that they should perpetuate by a grant.

We agree that every species of title that originated in the rightful exercise of legitimate authority, and existed under the safeguard of Mexican laws at the date of the acquisition of California by the United States, is protected by the Treaty of Cession. The change of the government does not alter the relations of the inhabitants in this particular. This court is charged with the duty, in the last resort, to recognize the validity of all such claims. But it is the duty of the court to distinguish between rights acquired under the laws and usages of Mexico, and claims depending upon the mere pleasure of those who were in power—between the vested estate and the hope or expectation of favor or bounty. The license of the governor to the applicant to make a temporary occupation, until he could inform himself, so as to act considerately or inteligently, we think, cannot be treated as conferring a property in the land.

We have examined these cases with unusual care, in consequence of the number of parties in interest and the amount of property involved. Upon the most liberal estimate of the powers of the governor, and the most indulgent view of the claims of the petitioners, we are unable to determine that they are valid.

Judgment of the district court reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

v.

ELIAS M. CONWAY.

(See S. C., 23 How., 235-249.)

Ejectment in Arkansas—when maintainable in federal court.

By the Statute of Arkansas, an action of ejectment may be maintained where the plaintiff claims possession by virtue of an entry made with the register and receiver of the proper land office of the United States.

This court held in the case of Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 450, that a patent for land carries the fee, and is the best title known to a court of law. Such is the settled doctrine of this court.

An action of ejectment cannot be maintained in the federal courts against a defendant in possession, on an entry made with the register and receiver, notwithstanding a State Legislature may have provided by statute that it can.

The law is only binding on the state courts, and has no force in the circuit courts of the Union.

Submitted Jan. 26, 1860. Decided Feb. 20, 1860.

ERRORS to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. Stilwell, for plaintiffs in error:

Can the plaintiffs, claiming under a grant of preemption, recover against the defendant, claiming under a patent issued subsequent to the preemption? We respectfully submit that by the Act of Congress of 29th May, 1830, the N. W. fractional quarter, section 2, 1 N. 12 W., was appropriated to the use of the occupant, Nathan Cloyes, was not subject to be granted to any other person, by Congress or any officer of the United States, until the expiration of the time allowed him to make payment therefor by that Act and the Act of 15th July, 1832; and it appearing that payment was made by his heirs within the time, the patent was void.

N. S., 605; Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How., 284; 10 Smedes & M., Miss., 461; 7 Smedes & M., Miss., 366.

A preemption is a legal vested right.

9 How., U. S., 333; 4 Ark., 283.

The patent issued to Governor Pope, being void as issued without authority, may be impeached in a court of chancery.

10 Johns., 26; 11 Mo., 595; 16 Ohio, 66; 8 Mo., 94.

Under the Statute of Arkansas, the patent certificate is of equal grade and dignity with the patent itself.

And it is a better title than a patent founded on a subsequent entry within the meaning of the statute;

Pettigrew v. Shirley, 9 Mo., 688; 5 Mo., 350; 11 Mo., 595;

The patent could not affect the pre-existing title of the ancestor of the plaintiffs;

N. O. v. Armas, 9 Pet., 236; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 738; Catlin v. Jackson, 8 Johns., 555; Jackson v. Cory, 8 Johns., 388; Nicks v. Rector, 4 Ark., 283;

And extraneous evidence was admissible, to show that the patent was void for want of authority to issue it.

2 How., 317; Collins v. Brannin, 1 Mo., 385, 540.

The title of the plaintiffs related to the date of the Preemption Act (29th May, 1830). The making of proof of occupation and cultivation, the adjudication of the right by the land officers, and the payment of the purchase money, were successive steps to perfect the right, and are to be regarded as having been done on that day;

Pettigrew v. Shirley, 9 Mo., 688; Borum v. Garland, 16 Ark., 454;

And consequently, the intervening rights cut out.

Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 372; Walk. Miss., 97; 12 Mo., 148; 3 Cow., 75; Vin. Abr., Tit. Relation; 5 Crouse Dig., 510, et seq.

When the patent was issued, the land had been appropriated and was not subject to grant, and it ought to have been excluded by the circuit court, or the jury instructed to disregard it as the plaintiffs asked. The act of issuing it was a mere ministerial act, and as to the rights of the plaintiffs' ancestors, was wholly ineffectual to prejudice them.

Ware v. Brush, 1 McLean, 535.

Mr. S. H. Hempstead, for defendant in error:

1. The first and principal question is, whether a patent issued by the United States can be impeached, annulled and set aside in an action of law.

In ejectment the rule is universal, that the plaintiff must show the right to possession to be in himself positively. A tenant is always at liberty to prove the title out of the plaintiff, although he does not prove it to exist in himself.

Lessee v. Birth, 6 Pet., 312; King v. Stevens, 18 Ala., 475; Rupert v. Mark, 15 Ill., 540; 1 Blackf., 131; 8 Blackf., 320, 366.

In Kentucky, it is a settled principle that courts of law will not look beyond the patent, and it is only in a court of equity that a prior right or equity can be established. The courts of the United States have adopted the same principle.

Finley v. Williams, 9 Cranch, 167; see, also, Bledsoe v. Wells, 4 Bibb, 329; Alexander v. Greenup, 1 Munf., 134; 5 Com. Dig., f. 1, f. 4, f. 6, f. 7, title Patent; 2 Bl. Com., 346; 5 Com. Dig., Patent, f. 6, p. 357; 2 Com. Dig., Chancery, ch. 1, p. 366; Taylor v. Fletcher, 7 B. Mon., 81.

A patent, when attacked incidentally, cannot be declared void, unless it be procured by actual fraud, or is void on its face, or has been declared void by law.

Underwood v. Crutcher, 7 J. J. Marsh., 532.

It is only where letters patent are void on their face as being issued contrary to law, or where the grant is of an estate contrary to law, as against the prohibition of a statute, that it possibly may be held void in a collateral proceeding.

Jackson v. Marsh, 6 Cow., 282; Jackson v. Lawton, 10 Johns., 23; Parmelee v. Oswego Co., 7 Barb., 622; The People v. Livingston, 8 Barb., 278, 284-287, 295; Jackson v. Hart, 12 Johns., 77; People v. Mauran, 5 Den., 389, 398, 400.

The principle indicating the introduction of extrinsic evidence to impeach a patent free from objection on its face, does not depend on the grade or nature of the evidence.

Norvell v. Camm, 6 Munf., 233, 238; Witherinton v. McDonald, 1 Hen. & Mun., 303; Alexander v. Greenup, 1 Munf., 140.

The same doctrine was laid down by Marshall, Ch. J., in Stringer v. Lessee of Young, 8 Pet., 340; he said no case had shown that a patent may be impeached at law unless it be for fraud; not legal and technical, but actual and positive fraud in fact, committed by the person who obtained it; and even that, said he, is questioned, citing the above case of Witherinton v. McDonald, 1 H. & M., 306; also, Hoofnagle v. Anderson, 7 Wheat., 212; Boardman v. Reed, 6 Pet., 342; 6 Cranch, 131; 8 How., 233; Patterson v. Winn, 11 Wheat., 380.

The opinion of the Chief Justice evidently was, that a patent could not be impeached at law even for fraud—actual positive fraud. It has been said a patent is void and confers no title, when it issues for land that has been previously patented to another individual, or granted to him by Act of Congress, which is equivalent to a patent.

Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How., 318; Grignon v. Astor, 2 How., 344.

Why is this so? Why, under such circumstances, may a patent be held inoperative at law? Those cases themselves answer, because the fee has passed out of the United States and vested in the first patentee or grantee.

59 U. S. (18 How.), 88; 9 Cranch, 99.

Those cases do not warrant, nor are there any cases to be found in the courts of the United States which warrant the impeachment of a patent at law, in a case where a preemptioner claims in opposition to that patent. Resort must be had to a court of equity, and to that alone.

A patent is a better legal title than an entry with the register and receiver, and in an action of ejectment must prevail over it.

Gaines v. Hale, 16 Ark., 25; Griffith v. Deerfelt, 17 Mo., 31; Dickinson v. Brown, 9 S. & M., 130; Bruckner v. Lawrence, 1 Doug., Mich., 37; Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 436; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet., 516; Wiggins v. Lusk, 12 Ill., 132.

A patent is evidence in a court of law of the regularity of all previous steps to it, and no facts behind it can be investigated.

6 Pet., 724; 5 Wheat., 293; 7 Wheat., 151; 11 Wheat., 580; 4 Pet., 340.

No equitable title can be set up in ejectment, in opposition to the legal title.

Jackson v. Chase, 2 Johns., 84; Jackson v. Pierce, 2 Johns., 222; Phelps v. Kellogg, 15 Ill., 136.

A patent is conclusive in a court of law.

West v. Cochran, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 403; 15 How., 450; 14 How., 382. The legal title must prevail at law. 13 How., 24; 11 How., 568; 9 How., 171; 8 How., 365.

A plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his title, and that must be a legal, as contradistinguished from an equitable title.

Livingston v. Story, 9 Pet., 632; U. S. v. King, 8 How., 846; Gilmer v. Poindexter, 10 How., 257.

A patent cannot be collaterally avoided at law, even for fraud.

Field v. Seabury, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 324, 332. This case is conclusive of the subject, and it was said that the case in 2 How., 318, did not authorize the impeachment of a patent at law. Courts of justice have no authority to disregard surveys and patents, when dealing with them in actions of ejectment.

West v. Cochran, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 403; Willot v. Sandford, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 82.

The Legislature of Arkansas has provided that an action of ejectment may be maintained on an entry made with the register and receiver of the proper Land Office of the United States, or on a preemption right under the laws of the United States.

Digest, 454.

But a patent being a superior legal title, must of course prevail over them; nor would it be competent for any state legislation to give such titles, which are only of an equitable nature, precedence over the legal title.

Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet., 516; Irvine v. Marshall, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 566; Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 450, 451.

And although actions of ejectment may be maintained on an equitable title, or less than a complete legal title in the state courts, by virtue of positive legislation, yet it may admit of great doubt whether, in the courts of the United States, that action can be sustained on anything but the paramount legal title. Such I understand to have been decided.

Carson v. Boudinot, 2 Wash. C. C., 33; Swayze v. Burke, 12 Pet., 23.

2. The right forum to impeach the patent was a court of chancery; and that had been resorted to and the preemption claim of Cloyes declared invalid, and to be in fact a base fraud, as the proof in the chancery case conclusively showed it was.

Lytle v. The State, 17 Ark., 608. It was purely vexatious to bring this ejectment suit, and the plaintiffs had no right to do it, as the same matter was involved in their chancery suit.

Mason v. Chambers, 4 J. J. Marsh., 401.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

An action of ejectment was brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas, founded on an entry made in a United States Land Office. This was the only title produced on the trial by the plaintiffs.

The defendant held possession under a patent from the United States to John Pope (Governor, &c.), with which the defendant connected himself by a regular chain of conveyances. The circuit court held the patent to be the better legal title, and so instructed the jury, who found for the defendant; and the plaintiffs prosecute this writ of error to reverse that judgment.

By the Statute of Arkansas, an action of ejectment may be maintained where the plaintiff claims possesion by virtue of an entry made with the register and receiver of the proper Land Office of the United States. Ark. Dig., 454.

This court held, in the case of Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 450, "that Congress had the sole power to declare the dignity and effect of a patent issuing from the United States; that a patent carries the fee, and is the best title known to a court of law." Such is the settled doctrine of this court.

But there is another question, standing in advance of the foregoing, to wit: can an action of ejectment be maintained in the federal courts against a defendant in possession, on an entry made with the register and receiver?

It is also the settled doctrine of this court, that no action of ejectment will lie on such equitable title, notwithstanding a state Legislature may have provided otherwise by statute. The law is only binding on the state courts, and has no force in the circuit courts of the Union.

Fenn v. Holme, 21 How., 482.

It is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

The case of Hooper v. Conway, depends on the same titles and facts and instructions to the jury as are set forth in this case, and the same verdict and judgment were given in the circuit court.

We order it to be affirmed likewise.

Judgment, when affirmed with ten per cent. damages.

Where, in a suit on a promissory note executed by defendants, they did not pretend to have any defense, and entered a false plea, which was overruled, and refused to plead in bar, and judgment was entered against them for want of a plea, and they do not pretend to allege any error, the judgment will be affirmed, with ten per cent. damages.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Arkansas.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the court below by the defendants in error, on a certain promissory note. The court below having entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, the defendants sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

No counsel appeared in this court for the plaintiffs in error.

Mr. George C. Watkins, for defendants in error:

The judgment was rendered on May 22, 1856, since which time the hands of the plaintiffs below have been tied from having execution, and the plaintiffs in error have never appeared in this court, nor have they taken any steps to prosecute their writ of error.

The defendants in error now ask for an affirmance of the judgment, with exemplary damages for delay.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in error were sued on a promissory note executed by them. They did not pretend to have any defense. They entered a false plea, which was overruled on demurrer. They refused to plead in bar. Judgment was entered against them in due form, for want of a plea.

They do not pretend to allege any error in the proceedings.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed, with ten per cent. damages.

Same day. Referred to Jimeno, and by him to Sutter, for report.

July 16, 1844. Report by Sutter that the land is unoccupied.

July 16, 1844. Jimeno's recommendation that it should wait until the governor can visit the Sacramento; to which the governor says, "Let him occupy it, provisionally, until I go up to conclude it."

These documents are not proved otherwise than by the testimony of one witness (J. J. Warner), who swears that he believes the signatures of Micheltorena, Jimeno, and Sutter, to be genuine.

December 22, 1844. Micheltorena's general grant to J. A. Sutter.

John A. Sutter, being called as a witness, says that Bennitz was one of the persons to whom the general grant applies.

This claim rests on the general grant of Micheltorena to Sutter, and on that alone. It is void; the title is worse than worthless.

Messrs. R. H. Gillet, C. Benham and A. Felch, for appellee:

Bennitz acquired an interest in the land claimed, by virtue of the license granted by Micheltorena on the 26th of July, 1844.

Bennitz petitioned for the land in the ordinary manner. It was referred to the secretary and by him sent to Sutter for report. The latter reported favorably. On returning the papers to the governor, the secretary suggested that the formal grant of the legal title should be delayed until the governor should visit that part of the country and dispose of the previous applications. Thereupon the governor authorized Bennitz to take possession, and hold it until he should go up and conclude the matter of the grants. He indorsed—"Let him occupy it, provisionally, until I go up and conclude the matter." But he never went up.

This conferred a right of possession and occupancy that has never been revoked. The petitioner took possession by his agent, and occupied for fifteen or eighteen months, until the agent was killed by the Indians, as in Reading's case, and he continued to claim the land.

On the 22d of December, 1844, Micheltorena gave what is denominated the "general title," which was intended as a confirmatory grant of this and other lands. This satisfied Bennitz that he had acquired a legal title, and he continued to occupy down to 1846 (when his agent was killed), and he also continued to claim the land.

This case is clearly distinguishable from those of Sutter and Nye, decided at the last term.

In each of those cases there was a petition, a reference, and a report by the local officer, but no further action by the governor in either. All rested upon the subsequent general title.

There was something in this case which was treated by Mexico and the claimant as an interest. There was an application for a definite spot which was not occupied, and it was so reported, and permission given to occupy it until further action by the governor, and then there was possession and continued occupancy. Mexico could not have recovered against him as a trespasser, after the license and occupancy under it, and no one denouncing the land, the governor could not eject him. Here were tangible facts. The claimant thought he had some rights, and no one questioned them. He was told his title was confirmed, and a formal document followed. Here was something of substance. Not being a legal title, but still being something which would affect the conscience of Mexico, it was clearly an equity. If it was an equity, this court is bound to recognize and confirm it.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The claimant applied to Micheltorena, in 1844, for a concession of five square leagues of land, lying in the valley of the Sacramento River, and bounded on the west by that stream. The petition was referred to Captain Sutter, who reported that the land was vacant.

The secretary reported, that the governor having deferred any action upon petitions like the present, until he could make a visit to the region of the Sacramento and San Joaquin, it would be proper to dispose of this in the same manner.

The governor so ordered, authorizing the applicant to take provisional possession, until he could make his visit. The suit of the claimant was submitted to the board of commissioners on this testimony, and it was rejected as invalid.

Upon appeal to the district court, the claimant proved that he was a soldier in the war of Micheltorena, and an officer in one of the companies of Sutter. That the governor acknowledged his services in that war, and verbally recognized the validity of his claim for the land specified, and that it will be perfected by means of the "general title" of Sutter. The claimant also proved, that in March, 1845, two persons went upon the land, to make improvements under his claim. That one of them shortly after retreated from fear of the Indians; and the other (Julien) made some improvement and cultivation, and occupied the land twelve or fifteen months, when he was killed by them. In the case of U. S. v. Reading, 18 How., 1, it was proved that Julien occupied the land of that claimant.

The merits of the claims arising under the general title of Sutter have been discussed in the cases of U. S. v. Nye, 21 How., 408, and U. S. v. Bassett, 21 How., 412. This claim is in all respects similar; and for the reasons assigned in those cases, is invalid.

Decree reversed. Cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

JOSE ANTONIO ALVISO.

Mexican claim, validity of.

Where, in a Mexican claim, no imputation is made against the integrity of claimant's documentary evidence, and no suspicion exists unfavorable to the bona fides of his petition, or the continuity of his possession and claim, and he has been recognized as the proprietor of the land since 1840, the court will not willingly disturb the decree in his favor.

Argued Feb. 14, 1860. Decided Feb. 27, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and the facts involved sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court,

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellants:

This title is utterly incapable of being sustained, because—

1. There is no espediente for it to be found among the archives, nor note of it in any Toma De Razon, nor in the index which is extant and contains all the grants that were made for that year.

2. Even if the espediente had been found, and it had been noted upon the proper book, the whole transaction between Alviso and the government would not have amounted to a grant of land.

It is a mere marginal order upon a petition, not an order of concession, such as the governors usually made after they received the reports that were sent in to them from the local magistrates. This was only an order of reference, calling upon the administrator of the ex-mission of San Francisco to report, and authorizing the petitioner in the mean time to occupy the land provisionally. Everything was to wait until the information required by the governor should be sent in to him. The governor also ordered that a map should be produced. It appears from the evidence that no report was ever made by the governor, no map ever produced before him, and that he was never asked to make the grant or concede the title.

2. The papers in this case, like all those whose genuineness is not proved by some corresponding entry upon the record, are probably mere fabrications. The best that can be said of them is, that the claimant had some old papers which showed that an application had once been made for the land, but afterwards abandoned; that he did not think the land worth getting a title for, until after the conquest of the country by the Americans, and that he gathered up his shapeless documents and produced them. If this be the worst of it, it is to all intents and purposes a false and fraudulent claim. But besides this, the evidence that even such papers as these were ever really made, is exceedingly slender and unreliable.

Messrs. C. Robinson and B. W. Leigh, for appellees:

In the discussion of the present question, we are to be guided, not by any decisions of this court precisely in point, but by the laws, usages and customs of the Mexican Government, the principles of equity and the decisions of this court in analogous cases.

See the Act of Congress of March 8, 1851, sec. 11, 9 Stat. at L., 631; Frémont v. The U. S., 58 U. S. (17 How.), 542, 543.

A statement of the effect of the decisions of this court to which the Act refers, will be found in the opinion of the court in the case of Frémont v. The U. S.

It connot be maintained that the Governor of California did not have power to authorize a provisional occupation of vacant land, to await the report and formal grant. In the language of this court in the case of The U. S. v. Sutter, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 170. "The decisions of the court show that they have been disposed to interpret liberally the measures of the Mexican authorities in California, and to view with indulgence the acts and modes of dealing with the inhabitants having reference to the laws of distribution and settlement of the public domain. The circumstances in which the governor was placed, required that his power and discretion should not be confined within narrow limits."

The claim is valid upon the general principles of equity, for there is no defect of consideration. The consideration here is as good and as sufficient as it was in Scott's Exr. v. Osborne's Exr., 2 Munf., 413.

It is the case of an offer—an agreement—by one party, accepted and acted on by the other.

Dowell v. Dew, 1 You. & Coll., 356.

The complainant acted under it in taking possession of the property, and expended money in its improvement;

King's Heirs v. Thompson, 9 Pet., 219,

And upon making out, against an individual, such a case as he has here made out against the government, a court of equity would decree specific execution of the contract;

1 Spence, Eq., 645; Ad. Eq., pp. 79, 80 of Eng., pp. 247, 248 of Am. ed.;

For, as Sir William Grant observes, "supposing the contract to have been entered into by a competent party, and to be in the nature and circumstances of it unobjectionable, it is as much of course in this court to decree a specific performance as it is to give damages at law."

Hall v. Warren, 9 Ves., 608.

The contract was by a competent party, and in its nature and circumstances unobjectionable. Here, as in Powell v. Thomas, 6 Hare., 305, there was never any dispute between the parties with respect to the occupation of of the land for the purpose for which it was taken, and there was no question between them as to any other matter—no such question to prove as there was there.

The occupation here was as plainly under the agreement as it was in Gregory v. Mighell, 18 Ves., 333, and upon the doctrine of these and other cases, relief should be given by quieting the complainant in his possession of the land. Sir William Grant, in effect, said: "I will not listen to anything so monstrous as to say he is not to have it. You have let him have the land; he has been upon it for a great number of years. He shall have it for the rest of the term."

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee was confirmed in his claim to two square leagues of land in the County of Santa Cruz, and known as La Cañada de Verde y Arroyo de la Purissima, by the Board of Commissioners and the District Court of California.

His testimony consists of a petition by his brother (Jose Maria Alviso) to the Governor of California, in 1838, for a grant of the land, and permission to occupy it, while the proceedings for the perfection of his title were pending. This petition was granted, and the administrator of the ex-mission of San Francisco, de Assis, was directed to make a report upon the subject.

In 1839 this order was exhibited to the prefect of that district, who agreed to reserve the land for the claimant, and that the claimant might occupy it, referring him to the governor for a complete title. In 1840 the administrator reported that the land was unoccupied, and was not recognized as the property of the mission or of any private person. The claimant has a conveyance from his brother, the petitioner, dated in 1840.

The testimony shows that his occupation commenced in 1840, and has continued for fourteen years; that he has improved and cultivated the land, and that his family have resided on it.

The claimant appears to have been a citizen of the department, and no objection was made or is suggested why he should not have been a colonist of that portion of the public domain he has solicited. No imputation has been made against the integrity of his documentary evidence, and no suspicion exists unfavorable to the bona fides of his petition, or the continuity of his possession and claim. He has been recognized as the proprietor of this land since 1840.

Under all the circumstances of the case, the court is not willing to disturb the decrees in his favor.

Decree of the district court, affirmed.

v.
ANTONIO MARIA OSIO.

Mexican land claim—license to occupy—power of governor.

Where a decree of the Mexican Governor granted the right or license to occupy an island to raise stock, subject to the right of the government to enter at any time and appropriate the premises as a site for a military fort; and the petitioner never availed himself of the license granted, or made any improvements on the island under the decree; held, that he had acquired no interest in the land, by virtue of that proceeding, at the date of the cession to the United States.

Colonization grants were usually made, subject to the approval of the Departmental Assembly. No such approval was ever obtained in this case.

The power conferred was to be exercised by the governor, in concurrence with the Departmental Assembly; and a grant made by the governor without such concurrence was simply void.

The governor, under the circumstances of this case, had no authority, without the concurrence of the Departmental Assembly, to make this grant, and the grant is void.

Argued Feb. 15. 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellants:

It is not pretented by Alvarado, or anyone else, that he had authority to grant away the islands in the Bay of San Francisco for purposes of colonization, previous to the order sent down from the Supreme Government, and dated at Mexico, July 20, 1838. That order authorizes the islands to be granted by the governor of the department in concurrence with the Departmental Junta, who were to proceed with activity and prudence. If this was a joint authority, as by its terms it was unquestionably intended to be, then the non-concurrence of the Departmental Junta with the governor makes the grant void and worthless. But even if this view of the subject should not be taken by the court, it will undoubtedly be regarded as a very impressive fact against the genuineness of this claim, that the concurrence of the Assembly was never asked for, during the whole period that intervened between 1839 and 1846.

Mr. R. H. Gillet, for appellee:

First. No form of grant is required by the order of the Supreme Government, authorizing the grant of the islands, nor required by the colonization law or regulations.

Larkins' case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 562.

Second. Meritorious, useful and patriotic services were good considerations for a grant.

See U. S. v. Sutherland, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 363, 364; U. S. v. Peralta, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 348; Case of Arguello, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 540; Larkins' case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 562.

Third. Confirmation by the Departmental Assembly is not necessary, in order to confirm a California grant made by a governor. It was the duty of the government, and not of the grantee, to present it for confirmation.

Frémont v. The U. S., 58 U. S. (17 How.), 563; Cruz Cervantes' case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 553; Larkins' case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 562.

Fourth. When an equitable right has once vested under a California grant by the governor, it cannot be devested except by the denouncement of a third person legally made.

Fifth. The question of the bona fides of this grant cannot now be raised, as it was not raised below.

Sixth. Conditions subsequent, if not complied with, do not render the grant void, nor authorize the government to forfeit the grantee's rights to its own use.

Frémont's case, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 560; Larkin's case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 563.

Seventh. When an officer of the Mexican Government who had the legal power to make grants of land, exercises that power in a manner to create a reasonable belief in the mind of an applicant for a grant that the instrument given is a grant, and he takes possession, occupies the same, and makes improvements thereon in good faith, such grant, if not in strict legal form, creates an equitable right which entitles the grantee to a confirmation thereof.

Eighth. By the laws, usages, and customs of Mexico, this claim would have been confirmed, and therefore this court must confirm it.

The Act under which these cases came before the board required that body, the district court, and this court, to be "governed by (1.)

the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo; (2.) the law of nations; (3.) the laws, usages and customs of the government from which the claim is derived; (4.) the principles of equity; (5.) the decisions of the Supreme Court, so far as the same are applicable.

9 U. S. L., 633, sec. 11.

Ninth. It is a well-settled rule, that equity cannot be resorted to for the purpose of enforcing forfeitures, but only to avoid them.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, affirming a decree of the commissioners appointed under the Act of the 3d of March, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 631), to adjudicate private land claims. Every person claiming land in California, by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government, is required by the 8th section of that Act to present his claim, together with the evidence in support of the same, to the commissioners in the first instance, for their adjudication.

Pursuant to that requirement, the appellee in this case presented his petition to that tribunal, claiming title to the island of Los Angeles, situated near the entrance of the Bay of San Francisco, and praying that his claim to the same might be confirmed. As the foundation of his title, he set up a certain instrument or document, purporting to be a grant of the island to him by Governor Alvarado. It bears date at Monterey, on the 11th day of June, 1839; and the claimant alleged in his petition to the commissioners that the grant was made under certain special orders issued to the governor by the Mexican Government. He obtained a decree in his favor before the commissioners, and the district court, on appeal, affirmed that decree; whereupon an appeal was taken, in behalf of the United States, to this court; and the question now is, whether the claim, upon the evidence exhibited, is valid, within the principles prescribed as the rule of decision in the 11th section of the Act requiring the adjudication to be made.

Unlike what is usual in cases of this description, it will be noticed that none of the documentary evidences of title, introduced in support of the claim, purport to be founded upon the Colonization Law of 1824, or the Regulations of 1828; and for that reason we shall refer to these documents with some degree of particularity, in order that their precise import and effect may be clearly understood.

On the 7th day of October, 1837, the present claimant presented a petition to Governer Alvarado, praying for a grant of the island in question, "to build a house thereon, and breed horses and mules;" representing, in his petition, that as early as 1830 he had made a similar request, and expressing the hope that the grant might be made.

Some further delay occurred in the contemplated enterprise of the petitioner, as appears from the fact that no action was taken on his second petition until the 1st day of February, 1838, when the governor, by an order appearing in the margin of the petition, referred it, not to the alcalde of the district, but to the military commandancy north of San Francisco, for a report. That office was filled at the time by Mariano G. Vallejo, who accordingly reported, on the 7th day of the same month, that the island might be granted to the petitioner; but suggested that it would be well to make an exception in the grant, to the effect that, whenever the government might desire or find it convenient to build a fort on the principal height thereof, it should not be hindered from so doing. With that report before him, the governor, on the 19th day of February, 1838, made a decree, wherein he states that he had concluded to grant to the petitioner the occupation of the island in question, "to the end that he may make such use of it as he may deem most suitable, to build a house, raise stock, and do everything that may concern the advancement of the mercantile and agricultural branches—upon the condition that, whenever it may be convenient, the government may establish a fort thereon."

Direction was given to the petitioner, by the terms of the instrument, to present himself, with the decree, not to the office where land adjudications under the Colonization Laws were usually recorded, but to the military commandancy, that an entry thereof might be made, for the due verification of the same.

No such note of the proceeding was ever made in the office of the military commandants, or in any book containing the adjudications of land titles. But the several documents are duly certified copies of unrecorded originals which were found in the Mexican archives. Their genuineness is controverted by the counsel for the appellants; but we do not think it necessary to consider that question on this branch of the case, for the reason that the petitioner never took possession of the island under that decree, and does not claim title under it in the petition which he presented to the land commissioners.

All that the decree purports to grant to the petitioner, in any view which can be taken of it, is the right or license to occupy the island for the purposes therein described, subject to the right of the government to enter at any time and appropriate the premises as a site for a military fort; and inasmuch as the petitioner never availed himself of the license granted, or made any improvements on the island under the decree, it is quite clear that he had acquired no interest in the land, by virtue of that proceeding, at the date of the cession to the United States, which the Mexican Government was bound to respect.

Four other documents were introduced by the petitioner, before the commissioners, in support of his claim: 1. A dispatch from the Minister of the Interior of the Republic of Mexico, addressed to Governor Alvarado. 2. A petition from the appellee to the same. 3. A duplicate copy of the grant set up in his petition to the commissioners, which is without any signatures. 4. The original grant of the island in question, which purports to be signed by the governor, and to be countersigned by the secretary. Of these, the first three are duly certified copies of unrecorded originals which were found in the Mexican archives.

As exhibited in the transcript, the dispatch bears date at Mexico, on the 20th day of July, 1838. By that dispatch the governer was informed that "the President, desiring on the one part to protect the settlement of the desert islands adjacent to that department, which are a part of the national territory, and on the other to check the many foreign adventurers who may avail themselves of those considerable portions, from which they may do great damage to our fishery, commerce, and interests, has been pleased to resolve that Your Excellency, in concurrence with the Departmental Junta, proceed, with activity and prudence, to grant and distribute the lands on said island to the citizens of the nation who may solicit the same."

In addition to what is here stated, two persons, Antonio and Carlos Carillo, are named in the communication, to whom, on account of their useful and patriotic services, preference was to be given in making the grants, to the extent of allowing them to select one exclusively for their benefit.

Such is the substance of the dispatch, so far as it is material to consider it in this investigation.

On the 15th day of February 1839, the present claimant presented to Governor Alvarado another petition, wherein, after referring to the fact that the island in question had been granted to him during the preceding year, for the breeding of horses, he prays that a new title of possession may be given to him, in accordance with the superior decree, which, as he assumes, empowered the governor to grant, for purposes of colonization, the islands near by, on the coast.

Some idea of the situation of the island, and of the importance which was attached to it in a military point of view, may be gathered from the exposition of the military commandante, made by the governor on the 17th day of August, 1837. One of the purposes of that court was to recommend that the custom-house established at Monterey should be transferred to the port of San Francisco. Various reasons were assigned for the change; and among others, it was stated that the latter port was impregnable, by reason of its truly military position.

After describing the port, and expatiating upon the advantages which would flow from the transfer, the report goes on to state, that near its entrance and within the gulf are several small islands, where are found water and a variety of timber most suitable for a fortification; adding that it contains safe anchorages and suitable coves for landing goods and for storehouses, particularly the island of Los Angeles, which is one league in circumference, lying at the entrance of the gulf, and forming two straits with their points—giving their names—so that it is the key of the whole of it, inasmuch as from this very place the coming in or going out of vessels can be prevented with the utmost facility.

Suffice it to say, without repeating any more of its details, that the whole report is of a character to afford the most convincing proof that the public authorities of the Territory, as early as August, 1837, fully appreciated the importance of the island, as a necessary site to be retained by the government for the purposes of national defense. Arch. Exch., p. 5.

Grants under the Colonization Laws were usually issued in duplicates—one copy being designed for the party to whom it was made, and the other to remain in the archives, to be transmitted, with the espedients, to the Departmental Assembly for its approval. They were in all respects the same, except that the copy left in the office, sometimes called the duplicate copy, was not always signed by the governor and secretary, and did not usually contain the order directing a note of the grant to be entered in the office where the land adjudications were required to be recorded.

In this case there is no espedients, other than the one presented with the first-named petition, which is not necessarily or even properly connected with the grant set up by the claimant. Two copies of this grant were produced by the petitioner, both bearing date at Monterey, on the 11th day of June, 1839, nearly two years after the governor received the before mentioned exposition of the military commandante, showing the importance of the island to the government as a site for works of defense. They are of the same tenor and effect, and both purport to be absolute grants, without any of the conditions usually to be found in the concessions issued under the Colonization Laws. As before remarked, the copy not signed, together with the petition, were found in the Mexican archives; but the original, properly so called, was produced from the custody of the party.

Adjudications of land titles were required by the Mexican law to be recorded. That requirement, however, was regarded as fulfilled, according to the practice in the Department of California, when a short entry was made in a book kept for the purpose, specifying the number of the espediente, the date of the grant, a brief description of the land granted, and the name of the person to whom the grant was issued. In this case there is a certificate appearing at the bottom of the instrument, to the effect that such an entry had been made, but it is wholly unsupported by proof of the existence of any such record.

An attempt was made before the commissioners, or in the district court, to account for the absence of such record evidence, by showing that a book of Spanish records, of the description mentioned, was consumed by fire, at San Francisco, in 1851; but the recollections of the witness called for the purpose are so indistinct, and his knowledge of the contents of the book so slight, that the evidence is not entitled to much weight. Jimeno, who signed the certificate, was not called, and, in view of all the circumstances, there does not appear to be any ground to conclude that any such record was ever made.

Colonization grants were usually made, subject to the approval of the Departmental Assembly, and the Regulations of 1828 expressly declare that grants to individuals and families shall not be held to be definitively valid without the previous consent of that deputation. No such approval was ever obtained in this case; and it does not appear that the dispatch, or order, as it is denominated by the governor, was ever communicated by him to the Departmental Assembly, until the 27th day of February, 1840. His message communicating the dispatch, though brief, clearly indicates that the members of the Assembly had no previous knowledge upon the subject.

A document, purporting to be an unsigned copy of the grant, and the petition, are all the papers that were found in the archives, except those connected with the first proceeding under which the license to occupy the island was granted. They were loose papers, not recorded, or even numbered, and, in view of all the circumstances, add little or nothing to the probability in favor of the integrity of the transaction. Two witnesses were examined by the claimant to prove the authenticity of the grant. Governor Alvarado testified that his signature to the grant was genuine, and that he gave it at the time of its date. In effect, the other witness testified that he was acquainted with the handwriting of the governor, and also with that of the secretary, and that they were genuine. Where no record evidence is exhibited, the mere proof of handwriting by third persons, who did not subscribe the instrument as witnesses, or see it executed, is not sufficient in this class of cases to establish the validity of the claim, without some other confirmatory evidence. But the testimony of Governor Alvarado stands upon a somewhat different footing. His statements purport to be founded upon knowledge of what he affirms, and if not true, they must be willfully false, or the result of an imperfect or greatly impaired and deceived recollection. Resting, as this claim does, in a great measure, so far as the genuineness of the grant is concerned, upon the testimony of this witness, we have examined his deposition with care, and think proper to remark that it discloses facts and circumstances which, to some extent, affect the credit of the witness. By his manner of testifying, as there disclosed, he evinces a strong bias in favor of the party calling him, as is manifested throughout the deposition. Some of his answers are evasive; others, when compared with preceding statements in the same deposition, are contradictory; and in several instances he refused altogether to answer the questions propounded on cross-examination. Suffice it is to say, without entering more into detail, that we would not think his testimony sufficient, without some corroboration, to entitle the petitioner to a confirmation of his claim.

On the part of the United States the confirmation of the claim is resisted chiefly upon two grounds. It is insisted, in the first place, that the evidence introduced by the claimant to establish the authenticity of the grant is not sufficient to entitle him to a confirmation, and that in point of fact the grant was fabricated, after our conquest of the territory. Second, it is contended that the grant, even if it be shown that it is genuine, was issued by the governor without authority of law.

In support of the first proposition, various suggestions were made at the argument, in addition to those which have already been the subject of remark. Most of them were based upon the state and condition of the title papers, the circumstances of the transaction, and the conduct of the parties, as tending to show the improbability that any such grant was ever made. Much stress was laid upon the fact that the grant was never approved by the Departmental Assembly, or any note of it entered in the office where the adjudications of land titles were required to be recorded. Attention was also drawn to the fact that the paper produced as the espedients is without any number, which circumstance, it was insisted, furnished strong evidence that they were fabricated, or at least that they had never been completed. To support that theory, an index, prepared by the secretary, and found in the Mexican archives, was exhibited, containing a schedule of espedientes numbered consecutively from one to four hundred and forty-three, covering the period from the 10th day of May, 1833, to the 24th day of December, 1844, and including in the list one in favor of this petitioner for another parcel of land granted on the 7th day of November, 1844. Reliance was also placed upon the omission of the appellee to call and examine the secretary who prepared that index, and whose name purports to be signed to the grant set up in the petition. Another suggestion was, that, from the nature of the property, it was highly improbable that any private person should desire such a grant in a department where there were vast tracts of fertile land to be obtained for the asking, and that it was past belief that the governor would have been induced to make the grant, especially after the receipt of the exposition of the military commandante, except upon the same conditions as those inserted in the decree of the preceding year. Every one of these suggestions is entitled to weight, and when taken together and considered in connection with the unsatisfactory character of the parol proof introduced by the petitioner, they are sufficient to create well-founded doubts as to the integrity of the transaction. But it is unnecessary to determine the point, as we are all of the opinion that the second objection to the confirmation is well taken, and must be sustained.

Nothing can be plainer than that the governor, in making the grant in question, did not assume to act under the Colonization Law of 1824, or the Regulations of 1828. Were anything wanting beyond what appears in the terms of the grant to establish that proposition, it would be found in the deposition of the governor himself, in his answer to the fourth interrogatory propounded by the claimant. His answer was, that he made the grant by an express order in writing from the General Government. He further states, that his predecessors had applied to the General Government for such authority, but without success. On coming into office, he renewed the application, and, after considerable delay, he says he received the before mentioned dispatch by the hands of a courier.

Neither side, in this controversy, disputes the authority of the Mexican President to issue the order contained in the dispatch. From its date, it appears to have been issued during the administration of General Anastasio Bustamente. He succeeded to the Presidency, for the second time, on the 19th day of April, 1837, after the capture of Santa Anna in Texas, and remained in office until the 6th day of October, 1841, when he was driven from the capital by the partisans of his predecessor.

At the beginning of his administration, he professed to be guided by the principles of the Constitution; and from the well known antecedents of his cabinet, he could hardly have expected to adopt any different policy. His cabinet, however, shortly resigned, and a new one was formed, believed to have had much less respect for the fundamental law. On the 9th day of March, 1838, the Minister of the Interior of the new cabinet resigned, when Joaquin Pesado, whose name is affixed to this dispatch, was appointed in his place.

After the new cabinet was organized, the policy of the administration was changed; and it cannot be doubted but that, at the date of this dispatch, the President had assumed extraordinary powers, and was, in point of fact, to a considerable extent, in the exercise of the legislative as well as the executive powers of the government.

Assuming that the dispatch was issued in pursuance of competent authority, it must be considered as conferring a special power, to be exercised only in the manner therein prescribed. In this view of the subject, it is immaterial whether the power to grant the islands on the coast was vested in the governor before or not, or in what manner, if the power did exist, it was required to be exercised, as the effect of this order, emanating from the supreme power of the nation, was to repeal the previous regulations upon the subject, and to substitute a new one in their place.

Strong doubts are entertained whether the islands situated immediately in the Bay of San Francisco are either within the words of the dispatch or the declared purpose for which the power was conferred, but it is unnecessary to determine that point in this investigation.

Waiving that point at the present time, we come to consider the question whether, upon the proofs exhibited, the power was exercised in this case in a manner to give validity to the grant; and that inquiry necessarily involves the construction of the dispatch.

Omitting the formal parts, its effect was to authorize the governor, in concurrence with the Departmental Assembly, to grant and distribute the lands on the desert islands adjacent to the department to the citizens of the nation who might solicit the same. By the terms of the dispatch, the power to grant and distribute such lands was to be exercised by the governor, in concurrence with the Departmental Assembly; by which we understand, that the Assembly was to participate in the adjudication of the grant. Whenever a petition was presented, the first question to be determined was, whether the grant should be made and the title papers issued; and, by the plain terms of the dispatch, an affirmative adjudication could not be legally made, without the consent of the Departmental Assembly. Whether a subsequent ratification of the Act by the Assembly might not be equivalent to a previous consent, is not a question that arises in this case, for the reason that no such ratification ever took place.

All we mean to decide, in this connection, is, that by the true construction of the dispatch, the act of adjudication cannot be held to be valid without the concurrence of the Departmental Assembly, as well as that of the governor.

In this respect, the provision differs essentially from that contained in the Regulations of 1828, under which the approval of the Assembly was an act to be performed after the espediente had been perfected, and after the incipient title papers had been issued by the governor. His action preceded that of the Assembly, and in contemplation of law was separate and independent. After the grant was made and executed by the governor, and countersigned by the secretary, it was the duty of the governor to transmit it to the Departmental Assembly, for its approval; and if it was not so transmitted, it was the fault of the officer, and not of the party.

Other differences between the Regulations of 1828 and the provisions of that dispatch might be pointed out; but we think it unnecessary, as those already mentioned are deemed to be sufficient to show that the decisions of this court, made in cases arising under those regulations, have no proper application to the question under consideration.

From the words of the dispatch, we think it is clear that the power conferred was to be exercised by the governor in concurrence with the Departmental Assembly; and consequently, that a grant made by the governor without such concurrence was simply void. This view of the question finds support in the Mexican law defining the functions and prescribing the duties of the governor, and those of the Departmental Assembly. That law was enacted on the 20th day of March, 1837, and continued in force during the administration under which this dispatch was issued. 1 Arrillago, Recop., Vol. I., pp. 202 and 210. Many duties were devolved, by that law, upon the governor, and also upon the Departmental Assembly, where each was required to act independently of the other. But other duties were prescribed, in the performance of which the governor and the Assembly were required to act in concurrence. In the latter class, the governor could not act separately, though in some instances it was competent for the Assembly to act in his absence.

Concurrent duties, it seems, were usually performed in open session, in which the governor, when present, presided; but he had no vote, except when, from absence or otherwise, the members present were equally divided. The Assembly consisted of seven members, chosen by the electors qualified to vote for deputies to the General Congress.

Those in charge of the Supreme Government, or some of them, had been much in public life, and it must be presumed that the dispatch under consideration was not framed without some reference to that law. On examining the words employed in the law, to express and define concurrent action, and comparing them with the words of the dispatch translated "as in concurrence with," we find they are the same in the original language. Further support to the construction here adopted is derived from the declared purpose of the dispatch, as appears in its recitals. Mexican authorities had long dreaded the approach of foreigners to her western coast, and the language of the dispatch shows that its great and controlling purpose was to promote the settlement of the unoccupied islands by trustworthy citizens of the nation, with a view to ward off that apprehended danger. They feared that those islands, especially those further south and nearer to the track of commerce into the Pacific Ocean, might become the resort of military adventurers, and be selected by those desirous of invading that remote department as places of rendezvous or shelter; and in the hope of averting that danger, or, in case of its approach, of supplying the means of timely information, they desired that their own citizens might preoccupy those exposed positions. In this view of the subject, the President, no doubt, regarded the power to be exercised under the dispatch, as one of importance and delicacy, and might well have desired to prescribe some check upon the action of the governor; and if so, it would have been difficult to have devised one more consonant with the then existing laws upon the general subject, or better suited to the attainment of the object in view, than the one chosen in this dispatch.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the governor, under the circumstances of this case, had no authority, without the concurrence of the Departmental Assembly, to make this grant. Whether the person specially designated in the dispatch as the fit subjects for the bounty of the government stand in any better situation or not, is not a question in this case. Having come to the conclusion that the grant is void, it does not become necessary to consider the evidence offered to prove possession. On that point, it will be sufficient to say, it is conflicting and unsatisfactory; and if true, is not of a character to show any right or title in the land under the Mexican Government, or any equity in the claimant, under the Act of Congress requiring the adjudications to be made.

The decree of the district court is, therefore, reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

THE UNITED STATES, Appt.,

v.

ANTONIO MARIA OSIO.

Argued Feb. 13, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This is the same as the preceding case, and the same counsel appeared.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the following order:

This is an appeal from a decree of the District Court for the Northern District of California, affirming a decree of the Land Commissioners.

On examination of the transcript we find it is the same case as the preceding, in which the opinion has been delivered reversing the decree of the district court—by some mistake two transcripts of the record were taken out in the court below, and each has been docketed in this court.

Accordingly, the case is dismissed, but no procedendo will issue to the district court.

THE UNITED STATES,

v.

JAMES NOE.

(See S. C., 23 How., 312-318.)

Specific performance—stale demand—laches—abandoned land claim.

It is a general principle of equity, to grant a decree of specific performance only in cases where there is a mutuality of obligation, and when the remedy is mutual.

It will not be rendered in favor of one who has been guilty of an unreasonable delay in fulfilling his part of the engagement or who has slept for a long period on his rights, and comes forward at last, when circumstances have changed in his favor, to enforce a stale demand.

It would be unjust to revive long antecedent covenants and dormant engagements in California, since the change in the condition of that country, where they were treated as abandoned.

Where, in a claim of a Mexican grant, nothing was done to place the claim of the applicants upon the records of the department, and the duty of a colonist was wholly disregarded, the claim must be treated as one abandoned prior to the date of the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo, and not entitled to confirmation.

Argued Feb. 7, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

CROSS appeals from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for U. S.:

There is but one point in this case, and that is too simple to admit of any elaboration.

There was no grant. There was a petition with a marginal order, but that marginal order was not a grant, although Alvarado swears that it was. The court is bound to give it this proper legal construction, independent of all oral evidence. Alvarado did not swear to the truth when he said that he considered and regarded it as a definitive grant, passing the title out of the nation and vesting it in Elwell. If he had so regarded it, why did he not make it in the proper form, and according to the laws and customs of the government under which he was acting? Why was it that he caused no record of it to be made on book, nor the espediente to be filed among the archives, as the law upon the subject expressly and positively commanded him to do? If the papers produced from the private custody of the claimant could for a moment be deemed regular, in other respects, the objection that they are not on record and that there is no record at all of the grant, would be fatal to the validity of the claim.

Messrs. Calhoun Benham and F. Marbury, for Noe.

The title is valid. The petition and concession, taken together, disclose proper parties, a definite object, a good and valuable consideration, and apt and competent words of grant operative in præsenti. These elements constitute a good grant. It is true there are two conditions expressed on the face of the grant to which it is subject. The grant is good under the Colonization Law of 1824 and the Regulations of 1828.

The informe was not necessary in fact or law. Reg. 1828, art. 3.

Objection has been taken to the grant that it lacks formality; that it is not couched in the words usually employed by the Mexican authorities. This is immaterial. If the instrument contains words which express, or from which we can even collect, an intention or a promise to grant, it is good.

Larkin's case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 563.

The land was not occupied, but it was situated in a very remote quarter of the country, in the midst of hostile Indians. This rendered settlement impossible, for several years after the date of the grant, and until political disturbances arose which prevented the grantee from occupying it up to the change of flags.

In regard to this point, the case is stronger than Frémont's. Elwell's inability to make a diseno at the time the petition was presented, was stated as in that case, and as the evidence discloses it, for the same reasons. Here its preliminary production was dispensed with, as in that case, and the conditions usually imposed were not inserted in the grant. Yet, in the Frémont case, where the conditions were imposed, the court expressed themselves as being encouraged in holding him excused for his default, because the Mexican Governor had dispensed with the diseno for the reasons urged.

There could not, however, be default in this case, for no time was fixed for performance.

Arredondo's case, 6 Pet., 745.

The presumption of abandonment cannot arise. There was no denouncement, and the right was unimpaired at the date of cession. Denouncement was necessary to devest the grant.

Frémont's case, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 563.

The grant passes the whole island. The petitioner asks for the island, and the governor grants what is asked for; it is already segregated. The question of quantity is adjudicated. The court will not go behind the act of the governor. The act does not, nor with propriety can, show what the area is.

If the call for quantity is repugnant to metes and bounds, it must give way, especially when the call for metes and bounds is shown by the evidence to have been the one chiefly relied upon at the time the description was made.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

Robert Elwell, in a petition to Governor Alvarado, that bears date in 1841, represents that he had resided in the country sixteen years, was married to one of the natives, and had a numerous family, and had been employed in commercial business; that his capital had been impaired, and he had been reduced to enlist as a private soldier in the militia, and had served in the year 1838, under the command of the governor, in the south, and had received no compensation. He solicits of the governor, as a generous recompense to his subordinate, and also with a view to promote the progress of agriculture, to confer upon him a concession of a parcel of land situated in the northern frontier, and forming an island in the Sacramento River, eighteen leagues from the establishment of Don Aug. Sutter, containing five square leagues.

The governor, in March, 1841, "in consideration of the services and merits specified," grants the land asked for, the claimant to abide the reports, as to whether the land is vacant, with whatever else that is proper, and that he shall furnish the diseno in order to commence the espediente.

Two days before the claim was presented to the Board of Commissioners in 1852, Elwell conveyed his claim to the appellee. He (Elwell) was examined as a witness, and testifies that he had presented a diseno some three months after he had exhibited his petition; that there was no information or formal report made to the governor, and that he had never occupied the land or had judicial possession delivered to him; that there was no officer to perform these duties.

There is some testimony to show that Noe had a tenant on the land in 1851, who inhabited a small house, and that the whole region of the Sacramento above Sutter's fort was not in a situation to be occupied, owing to the dangerous character of the Indians.

The Board of Commissioners rejected this claim; but, on appeal, their sentence was reversed by the district court, and the claim confirmed to the entire island, provided it did not contain more than eleven leagues. From this decree cross appeals have been prosecuted to this court.

As an inducement to the allowance of his petition, the applicant refers to the services he had rendered to the governor in a military campaign; but the consideration of the grant is the proposed improvement of the department, by the settlement and occupation of its waste lands. The authority of the governor to make the grant is derived from the laws that provide for that object.

The decree of the governor indicates that the title was to be perfected in the usual manner; and consequently, that it was to be subject to the conditions of colonization. An interval of eleven years elapsed from the date of this decree till the presentation of the claim to the Board or Commissioners in 1852. During this time, the applicant took no step towards the completion of his title, or the fulfillment of the obligations it imposed. There is no espediente in the archives to show the segregation of this island from the public domain, nor report to the Departmental Assembly or the Supreme Government to testify that a citizen had been enlisted, "to give impulse to the progress of agriculture in the country." There was no delivery of judicial possession, nor any other assertion of right, by which the inhabitants could be charged with notice of this claim. A great change has taken place in the condition of the country, and other persons have assumed to settle and improve the land, which the applicant failed to do.

It is a general principle of equity, to grant a decree of specific performance only in cases where there is a mutuality of obligation, and when the remedy is mutual, and that it will not be rendered in favor of one who has been guilty of an unreasonable delay in fulfilling his part of the engagement, or who has slept for a lengthened period on his rights and comes forward at last, when circumstances have changed in his favor, to enforce a stale demand. And it would be manifestly unjust to revive long antecedent covenants and dormant engagements in California, since the change in the condition and circumstances of that country, where it is evident that they were treated as abandoned, and imposing no obligation previously to that change.

The only explanation for the laches of the applicant is found in the testimony of the witnesses Castro and Combs, who say: "The whole of the region of country of the Sacramento above Sutter's fort, or New Helvetia, was not in a situation to be settled upon by individual grantees, owing to the hostilities of the Indians;" "that the Indians were numerous and hostile."

But this fact existed at the date of the decree in 1841, and will account for the abandonment of the purpose, that the applicant seems to have entertained at one time, of making a settlement. It is hardly probable that he could have anticipated the revolution that took place long afterwards in the condition of the country, and was then preparing to avail himself of the advantage to be derived from it.

In The United States v. Kingsley, 12 Pet., 476, the claimant sought to excuse the non-performance of the condition, because "the country was in a disturbed and dangerous state, from the date of the grant, and for a long time previous, till the transfer of the province." The court say: "All the witnesses concur in stating there was no more danger after the appellee petitioned for the land than there had been before and at the date of the application. The appellee, then, cannot be permitted to urge as an excuse, in fact or in law, for not complying with his undertaking, a danger which applies as forcibly to repudiate the sincerity of his intention" to improve the land when he petitioned, as it does "his inability from such danger to execute it afterwards."

The court say: that "concessions of land upon condition have been repeatedly confirmed by the court, and it will apply the principles of its adjudications to all cases of a like kind. It will, as it has done, liberally construe the performance of conditions precedent or subsequent in such grants. It has not nor will it apply, in the construction of such conditions in such cases, the rules of the common law. But this court cannot say a condition wholly unperformed, without strong proof of sufficient cause to prevent it, does not defeat all right of property in land, under such a decree as the appellee in this case makes the foundation of his claim."

In De Vilemont v. United States, 18 How., 261, the court say: "The only consideration on which such a title could be founded was inhabitation and cultivation, either by De Vilemont himself or his tenants; and having done nothing of the kind, he had no right to a title; nor can the excuse be heard, that he was prevented from a compliance with the conditions by the hostility of the Indians, as he took his concession subject to that risk."

In the cases of The U. S. v. Frémont, 17 How., 560, and U. S. v. Reading, 18 How., 1, the court have considered the effect of the conditions usually accompanying the grants to land in California, and how far their fulfillment is to be exacted in determining the validity of those claims. The court say, in the first case, "there is nothing in the language of the conditions, taking them altogether, nor in their evident object and policy, which would justify the court in declaring the lands forfeited to the government, where no other person sought to appropriate them, and their performance had not been unreasonably delayed."

In the latter case, it is shown that the grantee displayed good faith and reasonable diligence to perform the conditions annexed to his grant; and all presumptions of an abandonment of his claim were repelled by affirmative and satisfactory proof.

But, in the present instance, we find nothing to have been done to place the claim of the applicant upon the records of the department; and the duty of a colonist was wholly disregarded. Within the doctrine of the cases we have cited, the claim must be treated as one abandoned prior to the date of the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo, and is not entitled to the confirmation.

Decree of the district court reversed; cause remanded; petition to be dismissed.

THE UNITED STATES, Appt.,

v.

FRANCISCO PICO ET AL.

When Mexican authority over public lands terminated—invalid claim.

In the Act of Congress of 1851, and the decisions of this court, the 7th July, 1846, is referred to as the epoch at which the power of the Governor of California, under the authority of Mexico, to alienate the public domain, terminated.

Where, previously to that date, the claimant did not acquire a title to the land, nor has he acquired an equitable claim to it by any act done upon the land in the fulfillment of the colonization policy of the State, the decree in his favor must be reversed and his petition dismissed.

Argued Feb. 16, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by the appellees, for the confirmation to them of a claim to a certain tract of land.

The Board of Land Commissioners entered a decree dismissing the petition. The district court, on appeal, reversed this decree and entered a decree confirming the claim; whereupon the United States took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellants:

This grant is not mentioned in any original index. Nor does it appear that any trace of the expedients or other paper pertaining to the grant existed among the archives earlier than 1858. The allegation that such a grant was made is, therefore, contradicted by the record.

In addition to that, an examination of the original papers will furnish occular demonstration that all of them, from beginning to end, are fabricated.

If we assume that the papers produced in this case are genuine and authentic, there is still no legal grant of the land, because—

1. There is no petition to the governor soliciting the land agreeably to the Regulations of 1828.

2. The marginal decree made by Pico upon the 11th of June, 1846, was not a grant, and does not profess to be a grant.

3. The grant itself, which is dated July 20, 1846, was after the conquest of the country by the American arms, and when the Mexican authorities had been entirely displaced and expelled.

4. There being no record evidence of the grant, there could be no legal title in the grantee.

Messrs. R. H. Gillet and Stanly & King, for appellees:

Facts Proved in the Record.

The signatures to the title papers are proved to be genuine.

The grant and steps taken to procure it are proved.

Possession was not taken immediately, because of the hostility of the Indians and the unsettled state of the country.

Argument.

1. No evidence can be admitted in this court in cases on appeal, which was not offered and admitted in the court below.

2. No question can be raised or decided on appeal, which was not raised below.

3. When an equitable title is once vested under a grant by an officer having the power to make grants, it cannot be devested by the government except upon a legal denouncement by a third person.

4. Conditions subsequent, if not performed, do not render a grant void nor authorize the government to forfeit the grantee's rights for its own use.

5. By the laws, usages and customs of Mexico, a grant is valid when by its terms it constitutes a conveyance, whether it conforms to the usual formalities or not.

6. It is to be presumed that in making the grant the governor performed his duty, and those who dispute that he did, must prove it.

7. The United States, as the subsequent grantee of Mexico, cannot deny the former recitals of the latter in relation to those contained in its previous grant of the same land to the claimant.

8. The regulations relating to the formalities in making the grants are directory and not mandatory, and if not strictly conformed to, do not destroy the validity of the grant.

9. The grant having been made, in fact, June 11, 1846, and the final title papers ordered, an equitable right vested in the grantee which has not been devested; on the 11th of June the last act had been performed by the claimant which he could perform to perfect his title, and the governor had made his decree and conceded what had been asked. Everything had been done but a final act which the government was bound to perform, and this duty devolved upon the United States under the Treaty. The claimant's rights became vested, and no neglect of officials after that, if there had been any, could deprive him of his right.

10. If the paper dated July 20, 1846, at Los Angeles, is held to be the origin of the title, such title is valid, and in no way affected by the American forces taking possession of Monterey only thirteen days previous thereto.

Monterey is on the Pacific coast, from one hundred to two hundred miles southerly of San Francisco, and near that distance southwest of the grant in question, and about four hundred miles northerly of Los Angeles.

Under such circumstances, the acts of the Mexican authorities at a distance from the places occupied by the American forces, and at points where they did not attempt to control, must be as valid and effectual as at any anterior period. The former laws remained in force, and these authorized the governor to make grants. These laws were not annulled and others made in their place; the former officials were not removed, nor others substituted.

The political branch of the government having fixed the date of the acquisition of California, this court cannot alter it or fix one for itself. That branch fixed the date of the American acquisition on the 2d of February, 1848, and agreed to protect those who had previously who had previously acquired rights under Mexico, not excepting those dated after Feb. 7, 1846.

11. The title of the United States to lands in California, dates, not from the commencement of hostilities, but from the date of the Treaty by which we acquired them.

Before the war with Mexico, we had no claim upon the lands in California or elsewhere. When the American flag was raised at Monterey, July 7, 1846, it was not done by order of our government, nor did those who took possession know the existence of the war for more than a month afterwards.

This court, in Fleming v. Page, 9 How., 614, expressly declared that the war was not one of conquest.

This decision shows that our rights in California were those of military power, and that the country still belonged to Mexico as a part of her dominions. The United States have never claimed it as a conquest, but simply as a purchase. They bought and paid for it, and their title dates with the agreement of purchase. Prior to that, although they had taken possession, the title was in Mexico.

The Land Commission Act, section 11, makes no exceptions of the grants made after July 7, 1846, but extends to all cases alike, except city and village lots held by corporations. This exception (in section 14), proves that none was intended in the general provisions of the Act. It shows what was intended by Congress as well as by the Treaty. The war not having been prosecuted for conquest, the Treaty provided the purchase, and Congress took measures for confirming rights which had not passed to our government, but remained with Mexican grantees. Consequently the present grant must be confirmed, because it was made and completed before the Treaty under which our government claims.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, a Mexican by birth, obtained a decree of confirmation in the district court for a parcel of land, known as Las Calaveras, containing eight square leagues, and situated in Tuolumne County, in California.

His testimony is an espediente, existing in the archives, in the custody of the surveyor-general, from which it appears that the claimant presented, to the justice of the peace and military commandant at New Helvetia, a petition, representing that he desired to obtain a grant for the land described in his diseno; and, to expedite his purpose, he requested a favorable report. One was made, bearing date the 1st of May, 1846. A similar representation was made to the same officer in the district of Yerba Buena, who declined to act, because the place was not within his jurisdiction. The prefect of that portion of the department certifies, on the 18th of May, 1846, to the capacity of the claimant, and that the land was vacant. The governor, on the 11th of June, 1846, made an order for the issue of a titulo in form.

Here the espediente terminates; but the claimant produces from his custody a titulo, bearing date at Los Angeles, the 20th July, 1846.

To strengthen his case, he adduces the testimony of a witness, to the effect that the witness had built a house upon the land in 1847, and had occupied it as tenant from that date; that there were people who inhabited and cultivated the land for the claimant, and that before 1847 the disturbances in the country hindered any improvement or settlement.

This testimony is contradicted by a witness produced on the part of the United States, who testifies with precision, and seems to have had every opportunity of acquiring exact information. He says that he came to reside in the vicinity of the land in 1848, and that there had been no improvement or occupation of it, and that the cattle seen upon the land did not belong to the claimant; that he had never heard of a claim by the petitioner until 1858.

There are grave objections to the allowance of this claim. There is a departure from the regular and usual modes for securing lands under the Colonization Laws. There is some reason to believe that the governor was not at Los Angeles at the date of the order; and there is a failure to show, in any satisfactory manner, any assertion of claim or title under it, until the presentation of the claim, in 1853, to the Board of Commissioners. The claimant is a kinsman of the governor, and we should expect to find on the part of the governor the most exact attention to the laws prescribing rules for his guidance under such circumstances. Besides, the titulo bears date of a day when the conquest of Upper California had been completed by the military occupation of Monterey, Sonoma, Bodega, Yerba Buena, and the region of the Sacremento and American Rivers, by the forces of the United States.

The commandant in that portion of the department was making a rapid retreat to Lower California, leaving the country to the control of the United States. From the capture of Monterey, on the 7th July, 1846, till the surrender of Los Angeles and the organization of a territorial government by Commodore Stockton, under the United States, there was scarcely six weeks. The Californian Government, for all practical purposes, was subverted by the capture of Monterey and the country north of it.

In the Act of Congress of 1851 (9 Stat at L., 631), and the decisions of this court, that day is referred to as the epoch at which the power of the Governor of California, under the authority of Mexico, to alienate the public domain, terminated. Previously to that date, the claimant did not acquire a title to the land, nor has he acquired an equitable claim to it by any act done upon the land in the fulfillment of the colonization policy of the State.

Upon the whole case, our opinion is, that the appellee has not sustained the validity of his claim, and that the decree in his favor must be reversed, and his petition dismissed.

WILLIAM WISEMAN, Plff. in Er.,
v.
ACHILLE CHIAPPELLA.

(S. C., 32 How., 368-380.)

What sufficient demand of payment of bill, when the acceptors are absent—demand need not be personal—demand at residence or office—when made—prima facie evidence—when usage governs.

Going several times to the office of the acceptors of a bill in order to demand payment for the same, and finding the doors closed, and no person there to answer the demand, is a sufficient demand.

Further inquiry for them was not required by the custom of merchants.

From such an artifice the law will presume that they did not intend to pay the bill on the day when it has become due, and that further inquiries need not be made for them before a protest can be made for non-payment.

A demand for payment need not be personal, and it will be sufficient if it shall be made at acceptor's house or place of business in business hours.

It is sufficient if the bill be taken to the residence of the acceptor, as that may be stated in the bill, for the purpose of demanding payment, and to show that the house was shut up, and that no one was there.

Presentment for payment must be made on the day the bill falls due; and if there be no one ready at the place to pay the bill, it should be treated as dishonored, and protested.

In the presentment of a bill for payment, the demand may be made of a merchant acceptor at his counting room or place of business.

If that be closed, so in fact that a demand cannot be made, or the acceptor is not to be found at his place of business and has left no one there to pay it, it will be considered as due diligence, and further inquiry for him is not necessary.

Presenting a bill under such circumstances at the place of business of the acceptor will be prima facie, evidence that it has been done at a proper time of the day.

The notary is protected where the protest was made in conformity with the practice and law of the place, where the bill was payable.

Argued Feb. 28, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

NOTE.—Certificate of notary, evidence of what facts. Demand, presentment, and notice. When drawer or indorser not entitled to notice. See note to Fenwick v. Sears, 5 U. S. (1 Cranch), 259.

Liability of notary in protest of paper, and of bank employing him.

A notary, by accepting the office and entering upon the discharge of its duties, contracts with

This case arose upon a petition filed in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, to recover the amount of a foreign bill of exchange from the notary who had been employed to protest it, and through whose negligence, it was alleged, the drawers were discharged.

The case having been submitted to the court by the parties, a judgment was entered by the court in favor of the defendant on two grounds:

First. That the protest was sufficient.

Second. That the action was prescribed; whereupon the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for plaintiff in error:

1. The protest was insufficient. Calling at the office of the acceptors of the bill and finding it closed, is not such due diligence as will excuse the want of presentment and demand.

The necessity for due diligence is not questioned; but cases are cited in the opinion of the court, to show that the action of the notary was sufficient to constitute due diligence. These cases seem to us not to warrant the inference drawn by the court, but rather to establish the reverse.

In the case of The Union Bank v. Fowlkes, 2 Sneed, 555, the court held that want of presentment and demand was excused because the place of business was open, but no one had been left there to answer; the court expressly stated that if it had been closed, further diligence would have been necessary.

In the case of Shed v. Brett, 1 Pick., 413, the court held that plaintiff must be nonsuited if the demand at the place of business was not proven to have been made in business hours. The protest in the present case does not allege any visit in business hours.

In the case of The Branch Bank at Decatur v. Hodges, 17 Ala., 42, there was actual presentment and demand of the book-keeper of the acceptors at their counting room.

In the case of Brown v. Turner, 15 Ala., 832, there was actual demand of the agent of one partner, both partners being absent.

In Watson v. Templeton, 11 La. Ann., 187, the court held that as against a partnership, the want of demand was excused where the bill was presented at the commercial domicil within the usual business hours, but reserved its opinion as to cases where a person does business alone, and has a dwelling as well as a place of business, which is found closed. In support of this distinction between bills accepted by a firm and those accepted by individuals, the court cites Story on Promissory Notes, sec. 235; but we have sought in vain in the authority referred to and elsewhere, for anything to sustain this distinction, which seems to be quite a novel doctrine in the law of bills and notes.

In Williams v. Bank of U. S., 2 Pet., 96, and the case of Goldsmith v. Bland, therein cited and approved, there was, in the former case, further inquiry and information received, that the party and his family had left town on a visit; and in the latter, there was no person in the counting-house in the ordinary hours of business; but the counting-room is not stated to have been closed, the implication being, on the contrary, that it was open.

The foregoing are all the authorities cited in the opinion of the circuit court, no one of which goes the length required to sustain the validity of the protest now in dispute.

The authorities, to show its insufficiency, are very numerous.

M'Gruder v. Bank of Washington, 9 Wheat., 601; Granite Bank v. Ayres, 16 Pick., 392; Ellis v. Commercial Bank of Natchez, 7 How., Miss., 294; Follain v. Dupre, 11 Rob., 470; Collins v. Butler, 2 Str., 1087.

The rule as laid down by all text writers is, that if the acceptors have absconded and cannot be found, presentment and demand being impossible, the want of them is excused; but even where the acceptor has become bankrupt, or has removed to another place within the same State, or is absent on a journey, yet, if he has a dwelling, demand must be made there, in order to hold the other party.

Story, Prom. N., secs. 237, 238; Story, Bills, secs. 351, 352; Byles, Bills, pp. 141, 159; Chit., Bills, pp. 355, 383.

The only cases where want of jurisdiction and effort to find a party have been excused, are those where a place of payment is designated in the bill or note.

Mr. Louis Janin, for defendant in error:

those who employ him that he will perform such duty with integrity, diligence and skill. Like other ministerial officers, he is liable in damages to any person specially injured by his omission to perform or by his unskillful performance of a ministerial duty. Fogarty v. Finlay, 10 Cal., 239; Kinnard v. Willmore, 2 Heisk., 619; Hover v. Barkhoff, 44 N. Y., 113; Sawyer v. Corse, 17 Gratt., 230.

The statute prescribing the powers and duties of notaries generally declares their liability to a private action for damages resulting from negligence. Fogarty v. Finlay, 10 Cal., 239; 2 N. Y. R. S., 284, sec. 48.

Notaries are usually employed by bankers to protest bills of exchange, and it is the well settled law of many of the States that a banker who employs a competent notary is not liable for the notary's neglect to perform his duty. Tiernan v. Com. B'k of Natchez, 7 How. (Miss.), 648; 7 M. & S., 592; Bowling v. Arthur, 34 Miss., 41; Jackson v. Union B'k, 6 Harr. & J., 146; Bellemire v. B'k of U. S., 4 Whart., 105; 4 Rawle, 384; East Haddam B'k v. Scovill, 12 Conn., 303; Stacy v. Dane County B'k, 12 Wis., 629; Fabens v. Mercantile B'k, 23 Pick., 330; Hyde v. Planters' B'k, 17 La., 566; Frazier v. Gas B'k, 2 Rob., 286; Baldwin v. B'k of La., 1 La., Ann., 13. But see, contra, Thompson v. B'k of South Carolina, 3 Hill. (S. C.), 77; Allen v. Merchants' B'k, 22 Wend., 215; Ayrault v. Pacific B'k, 47 N. Y., 570; S. C., 7 Am. Rep., 489.

Party cannot recover from a notary for having neglected to protest a note legally, when, by his own laches, he has put it out of his power to subrogate the notary to his rights as they existed at the date of protest. Emmerling v. Graham, 14 La. Ann., 389; Franklin v. Smith, 21 Wend., 624; Reed v. Darlington, 19 Iowa, 349.

A notary is liable for loss occasioned by his negligence in failing to discharge his duty in protesting and delivering, or mailing notices of protest as required by law. Want of diligence or skill on his part must be shown. He is not liable in a matter in which judicial construction was necessary to enable him to know what his duty was. Neal v. Taylor, 9 Bush., 380.

A notary is not presumed to be a lawyer who is to revise or reverse the decision of his employer, as to the character of a bill, and as to whether it is entitled to days of grace or not. If, therefore, a bill is delivered to him with directions to make demand, and protest upon the wrong day, a right of action does not arise against him on account of the error. He is not guilty of negligence in proceeding according to the instructions of the bank giving him the draft to protest. Commercial B'k of Ky. v. Varnum, 49 N. Y., 269; S. C., 7 Hun, 236.

The circuit court held: first, that the demand was sufficient; second, that if it was insufficient, this action was barred by the prescription of one year under article 3501 of the Civil Code of Louisiana.

1. On the first point, the court cites Union Bank v. Fowlkes, 2 Sneed, 555; Shed v. Brett, 1 Pick., 413; Branch Bank at Decatur v. Hodges, 17 Ala., 42; Brown v. Turner, 15 Ala., 832; Burbank v. Beach, 15 Barb., 326.

The Louisiana case referred to by the circuit court, but not quoted, is the case of Watson v. Templeton, 11 La. Ann., 137.

Again in Nott's Exr. v. Beard, 16 La., 308, the notary certified that "at the request of the holder of the original draft, whereof a true copy is on the reverse hereof written, I demanded payment of said draft at the counting-house, &c." The counsel for the defendant contended that the protest should say that the bill was presented and payment thereof demanded. The court held that this was not necessary, and said: "we are disposed to give such meaning to terms used by public officers as will be understood by the mass of mankind."

"The Act of the Legislature passed in 1827, vests notaries with certain powers in relation to these matters and gives more authenticity to their acts than to private individuals. They are public officers and the presumption of law is that they do their duty."

The following English cases support the same doctrine: Buxton v. Jones, 1 Man. & G., 89; Hine v. Allely, 4 B. & Ad., 627, and 24 Eng. C. L., 127. It was shown that on the day when the bill became due it was taken to the place of payment, but the house was shut up and no further presentment could be made. The court held that there was a presentment. See, also, Burbridge v. Manners, 3 Campb., 193.

The counsel for the plaintiff, indeed, endeavors to distinguish these cases from the one before the court, because the number of the acceptor's residence was there stated in the face of the bill. But while the courts evidently speak of well known places where the presentment is to be made, they lay no stress upon the manner in which they became known. The proper place to present a bill to a firm is undoubtedly their counting-house; and whether that be known to the notary by the number of the house stated in the bill, or in any other positive manner, the reason of the thing and the conclusion of the thing must be the same. Here the notary knew the counting-house so well and so positively that he went to it several times.

The plaintiff in this action alleges that he is the holder and owner of a certain bill of exchange for $2,045.45, dated at Vicksburg, in the State of Mississippi, May 13th, 1855, and payable on the 23d November, 1855, which had been drawn by John A. Durden and A. Durden on William Langton & Co., of New Orleans, and accepted by them, payable to the order of Langton, Sears & Co., and by that firm indorsed in blank. He further declares that the bill, when it became due, was intrusted to the defendant, Achille Chiappella, a commissioned notary public for the City of New Orleans, to demand payment of it from the acceptors, and to protest the same for non-payment, should the acceptors dishonor it; and that from his carelessness in not making a legal demand of the acceptors, and from not having expressed it in the protest, that the indorsers of the bill had been discharged from their obligation to pay it, by a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi. He further alleges that the acceptors, payees, and indorsers, were insolvent, and that, from the insufficiency of the demand for payment to bind the drawers of the bill, the defendant had become indebted to him for its amount, with interest at the rate of five per cent. from the day that it became due, the 23d November, 1855.

The defendant certifies in his notarial protest that the bill had been handed to him on the day it was due; that he went several times to the office of the acceptors of it, in Gravier Street, in order to demand payment for the same, and he found the doors closed, and "no person there to answer my demand." It also appeared that one of the firm by which the bill had been accepted had a residence in New Orleans; that no demand for payment had been made individually upon him; and that no further inquiry had been made for the acceptors than the repeated calls which the notary states he had made at their office.

We think, under the circumstances, that such repeated calls at the office of the acceptors was a sufficient demand; that further inquiry for them was not required by the custom of merchants; and that the protest, extended as it had been, is in conformity with what is now generally considered to be the established practice in such matters in England and the United States. We say, under the circumstances, for, as there is no fixed mode for making such a demand in all cases, each case as it occurs must be decided on its own facts.

We have not been able to find a case, either in our own or in the English reports, in which it has been expressly ruled that a merchant, acceptor of a foreign bill of exchange, having a notorious place of business, has been permitted to close it up during the business hours of the day, thus avoiding the obligation of his acceptance on the day of its maturity, and then that he was allowed to claim that the bill ought to have been presented to him for payment elsewhere than at his place of business. Though such conduct is not absconding, in the legal sense of that word, to avoid the payment of creditors, it must appear, when unexplained, to be an artifice inconsistent with the obligations of an acceptor, from which the law will presume that he does not intend to pay the bill on the day when it has become due.

The plaintiff in this case does not deny that the office of the acceptors was closed, as the notary states it to have been. The only fact upon which he relies to charge the defendant with neglect is, that one of the firm of Langton, Sears & Co. resided in New Orleans, and that it was the duty of the notary to have made inquiry for him at his residence. No presumption, under such circumstances, can be made, that the acceptors had removed to another place of business, or that they were not intentionally absent from it on the day that they knew the bill was payable. This case, then, must be determined on the fact of the designed absence of the acceptors on that day; and that inference is strenghtened by no one having been left there to represent them.

All merchants register their acceptances in a bill book. It cannot be presumed that they will be unmindful of the days when they are matured. Should their counting-rooms be closed on such days, the law will presume that it has been done intentionally, to avoid payment, and on that account, that further inquiries need not be made for them before a protest can be made for non-payment.

Cases can be found, and many of them, in which furtlrer inquiries than a call at a place of of business of a merchant acceptor has been deemed proper, and in which such inquiries not having been made, has been declared to be a want of due diligence in making a demand for payment; but the rulings in such cases will be found to have been made on account of some peculiar facts in them which do not exist in this case. And in the same class of cases it has been ruled that the protest should contain a declaration by the notary that his call to present a bill for payment had been made in the business hours of the day; but in no case has the latter ever been presumed in favor of an acceptor, whose place of business has been so closed that a demand for payment could not be made there upon himself or upon some one left there to attend to his business.

Lord Ellenborough said, in the case of Crosse v. Smith, 1 M. & S., 545: "The counting house is a place where all appointments respecting business and all notices should be addressed; and it is the duty of the merchant to take care that proper persons shall be in attendance." It was also ruled in that case, that a verbal message, imparting the dishonor of a bill, sent to the counting-house of the drawer during the hours of business, on two successive days, the messenger knocking there, and making a noise sufficient to be heard within, and no one coming, was sufficient notice.

In this case the facts were, that Fea & Co. had a counting-house at Hull, where they were merchants, and one lived within one mile and the other within ten miles of Hull. The Monday after Smith & Co. received the bill, their clerk went to give notice, and called the counting-house of Fea & Co. about half after ten o'clock. He found the outer door open; the inner one locked. He knocked so that he must have been heard, had anyone been there, waited two or three minutes, and went away; and on his return from the counting-room he saw Fea & Co.'s attorney, and told him. The next Monday he went again at the same hour, but with no better success. No written notice was left, nor was any notice sent to the residence of either of the parties. The court took time to consider, and then held, without any reference to the clerk having called at the counting-house two successive days, that going to the counting-house at a time it should have been open was sufficient, and that it was not necessary to leave a written notice, or to send to the residence of either of the parties.

In Bancroft and Hall, Holt, N. P., 476, the plaintiff received notice of the bill's dishonor at Manchester, 24th May. The same day he sent a letter by a private hand to his agent at Liverpool, to give defendant notice. The agent called at the defendant's counting-house about 6 or 7 P. M.; but the counting-house was shut up, and the defendant did not receive notice of the dishonor of the bill until the morning of the 27th—Monday. Two points were ruled: 1st. That sending by a private hand to an agent to give notice was sufficient; 2d. That it was sufficient for the agent to take the ordinary mode to give notice—the ordinary time of shutting up was eight or nine. Where the indorser of a note shut up his house in town soon after the note was made, and before it became due, and retired to his house in the country, intending, however, only a temporary residence in the country, it was held that a notice left at his house, by having been put into the key hole, was sufficient to charge him. Stewart v. Eden, 2 Caines, 121.

This court held, in Williams v. Bk. of U. S., 2 Pet., 96, that sufficient diligence had been shown on the part of the holder of the note to charge the indorser, under the following circumstances: a notary public employed for the purpose called at the house of an indorser of a note, to give him notice of its dishonor; and finding the house shut and locked, ascertained from the nearest resident that the indorser and his family had left town on a visit. He made no further inquiry where the indorser had gone, or how long he was expected to be absent, and made no attempt to ascertain whether he had left any person in town to attend to his business, but he left a notice of the dishonor of the note at an adjoining house requesting the occupant to give it to the indorser upon his return.

In making a demand for an acceptance, the party ought, if possible, to see the drawee personally, or some agent appointed by him to accept; and diligent inquiry must be made for him, if he shall not be found at his house or place of business, but a demand for payment need not be personal, and it will be sufficient if it shall be made at one or the other place, in business hours. Chitty, 274, 367.

It was formerly the practice, if the house of the acceptor was shut up when the holder called there to present the bill for payment, and no person was there to represent him, and it appeared that he had removed, that the holder was bound to make efforts to find out to what place he had removed, and there make a payment. Such, however, is no longer the practice either in England or the United States, nor has it been in the United States for many years. It is now sufficient if the bill shall be taken to the residence of the acceptors, as that may be stated in the bill, for the purpose of demanding payment, and to show that the house was shut up, and that no one was there. Hine v. Allely, 4 B. & Ad., 624. It has been decided by the Supreme Court in Tennessee, that the protest of a foreign bill of exchange, drawn upon a firm in New Orleans, with no place of payment designated, where it appeared that the deputy of a regularly commissioned notary had called several times at the office of the acceptors to make demand of payment, but found no one there of whom the demand could be made, was sufficient to excuse a demand, and to fix the liability of the indorsers to whom notice had been given. Union Bank v. Fowlkes, 2 Sneed, 555. The Supreme Court of Louisiana, in Watson v. Templeton, 11 La. Ann., 137, declares "that a demand made within the usual hours of business, at the commercial domicil of a partnership, for the payment of a note or bill due by the firm, is a sufficient presentment; that it was not necessary to make a further demand at the private residences of individual persons. The place of business is the domicil of the firm, and it is their duty to have suitable persons there to receive and answer all demands of business made at that place." Going with a promissory note, to demand payment, to the place of business of the notary, in business hours, and finding it shut, is using due diligence. Shed v. Brett, 1 Pick., 413.

In the case of The Branch Bk., at Decatur v. Hodges, 17 Ala., 42, the Supreme Court of Alabama say: "The court below excluded the protest for non-payment, because the presentment is stated thereon to have been made of the bookkeeper of the drawees in their counting-room, they being absent. This was erroneous. The bill was presented at the place of business of the firm, at their counting-room. If they had intended to pay the bill, it was their duty to have been present on the day of payment, or have left means for making such payment in charge of some one authorized to make it. The notary finding them absent from their place of business, and their book-keeper there, might well make protest of the dishonor of the bill for non-payment upon presentment to and refusal by him." When upon presentment for acceptance, the drawee does not happen to be found at his house or counting-room, but is temporarily absent, and no one is authorized to give an answer whether the bill will be accepted or not, in such case it would seem the holder is not bound to consider it as a refusal to accept, but he may wait a reasonable time for the return of the drawee. He may present the bill on the next day, but this delay is not allowable in a presentment for payment. This must be made on the day the bill falls due; and if there be no one ready at the place to pay the bill, it should be treated as dishonored, and protested. Story on Bills, sec. 250; Chit. on Bills, 9 ed., 400. The Supreme Court of New York has ruled that where a notary's entry case states that presentment and demand were made at the maturity of a bill, at the office of C. & S., the acceptors, this language imports that the office was their place of business, and it will be presumed in favor of the notary, that the time in the day was proper. Burbank, President of Eagle Bank of Rochester, v. Beach, 15 Barb., 326.

The preceding citation is in conformity with what the Supreme Court of New York had ruled thirteen years before, in the case of The Cayuga Bank v. Hunt, 2 Hill, 635. Its language is that where a notarial certificate of a protest of a bill of exchange stated a presentment for payment at the office of an acceptor, on the proper day, and that the office was closed, but was silent as to the hour of the day of doing the act, that it it was sufficient, and that regularity in that particular should be presumed.

We infer, from all the cases in our books, notwithstanding many of them are contradictory to subsequent decisions, that the practice now, both in England and the United States, does not require more to be done, in the presentment of a bill of exchange to an acceptor for payment, than that the demand should be made of a merchant acceptor at his counting room or place of business; and if that be closed, so in fact that a demand cannot be made, or that the acceptor is not to be found at his place of business, and has left no one there to pay it, that further inquiry for him is not necessary, and will be considered as due diligence; and that presenting a bill under such circumstances at the place of business of the acceptor will be, prima facie, evidence that it had been done at a proper time of the day. If that shall be denied, it must be shown by evidence.

But whatever may have been the differences between cases upon this subject, both in England and the United States, there has always been a requirement in both countries, and everywhere acknowledged in the United States, which protects the defendant in this suit from any responsibility to the plaintiff. The requirement is this: that the protest was made in this case in conformity with the practice and law of Louisiana, where the bill was payable. Rothschild v. Currie, 1 Ad. & El., 43; 11 Sm. & M., 182.

We are aware of the contrariety of opinion which prevailed for many years in regard to what should be considered due diligence in making a presentment of a bill of exchange for payment to an acceptor of it, under such circumstances as are certified to by the notary in this case. We have carefully examined most of them, from the case of Cotton v. Butler, 2 Strange, 1086, to the year 1856, and we have adopted those of later years as our best guide, and as having a better foundation in reason for the practice and the commercial law of the present day, and because we think it has mostly prevailed in the United States for thirty years.

As the view which we have taken of this case disposes of it in favor of the defendant, we shall not notice another point made in the argument in his behalf, which was that the plaintiff's right of action, if he ever had one against the defendant, was excluded by the Louisiana law of prescription.

We direct the affirmance of the judgment of the circuit court.

Sutter's general title.

This court has already expressed the opinion upon the merits of the general title of Sutter to California lands in several cases, and this case is decided in accordance therewith.

Submitted Feb. 23, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEALS from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

These cases arose upon petitions filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by the appellees, for the confirmation to them of claims to certain tracts of land.

The Board of Land Commissioners entered decrees confirming the claims in both cases.

The District Court of the United States having affirmed said decrees, on appeal, the United States took appeals to this court. A further statement appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellants.

Mr. A. Felch, for Emanuel Pratt.

Both cases were submitted on the records without argument in this court.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees in these suits were respectively confirmed in their claims to land in the valley of the Sacramento River.

Their applications were made to Micheltorena in 1844; and upon a reference, Captain Sutter reported that the land was vacant. Upon the advice of the secretary, further action was deferred until the governor could visit that portion of the department, and leave was given to the petitioner to occupy the land until that time.

In December of that year, the "general title" to Sutter was issued, and in 1845 or 1846, after the deposition of Micheltorena as governor, Sutter gave copies of that title to the petitioners. In the testimony of Sutter, in the case of Pratt, he says "that he applied for the paper a few weeks before the couriers arrived with it; that duplicates were sent to him, and that it was designed as a bounty to the soldiers who had served under him, for their services in the war."

We have already expressed our opinion upon the merits of this title in several cases, during this and the last term; and it remains only to say that the decrees of the district court must be reversed, and the causes remanded, with directions to the district court to dismiss the petition in each.

v.

WILLIAM CUSTARD.

(See S. C., 23 How., 484–487.)

Suit, when removable from Texas court to U. S. court.

By the 12th section of the Judiciary Act, a citizen of Massachusetts, when sued by a citizen of Texas, in a state court of Texas, no matter what the cause of action may be, provided it demand over $500, may remove the suit to the U. S. District Court.

The exception of the 11th section could have no possible application to the case.

Argued Feb. 29, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas.

The history of the case and the facts involved sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Fred. P. Stanton, for plaintiff in error:

The court below properly acquired jurisdiction of the case as made by the original petition, which alleged that Custard was a citizen of Texas, and Green, a citizen of Massachusetts.

Act of 1789, ch. 20, sec. 12.

The assignee of a judgment does now stand upon the same footing as the assignee of a note or other "chose in action."

1 Bouv. L. Dict., 227; Bobyshall v. Oppenheimer, 4 Wash. C. C., 482; Bean v. Smith, 2 Mason, C. C., 268, 269.

When the note was set up in the amended petition, neither Arthur nor Green being a citizen of Texas, the case then became one over which the United States court had no jurisdiction.

Gibson v. Chew, 16 Pet., 315; Dromgoole v. F. & M. Bank, 2 How., 241.

The court below was right in dismissing the original petition and refusing to take jurisdiction of the amendments; but it had no authority to remand the case to the state court; the only alternative was to dismiss it altogether.

The right to have his case tried in the federal court in a proper case for removal, is an absolute legal right in the party so removing it.

Ward v. Arredondo, 1 Paine's C. C., 410; Beardsley v. Torrey, 4 Wash., 286; Gibson v. Johnson, 1 Pet. C. C., 44; Gordon v. Longest, 16 Pet., 97.

It is only causes improperly removed which will be remanded.

Laws U. S. Courts, 147, which quotes Pollard v. Dwight, 4 Cranch, 421.

A party, after the removal of the cause, cannot amend so as to oust the jurisdiction of the federal court.

Wright v. Wells, 1 Pet. C. C., 220.

It may not be amiss to refer to the principles controlling the practice of the courts in Texas, in cases like the present. While they are very liberal in allowing new causes of action to be introduced by way of amendment, they except cases where, in the "mean time," between the filing of the original and amended petition, the Statute of Limitations had run, or some other defense valid in law "had accrued to the defendant, and which could have been set up had the original action been discontinued, or a new one commenced."

"The matter brought into the bill by amendment, will not have relation to the time of filing the original bill, but the suit will so far be considered as pending from the time of the amendment."

Henderson v. Kissam, 8 Tex., 53; Pridgin v. Strickland, 8 Tex., 427; Williams v. Randon, 10 Tex., 74; Kinney v. Lee, 10 Tex., 153.

The subsequent promises alleged were a new and distinct cause of action.

Coles v. Kelsey, 2 Tex., 541; Grayson v. Taylor, 14 Tex., 675; Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet., 360; Van Keuren v. Parmelee, 2 N. Y., 425.

Mr. G. W. Paschal, for defendant in error, made no argument in this court.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

This case originated in the District Court for the County of McLennan, in the State of Texas, where Custard had instituted his suit against Green by attachment, claiming to recover from him the balance due on a judgment entered on a mortgage given by Green to one Arthur, on lands in California. Green appeared, and moved to have his cause removed to the District Court of the United States, he being a citizen of Massachusetts, and Custard a citizen of Texas—the case coming clearly within the provisions of the 12th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789 (1 Stat. at L., 72).

It is probably because this case originated in a state court, that the court below permitted the counsel to turn the case into a written wrangle, instead of requiring them to plead as lawyers, in a court of common law. We had occasion already to notice the consequences resulting from the introduction of this hybrid system of pleading (so called) into the administration of justice in Texas. See Randon v. Toby, 11 How., 517, and Bennett v. Butterworth, 11 How., 669, with remarks on the same in McFaul v. Ramsey, 20 How., 525. This case adds another to the examples of the utter perplexity and confusion of mind introduced into the administration of justice, by practice under such codes.

Without attempting to trace the devious course of demurrers, replications, amendments, &c., &c., which disfigure this record, it may suffice to say that the plaintiff, beginning, after some time, to discover that he could not recover on his original cause of action, among other amendments set forth an entirely new cause of action, to wit: a note given by Green, payable to "Arthur or order," for $5,000, without any indorsement or assignment by Arthur to plaintiff, but which Custard alleged he had obtained "in due course of trade."

After further demurrers, exceptions, &c., &c., and after taking testimony in California, wholly irrelevant to any possible issue in the case, the record exhibits the following judgment:

"And now on this day came the parties by their attorneys, and the court being now sufficiently advised upon the questions submitted, is of opinion that the judgment, the original cause of action in this case, is not conclusive—in fact, is a nullity; but because the parties plaintiff have amended their petition herein, setting forth the note the base of said judgment, and as it has become a part of the pleadings in this case, and the court being of the opinion that, upon the note, the court is debarred from entertaining the case further in this court, for want of jurisdiction, it is therefore considered by the court that the cause ought to be remanded. It is, therefore, ordered and decreed that this case, with all the papers belonging to the same, be, and is hereby remanded to the District Court of McLennan County for further action."

So far as this judgment treats the original cause of action "as a nullity," it could not be objected to; and perhaps the same remark might have equally applied to the amended portion. But the conclusion, that the court had no jurisdiction to proceed further, and the order to remand the case to the state court to try the other half of it, is a clear mistake, for which the judgment must be reversed.

If Green had been a citizen of Texas, and Custard had claimed a right, as indorsee of a citizen of Texas, to bring his suit in the courts of the United States, because he (Custard) was a citizen of another state, the case would have occurred which is in the proviso to the 11th section of the Act which restrains the jurisdiction of the court. But the United States court had jurisdiction of this case, by virtue of the 12th section. It is a right mainly conferred on Green, a citizen of Massachusetts, when sued by a citizen of Texas, in a state court of Texas, no matter what the cause of action may be, provided it demand over $500. The exception of the 11th section could have no possible application to the case.

Let the judgment be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

JOHN YONTZ, Administrator of JOSE DOLORES PACHECO, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

In Spanish claims, the petition and concession must be construed together.

In cases coming up by appeal from the District Courts of Missouri and Florida, which adjudicated Spanish claims under the Act of 1824, the petition to the governor for land and his concession must be taken as one act. The decree usually proceeded on the petition, which described the land as respected locality and quantity.

Where the grant refers to the previous steps (including the petition, asking for only two leagues), and carries them along with the grant, the decree of the district court, restricting the quantity to two square leagues, must be affirmed.

Argued Mar. 1, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by Jose Dolores Pacheco, for the confirmation to him of a claim to a certain tract of land. The Board of Land Commissioners entered a decree against the validity of the claim. The district court on appeal reversed this decree, and entered a decree in favor of the claimant to the extent of two square leagues, if such quantity be contained within the boundaries claimed, or for so much thereof as shall be therein contained; whereupon the administrator of the claimant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. V. E. Howard, William C. Jones and E. L. Goold, for appellant:

In the construction of grants, well ascertained natural or artificial boundaries are to prevail over course, distance and quantity.

Lessee of Nelson v. Hall, 1 McLean, 518; Mayhew v. Norton, 17 Pick., 357; Frost v. Spaulding, 19 Pick., 445; Massengill v. Boyles, 4 Humph., 205; Newman v. Foster, 8 How., Miss., 888.

It is universally admitted, that of all the descriptions in a deed, quantity is the least reliable and the last to be resorted to.

Littlefield v. Littlefield, 28 Me., 180.

"In the construction of grants, it is a well settled rule that course, and distance, and quantity must yield to natural or artificial monuments or objects; that where these monuments or objects are known certain and unquestionable, and neither course, distance nor quantity correspond with them, the monuments, natural or artificial, shall prevail, and courses must be varied and distance lengthened or abridged, in order to harmonize them."

Surget v. Little, 5 Smedes & M., 832; Campbell v. Clark, 8 Mo., 558; Hough v. Horn, 4 Dev. & B., 231; Hare v. Harris, 14 Ohio, 536; Pernam v. Wead, 6 Mass., 132; Preston v. Bowmar, 2 Bibb, 495; Folger v. Mitchell, 3 Pick., 401; Howe v. Bass, 2 Mass., 382.

It is, at least, but a mere question of intention. Certainly Pacheco intended to get that place, and the governor intended to bestow it upon him; for the governor knew all that it was important for him to know touching the quantity, viz.: that it was not over eleven leagues, and he, therefore, said nothing as to quantity when he made the grant. The intention of Pacheco is abundantly made manifest by the fact that for thirty years he has occupied and cultivated the whole of it—acts of interpretation both prior and subsequent to the date of the grant.

"Where the intention is doubtful, the manner in which the contract has been executed by both or one of the parties, furnishes a rule of interpretation."

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellees:

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

Yontz prosecutes this appeal as administrator of Jose Dolores Pacheco, who died pending the suit below.

There is no controversy in relation to the validity of the grant, but only as respects the quantity confirmed by the district court, being two square leagues. The claimant insists that he is entitled to a survey and patent from the United States corresponding to the out-boundaries embraced in his diseno, and the description given of the rancho in the governor's grant, which recites: "Whereas citizen Jose Dolores Pacheco has sought to obtain for his personal benefit and that of his family the place lying between the 'creek or ravine' of La Tasajera and the place of 'San Ramon' bounded by the house of the same place of San Ramon down to the 'dead trees' (palos secos), and from this point, taking by the 'Tular,' to the 'high hill' (Loma Alta) along the creek or ravine of said Tasajera, and along the range of hills (sierra) and the land of citizen Bartolo Pacheco." After which the conditional clause follows, to wit: "The tract of which grant is made is of the extent mentioned in the plan, which goes with the espediente, with its respective boundaries. The officer giving the possession shall cause it to be measured according to the ordinance to mark boundaries; the surplus to remain for the nation, for its uses."

Pacheco petitioned Governor Figueroa for two leagues of land, in June, 1834, lying within the boundaries set forth in the foregoing description and plan. He then failed to have his petition favorably considered by the governor, because opposition was made by the mission of San Jose.

On the 30th of November, 1837, Pacheco again petitioned Governor Alvarado to grant him the same land; he says: "At this time I confine the application for two leagues, more or less, according to the boundaries of said mission of San Jose to the south: the plan of which I inclose herein again." The governor referred this second petition to the Council of San Jose, and they reported the land to be vacant, and that it could be adjudicated for colonization. On this report the governor made the grant. It was confirmed by the Departmental Assembly, May 12th, 1840, with directions, "that the espediente be returned to his excellency the governor, for the proper ends." No final document in consummation of a perfect title issued to the grantee; nor was judicial possession given of the land, and in this unsurveyed condition the claim stood when the United States acquired the country.

If we are bound to take the last paper issued by the governor as concluding all reference to preceding steps in the progress of obtaining a complete title, then we find the grant inconsistent on its face. The argument urged on our consideration is, that there are specific boundaries given as to the extent of the land granted, so that it is clearly a grant of all the land within these prescribed limits. In contravention of this assumption, the clause above recited directs that the officer giving judicial possession shall cause the land to be measured, according to the ordinance, and to mark boundaries; "the surplus to remain for the nation, for its uses." If it be true that the boundaries are conclusively defined in the grant, then no surplus could be thrown off by the survey. But if two leagues are to be surveyed within the larger limits, then the clause is consistent.

In the next place, it is insisted that the clause is a condition, usual in all these grants, and amounts to little more than a mere formality. Ascribing to the clause usually declaring quantity only this degree of credence, then we are thrown on the recitals of the grant, and bound to look behind it, to the incipient steps, and to other title papers referred to, and from all these to ascertain how much land was intended to be conceded.

The claimants come before us, presenting an equity; their title not being completed, because the land has never been surveyed, and severed from the public domain. U. S. v. Hanson, 16 Pet., 200; Rosa Pacheco's case, now decided.

We are called on to adjudge what the equities of claimants are; and to do this, it is proper "to look at all the several parts and ceremonies necessary to complete the title, and to take them together as one act." Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 372.

This court has uniformly held, in cases coming up by appeal from the District Courts of Missouri and Florida, which adjudicated Spanish claims under the Act of 1824, that the petition to the governor for land and his concession must be taken as one act, and the decree usually proceeded on the petition, which described the land as respected locality and quantity. This was necessarily so, as the concession was often a mere grant of the request, without other description than the petition contained.

And this is manifestly one of the rules of decision governing the tribunals in California, prescribed by the 11th section of the Act of March 3d, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 631). In this case the grant refers to the previous steps (including the petition, asking for only two leagues), and carries them along with the grant.

From all the Acts, taken together, it is manifest that the decree of the district court, restricting the quantity to two square leagues, must be affirmed, if so much land is found within the out-boundaries of the tract of country set forth in the grant and diseno; otherwise, the less quantity.

THE WIDOW AND HEIRS of JOSE E. BERREYESA, Deceased.

This court will not direct as to location of grant before the court below acts upon it.

Where the genuineness of this grant and the fulfillment of the conditions are fully established, and the validity on the claim is unquestionable, and where no question was decided in the court below upon the location of the lines of the tract, it would be irregular for this court to assume that the action of that court will not conform to the established rules on the subject.

As the decree of the district court has not been called in question by the appellees, should any difficulty arise in the location of the grant, it will be competent for the appellees to invoke the aid of that court.

Argued Feb. 28, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellants.

Mr. E. L. Goold, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees were confirmed in their claim to a parcel of land in the County of Santa Clara, known by the name of San Vicente, and being a part of the Cañada de los Capitancillos, containing one square league, and adjoining the lands of Justo Larios.

They are the widow and heirs at law of Jose E. Berreyesa, who became possessed of the land in 1834, under the authority of the Governor, Figueroa, and occupied it, with his family, until 1842. In that year he presented a petition to the governor, representing these facts, and complained that his neighbor Larios had disturbed his enjoyment and repose, and desired that there might be granted to him two sitios, from the house of Larios to the Matadera, with all the hills that belong to the Cañada. He says that he served the country in the army for twenty-four years and upwards, without receiving pay, and that he had with him eleven children.

A reference was made of the petition to the justice of the pueblo, who called Larios before him, and an agreement was then made between the parties in reference to the division line.

This report was returned to the governor, who directed that a title should issue to the applicant, and that the espedients be remitted to the Departmental Junta, for its approval. The decree and titulo describe a parcel of land included within natural boundaries; but in the conditions, it is confined to a single league in quantity.

Subsequently to this, Berreyesa complained to the governor of the limitation, insisting that his petition had been for two leagues, and that he had returned the grant, to have it corrected. The governor directed the proper inquiries, and the result was to concede the prayer of the petitioner; but for some reason the grant did not issue.

The Board of Commissioners confirmed the claim of the petitioners for one square league; and this decree was confirmed by the district court on appeal, and it ordered the land to be located, according to the description and within the boundaries set out in the original grant, and delineated in the map contained in the espedients, to both of which reference is made for a more particular description. The genuineness of this grant and the fulfillment of the conditions are fully established, and the validity of the claim is unquestionable.

The appellees have requested the court to give instructions relative to the location and survey of this grant, similar to those found in the case of The United States v. Fossat, 20 How., 413. But no question was decided in the court below upon the location of the lines of the tract, and it would be irregular for this court to assume that the action of that court will not conform to the established rules on the subject. The decree of the district court has not been called in question by the appellees; and should any difficulty arise in the location of the grant, it will be competent for the appellees to invoke the aid of that court.

Decree affirmed.

HIRAM A. TUCKER.

Mortgage as security for future advances—new partners—variance in stating indebtedness.

Mortgage to secure future advances by firm, can stand as security for advances made after the admission of new partners into the firm.

A mortgage bona fide made, may be for future

NOTE.—Mortgages for future advances, their validity and priority.

Mortgages may be given as well to secure future advances or contingent debts as those which al-advances by the mortgagee, as well as for present debts and liabilities.

If, upon investigation, the real transaction shall appear to be fair, the variance between the alleged indebtedness and the advances which were to be made afterwards, gives no additional equity.

Argued Feb. 29, 1860. Decided Mar. 19, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellant, to redeem the furniture of a hotel in the City of Chicago, upon which the appellee had a mortgage.

The court entered a decree allowing redemption upon payment of $9,689.56.

The complainant, insisting that nothing was due upon the mortgage, or, if anything, a much less sum, took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. B. R. Curtis, for appellant:

The question is, as against the complainant, a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, with notice only of what appears of record, for what amount does the recorded mortgage to Tucker stand as security?

I. H. A. Tucker individually cannot set up this note against a subsequent incumbrance, as intended to cover future advances.

It is true that a mortgage may be taken to secure future advances; and perhaps, where no fraud is intended, a note for a sum of money may be given in consideration of such expected advances. But this mortgage in effect asserts that the note is not to stand for future advances. For it makes a specific and distinct provision for future advances, and expressly and clearly distinguishes between them and the note, which is in so many words declared not to have been given for future advances, but for that amount of money already due.

If H. A. Tucker individually had actually made advances subsequent to the mortgage, he could not have a lien by virtue of it, to secure advances by himself and his firm beyond the amount of $6,000, without being allowed to contradict the express and clear terms of the deed, which limits the future advances to that sum.

But he has advanced nothing. And the question is whether a mortgage to one partner, purporting to secure a debt due to him individually, can, as against a bona fide purchaser, without notice of any parol understanding between mortgagor and mortgagee, be set up as a security for advances made by the firm, of which he is a member.

II. The mortgage expressly declaring that it was to stand as security for future advances only to the extent of $6,000, it cannot stand as security for any greater amount of such advances as against a junior incumbrancer, who has no notice of any parol agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee, that it shall stand as security for a greater sum.

III. Upon the face of the mortgage and the whole evidence, it is not made out with the requisite certainty, that there was an original agreement between the mortgagors and mortgagees that the $5,500 note should stand as a continuing security for all future advances; and when advances to that amount had been made and repaid, that part of the security, if ever applicable to advances, was extinguished.

Truscott v. King, 6 N. Y., 147.

IV. This mortgage to H. A. Tucker, to secure future advances by the firm of H. A. Tucker & Co., cannot stand as security for advances made after the admission of new partners into the firm. A junior incumbrancer is affected only by the precise terms of the mortgage itself, which provides only for advances to be made by the then firm of H. A. Tucker & Co. Either the admission or retirement of a partner puts an end to the right to make further advances upon the credit of the security as against the junior incumbrancer, and if the amount due at the time of such change of the firm is afterwards balanced by payments on account, nothing remains due on the mortgage.

Preston, 1 Watts, 385; Ackerman v. Hunsicker, 85 N. Y., 43.

If no sum is mentioned, but the purpose of the mortgage is stated to be to secure the payment of all future advances, or of all liabilities of a certain kind to be thereafter incurred, this will be sufficient, and if the instrument is sufficiently certain to be valid against the mortgagor it will be equally valid against all persons claiming under him. Youngs v. Wilson, 27 N. Y., 351; Robinson v. Williams, 22 N. Y., 380; Miller v. Lockwood, 32 N. Y., 299; Monell v. Smith, 5 Cow., 441; Kramer v. Trustees of Farm. B'k, 15 Ohio, 253; Merrills v. Swift, 18 Conn., 266; Loews v. DeForest, 20 Conn., 442; Ketchum v. Jauncey, 23 Conn., 127.

Where the mortgage is in form an absolute deed, and the defeasance is in parol, it is competent as between the parties that the transfer should be allowed to stand as security for further advances, even though the terms of redemption contemplated when conveyance was made did not provide for them; but where the mortgage recites the debt which it is made to secure, there is no implication of any intention to secure any further debt. Jarvis v. Rogers, 15 Mass., 389; James v. Johnson, 6 Johns. Ch., 429; Odell v. Montross, 6 Hun, 115; Stoddard v. Hart, 23 N. Y., 556.

An equitable mortgage by deposit of deeds may be extended beyond the original purpose by implication or parol. Kensington, ex parte, 2 Ves. & B., 79; 2 Rose, 138.

A mortgage to secure future advances will not operate as a security for costs subsequently incurred. Shaw v. Neale, 6 H. L. Cas., 581; 4 Jur. N. S., 655; 27 L. J. Ch., 444.

A further sum agreed to be secured by pledge of property equitably mortgaged, is also tantamount to a further equitable mortgage; and possession of the deeds by the first mortgagee is a possession by the second. Factor v. Philpott, 12 Price, 197.

Where there is a mortgage for present and future advances and a subsequent mortgage of the same description, further advances made by the prior mortgagee, with notice of the subsequent mortgage, have no priority over antecedent advances made by the subsequent mortgagee. Rolt v. Hopkinson, 3 DeG. & J., 177; 4 Jur. N. S., 1119; 28 L. J. Ch., 41.

Where it is part of the contract under which the mortgage is made, that the advances shall be made at certain fixed periods, and that the mortgagor shall then accept them and pay interest upon them, the rights of the parties become fixed at the date of delivery of the security, and the mortgage will be a protection against subsequent encumbrancers whose rights are acquired before the advances were actually made, except against Bank of Scotland v. Christie, 8 Clark & F., 214; Spiers v. Houston, 4 Bligh, N. S., 515; Pemberton v. Oakes, 4 Russ., 154; Cremer v. Higginson, 1 Mas., 328; Simson v. Cooke, 1 Bing., 441, 452.

Without an agreement by the mortgagors to extend the operation of the security to the new firm, which binds only the debtor and his representatives, there is believed to be no case which holds that the right to make advances on the credit of the security continues after a change in the members of the firm.

See Ex parte Oakes, 2 Mont., D. & D., 284; Ex parte Marsh, 2 Rose, 239.

If there was such an agreement in this case, the complainant had no notice of it and is not bound by it.

The firm of H. A. Tucker & Co. was changed by the admission of new partners, Jan. 1, 1857, and all advances made previous to that date have been repaid.

Messrs. S. F. Vinton and Thos. Hoyne, for appellee:

1. What was the mortgage to Tucker intended to secure?

We claim that it was intended to secure any indebtedness that might arise in the manner specified therein, to an amount not exceeding at any one time the sum of $11,500; and that the actual knowledge of defendant's claim by the subsequent incumbrancers, and by Lawrence, the purchaser, made them chargeable with what was in fact due on the mortgage not exceeding that sum, as the only condition on which they or any of them would be allowed to redeem the property. In other words, they can only redeem subject to the satisfaction of Tucker's prior equity, whatever that may be.

2. The cases which affirm the doctrine that a mortgage may be given to secure future advances or future liabilities, are very numerous.

Shirras v. Caig, 7 Cranch, 34; Leeds v. Cameron, 8 Sumn., 492; Lyle v. Ducomb, 5 Binn., 590; Collins v. Carlisle, 13 Ill., 256; and some of the leading American cases on this head.

In Leeds v. Cameron, Judge Story said: "Nothing can be more clear, both upon principle and authority, than that at the common law a mortgage bona fide made, may be for future advances and liabilities for the mortgagor by the mortgagee, as well as for present debts and liabilities." He cites 3 Cranch, 73; 1 Pet., 448.

During the continuance of the dealing, the mortgage and the note for $5,500 were treated as, and understood by the parties to be, a continuing security for whatever advances might be made during the two years the contract was to last. And neither subsequent incumbrancers nor purchasers could suffer any prejudice, if due inquiry were made, from a mortgage the record of which was notice to all persons of an incumbrance to the extent of $11,500. They were interested in knowing what was in fact due when the subsequent incumbrance was taken and when the subsequent purchase was made, and they were interested no further.

The note of $5,500 states on its face that it was given for an actual loan of money, and consequently the mortgage to the extent of that note appears to have been given to secure a debt then due, and this presents the question.

As between the parties to the mortgage, there can be no question but that parol evidence can be given to show that the note and mortgage were taken as collateral security for advances thereafter to be made, and that, in fact, such advances were subsequently made on the faith of that security. It is one of the most ancient principles of a court of equity, that if a deed be absolute on its face, it may be proved by parol in a court of equity, that it was a conditional conveyance given to secure a loan of money.

Whether such proof will be let in against third persons, will depend upon the fact whether the misstatement or misrepresentation in the deed was made for a dishonest purpose, or purchasers for value without notice from the public records or otherwise. In such a case, the debt is present, and the security is as valid as if the advances were made at its date. Crane v. Deming, 7 Conn., 387; Boswell v. Goodwin, 31 Conn., 74; Rowan v. Sharpe Rifle Mfg. Co., 29 Conn., 329; Griffin v. Burnett, 4 Edw., 637.

Where the mortgagee is not obligated to make the advances, he holds a lien upon the land, at any given time, for the actual amount of his advances at that time, and if with knowledge of a subsequent lien he makes further advances, his rights as to the new advances would be inferior to the subsequent lien. Robinson v. Williams, 22 N. Y., 380; Bissell v. Kellogg, 60 Barb., 617; Brinckerhoff v. Marvin, 5 Johns. Ch., 320; Craig v. Tappin, 2 Sand. Ch., 90; Lansing v. Woodworth, 1 Sand. Ch., 45; Kramer v. Trustees Farm. B'k, 15 Ohio, 253; Merrills v. Swift, 18 Conn., 266; Lewis v. De Forest, 20 Conn., 442; Ketchum v. Jauncey, 23 Conn., 127; Carpenter v. Blote, 1 E. D. Smith, 491; B'k of Montgomery Co., Appeal, 36 Penn. St., 172; Bell v. Fleming, 1 Beasley (N. J.), 1; Frye v. B'k of Ill., 11 Ill., 367; Ketcham v. Wood, 22 Hun, 64.

As to what is notice, the decisions vary. See McDaniels v. Colvin, 16 Vt., 300; Truscott v. King, 6 Barb., 346, rev'd, 6 N. Y., 147; Spader v. Lawler, 17 Ohio, 371; Ten Hoven v. Kerns, 2 Penn. St., 96; Parmentier v. Gillespie, 9 Penn. St., 86; Boswell v. Goodwin, 31 Conn., 74.

If the mortgage be nominally for a certain sum, it cannot be shown to have been intended as a lien for a greater sum, and moneys not mentioned in the mortgage cannot be covered by it to the prejudice of subsequent liens. Truscott v. King, 6 N. Y., 147; St. Andrews' Ch., v. Tompkins, 7 Johns. Ch., 14; B'k of Utica v. Finch, 3 Barb. Ch., 293; Walker v. Sneliker, Hoff. Ch., 145; Pettibone v. Griswold, 4 Conn., 158; Stoughton v. Pasco, 5 Conn., 442; Shepard v. Shepard, 6 Conn., 37; Hubbard v. Savage, 6 Conn., 215; Hart v. Chalker, 14 Conn., 77; Garber v. Henry, 6 Watts., 57; Townsend v. Empire Stone Dressing Co., 6 Duer, 208.

A mortgage duly recorded, given to secure future indorsements or advances, has a preference over subsequent judgments against the mortgagor, as well as to advances or indorsements upon the faith thereof subsequent to the rendition of judgment, without notice thereof, as to those previously made; and this without regard to the question whether the indorsements or advances were optional or obligatory. The docketing of a judgment is not, under the registry laws of N. Y., constructive notice to the mortgagee of its existence. Record of such a mortgage is notice to subsequent incumbrancers. Ackerman v. Hunsicker, 85 N. Y., 43; S. C., 39 Am. Rep., 621; S. C., 12 Week Dig., 265; S. C., 21 Hun, 53, rev'd. A mortgage is only a prior lien, as against an intervening judgment, to the extent of the advances at the time of entering the judgment. Wilder v. Butterfield, 50 How. Pr., 385.

National bank has no power under the Act of Congress to take a mortgage to secure future indebtedness. Crocker v. Whitney, 71 N. Y., 161.

A mortgage intended as a security for a present and continuing indebtedness is valid between the parties; and if free from fraud, as to creditors also. Brown v. Keefer, 71 N. Y., 610.

A mortgage to secure payment for services to be rendered in future by the mortgagee and a third person, is valid as against intervening incumbrances. Hall v. Crouse, 13 Hun, 557.

whether such third person has been deceived or injured by it.

Shirras v. Caig, 2 Pct. Cond., 410.

The misrepresentation in Tucker's mortgage, if it may be called such, has neither injured nor deceived the subsequent incumbrancers nor the purchasers under them, nor was it made for an unfair or dishonest purpose. If the complainant could prove any of these facts, he had the right and an opportunity to do it. And they are not to be presumed in the absence of proof.

Judge Curtis in his brief has raised the question, whether the mortgage can stand as a security for advances made by the firm of H. A. Tucker & Co., after the admission of new partners into that concern.

The complainant comes into court asking for equity, and praying that the defendant's legal title to the property mortgaged may be taken from him by a decree of the court. That being his attitude, he will not be likely to meet with much encouragement in setting up technicalities to deprive the defendant of his honest rights.

Lyle v. Ducomb, 5 Binn., 590, was a case where defendant, Ducomb, gave a bond for $18,000 conditioned to pay $9,000, with a mortgage on real estate. By an indorsement on the mortgage it was stated that it was made to secure the plaintiff for notes drawn and to be drawn by him, and by Lyle and Newman, for Ducomb's accommodation.

Objection was made that a mortgage intended as an indemnity against acts to be performed at a subsequent time, ought not to have any effect against third persons.

Tilghman, Justice, said: "This point was very properly abandoned. There cannot be a more fair bona fide and valuable consideration than the drawing and indorsing of notes at a future period, for the benefit and at the request of the mortgagor, and nothing is more reasonable than the providing a sufficient indemnity before hand."

In that case, six months after the making of the mortgage, and after a builder's lien had attached to the property, the mortgagor and mortgagee entered into an agreement that a description of notes not before embraced by the mortgage, and made by a different drawer than the drawers named in the mortgage, should be embraced therein. Held, that the parties had a right to make such agreement, as between themselves, and that it was also good as to third parties who were intervening incumbrancers, if the amount of the mortgage incumbrance were not thereby increased beyond the amount which the mortgage was intended to secure.

5 Binn., 589.

This doctrine would seem to dispose of the objection we are now considering. In the case of The Commercial Bank v. Cunningham, 24 Pick., 270, the mortgagors, who were a firm under the name of Edgarton, Whitcomb & Co., made a mortgage to secure their existing debt, and also future debts they might owe mortgagees, and afterwards mortgagors admitted a new partner into the firm, which assumed a new name. Held, that notes given by the new firm were covered and secured by the mortgage.

Upon no known principle of equity, can the defendant be deprived of his legal and equitable lien upon the property mortgaged to him, until he is paid the full amount equitably covered by the mortgage, and due to him and to the other parties named in the deed.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

We have been unable to find anything in this record to authorize us to change or modify the decree made by the circuit court in this case.

Andrew Lawrence filed his bill in that court, for the northern district of Illinois, against Hiram A. Tucker, to redeem the furniture of a hotel in the City of Chicago, called the Briggs House, upon which Tucker has a mortgage.

On the 1st of September, 1856, John J. Floyd and George H. French, who then were the keepers of that hotel, wishing to have a current business credit with Tucker and the firm of H. A. Tucker & Co., and the bank named in the mortgage, executed, under the firm of Floyd & French to Hiram A. Tucker, a mortgage of the furniture of the hotel, to secure a note of Floyd & French, made to Tucker, for $5,500, and such advances of money as there had been or might be made within two years, by H. A. Tucker, H. A. Tucker & Co., or the Exchange Bank of H. A. Tucker & Co., not to exceed in all an indebtment of $6,000 in addition to the sum for which their note was given. The note was dated on the 1st of September, the day on which the mortgage was made, payable one day after date, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum. The note was to be held by Tucker, as a collaterial security for such advances as have just been stated, and the amount of the note also. Under his arrangement, successive advances were made to Floyd & French, on their checks, or by discount of their notes, until sometime in October, 1857, when they ceased.

Tucker, during this time, continued to hold the note for $5,500. He also held several other promissory notes of Floyd & French, as appears by the exhibits, C, D, E, G, H, annexed to Tucker's answer to the complainant's bill. All of these notes, except that for $2,000, are drawn payable to H. A. Tucker; all of them are prior in dates to other mortgages upon the same furniture, except the note just mentioned for $2,000, and that was a renewal of a note for a loan made on the 26th September, 1857, prior to the date of the mortgages made to Briggs & Atkyns. The mortgage to Briggs was made on the 19th November, 1857, by Floyd & French, and one Ames, who had been taken into their firm. It was given to secure debts due to Briggs, and liabilities he had assumed for them, and also for such advances of money as Briggs might thereafter make to them, with a power of sale on default. When Briggs took this mortgage, he knew that Tucker had a prior mortgage on the same furniture, and he states in his evidence that he knew advances of money had been made upon it by Tucker, for which he knew it stood as a security.

On the 12th of January, 1858, Floyd & French and Ames made a third mortgage of the same property to Henry Atkyns, as trustee, with a like power of sale, to secure debts mentioned in it. Both of these mortgages refer to Tucker's mortgage as an existing incumbrance upon the furniture, &c., &c. Briggs and Atkyns had then, of course, notice of Tucker's mortgage.

Atkyns sold the furnitrue under his power of sale on the 27th February, 1858; Briggs sold under his power of sale on the 12th March following. Lawrence became the purchaser at both sales. Briggs sold to him expressly subject to the mortgage of French & Floyd to H. A. Tucker; and Lawrence admits, by a stipulation in the record, that when he purchased the property under the mortgages, he had notice that either the defendant Hiram A. Tucker or H. A. Tucker & Co. held the notes against Floyd & French, as they are set forth in the defendant's answer, and that the amount was claimed to be due upon them, as it is set out in the answer.

Upon referring to that answer, and its exhibits, C, D, E, G, H, we find that the only securities now claimed to be due are, with one exception, notes of hand given by Floyd & French, payable to the order of H. A. Tucker alone, precisely within the mortgage, and that the note of December 18th, 1857, payable to H. A. Tucker & Co., for the sum of $2,000, payable at the counting-house of H. A. Tucker & Co., in Chicago, was for an actual loan of money, and that it was the renewal of a former note for the same sum, dated the 26th September, 1857.

We have, then, the admission of the complainant, that when he purchased under the mortgages of Briggs & Atykins, he knew the particular items constituting the outstanding unpaid debt of Floyd & French to Hiram A. Tucker and H. A. Tucker & Co. for advances. One of these notes, dated the 14th October, 1857, was for $1,000, exhibit C; another, dated 22d October, 1857, exhibit D, was for $3,000; the third, exhibit E, dated July 11, was for $450; exhibit G, of the same date, was a note for the sum of $5,000; and exhibit H, dated the 18th December, 1857, was for $2,000.

Floyd, who did the financial business of the firm of Floyd & French, testifies that the notes just mentioned were given for advances; but he claims a credit of $1,500 on the note, exhibit D; and states that the note for $450, exhibit E, had not been given for money advanced, but that it and another note for the same amount were given for the interest for one year on the note for $5,500. Floyd also states that the note marked exhibit I, for $5,500, was signed by himself when he signed the mortgage, and that he personally made the negotiation with H. A. Tucker & Co.

It is further stated by him, that the aggregate amount of all the advances which had been made by the defendant to his firm upon the faith of the note and the mortgage, since the first of September, 1856, amounted to "from fifty to a hundred thousand dollars," and that the sum now remaining due was "somewhere in the vicinity of $10,000." He verifies the notes named in the exhibits, C, D, E, G, H, with the originals; confirms the statement in exhibit A of the discounts which his firm had received under the note and mortgage; and adds, that when the note and mortgage were given, his firm then owed to H. A. Tucker & Co. $2,500, which was paid on the 7th September, 1856; and repeats in his cross-examination what he had said in his examination in chief, concerning the amount of the discounts and cash received from H. A. Tucker & Co. under the note and mortgage.

It must have been upon the testimony of this witness that the court below gave its decree.

But we have not referred to it with the view of testing the correctness of the sum allowed to the defendant, as the condition upon which the complainant might redeem the mortgage—though, having made the computation, we find it to be correct, with a small mistake. Our object has been to show that the parties to the original transaction understood it alike, and acted upon it accordingly; that there never was a difference between them, as to the character of the mortgage and its purpose; and that it was intended to be a security for and a lien upon the property mortgaged for future advances, to the extent of the sum provided for in it. So, also, Floyd & French represented it to be in their transactions with others, when they found it convenient to their business to give other mortgages upon the same property for the security of other creditors.

We consider it to be a mortgage for future advances, that they were subsequently made in conformity with its provisions, and that the proofs that they were so, were rightly received by the court below to substantiate them. There is neither indirectness nor uncertainty in the terms used in the mortgage, to make it doubtful that it was intended to cover the note for $5,500 and for future advances. It is stated in terms that it was intended for that purpose. The note, though expressed to be an existing indebtedness at the date of the mortgage, secured to be paid by a promissory note, payable one day after date, is associated with the advances to be made to Floyd & French to the amount of $6,000; but it is proved that the note and mortgage were in fact taken as a security for advances thereafter to be made, and that it was done without any other purpose than to get a credit extended to them of $11,500, instead of advances only to the amount of $6.000. It is objected that the difference makes the transaction subsidiary.

An objection of this kind was made in the case of Shirras v. Caig, 7 Cranch, 34; but this court then said, it is true the real transaction does not appear on the face of the mortgage; the deed purports to have been a debt of £30,000, due to all of the mortgagees. It was really intended to have different sums due at the time to particular mortgagees, advances afterwards to be made, and liabilities to be encountered to an uncertain amount. After remarking that such misrepresentations of a transaction are liable to suspicion, Chief Justice Marshall adds: "But if, upon investigation, the real transaction shall appear to be fair, though somewhat variant from that which is described, it would seem to be unjust and unprecedented to deprive the person claiming under the deed real equitable rights, unless it be in favor of a person who has been in fact injured and deceived by the misrepresentation." In this case, the complainant has not been deceived, and the variance between the alleged indebtedness and that advances were to be made afterwards gives to his suit no additional force or equity.

No proof was given by the complainant that he had been injured or deceived by it into making his purchase under the mortgages of Briggs and Atkyns, and that cannot be presumed in his behalf. In fact, there is not an averment in the complainant's bill in favor of the equity of his demand, which is not met and denied in the defendant's answer, and which has not been disproved by competent testimony. We do not think there is anything in the objection that the mortgage to H. A. Tucker to secure future advances by the firm of H. A. Tucker & Co. cannot stand as security for advances made after the admission of new partners into that firm. The cases cited in support of this objection do not sustain it, and we have not been able to find any one that does. They relate exclusively to stipulations for an advancement of money to a copartnership after a new member has been taken into the firm.

In respect to the validity of mortgages for existing debts and future advances, there can be no doubt, if any principle in the law can be considered as settled by the decisions of courts. This court has made three decisions directly and inferentially in support of them: U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch, 73; Conard v. Atlantic Insurance Company, 1 Pet., 448; Shirras v. Caig, 7 Cranch, 34. Tilghman, Ch. J., says, in Lyle v. Ducomb, 5 Binn., 590, "there cannot be a more fair, bona fide, and valuable consideration than the drawing or indorsing of notes at a future period, for the benefit and at the request of the mortgagors; and nothing is more reasonable than the providing a sufficient indemnity beforehand." Mr. Justice Story declared, in Leeds v. Cameron, 3 Sumn., 492, that nothing can be more clear, both upon principle and authority, than that at the common law a mortgage, bona fide made, may be for future advances by the mortgagee as well as for present debts and liabilities. I need not do more upon such a subject than to refer to the cases of The U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch, 73, and Conard v. The Atlantic Insurance Company, 1 Pet., 448.

We affirm the decree of the circuit court in this case, and shall remand it there for execution.

LEWIS TEESE AND LEWIS TEESE, JR., Plffs. in Er.,

v.

C. P. HUNTINGDON AND MARK HOPKINS.

(See S. C., 23 How., 2-14.)

Counsel fees, not damages—patent right—notice of special defense—order not necessary—second notice—depositions—credit of witness, how impeached.

Counsel fees are not a proper element for the consideration of the jury in the estimation of damages in actions for the infringement of a patent right.

In such action, the Act of Congress requires that notice of special matter to be offered in evidence at the trial shall be in writing, and be given to the plaintiff, or his attorney, more than thirty days before the trial.

This is a right conferred upon the defendant; and he may exercise it in the manner and upon the conditions therein pointed out, without any leave or order from the court.

When the notice is drawn, served and filed in court, nothing further is required to give the defendant the full and unrestricted benefit of the provision.

The defendant is required to specify in such notice the persons on whose prior knowledge of the alleged improvement he relies to disprove the novelty of the invention, and the place or places where the same had been used.

Compliance with this provision, on the part of the defendant, is a condition precedent to his right to introduce such special matter under the general issue.

He may give the requisite notice without any leave or order from the court.

If the first notice served is defective, or not sufficiently comprehensive, he may give another, more than thirty days before the trial.

Depositions taken before the notice was served, as well as those taken afterwards, are admissible, provided the statements of the deponents are applicable to the matters thus put in issue between the parties.

A witness, to impeach the credit of another, must know what is generally said of the witness whose credit is impeached by those among whom the last named witness resides, to be able to answer the inquiry, either as to his general character, or as to his general reputation for truth and veracity.

He is not required to speak from his own knowledge of the acts from which the reputation of the witness has been derived, nor is he allowed to do so.

But he must speak from his own knowledge of what is generally said of him by those among whom he resides, and with whom he is chiefly conversant.

Any question that does not call for such knowledge is an improper one, and ought to be rejected.

The question, "What is the reputation of the witness for moral character," was properly excluded.

Such testimony may also be excluded by the court, when it applies to a period of time so remote as to become entirely unsatisfactory and immaterial.

As the law cannot fix that period of limitation, it must necessarily be left to the discretion of the court.

When the witness had already stated that he was not able to answer the question, the discretion of the court was not unreasonably exercised by excluding it.

Argued Mar. 15, 1860. Decided Mar. 26, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, in and for the Northern District of California.

This was an action on the case brought in the court below, by the plaintiffs in error, to recover damages resulting from an alleged infringement of certain letters patent.

The trial below having resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendants, the plaintiffs sued out this writ of error:

NOTE.—Impeaching witness by proof of character. Scope of the inquiry as to character and time.

An impeaching or sustaining witness is not to speak of the reputation unless he knows it, and such knowledge must be founded upon an acquaintance and intercourse with the neighbors and acquaintances of the individual whose character is in question, and that intercourse must be of some length of time—sufficient at least to enable him to gather the general estimation in which he is held in the community in which he resides. Curtis v. Fay, 37 Barb., 64; State v. Boswell, 2 Dev., 209; People v. Rector, 19 Wend., 569.

Particular facts cannot be inquired into. A witness is never permitted to speak of his knowledge of particular facts from which he draws an opinion of the witness examined. Particular instances of want of veracity or destitution of moral principle or particular immoral conduct is not admissible. Anon., 1 Hill, 257; Boyd v. Lewis, 13 Johns., 504; Evans v. Smith, 5 Mon., 263; State v. Collins, 3 Dev., 117; Kimmel v. Kimmel, 3 Serg. & R., 336; Wike v. Lightner, 11 Serg. & R., 198; Rex v. Hodgson, Russ. & Ry., 209; Rex v. Clark, 2 Stark., 241; Greaton v. Socarras, 8 Abb. Pr., 302.

General character for drunkenness is not admissible (Brindle v. McIlvaine, 10 Serg. & R., 282); nor

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. P. Phillips, for plaintiffs in error:

By the 15th section of the Act of July 4, 1836, it is provided that "whenever the defendant relies, in his defense, on the fact of a previous invention, knowledge or use of the thing patented, he should state in his notice of the special matter, the names and places of the residence of those whom he intends to prove to have possessed prior knowledge of the thing, and where the same had been used.

The object of the notice is to prevent surprise, to enable the patentee fully to vindicate his rights. The notice is, therefore, to be strictly construed, and no evidence variant from it is admissible.

Phil. & T. R. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet., 459; Silsby v. Foote, 14 How., 222; Seymour v. McCormick, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 107.

If the evidence was inadmissible under the first notice, it could not be made good by a notice subsequent to the filing of the depositions.

Evidence was offered to impeach the character of one of the defendants' witnesses, by showing his "general reputation for moral character." It was objected that "the inquiry should be limited to his general reputation for truth and veracity;" and the objection was sustained.

The authorities on this point are to be found carefully collated in 21 Amer. L. J., N. S., 145, where it is said that so far as the decisions in England are concerned, "they are unanimous to the point that the true criterion of the credit of a witness is his general character and conduct, and not his general character for truth and veracity. The English books will be examined in vain for a single authoritative case which, in any respect, limits the examination upon this point to the character for truth and veracity."

Upon examination it will be found that this rule obtains in most of our states.

Other evidence was then offered to prove the reputation of the witness from 1850 to 1858, for truth and veracity. To which it was objected that "the dates named were too remote, and that the reputation of the witness at a period less remote from the time of trial, could be alone put in issue." This objection, also, was sustained.

Four years is certainly a short statute of limitations in favor of reputation. Whatever influence the question of time was entitled to, was for the jury to consider. The judge could not exclude the evidence as incompetent, for there is neither common law rule nor statute to justify it.

Messrs. Charles O'Conor and George Gifford, for defendants in error:

1. The objection to the introduction of evidence of Haight to prove what would be a reasonable counsel fee, was properly sustained.

No recovery can be had in an action for the infringement of a patent, for counsel fees.

As to the meaning of actual damages, see Seymour v. McCormick, 16 How., 489, 490.

2. The objection to the inquiry as to Jesse Morrill's reputation for "moral character," was properly sustained.

It is not in any case proper to seek to impeach a witness by proving what was his reputation for moral character. The inquiry should be as to his reputation for truth and veracity.

that the witness has been indicted, no conviction having followed (Gibbs v. Osborn, 2 Wend., 555); nor that he has heard witness accused of petit larceny. Barton v. Morphes, 2 Dev., 520.

The scope of the inquiry seems to be: 1. What is the general character of the witness? 2. What is his general character for veracity? 3. Is he to be believed under oath from his general character? General character and common reputation must never be departed from, though the question need not be restricted to an inquiry as to truth and veracity. Wilke v. Lightner, 11 Serg. & R., 199; Noel v. The character of a witness may be impeached by persons in whose neighborhood the attacked witness has resided until within four years of the trial, though they know nothing of the character borne by the witness at the place to which he had removed. Sleeper v. Middleworth, 4 Denio, 431.

The inquiry is not, in its nature, limited as to time. People v. Abbot, 19 Wend., 192.

The law lays down no certain limit to inquiries as to the general reputation of a witness. A limitation to a period of five years before trial, held to be error. Stevens v. Rogers, 25 Hun, 54.

A person is not a competent witness to testify to the general character of another witness unless he knows it. It is not sufficient, that he has heard a number of people, on a single occasion, speak ill of such witness, without proof that they knew his character; but the knowledge to make him competent must be acquired by time and by the general speech of people who know or have had an opportunity to know and form an opinion. To discredit a witness it is not competent to prove general bad charater disconnected with the inquiry concerning his veracity. U. S. v. Van Sickle, 2 McLean, 219; U. S. v. Dickinson, 2 McLean, 325; see Teese v. Huntington, supra.

The usual questions asked in U. S. courts to discredit a witness are, what is the witness' general reputation for truth? Is it good or bad? Gass v. Stinson, 2 Sumn., 605.

It is not improper to ask the person on the stand, What is the general "reputation" for truth of the witness sought to be impeached. It is even more proper than to ask what is his general "character" for truth. Knode v. Williamson, 34 U. S. (17 Wall.), 586.

3. The testimony was properly excluded, as to what was the reputation of Jesse Morrill in 1852 or 1853—about five years before the trial.

It does not appear that said Morrill was a witness called by the defendants. He is not named in the notices of special matter of defense as one of the defendants' witnesses, and he is not named in the lists of witnesses examined by the defendants.

It must appear by the record that he was called by the defendants, or this objection for that reason must fall.

The mere assertion of facts in the assignment of errors to show error, cannot be substituted for the record.

Judiciary Act of 1789, sec. 22; Conkl. Tr., 3d ed., 689; Stevens v. Gladding, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 64; Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet., 433, 445.

A party cannot impeach a witness called by himself, by proving him unworthy of belief.

Grah. & Wat., N. T., 953.

The court below ruled out the evidence offered to impeach Morrill, and except so far as the record shows, this court has no means of knowing why. All presumptions are in favor of the correctness of the ruling.

2 Grah. & Wat., N. T., 596 to 599, and cases.

There must be a limit of time, back of which a party cannot go to prove the reputation of a witness to impeach him; else to impeach a man on a trial to-day, it might be proved what his reputation was, for truth and veracity, fifty years ago.

There is no specific time fixed by law, and it must be left to the discretion of the judge at the trial.

V. The only object of granting a new trial in any case is to prevent injustice, and where the court sees that substantial justice has been done, it will not order a new trial, although there has been some irregularity or error at the trial.

See Horford v. Wilson, 1 Taunt., 12; Doe v. Tyler, 6 Bing., 561; Stiles v. Tilford, 10 Wend., 338; Smith v. Harmanson, 1 Wash., Va., 6.

The record in this case shows that, without the evidence objected to, if there had been a verdict for the plaintiff, the court would have set it aside as being against evidence.

Corbett v. Brown, 8 Bing., 33; Kohne v. Ins. Co., 1 Wash. C. C., 123.

The court will not grant a new trial for the plaintiff to try for a verdict which they would set aside, if rendered.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California. According to the transcript, the declaration in this case was filed on the 18th day of March, 1856. It was an action of trespass on the case for an alleged infringement of certain letters patent purporting to have been duly issued to the plaintiffs for a new and useful improvement in a certain machine or implement called a sluice fork, used for the purpose of removing stones from sluices and sluice boxes in washing gold. As the foundation of the suit, the plaintiffs in their declaration set up the letters patent, alleging that they were the original and first inventors of the improvement therein described, and charged that the defendants, on the 2d day of July, 1855, and on divers other days and times between that day and the day of the commencement of the suit, unlawfully and without license vended and sold a large number of the improved forks made in imitation of their invention. To this charge the defendants pleaded the general issue, and in addition thereto, set up in their answer to the declaration two other grounds of defense. In the first place, they denied that the plaintiffs were the original and first inventors of the improvement described in the letters patent, averring that the supposed improvement was known and used by divers other persons in the United States long before the pretended invention of the plaintiffs. They also alleged that the improvement claimed by the plaintiffs, as their invention, was not the proper subject of a patent within the true intent and meaning of the patent law of the United States.

By the 15th section of the Patent Act of the 4th of July, 1836 (5 Stat. at L., 117), the defendant, in actions claiming damages for making, using, or selling, the thing patented, is permitted to plead the general issue, and for certain defenses, therein specified, to give that Act and any special matter in evidence which is pertinent to the issue, and of which notice in writing may have been given to the plaintiff or his attorney thirty days before the trial. Within that provision, and subject to that condition, he may, under the general issue, give any special matter in evidence tending to prove that the patentee was not the original and first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented, or a substantial and material part thereof claimed as new, or that it had been described in some public work anterior to the supposed discovery by the patentee, or had been in public use, or on sale, with the consent and allowance of the patentee, before his application for a patent. But whenever the defendant relies in his defense on the fact of a previous invention or knowledge or use of the thing patented, he is required to "state in his notice of special matter the names and places of residence of those whom he intends to prove to have possessed a prior knowledge of the thing, and where the same had been used."

Two written notices were accordingly given by the defendants of special matter to be offered in evidence by them at the trial, in support of the first ground of defense set up in the answer to the declaration. One was dated on the 28th day of August, 1856, and the other on the 19th day of September of the succeeding year, but they were both duly served and filed in court more than thirty days before the trial. Upon this state of the pleadings the parties, on the 20th day of October, 1857, went to trial, and the jury, under the rulings and instructions of the presiding justice, returned their verdict for the defendants. After the plaintiffs had introduced evidence tending to prove the alleged infringement of their patent, they claimed that counsel fees were recoverable as damages in this action, and offered proof accordingly, in order to show what would be a reasonable charge in that behalf.

That evidence was objected to by the defendants, upon the ground that counsel fees were not recoverable as damages in actions of that description, and the court sustained the objection, and excluded the evidence. To which ruling the plaintiffs excepted. Little or no reliance was placed upon this exception by the counsel of the plaintiffs, and in view of the circumstances, one or two remarks upon the subject will be sufficient. Suppose it could be admitted that counsel fees constituted a proper element for the consideration of the jury, in the estimation of damages in cases of this description; still the error of the court in excluding the evidence would furnish no ground to reverse the judgment, for the reason that the verdict was for the defendants. For all purposes connected with this investigation, it must be assumed, under the finding of the jury, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any damages whatever; and if not, then the evidence excluded by the ruling of the court was entirely immaterial. But the evidence was properly rejected on the ground assumed by the presiding justice.

Counsel fees are not a proper element for the consideration of the jury in the estimation of damages in actions for the infringement of a patent right. The point has been directly ruled by this court, and is no longer an open question. Jurors are required to find the actual damages incurred by the plaintiff at the time his suit was brought; and if, in the opinion of the court, the defendant has not acted in good faith, or has caused unnecessary expense and injury to the plaintiff, the court may render judgment for a larger sum, not exceeding three times the amount of the verdict. 5 Stat. at L., p. 123; Day v. Woodworth, 13 How., 372. To maintain the issue on their part, the defendants offered three depositions, each tending to prove that the plaintiffs were not the original and first inventors of the improvement described in their letters patent.

Objection was seasonably made by the plaintiffs to the introduction of each of these depositions on two grounds: 1. Because the first notice of special matter to be introduced at the trial did not accord with the proof offered, as contained in these depositions. 2. Because the second notice of special matter to be thus introduced was served and filed without any order from the court and, therefore, should be disregarded.

Exceptions were duly taken to the respective rulings of the court, in admitting each of these depositions; but as they all depend upon the same considerations, they will be considered together.

It is conceded by the defendants that the first notice was, to some extent, insufficient. On the other hand, it is admitted by the plaintiffs that the terms of the second notice were sufficiently comprehensive and specific to justify the rulings of the court, in allowing the depositions to be read to the jury. They, however, insist upon the objection, taken at the trial, that it was served and filed without any order of the court, and that it was insufficient, because it was served and filed subsequently to the time when the depositions were taken and filed in court.

But neither of these objections can be sustained. All that the Act of Congress requires is, that notice of the special matter to be offered in evidence at the trial shall be in writing, and be given to the plaintiff, or his attorney, more than thirty days before the trial. By the plain terms of the law, it is a right conferred upon the defendant; and of course he may exercise it in the manner and upon the conditions therein pointed out, without any leave or order from the court. When the notice is properly drawn, and duly and seasonably served and filed in court as a part of the pleadings, nothing further is required to give the defendant the full and unrestricted benefit of the provision.

Such notice is required, in order to guard patentees from being surprised at the trial by evidence of a nature which they could not be presumed to know or be prepared to meet, and thereby subject them either to delay or a loss of their cause. To prevent such consequences, the defendant is required to specify the names and places of residence of the persons on whose prior knowledge of the alleged improvement he relies to disprove the novelty of the invention, and the place or places where same had been used. Wilton v. Railroads, 1 Wall., Jr., 195.

Compliance with this provision, on the part of the defendant, being a condition precedent to his right to introduce such special matter under the general issue, it necessarily follows that he may give the requisite notice without any leave or order from the court; and for the same reason, if he afterwards discovers that the first notice served is defective, or not sufficiently comprehensive to admit his defense, he may give another, to remedy the defect or supply the deficiency, subject to the same condition that it must be in writing, and be served more than thirty days before the trial.

Having given the notice as required by the Act of Congress, the defendant at the trial may proceed to prove the facts therein set forth by any legal and competent testimony. For that purpose, he may call and examine witnesses upon the stand, or he may introduce any deposition which has been legally taken in the cause. Under those circumstances, depositions taken before the notice was served, as well as those taken afterward, are equally admissible, provided the statements of the deponents are applicable to the matters thus put in issue between the parties.

After the defense was closed, the plaintiffs offered evidence to impeach one of the witnesses, who had given material testimony for the defendants. When called, the impeaching witness stated that he knew the witness sought to be impeached, and knew other persons who were acquainted with the witness, and that they both resided in the City of Sacramento; whereupon, the counsel of the plaintiffs put the question, "What is the reputation of the witness for moral character?" To that question, the counsel of the defendants objected, on the ground that the inquiry should be limited to the general reputation of the witness for truth and veracity, with the right to put the further inquiry whether the witness testifying would believe the other on his oath; and the court sustained the objection, and rejected the testimony.

No reasons were assigned by the court for the ruling; and of course the only point presented is, whether the particular question propounded was properly excluded.

Courts of justice differ very widely, whether the general reputation of the witness for truth and veracity is the true and sole criterion of his credit, or whether the inquiry may not properly be extended to his entire moral character and estimation in society. They also differ as to the right to inquire of the impeaching witness whether he would believe the other on his oath. All agree, however, that the first inquiry must be restricted either to the general reputation of the witness for truth and veracity, or to his general character; and that it cannot be extended to particular facts or transactions, for the reason that, while every man is supposed to be fully prepared to meet those general inquiries, it is not likely he would be equally so without notice to answer as to particular acts.

According to the views of Mr. Greenleaf, the inquiry in all cases should be restricted to the general reputation of the witness for truth and veracity; and he also expresses the opinion that the weight of authority in the American courts is against allowing the question to be put to the impeaching witness whether he would believe the other on his oath. In the last edition of his work on the law of evidence, he refers to several decided cases, which appear to support these positions; and it must be admitted that some of these decisions, as well as others that have since been made to the same effect, are enforced by reasons drawn from the analogies of the law, to which it would be difficult to give any satisfactory answer.

1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 461; Phillips v. Kingfield, 19 Me., 375, per Shepley, J.; Gass v. Stimpson, 2 Sumn., 610; Wood v. Mann, 2 Sumn., 321; Craig v. The State, 5 Ohio, N. S., 605; Gilbert v. Sheldon, 13 Barb., 623; Jackson v. Lewis, 13 Johns., 504; U. S. v. Van Sickle, 2 McLean, 219; State v. Bruce, 24 Me., 72; Com. v. Moore, 3 Pick., 196; Gilchrist v. McKee, 4 Watts, 380; State v. Smith, 7 Vt., 141; Frye v. Bank of Illinois, 11 Ill., 367; Jones v. The State, 13 Tex., 168; State v. Randolph, 24 Conn., 363; Uhl v. Com., 6 Gratt., 706; Wike v. Lightener, 11 S. & R., 338; Kimmel v. Kimmel, 3 S. & R., 338; State v. Howard, 9. S., 668; Bates v. Barber, 4 Cush., 107.

On the other hand, a recent English writer on the law of evidence, of great repute, maintains that the inquiry in such cases properly involves the entire moral character of the witness whose credit is thus impeached, and his estimation in society; and that the opinion of the impeaching witness, as to whether he is entitled to be believed on his oath, is also admissible to the jury. 2 Taylor, Ev., secs. 1082, 1083.

That learned writer insists that the regular mode of examining into the character of the witness sought to be impeached is to ask the witness testifying whether he knows his general reputation; and if so, what that reputation is, and whether, from such knowledge, he would belive him upon his oath. In support of this mode of conducting the examination, he refers to several decided cases, both English and American, which appear to sustain the views of the writer.

Rex v. Watson, 32 How. St. Tr., 496; Mawson v. Hartsink, 4 Esp., 104; Rex v. Rookwood, 13 How. St. Tr., 211; Carpenter v. Wall, 11 Ad. & El., 803; Anonymous, 1 Hill (S. C.), 259; Hume v. Scott, 3 A. K. Marsh., 262; Day v. The State, 13 Mo., 422; 3 Am. Law. Jour., N. S., 145.

Both Mr. Greenleaf and Mr. Taylor agree, however, that the impeaching witness must be able to state what is generally said of the other witness by those among whom he resides, and whom he is chiefly conversant, and in effect admit, that unless he can so speak, he is not qualified to testify upon the subject, for the reason that it is only what is generally said of the witness by his neighbors that constitutes his general reputation. To that extent they concur, and so, as a general remark, do the authorities which on the one side and the other support these respective theories; but beyond that, the views of these commentators, as well as the authorities, appear to be irreconcilable.

In referring to this conflict of opinion among text writers, and judicial decisions, we have not done so because there is anything presented in this record that makes it necessary to choose between them, or even renders it proper that we should attempt at the present time to lay down any general rule upon the subject. On the contrary, our main purpose in doing so is to bring the particular question exhibited in the bill of exceptions to the test of both theories, in order to ascertain whether under either rule of practice it ought to have been allowed. Under the first mode of conducting the examination, it is admitted that it was properly rejected, and we think it was equally improper, supposing the other rule of practice to be correct. Whenever a witness is called to impeach the credit of another, he must know what is generally said of the witness whose credit is impeached by those among whom the last named witness resides, in order that he may be able to answer the inquiry either as to his general character in the broader sense, or as to his general reputation for truth and veracity. He is not required to speak from his own knowledge of the acts and transactions from which the character or reputation of the witness had been derived, nor, indeed, is he allowed to do so, but he must speak from his own knowledge of what is generally said of him by those among him he resides, and with whom he is chiefly conversant; and any question that does not call for such knowledge is an improper one, and ought to be rejected. No case has been cited authorizing such a question, or even furnishing an example where it was put, and our researches in that direction have not been attended with any better success. For these reasons, we think the question was properly excluded. Some further attempts were made by the plaintiffs to impeach this witness, and with that view they called another witness, who testified that he knew the one sought to be impeached, and had had business transactions with him during the years 1852-'53 in the city where they resided. On being asked by the counsel of the plaintiffs what was the reputation of the witness for truth and veracity, he replied that he had no means of knowing what it was, not having had any dealings with him since those transactions; thereupon the same counsel repeated the question, limiting it to that period.

Objection was made to that question by the counsel of the defendants on the ground that the period named in the question was too remote, and the court sustained the objection and excluded the question. To this ruling the plaintiffs excepted. Such testimony undoubtedly may properly be excluded by the court when it applies to a period of time so remote from the transaction involved in the controversy, as thereby to become entirely unsatisfactory and immaterial; and as the law cannot fix that period of limitation, it must necessarily be left to the discretion of the court. Considering that the witness had already stated that he was not able to answer the question, we do not think that the discretion of the court in this case was unreasonably exercised.

None of the exceptions can be sustained, and the judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

Limitations in equity—same as at law—Michigan law—fraud or concealment, to avoid statute, how set up—fifty years' exclusive possession.

Where the common ancestor, and defendants claiming under them, have been in the exclusive possession of the premises in question sixty-two years before the commencement of this suit, and no right has been set up by the plaintiffs, or by those under whom they claim, to the title or the possession of the premises, until the filing of this bill; held, that the case is one in which courts of equity follow the courts of law, in applying the Statute of Limitations.

There are two Acts of Limitation in the State of Michigan, either of which bars the claim of the plaintiffs. 1. The Act of May 15, 1820, which limits the right of action to twenty years after the same has accrued; and 2. The Act of Nov. 15, 1829, which limits the right of entry to ten years, if the cause of action has then accrued.

When the plaintiffs seek to avoid the operation of the limitation, by an averment of concealment and fraud on the part of the defendants and those under whom they claim, the particular acts of fraud or concealment should have been set forth by distinct averments, as well as the time when discovered, so that the court may see whether, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, the discovery might not have been before made.

When no acts of fraud or concealment are stated, and the time when even an intention to defraud, which is all that is averred, was discovered, was some fifty years after the exclusive possession, of the defendants and those under whom they claim, had commenced; and this, although the plaintiffs lived in the neighborhood of the premises; held, that the Statute of Limitations applies.

Submitted Feb. 17 and Mar. 9, 1860. Decided Mar. 26, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Michigan.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. H. Gillet and Platt Smith, for appellants:

The bill sets forth a complete title executed in strict compliance with the previous edict of the King.

See White's Land Laws, fol. 1, p. 668.

The title papers in this case are executed by the proper officers, and in strict compliance with the above law. By virtue of this grant the lands in question became, and forever remained, private property, and consequently were never transferred by France to Great Britain, nor by Great Britain to the United States, as government property. The Treaty of 1794 between the United States and Great Britain, confirmed the rights of all parties, and their legal representatives, in the titles which they held at the time Great Britain ceded that country to the United States.

See art. 9 of the Treaty, Shanks v. Dupont, 3 Pet., 262.

The facts charged in the bill are admitted by the pleadings. Part of the defendants demur, the others plead in confession and avoidance. Thereby the authority of the officers making the grant, the reasons for taking the case out of the Statute of Limitations, the fraud and dishonesty of the defendants, and those under whom they hold—are all admitted.

Even if it were not admitted, the authority of officers making the grant would be presumed.

See Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet., 410, 411.

Lapse of time is not made a question by the pleadings; the court will not presume for the defendants what they do not claim for themselves.

In Weatherhead's Lessees v. Baskerville, 11 How., 329, the suit was brought 58 years after the death of the ancestor; 53 years after the partition among the girls; 45 years after that among the boys. The suit was maintained. See pages 359, 360.

In Stackpoole v. Davoren, an account of rents and profits of an estate was decreed after an adverse possession of 50 years.

1 Bro. P. C., 9, referred to in Hill on Trustees, 265.

In a recent case, Sir C. Pepys, the M. R., set aside a purchase by a steward at an undervalue after an interval of 47 years. 2d June, 1835: affirmed 11 Clark & F., 714; Hill on Trustees, 265, where reference is given to many other cases of like tendency.

A case is reported in 5 Sim., 640. There the defendants had been in possession 70 years; and to a bill filed by the remainder-man to recover the estate, a plea was put in, stating that adverse possession of the property had been held during the whole time, and that the rents and profits had been received. The Vice-Chancellor overruled the plea, and on an appeal taken, his decision was affirmed by Chancellor Brougham.

NOTE.—Limitations in equity. Relief denied from lapse of time. See note to Pratt v. Carroll, 12 U. S. (8 Cranch), 478, and note to Thomas v. Harvie's Heirs, 23 U. S. (10 Wheat.), 147.

The grant by the governor and intendant severed the tract from the public domain, and it could not be re-annexed without process by or before them.

Contrary to the Roman law, the French law did not hold to a strict forfeiture when a condition was not performed within a time limited.

The King is bound by the law equally with the subject.

Œuvres Duplessis, Vol. I., p. 679; see 1 White Land L., 639.

By the English as well as the French law, an action or "office" was necessary to re-annex a concession to the public domain.

Greenl. Cruise, Vol. II., p. 32, secs. 39, 41.

It has been repeatedly held that a perfect title needs no confirmation.

9 How., 445.

If the title had not been perfect, the confirmation would merely have made good the old, and would have made no new title.

See Act of Congress, March 3, 1807, sec. 2, 2 Stat. at L., 435.

This provides that the party in possession, in his own right, under a claim filed under the former Acts, shall be confirmed in the title to the same, as in the state of inheritance. No other title is intended to be granted by the Act. The confirmation is inoperative, except in favor of those in whom the right of possession is.

Antoine Beaubien's possession was that of a son and brother, not that of an adverse claimant; he was not in possession in his own right, but only for himself and his brothers and sisters.

Ang. Lim., 403, note.

There is equity in the bill. The matters in controversy could not be investigated at law without a multiplicity of suits. A court of equity will not hesitate to look behind a patent, especially when it appears that fraud was used in obtaining.

Reeder v. Barr, 4 Ohio, 446; Ware v. Brush, 1 McLean, 533.

The plea is no bar to the matters set up in the bill. The plea of a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, should aver that the person from whom he purchased had such an interest in the property as entitled him to convey it to the defendant.

2 Dan. Ch. Pr., 687; Head v. Egerton, 3 P. Wms., 281; Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves., 252; Craig v. Leiper, 2 Yerg., 196.

The plea traces title from the United States. But this is not enough, for a pre-existing title is distinctly averred and set forth in the bill; and it has been repeatedly held that a patent from the United States does not affect a pre-existing title in a third person.

New Orleans v. Armas, 9 Pet., 236; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 738.

The bill charges that this patent was obtained by the fraud of Antoine Beaubien, the patentee; that the patent was based on the French titles under which plaintiffs claim, which patent, so far as it purports to convey anything to said Antoine, is fraudulent and void as against complainants. The bill also charges that defendants, or some of them, have possession of the documents of the original title. The plea does not undertake to deny the fraud, or that the patent was obtained on the claim founded on the original French titles, or that the defendants have not the original title papers. All these should be negatived by averment in the plea.

2 Daniels' Ch. Pr., 691.

Possession, to be adverse, must be in good faith, and not a precarious possession, such as a possessio fratris or a fraudulent possession.

Messrs J. M. Carlisle, Geo. P. Russell and H. H. Emmons, for appellees:

1. The claim of the complainants is barred by the Acts of Congress and the action under them, by which Antonie Beaubien obtained a patent.

The following are the statutes under which the proceedings were had:

2 Stat. at L., March 26th, 1804; Act of 1805, March 3d., Stat. at L., 343, sec. 5; Act of March 3d, 1807, 2d Stat. at L., 437.

Among all the statutes creating boards, whose decisions this court has declared to be judicial and final, none are more comprehensive than these.

We insist that the statute having in express terms barred all rights not presented and proved before the board, every right which is in hostility to the decision of the board, is forever cut off.

The following cases we submit in full to sustain these views:

Bernard v. Bougard, 1 Harr., (Mich.), 180, Hickey v. Stewart, 3 How., 750; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet., 454, 458; see 6 Pet., 770; Robinson v. Minor, 10 How., 627; Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 348; Laroche v. Jones, 9 How., 155; West v. Cochran, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 414; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 729, 730.

2. The claim in this case is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

This defense, as well as lapse of time generally, may be taken by demurrer.

Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 15 Pet., 233; Story, Eq. Pl., secs. 503, 506, 761; 4 Wash., 631, 632; 2 Sch. & Lef., 637; 6 Sims, 51; 4 Johns. Ch., 299; 2 Ves., Jr., 294; 1 Johns. Ch., 46; 1 Bald. 418; 19 Vesey, 180; 7 Paige, 195; 11 Eng. Ch., 68.

The bill in this case contains no sufficient averment to avoid the application of the statute.

The two Acts, of May 15, 1820 (R. Laws of Mich., 1833, p. 570, sec., 6), and of Nov., 15, 1829 (R. Laws 1833, p. 408), and especially the latter, bar all claim in this case.

For the application of the Act of 1829 to past causes of action, see Laws of Michigan 1843, p. 43, declaring that all causes shall be determined by the law applicable to them, when the Rev. Stats. of 1838 were passed.

See, also, judicially so holding, Lastly v. Cramer, 2 Doug. (Mich.), 307.

It is hardly necessary to cite the following cases, to show that where the statute commences to run, no subsequent disability will arrest it.

15 Johns., 169; Adams, Eq., 69 note 1; 1

Sug. Vend., 889 3; Brod. & Bing., 217; 3 Johns. Ch., 140, and cases cited; Plowd., 353; 4 Mass., 282; C. & Hills Notes, 320.

And most particularly do we ask attention to the decisive fact, that in this Statute of 1829 there is no saving clause. The bar is general and universal. The non-resident is bound equally with the resident, the infant with the adult, and we therefore need not stop to discuss the particular circumstances of each complaint.

That where the Legislature have made no exceptions, the courts can make none.

See 1 Sug. Vend., 889; 4 Tenn., 307, per Shippen, arguendo, and many other cases cited elsewhere in this argument.

This court has repeatedly recognized this rule.

Bank of the State of Alabama v. Dalton, 9 How., 522; McIver v. Ragan, 2 Wheat., 25; Bacon v. Howard, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 25.

If, then, this action may be said to have arisen at any time before 1828, it was barred Nov. 10, 1839.

When, within the meaning of this rule, did it arise?

The bill says, that Antoine Beaubien was in possession with his brother before 1800; that he presented a sole claim before the board in 1804, and did not succeed because he failed in his attempt to prove a conveyance to himself under the French title. He then, in 1804, claimed sole ownership, attempted to prove it. This was open and notorious. A public record is made of it. All had notice of it. There is no denial that all the co-heirs had such notice; and there is no pretense that he agreed expressly to take in trust for them. This, then, was a hostile sole claim. But the bill further says, that again, in 1807, he presented another sole claim as sole occupant and improver. He procured witnesses to swear he was such. It was judicially determined he was such in a proceeding in rem, which impleaded all the world. Not only is there no averment that he had agreed to hold for the other heirs, but there is not one fact or circumstance stated which could lead them to believe so. He could not, without the aid of perjury, have proved in his own name, if he were not the sole occupant.

See Bernard v. Bougard, 1 Harr. (Mich.), 130.

We submit the Act of 1829 is a complete bar.

But the Act of May 15, 1820, is equally a bar. In the circumstances of this case the disabilities of non-residence, infancy and coverture are wholly immaterial. There can be no successive disabilities, either in the same person or set up in succeeding heirs. If the disabilities of the first takers are removed, the heirs must sue within 10 or 20 years (according to the statute) thereafter. Thus, if A, an heir, be a non-resident and dies, and his heir is also a non-resident, the disability of the latter cannot be added to that of his ancestor, but he must sue within the time limited after the death of the first taker; otherwise statutes of limitation would be perpetual.

The Act of 1820 limits the right of action to 20 years, and the saving section is as follows:

"This Act shall not extend to bar any infant, persons imprisoned, beyond seas, &c., &c., from bringing either of the actions before mentioned within the term before set and limited for bringing such actions, calculating from the time such impediment shall be removed."

Whitney v. Webb, 10 Ohio, 513.

Plaintiff resided out of, and had never been within, the State of Ohio, and his ancestor and those under whom the ancestor claimed, had in their lifetime been in the same situation, and the question was, whether the exception in the law (which was like ours) saved the rights of the plaintiff, who and whose ancestors had been successively and continually under the technical disability of non-residence.

The court cites and analyzes Plowd., 358; 6 East, 80; 4 Miss., 182; 2 Conn., 27; and 3 Johns. Ch., 129—which is an elaborate review of all the old cases—and holds that the action was barred immediately on the death of the ancestor or first taker, provided twenty years had then elapsed: that as the statute provided for no period after that for the heir to sue, and saved the rights only of the person to whom the right accrued, there was no mode in which by mere construction the heir could be allowed any time after the lapse of twenty years: that the person to whom the right accrued might have sued within twenty years after his disability removed. But this right did not accrue to the heir. On page 517 it says, successive disabilities cannot be set up where they exist in the same person, any more than when one man attempts to protect himself by one in himself, after the removal of one in his ancestor.

The doctrine was strictly applied in a case in equity in the same volume, Ridley v. Hettman, 10 Ohio, 524.

See, also, Thorp v. Raymond, 16 How., 247.

The court will not fail to perceive the vagueness with which the bill is drawn.

It makes no averment that these complainants have been continuously out of the Territory and the State of Michigan. Such, it is notorious, is not the fact. They all reside within half a mile of Detroit, and though in Canada, are and have for years, as have all their ancestors, been weekly there. Hence the statement that they have "resided" in Canada.

This may be true, and still if they have been within the State, the running of the statutes will be conceded. No authority need be cited for this. The bill should have averred that the complainants had not been within the State. See the common precedents of pleadings, the old exception of "beyond seas."

This answers the pretense that some of the complainants are within the exceptions of the Statute of 1820.

Still we repeat, that of 1829 has no exceptions.

That our holding is adverse, so as to start the running of the statute, whether it be said there is a trust or a tenancy in common, we cite a few decisions. They show equally what we cannot take time distinctly to argue, that this is a case where the presumption of a grant is full and clear.

Still, the main object is to show an adverse holding within the Statute of Limitations.

Prescott v. Nevers, 4 Mason, 326; 2 Smith L. C., 450; Notes to Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burr, 60; Nepean v. Doe, 2 Mees. & W., 910.

If a party holds in a character incompatible with the idea of a freehold in another, his holding is adverse. In order to ascertain the character of the holding, courts will look at the party's conduct while in possession. The cases are very fully cited in Davies v. Lowndes, 5 Bing., N. C., 161; see, per Tindal, Ch. J., p. 71; also, 72, 73, 74. For the evidence in the case, see p. 66.

A patent from the government invests the patentee with seizure in law, so that he is considered in actual possession until an ouster by a third person. 2 Smith, L. C., 469.

The patentee's conveyance transfers a like possession to his grantee.

See Barr v. Gratz, 4 Wheat., 215; 2 Smith, L. C., 469.

Page 472 cites the cases fully, to show that one tenant in common, by claiming to hold as owner of the whole, will constitute an ouster of his co-tenant.

See, also, Humbert v. Trinity Ch., 24 Wend., 601, 602.

3. The Statute of Limitations of Michigan, relied on in this case, is broader than the English Statute, and it is equally a bar in a court of equity as at law; this court under this statute, can make no exception in cases of undiscovered fraud.

Our Statute does apply equally to a court of equity as to that of law. Its language is, "no real or possessory action, of whatever name or nature," shall be sustained after ten years from 1829. So is the Act, also, of 1820.

Farnam v. Brooks, 9 Pick., 242; Johnson v. Ames, 11 Pick., 182, are directly in point, holding that a statute like this bound ex directu, both courts of equity and law, alike.

Beckford v. Wade, 17 Ves., 87.

4. If it is held that this Act is to receive the same construction as those which simply bar specifically enumerated legal actions, and that this court will, therefore, admit the same exceptions to its applications, such as trust and undiscovered fraud, then we say the bill does not set up facts to bring the case within these exceptions, and the remedy is barred by the statute under the general principle applicable to all Statutes of Limitations.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of the State of Michigan.

The bill was filed by the plaintiffs against the defendants, claiming to be tenants in common with them in a tract of land now lying in the City of Detroit, each party deriving title from a common ancestor, who made the settlement as early as the year 1745, under a concession from the French Government. The tract contained five arpents in front on Lake Erie, and eighty arpents back. The ancestor, John Baptiste Beaubien, died in 1798, having had the uninterrupted possession of the property from the time of the concession in 1745, leaving a widow and several children. Two of the sons, Antoine and Lambert, resided with their father at the time of his death, and continued in the possession and occupation with their mother till her death, in 1809.

In 1804, Antoine, one of the heirs in possession, applied to the Board of Commissioners to adjust land claims, under the Act of Congress of 1804, to confirm his claim to the land; and which was confirmed accordingly, and a patent issued in 1812. Acts of Congress, 26th March, 1804 (2 Stat. at L., 277); 3d March, 1805 (2 Stat. at L., 343); 3d March, 1807 (2 Stat. at L., 437).

Lambert, the other brother, continued in the joint occupation of the tract till his death, in 1815, and subsequently, in 1818, Antoine conveyed to the heirs of Lambert a moiety of the premises; and the present occupants and defendants are the descendants of the two brothers, or purchasers from them under this title.

The tract constitutes a portion of the City of Detroit, and is averred in the bill to have been worth, at the time of the filing of it in 1855, from a half a million to a million of dollars, exclusive of the improvements.

The case was presented to the court below on demurrer to the bill, and on pleas by some of the defendants, as bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice.

The plaintiffs aver in the bill, in addition to the facts already stated, that they are the descendants of the brothers and sisters of Antoine and Lambert, from whom the title of the defendants is derived; and that Antoine and Lambert and their descendants possessed and occupied the tract in subordination to the right and title of their co-tenants; and that they were permitted to possess and occupy the same in confidence, that they so held the premises for the common benefit of all parties interested. They further aver, that they verily believed that the brothers, Antoine and Lambert, and their legal representatives, were acting in good faith in this respect, until about the year 1840 they discovered, after examination and inquiry into the facts and circumstances, that they intended to cheat and defraud them, and those under whom they claim, of their just rights in the premises.

The bill further states that Antoine, in his lifetime, and his son, who is one of the defendants, and the heirs of Lambert, have conveyed to divers individuals, rights in the said tract; that, in some instances, they made donations without consideration; in others, conveyances for a pretended consideration; and that there now are in possession, as heirs, donees, and purchasers of different portions of the premises, several hundred persons, most of whose names are unknown to the plaintiffs, which persons set up claims and pretended rights and interests therein. And further, that neither Antoine nor Lambert's heirs, down to the year 1834, committed any open or notorious act, inconsistent with the rights of the plaintiffs, or in any way disavowed the trust and relation as co tenant, or of brothers or co-heirs, nor in any manner asserted any title to the land, to the exclusion of their rights.

The court decreed upon the demurrer to the bill, and also upon the pleas, in favor of the defendants.

The case comes before us on an appeal from this decree. Antoine and Lambert, the two sons of J. B. Beaubien, the common ancestor, and those claiming under them, have been in the exclusive possession of the premises in question since 1793, a period of sixty-two years before the commencement of this suit. The plaintiffs and those under whom they claim, during all this time, as averred in the bill, resided in Canada, and as appears, most of them in the County of Essex, in the neighborhood of the premises. The four hundred arpents which, in 1793, were worth some six or seven thousand dollars, now embrace a portion of the City of Detroit, and are worth, with the improvements, over a million of dollars; and, for aught that is averred in the bill or appears in the case, no right has been set up by them, or by those under whom they claim, to the title or the possession of the premises, until the filing of the bill; no claim to the rents and profits, or to an account as tenants in common, or for partition, or to be admitted to the enjoyment of any right as co-heirs.

The case is one, so far as the title of the plaintiffs is concerned, which depends upon the establishment of an implied trust to be raised by the evidence, and hence falls within that class of cases in which courts of equity follow the courts of law, in applying the Statute of Limitations. Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch., 91; Hovenden v. Annesley, 2 Sch. & Lef., 607.

There are two Acts of Limitation in the State of Michigan, either of which bars the claim of the plaintiffs:

1. The Act of May 15, 1820, which limits the right of action to twenty years after the same has accrued; and,

2. The Act of November 15, 1829, which limits the right of entry to ten years, if the cause of action has then accrued.

The language is: "No writ of right or other real action, no ejectment or other possessory action, &c., shall hereafter be sued, &c., if the cause of action has now accrued, unless the same be brought within ten years after the passage of this Act, any law, usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

There is no saving clause in this as to infants, femes covert, or residents beyond seas.

The pleader has sought to avoid the operation of the limitation, by an averment of concealment and fraud on the part of the defendants, and those under whom they claim. The plaintiffs aver "that, until within the last few years, your orators and oratrixes, and those under whom they claim, verily believed and supposed that the said brothers, Antoine and Lambert, and their legal representatives, were acting in good faith towards them, but that, about the year 1840, they discovered by information, after examination and inquiry into the facts and circumstances of the case, that the said brothers Antoine and Lambert, and their legal repre sentatives, intended to cheat and defraud them, and those under whom they claim, of their just rights in the premises."

This averment is too general and indefinite to have the effect to avoid the operation of the statute. The particular acts of fraud or concealment should have been set forth by distinct averments, as well as the time when discovered, so that the court may see whether, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, the discovery might not have been before made. Stearns v. Page, 7 How., 819; Moore v. Greene, 19 How., 69.

Here, no acts of fraud or concealment are stated; and the time when even an intention to defraud, which is all that is averred, was discovered, was some fifty years after the exclusive possession, of the defendants and those under whom they claim, had commenced; and this, although the parties lived in the neighborhood, and almost in sight of the city, which has, in the mean time, grown up on the premises.

We think the Statute of Limitation applies, and that the decree of the court below should be affirmed.

CHRISTIAN A. ZABRISKIE, Appt.,

v.

THE CLEVELAND, COLUMBUS AND CINCINNATI RAILROAD CO., AND JOHN A. BUTLER ET AL.

(See S. C., How., 381-401.)

Bill may be filed by stockholder, to restrain corporation from performing contract which is ultra vires*—who may voluntarily become defendants—more approved form of suit—assent of stockholders to contract, when it estops them—when corporation and stockholders are estopped to deny validity of contract.*

A bill may be filed by stockholder to restrain a railroad company from paying the interest on bonds which it had guarantied of another railroad company, and to enjoin the corporation from applying any of its effects to their redemption, on the ground that the contract is ultra vires of the corporation, and cannot be confirmed against a dissenting stockholder.

Holders of the bonds may avail themselves of the invitation of the bill, to become defendants, to all their class, who assert that they are bona fide holders, and that their securities are valid obligations of the company.

The usual and more approved form of such a suit is that of one or more stockholders, to sue in behalf of the others.

Where the stockholders at a meeting, without a dissenting vote, resolved: "That the indorsement be approved, as the act of the company," although there was dissatisfaction openly expressed ed by a majority who declined to vote; held, that the resolution complied with the law of Ohio which provided that no such aid should be furnished nor any arrangement perfected until, at a meeting of the stockholders, they shall have assented thereto.

A court of equity will not hear a stockholder assert that he is not interested in preventing the law of the corporation from being broken.

Where these negotiable securities had been placed on sale in the community, accompanied by the resolution and vote inviting public confidence, and had circulated without an effort on the part of the corporators to restrain them, and men had invested their money on the assurance they afforded, the corporation was held liable.

A corporation is held to a careful adherence to truth in their dealings with mankind, and cannot, by their representations or silence, involve others in onerous engagements, and then defeat the calculations and claims which their own conduct had superinduced.

Argued Mar. 14, 1860. Decided Mar. 26, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellant, a stockholder of the C., C. & C. R. R. Co., to enjoin the said Corporation from applying any of its effects to the redemption of certain bonds of another Corporation which it had indorsed.

The court below allowed a temporary injunction, pending the suit. Subsequently a final decree was entered, dissolving this injunction and dismissing the bill with costs, whereupon the complainant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. P. Benjamin, W. S. C. Otis and E. M. Stanton, for appellant:

The record presents the following questions for the decision of the court:

1. Had the directors of the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati Railroad Company the power to indorse the bonds of the Columbus, Piqua and Indiana Railroad Company?

II. Were said bonds and the indorsement thereon void in the hands of Neil & Dennison, and of those claiming under them?

III. Are the defendants, Butler, Belknap, and Callender, bona fide holders of said indorsement, without any notice, actual or constructive, of the circumstances under which the indorsements were made, or of the want of power on the part of the directors of the Clevaland, Columbus and Cincinnati Railroad Company to make the same?

IV. Has the complainant forfeited his right to the relief which he seeks, by any neglect on his part?

1. The power to bind must be found, either in the charter of the C., C. & C. R. R. Co., or in some general law of the State, which has been accepted by the entire body of the stockholders of the Company, and has thereby become a part of its charter, or the indorsement is ultra vires, and therefore void. The only laws of the State in which it is claimed by any of the defendants such power can be found, are those of March 3, 1851, 49 Ohio laws, 94, and March 1, 1852, 50 Ohio Laws, 274.

In all questions of power arising under a grant of corporate privileges, the test of the existence if the power is to be found in the inquiry whether the same is expressly granted or whether it is incidental to any express grant of power, and necessary to its accomplishment.

State of Maryland v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 6 Gill, 363; Perrine v. C. & D. Canal Co., 9 How., 172; N. Y. Firemen Ins. Co. v. Ely, 2 Cow., 678, 709; see, also, Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat., 636; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet., 519; Bank of Chillicothe v. Swayne, 8 Ohio, 257; 8 Gill & J., 248; 22 Conn., 502; 29 Me., 123; 2 Kent's Com., 350; Ang. & A. Corp., 111, 256–258.

The counsel then examined the powers of the C. C. & C. R. R. Company under its original Act of Incorporation of March 14, 1836, and the Act to revive the original Act of March 12, 1845, referring especially to secs. 1, 3, 9, 12, 14, 16 and 17, of the Act of 1836, and sec. 6 of the Act of 1845.

It is seen that no power was expressly conferred upon the directors of this Company by the Acts incorporating the same, to indorse the bonds of individuals or other railroad companies for any purposes whatever, nor was any such authority necessary to the construction or operation of said road. The president and directors are merely the agents of the Corporation, whose powers are conferred by the Acts of incorporation, and are subject to the same strict rules of construction as those of the body over which they preside.

Beatty v. Knowler, 4 Pet., 152; Ang. & A. Corp., secs. 280, 291, 299.

If the directors could indorse the bonds of the C., P. & I. R. R. Co., in order to bring business over the road of that Company to Columbus, thence to be carried over their own road to Cleveland, they could, for the like purpose, indorse the bonds of any steamboat or transportation company, or incur any other pecuniary liability, in order to bring the business over Lake Erie to Cleveland, thence to be carried over their road to Columbus, or they could indorse the bonds of manufacturing companies, to enable them to erect manufacturing companies along the line of their road, because such establishments would necessarily increase the business and income of the same.

No subtilty of argument, no force of intellectual power, no degree of professional reputation, are adequate successfully to maintain such a doctrine, for it is opposed to the principles of public policy, and the uniform authority of adjudicated cases.

The Act of March 3, 1851, conferred no power upon the C., C. & C. R. R. Co. to indorse the bonds of the C., P. & I. R. R. Co., for the following reasons:

1. Because said Act has been repealed by the Act of May 1, 1852, passed in accordance with art. 13 of the Constitution, which took effect Sept. 1, 1851.

The Act of May 1, 1852, created a new, entire and independent system of railroad law, and was designed, and did in fact operate, as a substitute for said Acts, and thereby repealed them.

It is well established on principle and authority, that where a subsequent Act revises antecedent Acts, and is intended as a substitute for them, such subsequent Act repeals the antecedent Act, although it contains no express words to that effect.

2. Because the General Assembly intended to repeal said Act of March 3, 1851.

The principal objection to the argument in favor of the repeal of the Act of March 3, 1851, is founded upon sec. 16, art. 2, Constitution, 1851:

"No law shall be revised or amended, unless the new Act contain the entire Act revived, or the section or sections amended, and the section or sections so amended shall be repealed."

The counsel referred to the case of Pine v. Nicholson, 6 Ohio St., 176, and asserted of his own personal knowledge, as well as from information derived from the Judges of the Supreme Court of Ohio, that the courts of the State of Ohio uniformly hold that the foregoing provision does not forbid the repeal of the Statute by implication.

The Act of March 3, 1851, did not create any vested right in the C., C. & C. Company, because there had been no acceptance of said Act by the stockholders of the Company. It was a mere license to the Company, and the Legislature could repeal it an any time.

3. Because the indorsement was not made for any of the objects authorized by said Act.

Only those contracts could be made, and only those companies could enter into them, which were expressly authorized by the Act, and even the mode of making the contract prescribed by the Act must be strictly observed.

Head v. Providence Ins. Co., 2 Cranch, 127.

4. Because the indorsement was not made in reference to said Act of March 3, 1851, as the source of power, but with reference to the charter. Although the directors of the C., C. & C. R. R. Company in their resolution of June 16, 1854, proposed to submit their action in incurring the liabilities mentioned in said resolution, to a vote of the stockholders for their approval, under the 4th section of the Act of March 3, 1851, all the liabilities mentioned in said resolution were incurred by said board without any reference to said Act as the source of their power, but the reference made in said resolution to said section was a mere afterthought on the part of said directors, adopted after the propriety of their conduct had begun to be called in question, with a view to give to their illegal and unauthorized acts the semblance of legal authority, and thereby wrest from the stockholders a vote of approval.

5. Because in making said indorsement there was no compliance with the imperative prerequisite conditions of said Act.

See the 4th section of said Act; also, Commissioners of Kensington v. Keith, 2 Pa. St., 218; Webster v. French, 12 Ill., 302; Weaver v. Cherry, 8 Ohio St., 564; Voorhees v. Bank, 10 Pet., 449; Stayton v. Hulings, 7 Ind., 144; Southampton Dock Company v. Richards, 1 Scott. 6. Because neither the complainant nor any considerable number of the stockholders of said Company, ever consented to said indorsement, either directly or by implication.

7. Because said Act of March 3, 1851, is unconstitutional. The several Acts incorporating the C., C. & C. R. R. Co. constitute a legislative contract, not only between the State and the members of the Company as an organized body, but also between each individual member of the Company on the one hand, and the aggregate numbers of the Company on the other—between the individual stockholders and the "legal entity." This contract is as completely under the protection of the supreme law of the land, as a contract between the State and a corporation.

St., 339, 352; 11 Ga., 438; 39 Me., 571; 1 N. H., 44; 8 Mass., 268; 10 Mass., 384; 10 Mass., 390; 2 Gray, 543.

Every individual who became a member of the Corporation in question by subscribing to its capital stock, undertook and promised to pay the amount of his subscription for the purpose of constructing and equipping said road; and the Company undertook and promised to appropriate the same to the construction and equipment of said road, and to pay in dividends to such member his ratable share of the earnings of said road, beyond what might be necessary to maintain said road and its equipment, and to meet the necessary current expenses of operating and running the same; and each party acquired an indefeasible interest in the undertaking and promise of the other party. Whether this contract was expressed or implied, is immaterial. It will not be contended that the Legislature possessed the power to exonerate such a subscriber from paying his subscription. How, then, can the Legislature, after such person has paid his subscription and become entitled to his dividends, authorize the Company to withhold the same and invest the money in other railroad schemes?

A brief inquiry into the nature and extent of the authority which the Legislature may lawfully exercise over railroad companies, and also into the nature and extent of the changes which the Legislature may make in the charter of such companies, with the consent of the organized bodies respectively, without any well-founded legal objection on the part of any individual stockholder, will throw much light upon the particular subject now under consideration, and tend to confirm the conclusion that the Act of March 3, 1851, was an unconstitutional enactment.

Grants to railroad companies are strictly construed. Corporations take no rights from the public beyond what the natural import of the words used in their Acts of incorporation rationally and properly convey. These grants are never construed to embrace public rights and duties; nor can it be presumed that the Legislature intended to part with the power of accomplishing the very object for which railroad companies are created. This object is the comfort and convenience of the public, and whatever regulations tend to secure or promote that object, the Legislature may enact, even though these regulations may abridge the value of the rights previously granted. It is upon this ground that railroad companies may be lawfully required to fence their roads, construct cattle guards, diminish the speed of their trains, and generally submit to such police regulations in respect to the management of their respective roads as will most effectually secure the safety of the persons and property transported over the same; and so long as the Legislature shall confine its action to the due exercise of the rights granted, no question can arise as to the lawfulness of such legislation.

The second branch of the inquiry depends upon a very different principle. A railroad charter once accepted becomes a contract; and though the charter is an entirety, it is in fact a two-fold instrument, both in regard to its subject and the parties thereto. So far as the charter relates to the object of the grant, the mode of carrying the same into execution, or the organs through which the Company may act, it constitutes a contract between the State and the organized body; and it is competent for the Company acting in the manner prescribed in its charter, to accept of any amendments touching these subjects which the Legislature may propose, even though these amendments are evidently less beneficial to the Company than the original Act. To this contract the individual stockholder is not a party, except as a member of the organized body. And as it is a fundamental principle of all associations of this kind, that the act of the majority is the act of all, the organized body will be bound by the action of the majority, however vehemently a minority of individual stockholders may dissent therefrom. It is upon the ground that the contract is one between the State and the Corporation as the sole parties thereto, and not upon any implied assent on the part of individual stockholders, on becoming members of the Corporation, to such changes as shall be auxiliary to the object of the grant, that all the stockholders are bound by such legislation. But, so far as the charter relates to the obligation of the Company to expend all its subscriptions solely for the specified purposes of the grant, or, in other words, in the construction and equipment of its road, or to the right of each individual stockholder to his ratable share of the net earnings of the Company in the shape of dividends, or to his right to vote upon each share of stock owned by him in the election of a board of directors, it is a contract between each individual stockholder and the organized body, made in pursuance of the authority conferred by the State. To this contract the State is not a party; but the individual stockholder on the one hand, and all the other stockholders forming the organized body of the other, are the sole parties to the contrct. And although the nature of this contract is such that it cannot be changed even by the consent of the parties to it, without legislative permission, such permission does not confer upon either party the authority to make such change without the consent of the other party. This contract between the individual stockholder and the Corporation is essentially like a contract of copartnership, and can no more be changed than any other private contract, without the consent of the parties thereto.

Natusch v. Irving, Gow. Part., Appendix, p. 576; Livingston v. Lynch, 4 Johns. Ch., 573; Ang. & Ames, Corp., secs. 536–538.

There are no difficulties connected with this question in its relation to this case, except those which have arisen from the illogical mode of treating it. If the Act of March 8, 1851, was intended to confer upon a majority of the stockholders of the Cleveland, Columbus & Cincinnati Railroad Company, authority to take the money due to the stockholders as dividends, and to appropriate it to any of the purposes mentioned in the 4th section of said Act, against the consent of a single stockholder, though owning but a single share of stock, the enactment transcended the constitutional power of the Legislature and was void.

The obligation of the contract which relates to a single share of the capital stock of a railroad company, can no more be impaired by legislative interference than the obligation of the contract which relates to the entire capital stock. The protecting power of the Constitution extends to both alike.

Where a charter has been accepted, a subsequent amendment is nothing more than a proposition to change the original contract in that particular. If the proposed change relates to the contract between the State and the organized body, it must be accepted by the organized body before it will have any binding force; but if the proposed change relates to the contract between the individual stockholder and the organized body, it must be accepted by both the parties thereto, before it will have any binding force. If the proposed change be not clearly beneficial to the individual stockholder or to the company, or if it extends the objects or increases the liabilities of the company, or enlarges the powers of the company over the stockholders, as in the present case, the acceptance of such amendment by the party to be affected thereby, must be clearly made out by the party seeking to establish the same. It should be established by clear affirmative proof, that knowledge of such change and of its effects upon their interest was brought to the stockholders, and with such knowledge they deliberately assented thereto. Any rule short of this will expose to imminent hazard the property invested in the railroads, in this State, and seriously impair the character of our legislation.

The foregoing argument against the constitutionality of the Act of March 3, 1851, cannot be overthrown or in the least degree shaken by any reference to the decisions of the English courts. That country has not any constitutional check upon the supremacy of the law-making power. An Act of Parliament, of which the terms are explicit, cannot be questioned in any court of judicature.

Dwar. on Stat., 484; Stevens v. The South Devon R'y Co., 2 Eng. L. & Eq., 138; and The Great Western R'y. Co. v. Rushout, 10 Eng. L. & Eq., 72, are cases illustrative of this feature of English law.

See, also, an article in the Edinburgh Review, October, 1854.

The Act of May 1, 1852, does not extend to companies already incorporated, unless such companies shall accept the provisions of said Act. To make such acceptance legal and obligatory, the mode therein prescribed, sec. 76, must be strictly pursued.

Ang. & Ames, Corp., sec. 291.

And it is sufficient to say that the learned judge who decided this case in the circuit court was unable to find any such acceptance, and held that the C., C. & C. R. R. Co. did not derive any power to make said indorsement from said Act.

2. The bonds in question were void in the hands of Niel & Dennison, and as the indorsement is merely accessary to the obligation of the bond, it is void also. It is of the essence of a guaranty, that there should be the valid obligation of a principal debtor. If there be no valid obligation, the guarantor is not bound.

Warren v. Crabtree, 1 Me., 169; Huntress v. Patten, 20 Me., 28; Gaither v. F. & M. Bank, 1 Pet., 37; Harrison v. Hannel, 5 Taunt., 780.

The indorsement, which bears date six days after the date of the bonds, is in form a guaranty, and is, in its legal effect by the laws of this State, collateral to the obligation of the bonds.

Bright v. Carpenter, 9 Ohio, 139; Robinson v. Abell, 17 Ohio, 36.

The counsel also argued that Dennison was a director of the Company when the purchase and sale were made, and that hence, under the second section of the Act of Dec 15, 1852, the paper became void in his hands. Notes and other commercial paper, when declared absolutely void by statute, are void even in the hands of innocent holders.

As the bonds are void, so also is the indorsement, because given to enforce such bonds.

3. The defendants, Butler, Belknap, and Callender, are not bona fide holders of said indorsement. The simple fact that the indorsement was made by a railroad company, which had no power to indorse the bonds of another company unless such power be expressly granted and strictly pursued, constituted a circumstance of itself sufficient to put the purchasers upon inquiry.

Under this head the counsel referred to 14 Ohio, 542; 12 Pick., 545; 8 Conn., 336; 4 Mass., 370; 12 Johns., 306; 3 C. & P., 325; 2 Barn. & C., 466; 3 Kern., 309, 321.

The Acts incorporating the Company, though local, are nevertheless public Acts, and are notice to all parties of the powers thereby conferred.

4. The complainant has forfeited no right to relief by any neglect on his part. To constitute such an estoppel, three requisites are indispensable:

1st. Willful silence or misrepresentation by a party who has knowledge of the fact.

2d. That the party alleging the estoppel was ignorant of the truth and without the means of information, and relied upon the faith of such acts or declarations.

3d. That injury will result to the other party by their denial.

A party who acts in ignorance of his own rights shall not be prejudiced thereby.

An estoppel is not to be favored or extended by construction.

An admission or assertion of a conclusion of law upon undisputed facts can never raise an estoppel.

6 Blackf., 389; 2 N. Y., 119.

If we apply the foregoing principles to the contract of the complainant, we shall not find in it a single requisite of an equitable estoppel. It follows, therefore, that the complainant has not forfeited in any degree his claim to the aid of this court in the protection of his rights of property, by anything which he has done or omitted to do.

Messrs. T. Ewing and H. Stanbery, for bondholders:

We claim that the acts of the Company were legal, but if not, the complainant is bound by his acquiescence therein. There is nothing to invalidate the title of the bondholder, even in strict law; much less in court of equity.

This guaranty is valid in the hands of the present holders, independently of the Act of March 4, 1851.

1. The subject-matter of the contract of which the guaranty was part was within the legitimate powers of the Corporation. The usage began with the organization of the Company, and we find it continued to within about ten months of the time of taking our last testimony.

2. But if the object for which the guaranty was made was without the legitimate powers of the Corporation, yet the guaranty in form, as it exists, was clearly within them. By the mere fact of incorporation, this Railroad Company is vested with all the powers necessary to carry into effect the object of its creation—the ordinary powers of corporations applied to and controlled by that object.

It has the general power to contract and be contracted with. Ang. & Ames, Corp., 100.

The guaranty which a court of equity is asked to compel the Railroad Company to repudiate, is clearly within the general power to contract. The Company might make a bond, it might take a bond, it might guarantee and sell the bond which it had taken. These are correlative powers, and the possession of the one implies the other. There is, therefore, nothing, in the mere fact or form of the guaranty, which is out of or beyond the general powers of the Corporation. It is quite immaterial whether there be one bond or four hundred, whether the same be large or small, provided it do not exceed the sum to which the utmost indebtment of the Corporation is limited by its charter. The bona fide holder for a valuable consideration of a bond or contract, the execution of which is within the power of the Corporation, has nothing to do with the object or purpose of its execution. It is good in his hands, no matter what the purpose for which it was given, unless some positive statute declare it void. If the object be unauthorized, the directors may be enjoined from entering into the contract or making the indorsement, as in the case of Colman v. Eastern Counties R'y Co., 4 Eng. R'y Cas., 513, 529, and Cohens v. Wilkinson, 5 Eng. R'y Cas., 741. Where the court specially confined their action to restrain an illegal purpose not consummated, while it impliedly admits the binding effect of actual contracts, legal on their face, though made in furtherance of an unauthorized object. P. 760.

We can find no case in which the negotiable paper of a private corporation, legal upon its face, in the hands of a bona fide holder for valuable consideration, without notice, has been holden void at law, or set aside in chancery, because the object for which it was given was without the power of the corporation giving it. Can it be doubted that the Corporation had power to make this identical guaranty in form and substance, if made for a proper object? Then, as the Corporation had power to make this very paper in form and substance as we now have it, neither the Corporation nor any of its members can object that they made it for an unauthorized object. It is the legality of the act of which we must inquire, not the wisdom or purity of the motive. We cannot conceive a case in which a court of equity will compel a private corporation to repudiate a contract legal on its face, the benefit of which it has received and retains, and on which innocent third persons have relied.

2. But we contend that the end and aim, the object and purpose to be effected by this contract, was legitimately within the powers of the Corporation under and by virtue of the Act of March 3, 1851.

The 4th section of that Act was re-enacted in haec verba, by section 24 of the Act of May 1, 1852; but the last named Act has no repealing clause. If, then, it applies to and covers all the cases to which the 4th section of the Act of 1851 applies, it is immaterial whether that section is repealed or not. If it does not extend to the same cases, then it is not a repeal. The Constitution of the State, however, art. 2, sec. 16, settled the question that is not a repeal.

III. But it is contended on the other side that the 4th section of the Act of 1851, and its re-enactment in 1852, so far as it applies to pre-existing corporations, impairs the validity of the contract of subscription, and is, therefore, as to them, unconstitutional and void.

We do not readily perceive how a law, permissive merely, not compulsory, authorizing this Corporation to do an act which we admit, argumenti gratia, it was not authorized to do before, violates the contract of incorporation, or the contract between corporation and corporators. The mere extension of privileges by law is not a violation of the contract of incorporation.

Gray v. The Monongahela Nav. Co., 2 Watts & S., 152.

The decision in the case of The Hartford & N. H. R. R. Co. v. Croswell, 5 Hill, 383, relied on by the complainant's counsel, bears strongly on this case.

In the case, we have no doubt that a stockholder might, by bill in chancery presented in due time, have enjoined and prevented the acceptance of the new power and the action under it. But he could not, thereby, suffer the directors to accept the newly conferred privileges, employ workmen and build boats, and then enjoin the Corporation from paying for them. If he consent to the contract, or acquiesce in it until third persons have become involved, his remedy is gone. The powers granted by the Act of 1851, do not extend to a new undertaking, but to a more full and perfect means of executing the original charter; and it is purpose of the Corporator to see that the additional powers are not exercised to their injury.

If they neglect this, they, and not innocent third persons, must suffer the consequence of their laches.

Moss v. Rossie Lead Min. Co., 5 Hill, 141; Jackson v. Lamphire, 3 Pet., 291; Mumma v. The Potomac Co., 8 Pet., 286.

If we be not sustained under the general powers of the Corporation, and if the legality of the power for which the guaranty was made must be shown in order to sustain it, then we claim and will endeavor to show, that the transaction out of which the guaranty arises, comes within the provisions of the 4th section of the Act of March 4, 1851. Under this law, the purpose with which the aid is to be furnished to another road, must be that of forming a running connection with the road aided. This gives the power, and it is no matter whether it be wisely exercised or not; and if such be its apparent object and the connection actually exist, it is quite immaterial, so far as innocent third persons are concerned, whether the aid was so applied in good faith or not. We suppose that in order to make out the casus fœderis it is not essential that the road granting the aid should connect immediately with the road aided. If they connect through an intermediate road, it is sufficient. The contract, so far as it affects the Indianpolis & Bellefontaine R. R. Co., has been complied with by change of gauge, so as to make perfect running connection from Cleveland to Indianpolis by the Columbus and Piqua road. It has been complied with by the removal of the injunction by them obtained against the requisite change of gauge, and by forming the required connection at Columbus, and the C., C. & C. R. R. is enjoying the full benefits of the contract, of which this guaranty is the consideration. The arrangement entered into in this case is quite within the powers of the Company. It may be viewed in two aspects, as it evidently was done with a double purpose.

The bonds issued by the C., P. & I. R. R. Co. was stated by the bill to have been issued to raise money to complete the road. That road connects directly with the C., C. & C. road. This makes a casus fœderis. The object in extending the aid to the C. P. & I. was to form a connection with the last-named road. But there was also another contract with other parties, which formed one of the motives for the guaranty, and which comes under the second clause of this section, namely: an arrangement between two railroad companies whose lines were so connected for their common benefit, consistent with and calculated to promote the object for which they were created. The C., P. & I. R. R. Co. had a contract with the I. & B. R. R. Co., by which the two roads were to connect on the state line at Union with a gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches, and thus run in connection from Columbus to Indianpolis. The guage of the denfendant was 4 feet 10 inches, and it connected Galion with the I. & B. R. R. of like gauge, which gauge terminated at Union, on the state line. The gauge being there broken, cars coming on this road could not pass on to Indianapolis without a change of gauge in the Indianapolis road. That road entered into a contract with the defendant, the C., C. & C. R. R., by which it agreed to change its gauge to conform with theirs, and run in connection with them. The parties were proceeding to carry out this contract, when the C., P. & I. R. R. Co. filed its bill in chancery and enjoined the change. To get rid of this injunction, and get a continuous line to Galion, and thence to Indianpolis and westward, was one of the leading objects of this guaranty. This running connection is proved to have been of great value to the defendant railroad, and all parties connected with it ought to be grateful to the complainant for abstaining to file his bill until the change of gauge and the running connection were completed. It can now injure none but the bondholders. Had he filed his bill and obtained an injunction 20 months earlier, it would have greatly injured the road and depreciated the value of his own stock.

These arguments we supposed to be fully sustained by the two clauses of the statute above cited.

V. The counsel on the other side further contend that the whole transaction is void under the 4th section of the Act of March 3, 1851, because the directors of the Company acted in the matter before they convened the stockholders to vote upon it.

The statute does not say who shall take the initiative, the directors or the stockholders, but that "no such aid shall be furnished," or "arrangement perfected," without a vote of the stockholders. There is no provision in the Act that the vote of the stockholders shall be first in order. The reverse is implied in the language of the statute, and its sole requisition is that no such act of the directors shall be valid without this sanction of the stockholders. All the sales of bonds appear to have been made after, and upon the faith of, the resoiutions of the stockholders.

VI. But it is contended that the contract under which those bonds were guarantied is not obligatory on this Company, because it does not appear to have been sanctioned by a vote of the stockholders of the other companies.

The contract was sanctioned by a vote of the stockholders of the B. & I. R. R. Co. on July 20, 1854, and it has been fully complied with by that Company and also by the C., P. & I. Co. The stockholders of this Company cannot now make this an objection, for performance is in equity equivalent to consent. On each of the above grounds we resist the prayer of the bill, and we think a court of equity cannot grant the injunction asked. The complainant road had received, and is daily receiving, the benefit of the contract which it is required to repudiate. The contract cannot be rescinded; indeed, there is no case made of prayer inserted for rescission. It is simply a prayer to compel it to repudiate, and to permit to it enjoy the benefit of the contract. The Railroad Company does not ask this. It is fully impressed with the obligation of its contract, and will not violate its faith unless compelled to do so. It is a stockholder who wants a larger dividend, who comes into equity to compel repudiation—a stockholder who, by his proxy, was present at the meeting which voted the contract, and who made no objections—a stockholder who, with a full knowledge of all the facts, lay by till a contract was irrevocably executed by the other parties thereto, and until the guaranty bonds were in the hands of bona fide purchasers, and then filed his bill. If every act of the directors was unauthorized and illegal, we think equity could afford him no relief. There is a superior equity on the other side.

Mr Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant is a stockholder of the Cleveland, Columbus & Cincinnati Railroad Company, a corporation existing by the law of Ohio, and empowered to construct a railroad from Cleveland south, and having a capital of more than $4,300,000 distributed among above nine hundred stockholders. The appellant complains, that this Corporation, in April, 1854, illegally indorsed a guaranty upon four hundred bonds of $1,000 each, with interest coupons at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable to Elias Fossett or bearer in New York, in 1869, that had been issued in that month by the Columbus, Piqua & Indiana Railroad Co., and which were also indorsed by the Bellefontaine & Indiana Railroad Co., and the Indianapolis & Bellefontaine Railroad Co., to the prejudice of the stockholders, and the burden of the resources of the said Cleveland Corporation. The object of the bill was to obtain a decree to restrain the Company, pending the suit, from paying the interest, and upon a declaration of the illegality of the bonds, to enjoin the Corporation from applying any of its effects to their redemption.

The three defendants are holders of five of the bonds, who have availed themselves of the invitation of the bill to all their class to become defendants, and who assert that they are bona fide holders, and that their securities are valid obligations of the Company. This issue of the obligations of these four Corporations originated in a negotiation among their officers, in 1854, to determine upon a uniform gauge for all their roads, and to promote intimate connections in their transit operations.

The Piqua road and the Indianapolis road were projected to extend from Columbus to Indianapolis (one hundred and eighty-five miles), and were partially finished at a gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches, and had agreed to maintain this gauge for their common interest. At Columbus they were to connect with roads of the same gauge, leading through Ohio and Pennsylvania to Philadelphia.

The Cleveland and the Bellefontaine railroads were constructed upon the Ohio gauge, of four feet ten inches, and the Companies were interested to detach the other Corporations from their Pennsylvania connection, and to combine them with their own and other companies, whose roads passed through Cleveland, along the shores of the lakes into New York, and connected there with the railroad and canal communications of that State. The Piqua road was at this time finished only forty-six miles, and the Company was embarrassed, and their work suspended for want of money. The Indianapolis Company were willing to change the gauge of their road to the Ohio pattern, but were witheld by their contract with the Piqua company. In January, 1854, the Piqua company appointed a committee from their board of directors to negotiate for money or securities sufficient to complete their road, and to discharge their debts, other than bond debts, and were authorized to prepare six hundred bonds of $1,000 each, of the usual form, to be secured by a mortgage, being the third mortgage of their franchises and road. They were also empowered to determine the gauge of the road, and either to maintain their existing connections, or to consent to the adoption of the Ohio gauge in conjunction with the Indianapolis Company.

This committee opened their negotiations in Philadelphia, but pending these the vice-president of the Company (Dennison) "sounded the inclinations" of the Cleveland Company, by intimating that if that Company would indorse a portion of the bonds, and take some of the stock of the Piqua Company, the Pennsylvania connection would be abandoned. Some assurance having been given by the president of the Cleveland Company to him, he, with the financial agent of the Company (Niel) arranged a contract with the committee of the Piqua Company to purchase the six hundred bonds, to guaranty a subscription for $50,000 of their stock at par, and to assume the control of the settlement of all controversies and questions concerning the gauge of the road. These negotiations were pending from the first week in February until the 25th of the month, when the contract was reduced to writing, and the price to be paid settled at $305,000. On the 7th of March, 1854, Dennison and Niel concluded a contract with the three Corporations, Cleveland, Indianapolis and Bellefontaine, by which they consented to the permanent adoption of the Ohio gauge for the Piqua and Indianapolis roads, and those Corporations agreed to guaranty four hundred of the bonds of the Piqua Company before mentioned, and to subscribe for $30,000 of their stock. This contract was reported shortly after to the boards of the severalo Crporations, and approved, and the bonds were issued and indorsed, and the stock subscribed for in April, 1854. The tracks of the several roads were altered to conform to this arrangement shortly after. The negotiations and contracts of Dennison and Niel were for their own account and benefit. The testimony is conclusive of the fact that the members of the Piqua board were ignorant of the assurances they had received of the disposition of the Cleveland and other companies to enter into such engagements. Dennison had been a director of this Company from its organization; but before signing the contract of the 25th February, with the Piqua Company, he exhibited a written resignation, and that resignation was entered upon the minutes of the board before the approval of the contract or the issue of the bonds to him and his associate.

This transaction was reported to the stockholders of the indorsing Corporations in July, 1854, and accepted by them as the act of the Company. The board of directors of the Cleveland Company, on the 16th June, resolved, that there should be submitted to a vote of the stockholders, at a meeting on the 1st July proximo, four propositions for the aid of other roads desiring to form a connection with that Company, under the 4th section of a statute of Ohio, passed 3d March, 1851. Among these was the indorsement of four hundred bonds of the Piqua Company. Notice was given of this meeting by advertisement in the daily papers of Cleveland and Columbus, and a daily paper in New York, but it did not disclose the object of the meeting. Above eighteen thousand shares of stock were represented, and the following resolution was adopted without a dissenting vote:

Resolved, "That the indorsement jointly and severally with the Bellefontaine and Indiana Railroad Company, and the Indianapolis and Bellefontaine Railroad Company, of $400,000 of the third mortgage bonds of the Columbus, Piqua & Indianapolis Railroad Company, by order of the board, March 6th, 1854, be, and the same is approved, adopted, and sanctioned, by this meeting, as the proper act of this Company." But, although there was no dissent in the vote, there was dissatisfaction openly expressed by the proxy of the appellant, and of a majority of the stockholders represented at the meeting, and who declined to vote on the resolution. The bonds were offered for sale in the City of New York in the summer of 1854 and the spring of 1855, under an uncontradicted representation of their validity through the votes above mentioned, and were freely purchased at fair prices. The interest was paid by the Piqua Company until October, 1855, when the installment due in that month was discharged by the indorsers in equal proportions. In the spring of 1856, the Piqua Company having become insolvent, the appellant served a notice upon the Cleveland Company not to pay any portion of the principal and interest that might become due on the bonds, and required them to sue for the cancelation of their guaranty, and demanded his share of the profits of the Company, without the reservation of any part for the payment of the bonds, and immediately after filed the bill in this cause.

He contends that the sale by the Piqua Company to Dennison and Niel is void, under a statute of Ohio that prohibits any director of a railroad company to purchase, either directly or indirectly, any shares of the capital stock, or any of the bonds, notes, or other securities, of any railroad company of which he may be a director, for less than the par value thereof; and it declares: "That all such stocks, bonds and notes, or other securities, that may be purchased by any such directors for less than the par value thereof, shall be null and void."

He insists that the indorsement of the bonds of the Piqua Company was of no advantage to the Cleveland Company, but was merely to consummate the success of a speculation of Dennison and Niel—a speculation reprobated by the law of Ohio; that the Cleveland Company were not empowered by their charter to guaranty the contracts of corporations or individuals; that this indorsement was not required for the construction of the road, or in the course of the business of the Company, or to promote an end of the incorporation; and that none of the Acts of the General Assembly of Ohio authorize it.

He denies any efficacy to the vote of the stockholders in July, 1854, because the notice was insufficient, in the length of the time and in the failure to disclose the purpose of the call; that more than one half of the stock of the Company was not represented, and two thirds of that present did not vote, for the want of proper information and counsel on the subject. That the meeting were ignorant of material facts; they were not advised of the relations of Dennison and Niel to the Piqua Company, and their connection with the bonds, when the vote was taken; and were deceived as to the condition of the Pique Company. He avers that the bondholders are chargeable with notice of the fact that the indorsement was made before the meeting of the stockholders, and by the authority of the directors only.

The testimony does not convict the defendants—the bondholders—of complicity in the negotiations or contracts that preceded the issue of the bonds, nor does any equivocal circumstance appear in their purchase of those securities. It is proved that it is a common practice for railroad corporations to make similar arrangements to enlarge their connections and increase their business. The Cleveland Company had encouraged this practice by precept and example. In a report of their board of directors, in January, 1854, the Company were informed of their establishment of a line of first-class steamboats between Cleveland and Buffalo, and of their guaranty of the bonds of other companies for $300,000; of subscriptions for stock to the extent of $100,000, and of promised aid to still another company. They say: "These companies may need additional assistance, and others proposing to intersect ours may, by a moderate loan of money or credit, be enabled to finish their roads, and establish with us business relations, for the mutual benefit of both parties, while the advances on our part may be made safe and remunerative. Unless advised of your disapprobation, the board will continue to pursue this policy."

No such disapprobation was expressed as to check the board of directors until the guaranty of these bonds had been sanctioned, in July, 1854, at a meeting of the stockholders. The discussion was confined to the circle of the Corporation, until after the failure of the Piqua Company to pay a second installment of interest. Then the appellant filed this bill.

The frame of the bill implies that this contract exceeds the power of the Corporation, and cannot be confirmed against a dissenting stockholder. His authority to file such a bill is supported upon this ground alone.

Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How., 331; Mott v. Penn. R. R. Co., 30 Pa., St., 1; Manderson v., Commercial Bank, 28 Pa. St., 379.

The usual and more approved form of such a suit being that of one or more stockholders to sue in behalf of the others.

Beman v. Rufford, 1 Sim. N. S., 550; Winch v. Birkenhead H. Railway Co., 5 DeG. & S., 562; Mosley v. Alston, 1 Phil., 790; Wood v. Draper, 24 Barb., 187.

A court of equity will not hear a stockholder assert that he is not interested in preventing the law of the corporation from being broken, and assumes that none contemplate advantages from an application of the common property that the constitution of the company does not authorize.

The powers of the Cleveland Company are vested in a board of directors chosen from the Company. They are authorized to construct and maintain their road, and for that purpose can employ the resources and credit of the Company, and execute the requisite securities, and are required to exhibit annually a clear and distinct statement of their affairs to a meeting of the stockholders. In the year 1851 a general law relating to railway companies empowered them "at any time, by means of their subscription to the capital stock of any other company, or otherwise, to aid such company in the construction of its railroad, for the purpose of forming a connection of said last mentioned road with the road owned by the company furnishing such aid; * * * and empowered any two or more railroad companies, whose lines are so connected, to enter into any arrangement for their common benefit, consistent with and calculated to promote the objects for which they were created: Provided, that no such aid shall be furnished nor any * * * arrangement perfected until a meeting of the stockholders of each of said companies shall have been called by the directors thereof, at such time and place and in such manner as they shall designate; and the holders of at least two thirds of the stock of such company represented at such meeting in person or by proxy, and voting thereat, shall have assented thereto."

This section was re-enacted in the following year, in a general Act for "the Creation and Regulation of Incorporated Companies in Ohio," which last Act provides that "any existing company might accept any of its provisions, and when so accepted, and a certified copy of their acceptance filed with the Secretary of State, that portions of their charters inconsistent with the provisions of this Act shall be repealed." Curwen's Ohio Laws, 949, 1110.

It is contended that neither of these Acts was accepted by the Cleveland Company; that the Act of 1852 superseded that of 1851, and that the former could be accepted and become obligatory upon the Company only in the mode it prescribed. Both of these are general Acts, and were designed to enlarge the faculties of these Corporations, so as to promote their utility, and to enable them to accomplish with more convenience the objects of their incorporation. This Act of 1851 does not devest any estate of the Company, or make such a radical change in their constitution as to authorize the members to say that its adoption without their consent is a dissolution of the body. But for an intimation in an opinion of the Supreme Court of Ohio (Chapman v. M. R. & L. E. R. R. Co., 6 Ohio St., 119) to the contrary, we should have been inclined to adopt the conclusion, that the Act of March, 1851, might be operative without the specific or formal assent of the corporations to which it refers, and was not superseded by the Act of 1852, as to pre-existing corporations.

Everhart v. P. & W. C. R. R. Co., 28 Pa. St., 340; Gray v. Monongahela N. Co., 2 W. & S., 116; Great W. R. R. Co. v. Rushout, 5 De-G. & S., 290.

The jurisprudence of Ohio is averse to the repeal of statutes by implication; and in the instance of two affirmative statutes, one is not to be construed to repeal the other by implication, unless they can be reconciled by no mode of interpretation. Cass v. Dillon, 2 Ohio St., 607.

The learned compiler of the laws of Ohio retains the Act of 1851 as valid, in respect to the corporations then existing. But as between the parties on this record, the acceptance of those acts may be inferred from the conduct of the corporators themselves. The Corporation have executed the powers and claimed the privileges conferred by them, and they cannot exonerate themselves from the responsibility, by asserting that they have not filed the evidence required by the statute to evince their decision. The observations of Lord St. Leonards in the House of Lords (Bargate v. Shortridge, 5 H. L. Ca., 297), in reference to the effect of the conduct of a board of directors as determining the liability of a corporation, are applicable to this Corporation, under the facts of this case. "It does appear to me," he says, "that if, by a course of action, the directors of a company neglect precautions which they ought to attend to, and thereby lead third persons to deal together as upon real transactions, and to embark money or credit in a concern of this sort, these directors cannot, after five or six years have elapsed, turn round, and themselves raise the objection that they have not taken these precautions, and that the shareholders ought to have inquired and ascertained the matter. * * * The way, therefore, in which I propose to put it to Your Lordships, in point of law, is this: the question is not whether that irregularity can be considered unimportant, or as being different in equity from what it is in law, but the question simply is, whether, by that continued course of dealing, the directors have not bound themselves to such an extent that they cannot be heard in a court of justice to set up, with a view to defeat the rights of the parties with whom they have been dealing, that particular clause enjoining them to do an act which they themselves have neglected to do."

This principle does not impugn the doctrine that a corporation cannot vary from the object of its creation, and that persons dealing with a company must take notice of whatever is contained in the law of their organization. This doctrine has been constantly affirmed in this court, and has been engrafted upon the common law of Ohio. Pearce v. M. & I. R. R. Co., 21 How., 441; Straus v. Eagle Ins. Co., 5 Ohio St., 59. But the principle includes those cases in which a corporation acts within the range of its general authority, but fails to comply with some formality or regulation which it should not have neglected, but which it has chosen to disregard.

The instances already cited of the course of dealing of this Corporation, and others of a similar nature, of which there is evidence in the record, sufficiently attest that the Corporation accepted the Acts of 1851 and 1852 as valid grants of power; and it would be manifestly unjust to allow it to repudiate the contracts which it has made, because their acceptance of these grants has not been clothed in an authentic form. The Supreme Court of Ohio have recognized the obligation of corporators to be prompt and vigilant in the exposure of illegality or abuse in the employment of their corporate powers, and have denied assistance to those who have waited till the evil has been done, and the interest of innocent parties has become involved. Chapman v. Mad River R. R. Co., 6 Ohio St., 119; The State v. Van Horne, 7 Ohio St., 327.

We conclude that the validity of the contract of the Cleveland Corporation, under the circumstances, must be determined on the assumption that it was authorized to exert the power conferred in the 4th section of the Act of March, 1851, and 24th section of the Act of May, 1852.

In deciding upon the validity of this contract, we deem it unimportant to settle whether Dennison was a director of the Piqua Company the 25th February, 1854, when he signed the contract with the committee of the Piqua Board of Directors; or whether that contract was affected by its ratification by the board after his resignation was entered upon the minutes, or by the subsequent consummation of the contract, in the reciprocal transfer of the securities and payment of the consideration; or whether, as matter of law, the bonds of the Piqua Company, commercial in their form, payable to another party, and issued after his resignation, are null and void.

The contract of the guarantors, indorsing the bonds, is a distinct contract, and may impose an obligation upon them independently of the Piqua Company. In the absence of a personal incapacity of Dennison to deal with his principal, the issue of the bonds by the directors of the Piqua Company is an ordinary act of administration; and bonds in such form, it is admitted, "challenge confidence wherever they go." We percieve no illegality in their delegation to them of the power to determine whether the Ohio or Pennsylvania gauge should be adopted, or their sale of the privilege to adjust the controversies and questions relating to it. Their adoption of the Ohio gauge was a solution of all the difficulties; it enabled the Indianapolis Company to adopt it; it superinduced the resulting consequence of running connections among the four Corporations; it secured profits to the guarantors; it imposed the burden of relaying their track upon the Piqua Company. Their contract to adopt this gauge and to form the corresponding connections is a valuable consideration, and the Piqua Company have fulfilled the engagements that Dennison and Niel were authorized to stipulate on their behalf. There is testimony that the bargain was a hard one for the guarantors, and argument that it was probably an unjust one, and possibly fraudulent in reference to the stockholders of the Cleveland Company. But the bill is framed, not to obtain relief from error or fraud in the administration of the powers of the Company by their trustees, but against the exercise of powers that did not belong to the Corporation, and which the body could not confirm, except by a unanimous vote. Foss v. Harbottle, 2 How., 461; 2 Phil. Ch., 740.

We proceed to consider of the effect of the sanction given to the arrangements of the Cleveland Company, through Dennison and Niel, with the Piqua Company, by the vote of the meeting in July, 1854. It is objected that the notice of this meeting was insufficient, and that, unprepared as the corporators were, the proxy appointed by the non-resident stockholders was overpowered by the heat and passion of the directors and their adherents. There is some force in the complaint that this meeting was not conducted with a due respect for the social rights of a portion of the stockholders. But the time, place and manner of the meeting were appointed by the directors, as the Act of 1851 permits. The proxy of the appellant was there, exhibited his instructions, discussed the propositions submitted, and declined to vote, when his vote would have controlled the action of the meeting. Since that time, several annual meetings have been held, at which the appellant was represented. The circumstances of the contract and its effects have been developed, and yet the resolution sanctioning this contract has not been rescinded. It may be that among the stockholders, and within the Corporation, the cause of this procrastination and hesitancy to act upon the subject may be estimated properly. But we are to regard the conduct of the Corporation from an external position. The community at large must form their judgment of it from the acts and resolutions adopted by the authorities of the Corporation and the meeting of the stockholders, and by their acquiescence in them. These negotiable securities have been placed on sale in the community, accompanied by these resolutions and votes, inviting public confidence. They have circulated without an effort on the part of the Corporation or corporators to restrain them, or to disabuse those who were influenced by these apparently official acts. Men have invested their money on the assurance they have afforded.

A corporation, quite as much as an individual, is held to a careful adherence to truth in their dealings with mankind, and cannot, by their representations or silence, involve others in onerous engagements, and then defeat the calculations and claims their own conduct had superinduced. The opinion of the court is, that the injunction granted upon the bill of the appellant was improvidently granted, and that he is not entitled to the relief he has sought; and that the decree of the Circuit Court dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill is correct, and must be affirmed.

THE UNITED STATES, Appt., v. ANDRES CASTILLERO.

(See S. C., 23 How., 464-469.)

Islands, when not grantable by Mexican governor —order to grant, by Mexican president, on July 20, 1838—effect of—grant of island of Santa Cruz, valid.

Islands situated on the coast, it seems, were never granted by the Governors of California or any of her authorities, under the Colonization Law of 1824, or the Regulations of 1828.

The power to grant the lands of the islands was neither claimed nor exercised by the authorities of the department, prior to the 20th day of July, 1838.

On that day the Mexican President, by a dispatch, authorized Governor Alvarado, in concurrence with the Departmental Assembly, to grant the desert islands adjacent to that department.

Grants made by the governor, under the power conferred, without the concurrence of the Departmental Assembly, were simply void. It was so held by this court in U. S. v. Osio, at the present term.

By another dispatch on the 20th day of July, 1838, the President recommended to the governor and the Departmental Assembly that one of the islands, such as the claimant might select, be assigned to him, before they proceeded to grant and distribute such lands, under the general authority conferred by the previous dispatch.

The legal effect of that second communication was to withdraw such one of the islands as should thus be selected by the claimant from the operation of the previous order, and to direct that it be assigned to this claimant.

On the 5th day of March, 1839, he presented his petition to the governor, asking for a grant of the island of Santa Catalina. The governor, on the same day, made a decree that a title of concession should issue, and that the expediente should be perfected in the usual way.

On the 7th day of March, 1839, he presented another petition to the governor, asking for a grant of the island of Santa Cruz, representing that the island previously offered was unfit for improvement, and for that reason praying that the order of concession may be so changed as to conform to his last mentioned request.

On the 22d day of May, 1839, the governor made the grant, basing it upon the special dispatch referred to in the petition: and all the documentary evidences of title, including the grant, were found in the Mexican archives.

Held, that the genuineness of the documentary evidence of title is satisfactorily proved, and that the grant was made by competent authority.

Emanating, as the dispatch did, from the supreme power of the nation, it operated of itself to adjudicate the title to the claimant, leaving no discretion to be exercised by the authorities of the department.

Neither the governor nor the Assembly, nor both combined, could withhold the grant, after a proper selection, without disobeying the express command of the Supreme Government.

Argued Feb. 23, 1860. Decided Apr. 2, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellants.

Mr. J. A. Rockwell, for appellees.

The argument of counsel, being confined almost entirely to the facts, is not here given.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, affirming a decree of the commissioners appointed under the Act of the 3d of March, 1851, to ascertain and settle private land claims.

Pursuant to the 8th section of that Act, the appellee in this case presented his petition to the commissioners, claiming title to the island of Santa Cruz, situated in the County of Santa Barbara, in the State of California, by virtue of an original grant from Governor Alvarado. All of the documentary evidences of title produced in the case are duly certified copies of originals found in the Mexican archives, as appears by the certificate of the Surveyor-General, which makes a part of the record. They consist of a special dispatch from the Minister of the Interior of the Republic of Mexico, addressed to Governor Alvarado; the petition of the claimant to the same, and the original grant to the petitioner, which purports to be signed by the governor, and to be duly countersigned by the secretary of the department. Certain other documents were also introduced, to which it will be necessary to refer, as a part of the proceedings that led to the grant.

Islands situated on the coast, it seems, were never granted by the Governors of California or any of her authorities, under the Colonization Law of 1824, or the Regulations of 1828. From all that has been exhibited in cases of this description, the better opinion is, that the power to grant the lands of the islands was neither claimed nor exercised by the authorities of the department prior to the 20th day of July, 1838, as was satisfactorily shown in one or more cases heretofore considered and decided by this court.

On that day, the Minister of the Interior, by the order of the Mexican President, addressed a communication to Governor Alvarado, authorizing him, in concurrence with the Departmental Assembly, to grant and distribute the lands of the desert islands adjacent to that department to the citizens of the nation who might solicit the same. That dispatch bears date at a period when the President was in the exercise of extraordinary powers, and was issued, as appears by its recitals, with a view to promote the settlement of the unoccupied islands on the coast, and to prevent those exposed positions from becoming places of rendezvous and shelter for foreign adventurers, who might desire to invade that remote department. Grants made by the governor, under the power conferred by that dispatch, without the concurrence of the Departmental Assembly, were simply void, for the reason that the power, being a special one, could only be exercised in the manner therein prescribed. It was so held by this court in United States v. Osio, 64 U. S., 457, decided at the present term, and we are satisfied that the decision was correct.

But the grant in this case was not made under the general authority conferred by that dispatch. In addition to what was exhibited in the former case, it now appears that another dispatch of a special character was addressed by the same cabinet minister to the governor on the same day. Like the other, it bears date at the City of Mexico, on the 20th day of July, 1838, and is signed by the Minister of the Interior. By the terms of the communication, the governor is informed that the President, regarding the services rendered by this claimant to the nation and to that department as worthy of great consideration and full recompense, has directed the minister to recommend strongly to the governor and the Departmental Assembly that one of the islands, such as the claimant might select, near where he ought to reside with the troops under his command, be assigned to him, before they proceed to grant and distribute such lands, under the general authority conferred by the previous dispatch.

Beyond question, the legal effect of that second communication was to withdraw such one of the islands as should thus be selected by the claimant from the operation of the previous order, and to direct that it be assigned to this claimant. His attorney, accordingly, on the 5th day of March, 1839, presented his petition to the governor, asking for a grant of the island of Santa Catalina, which is situated in front of the roadstead of San Pedro, and requested that the espediente might pass through the usual forms.

In conformity to the prayer of the petition, the governor, on the same day, made a decree that a title of concession should issue, and that the espediente should be perfected in the usual way. Accompanying the order of concession there is also a form of a grant of the island to the claimant; but it is without any signatures, and does not appear ever to have been completed.

On the 17th day of March, 1839, his attorney in fact presented another petition to the governor, asking for a grant of the island of Santa Cruz, which, as he represents, is situated in front of Santa Barbara, on the coast of that department.

Both of these petitions are based upon the special dispatch addressed to the governor; and in the one last presented, the claimant represents that the islands previously offered is wholly unfit either for agricultural improvement or the raising of stock, and for that reason prays, in effect, that the order of concession may be so changed as to conform to his last mentioned request. For aught that appears to the contrary, his request was acceded to without hesitation, for, on the 22d day of May, 1839, the governor made the grant, basing it upon the special dispatch referred to in the petition.

To prove the authenticity of the dispatch and the genuineness of the grant, the petitioner called and examined Governor Alvarado. He testified that he was acquainted with the handwriting of Joaquin Pesado, the Minister of the Interior, and also with that of Manuel Jimeno, the secretary of the department, who countersigned the grant. Both of these signatures, as well as his own, he testified, were genuine; and he also stated that he recognized the document as a genuine instrument, and intended it at the time as a perfect and complete title in the claimant. His testimony finds support in this case, to some extent, by the fact that all the documentary evidences of title, including the grant, were found in the Mexican archives; but much stronger confirmations of his statements is derived from the record evidence which those archives are found to contain.

At the argument, we were very properly furnished by the counsel of the appellants with a copy of an index of concessions, prepared by the secretary of the department. That index covers the period from the 10th day of May, 1833, to the 24th day of December, 1844. It contains a list of four hundred and forty-three concessions, and among the number is the one set up by the claimant in this case. Its description in the index corresponds in all particulars with the grant produced, except as to the date. As there given, it is dated the 5th day of March, 1839, which is the true date of the concession, under the first petition.

Considering that the name of the grantee and the description of the premises agree with the grant produced in the case, we think it a reasonable presumption that the error of date is in the index, and not in the grant. For these reasons, we think the genuineness of the documentary evidence of title is satisfactorily proved. Having come to this conclusion, the only remaining question is, whether the grant was made by competent authority. Direction was given to the governor and the Departmental Assembly in the special dispatch on which this grant was issued, that one of the islands, situated along the coast of the department, should be assigned to this claimant before they proceeded to grant and distribute such lands under the general order. Those communications were of the same date; but it is obvious, from the language of the special dispatch, that it was issued subsequently to the other communication, and must be regarded as qualifying the latter, so far as their terms are repugnant. Had the claimant petitioned for a grant of this description, under the general order, his application would have been addressed to the discretion of the governor and of the Departmental Assembly; and unless both had concurred in granting the prayer, his application would have been defeated, for the reason that such a title could only be adjudicated by their concurrent action. Power to refuse such applications was vested in the Assembly as well as in the governor, but when both concurred, and the adjudication had been made, the title papers were properly to be issued by the governor as an executive act. As the Assembly was a constituent part of the granting power under the general order, it was doubtless thought proper that the withdrawal of one of the islands from its operation, and the disposal of it in another way, should be notified to the Assembly as well as to the governor. They were accordingly directed not to proceed to make adjudications under that order until the assignment of the title to this claimant was perfected, but they were not required to make the assignment or to cause it to be made. To accomplish that purpose, and carry into effect the command of the President, two things only were necessary to be done: one was to be performed by the claimant, and the other was a mere ministerial act. It was the claimant who was to make the selection; and if it was a proper one, near the place where he was stationed with his troops, nothing remained to be done but to make the assignment as described in the dispatch. Emanating, as the dispatch did, from the supreme power of the nation, it operated of itself to adjudicate the title to the claimant, leaving no discretion to be exercised by the authorities of the department. Neither the governor nor the Assembly, nor both combined, could withhold the grant, after a proper selection, without disobeying the express command of the Supreme Government. Nothing, therefore, remained to be done, after the selection by the claimant, but to issue the title papers, and that was the proper duty of the governor, as the executive organ of the department. No doubt appears to have been entertained of the justice of the claim, either by the commissioners or the district court; and in view of all the circumstances, we think their respective decisions were correct.

The decree of the district court is, therefore, affirmed.

THE DUBUQUE AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY, Plf. in Er.,

v.

EDWIN C. LITCHFIELD.

(See S. C., 23 How., 66-90.)

Land grant in aid of Des Moines River—strictly construed—what it was—lands outside of grant —bona fide claimant.

Under the Act of 1846, to aid in the improvement of the navigation "of the Des Moines River," that portion from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork was the "said river," on each side of which the strip of land granted was to lie.

All grants of this discription are strictly construed against the grantees; nothing passes but what is conveyed in clear and explicit language.

The donation stands on the same footing of a grant by the public to a private company, the terms of which must be plainly expressed in the statute; and if not thus expressed, they cannot be implied.

The Act of Congress was a direct grant to Iowa, in fee, of an undivided moiety of the whole tract lying on each side of the river, from the Raccoon Fork to the Missouri line.

No authority was conferred on the executive officers administering the public lands to do more than make partition between the tenants in common, Iowa and the United States, in the manner prescribed by the Act of Congress.

It was impossible to make partition, under this grant, of lands lying outside of its boundaries; and all attempts to do so were merely nugatory.

Where the action was brought by a bona fide claimant under the grantee of the river improvement fund against the Railroad Company, although the case agreed was made up in a friendly spirit, to try the title at the instance of executive officers, the court felt bound to hear and decide the cause on its merits.

Submitted Mar. 29, 1860. Decided Apr. 9, 1860.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Iowa.

This was an action of right, brought in the court below by the defendant in error, to try the title to a certain section of land in the State of Iowa.

The case having been submitted to the court upon an agreed statement of facts, a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant sued out this writ of error.

The Attorney-General having represented to the court that the government was interested in the questions involved in this case, leave was granted to him to intervene and file a printed argument on behalf of the United States.

The case is very fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Platt Smith, for plaintiffs in error:

There is no doubt but that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, if, by the true construction of the Act of August 8, 1846, lands were granted the entire length of the river. But on the other hand, if the grant, like the improvement of the river, was limited to that portion of the Des Moines below the Raccoon Fork, then the plaintiff must fail in his action, as the locus in quo is some sixty miles above the Raccoon Fork. The defendants claim that plaintiff has no title, but that the lands belong to them as part of a grant made by Act of Congress, approved May 15, 1856, to aid the construction of certain railroads in Iowa, and subsequently regranted by the State of Iowa to the defendants. The facts agreed to in this case, show clearly that the land in dispute belongs to the defendants, unless it was covered by the grant made to improve the navigation of the Des Moines River.

It requires considerable persevering ingenuity to make the language of the Act ambiguous; but the diversity of opinion existing at different times among the heads of the departments, is such as to warrant the conclusion that the language is not clear and explicit.

It is a well known historical fact, that all grants of land by alternate sections to aid in making public improvements, are obtained on the plausible plea that the sections reserved to the government will be doubled in value in consequence of the improvement. This is the head and front of the argument, and the real consideration which induces the government to part with the lands. Putting the construction upon this Act which I contend for, no violence will be done to the well settled principle and policy lying at the very foundation of all land grants of the kind. But if the grant is construed to extend several hundred miles above the improvement, then there was no consideration for the grant; the general policy governing like cases has no application to the case. The parties who drew the bill, the delegate from Iowa and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, must have, either through ignorance or design, overreached and defrauded the government.

Again; it is a well settled principle of law, that all grants by governments are to be construed strictly against the grantee, that nothing shall pass except what is conveyed by clear and explicit language.

Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet., 420; Gildart v. Gladstone, 12 East, 668.

The counsel on the other side has taken considerable pains to show that there are exceptions to the above rule, such as grants made for a valuable consideration, grants to pious and charitable institutions, &c. But I am not aware that the Des Moines River Navigation Company fall within either of the above exceptions.

But it is contended that the plaintiff below, in this case, stands in the light of an innocent purchaser. A proper plea of innocent purchaser has several ingredients in it, which are altogether wanting in this case. A purchaser is always chargeable with every defect apparent in the chain of title which he holds.

Reeder v. Barr, 4 Hamm., Ohio, 446; Nelson v. Allen, 1 Yerg., Tenn., 360.

In the case of Ware v. Brush, 1 McLean, 533, the court say: "The assignment by the executor was wholly without authority, and therefore could convey no right to the assignee. Is the defendant chargeable with notice of this want of power in the executor? We think he is a purchaser with notice. The assignment by the executor appears upon the face of the warrant, which was transferred to the defendants and copied into the patent. This was clearly notice to the defendant that the assignment was made by the executor, and it was the duty of the defendant to examine the will for the power to made it. The executor was in fact a mere agent, and could only act within the limit of his authority. An assignment beyond this could transfer no right."

Mr. Litchfield was bound to look at the Act of Congress, by which he was notified that the grant did not extend above the Raccoon Fork; also to the certificate of Mr. Secretary Stuart, who certified the land to the territory under protest. Mr. Stuart was of opinion that the grant did not extend above the Raccoon Fork, and only certified under protest, in order to give the state an opportunity of protesting the question in court. Mr. Litchfield comes in as an adventurer under that suggestion, and now claims to be an innocent purchaser.

The opposite counsel has made an elaborate argument to show that the proper interpretation of laws must be derived from their own language; that evidence aliunde cannot be admitted for the purpose of varying, extending or controlling the meaning of a statute. I do not call such an Act as this a public law. It is true that it is an Act passed by Congress; but it is essentially a private Act, a grant and not a law or statute, within the general and broad acceptation of the term.

It is also contended on the other side, that the United States Government is estopped in consequence of letters written a long time subsequent to the passage of the Act; that if the original wording of the Act did not extend above the Raccoon Fork, the writing of these letters and the making of eight or nine alternate decisions for and against the grant, extending above the Raccoon Fork, work an estoppel against the United States.

There is something novel in the idea of a party setting up an estoppel against the United States, in a suit to recover land in which nothing more than a fighting right has been certified under protest, with a view of allowing the mooted question to be settled by the court.

Mr. Charles Mason, for defendant in error:

Each of the parties to this suit claims to be the owner of the tract of land in controversy. It is only necessary to consider the title of the defendant in error, as he was a plaintiff below.

On the 8th of August, 1846, Congress granted to the then Territory of Iowa, a quantity of land lying along the Des Moines River, for the purpose of aiding to improve the navigation of a portion of that stream. A year or two afterwards, and before any of the lands had been transferred to the State, a controversy arose as to the extent of that grant. It was contended on the one side that it reached to the source of the river, while on the other it was held to be limited to the Raccoon Fork.

The land which is the subject of this suit lies within five miles of the Des Moines River, but above the Raccoon Fork. It was duly selected as a portion of that grant, and has been regularly transferred from the State to the defendant in error. If, under all the circumstances of the case, the grant includes this tract, his title is complete—otherwise it is worthless. The court below decided that question in his favor, and the case is now brought here to test the correctness of that decision.

We hold that the plain language of the Act itself is sufficient to settle this question conclusively in his favor. It grants "one equal moiety in alternate sections of the public lands (remaining unsold and not otherwise disposed of, incumbered or appropriated), in a strip five miles in width on each side of said river."

It is true, that in defining the object of the grant, the law declares it to be for the purpose of aiding to improve the Des Moines River, from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork, and the conclusion is thence drawn by some, that the grant itself was intended to extend no higher than the latter point. But I submit whether such a conclusion can be reached by any sound rule for the interpretation of statutes.

When we speak in general terms of the Des Moines River, we mean the whole river and not a portion of it. In defining the purpose of the grant, a limited portion of the river is expressly mentioned. But in fixing the limit of the grant, the river itself is named without restriction or qualification. How shall it then be said that a part and not the whole of the river was intended?

As if to place the matter beyond all reasonable doubt, Congress has fixed another restriction upon the extent of this grant. The lands must be selected within the then Territory of Iowa. The first restriction prevented us from taking lands more than five miles from the river—the second confines us within the Territory. On the principle involved in the maxim "expressio unius est exclusio alterius," each of these restrictions adds strength to the conclusion that there are no other restrictions unexpressed. "As exceptions strengthen the force of the law in cases not excepted, so, according to Lord Bacon, enumeration weakens it in cases not enumerated."

Dwarr. St., 605.

In fact, a prohibition of one thing often involves an actual permission to do what is not thus prohibited.

Thus, the whole constitutional provision which prevents Congress from interfering with the slave trade prior to 1808, has always been regarded as giving authority to prohibit it after that period. In like manner, the limitation which restricts us to the Territory of Iowa in the selection of land, is in effect an authority to select the alternate sections within five miles of the whole length of the river, wherever such land can be found within any portion of that Territory.

In the construction of a statute, we must endeavor to give a definite meaning to every word and expression found therein. The plain and natural import of the terms employed is to govern in construing the law; and where a clear, intelligible meaning can be gathered from those terms, we are not to look beyond them to fancy some unexpressed intent.

See Denn v. Reid, 10 Pet., 524.

We need (as we think) only read this statute with an unprejudiced wish to arrive at its meaning from the natural import of the language alone, to be satisfied that for the purpose of aiding to improve the Des Moines River as high up as the Raccoon Fork, it was the evident intention of Congress to grant the alternate sections in a strip five miles in width on each side of said river, from its mouth to its source, so far as such land could be found within the limits of the then Territory of Iowa.

The land for thirty or forty miles above the mouth of the Des Moines, was not to contribute an acre to the improvement, though much money was to be expended on that very portion of the river. On the one side of that part of the stream was the State of Missouri, and the land was, therefore, excluded from being taken by the very terms of the grant; and on the other side was the half-breed tract in the State of Iowa, and was private property, as will appear from the Treaty of 1824, and the Act of Congress of July 30, 1834.

Besides, a considerable portion of the land between the half-breed tract and the Raccoon Fork had been sold by the United States prior to 1846; so that, at the date of the passage of this law, there was but little more than one half the amount of land below the Raccoon Fork to be affected by the grant, which it would have embraced had the alternative sections throughout this portion of the river been subject to the terms of the grant. There was only 321,000 acres left to be transferred to the State under this grant below the Raccoon Fork; whereas the amount of six sections to the mile for the whole distance, would have composed an aggregate of more than 587,000 acres. This deficiency of 266,000 acres situated below the Raccoon Fork, would probably, at that time, have been of more value than the whole 900,000 acres which were, as we contend, granted above that point, and which were to be received in lieu thereof. In railroad grants, it is the custom to allow the alternate sections to be taken for fifteen miles on each side of the road, to make up for any deficiency like the present. Instead of increasing the breadth of the grant for that purpose in this instance, a suitable addition has been made to its length.

What we contend for is, that in the construction of this statute the court should confine itself to the language of the law. The principle which has been sanctioned by this court justifies us in insisting upon such a rule.

In the case of Paulina's Cargo v. The U. S., 7 Cranch, 60, Chief Justice Marshall says:

"In construing these laws it has been truly stated to be the duty of the court to effect the intention of the Legislature; but this intention is to be searched for in the words which the Legislature has employed to convey it."

See, also, U. S v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358.

We respectfully submit, whether the present is a case which justifies a strained construction of the statute. Must not something more than a mere inconvenience or a departure from a supposed rule of fitness, be necessary, to justify a disregard of the ordinary rule of construction, in accordance with the fair import of the language used?

But the present Attorney-General (Mr. Black), in a very clearly written opinion, which will be found entire in the record, has decided this question adversely to us, founding that opinion entirely on the doctrine of doubts. After stating that there is an obscurity in the language used, sufficient to raise a doubt as to its meaning, he proceeds as follows:

"But for my own part I have not the least doubt about it. My reason may seem paradoxical, but the very obscurity of the grant, in my judgment makes it clear. It is out of these doubts that certainty grows. In every doubtful case, we know very well what we ought to do, as soon as we are certain which party is entitled to the benefit of the doubt. We shall see who is entitled to it here.

"It is well settled that all public grants of property, money or privileges are to be construed more strictly against the grantee; whatever is not expressly given, or very clearly implied from the words of the grant, is withheld."

Now, with the greatest respect for the learning and ability of this high functionary, I venture to suggest that he has made a double mistake in this instance. 1st. As to there being an obscurity in the language used. 2d. If such is the case, he has not correctly expounded the doctrine of doubts as applied to such cases as this.

I have nothing to add to what has already been said of the first of these points. If I am correct in this position, the rule as to doubts has no application whatever to this case. But suppose the language to be actually of doubtful import; is that doubt to be construed against the grantee in cases like the present?

In a general way, we find the doctrine laid down that grants from the King are to be construed strictly against the grantee—thus directly inverting the rule as between private persons—but this rule is subject to many and important exceptions. When closely scrutinized, it will, I think, be found to be narrowed down to cases of royal grants, which are mere bounties, or to cases where privileges and exemptions are granted to private corporations. No instance can, I think, be found wherein such a rule has been applied to a grant intended for a great public purpose, and made to a State or any other municipal corporation.

"A statute made pro bono publico shall be construed in such a manner that it may, as far as possible, attain the end proposed.

Bac. Abr. Stat., 1, 7.

"The rules of construction which apply to general legislation in regard to those subjects in which the public at large is interested, are essentially different from those which apply to private grants to individuals, of powers or privileges designed to be exercised with special reference to their own advantage, although involving in their exercise incidental benefits to the community generally. The former are to be expounded largely and beneficially for the purposes for which they were enacted—the latter, liberally in favor of the public, and strictly against the grantees."

Bradley v. N. Y. and N. H. Railroad Co., 21 Conn., 306; see, also. Sedgw. Stat. and Const. L., 338, 339; Ohio Life and Trust Co. v. Debolt, 16 How., 435; 2 Co. Inst., 496, 497; Sutton's Hospital, 10 Co., 27, 28; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet., 558.

But suppose the case of a real contract for a valuable consideration, and suppose the advantages conferred to be at the expense of no one but the government itself; and can anyone who carefully examines a decision of the majority in that case for a moment doubt that the whole court would have concurred unanimously in the views of the minority, as to the true rule by which the law should be construed?

Now, the case at bar is one of this very character. It is not simply a grant, but it is a contract, in fact as well as in law. A proposition was made by Congress to grant these lands, provided the State would assent to certain conditions with which the grant was coupled. One of these conditions (an implied one) was that Iowa should construct the improvement from the mouth of the Raccoon Fork—the grant being made to aid in that improvement, and the government having a great interest in the result.

But in addition to this, it was expressly provided that the rivers should be and forever remain a public highway for the use of the government of the United States, free from any toll or other charge whatever for any property of the United States or persons in their service, passing through or along the same.

If, in addition to the benefit which would result from this improvement to the United States as the proprietor of the public domain, could also be added the advantages above stipulated for, the government would be making an exceedingly profitable disposition of its property. A proposition to that effect was, therefore, made by Congress, and accepted by the Legislature of the State. It was, therefore, not only in fact, but in form, a contract for a valuable consideration promised on the part of the State, and is therefore not subject to the strict rule contended for by the Attorney-General.

I am aware that there are some decisions of this court which will be relied upon as establishing the contrary doctrine to that for which I have been contending; but a critical examination of those cases will show the error of such a conclusion.

In The U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 729, the general rule is laid down, as claimed by the Attorney-General, and as admitted by myself, that doubtful grants by the king are to be construed in favor of the grantor. But there is nothing in that decision to contradict the views here-in-before expressed in regard to exceptional cases like the present. Nor is there anything in the facts of that case incompatible with these conclusions.

I believe it to be a well settled principle, that a statute is never to be warped, as to its meaning, by extrinsic facts. Even a deed from a private individual cannot be affected by evidence of what was said or written by the parties or anyone else, at the time it was about to be executed. How much less should such evidence be permissible in the case of a statute, which is a much more solemn and important instrument and which it intended to affect the interests of the public, who have not the means or the opportunity of looking behind the record, if that were permissible.

I am aware that parol proof is properly resorted to for the purpose of explaining a latent ambiguity in a deed, and also in a statute. If an Act was passed for the relief of John Smith, parol proof may be given to show which of the many persons answering to that name was intended.

But where is the latent ambiguity in the present case? None has ever been shown or pretended. All that has ever been claimed as doubtful, is patent upon the face of the statute.

Parol proof is admissible to explain any such difficulty, in either a deed or a statute.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., intervening on behalf of the United States:

I shall try to make this paper as brief as I can, and weary the judges with unnecessary matter as little as possible. It is my duty to speak freely about the case itself, but I must not be understood as reflecting upon the parties or their counsel, most especially not upon the latter. Of the defendants' attorney I know nothing except what is reputable, and the gentleman who appears for the plaintiff is known to the whole country by his high character for integrity as well as ability. But men have different notions of right and wrong. Doubtless the conduct of my opponent squares exactly with their own ideas of propriety. Upon the face of the complaint and the plea, this is an action by a citizen of New York against an Iowa Railroad Company, for section 1, in township 88, North, Range 29 West of the principal Meridian. Whether the nominal plaintiff or the nominal defendant is the owner of that single section, is the whole question which pretends to be technically brought before you. But it is, in fact and in truth, in purpose and in object, an appeal from the Secretary of the Interior to the Supreme Court, in which the real appellants are certain parties interested in an old land grant, and the appellees are the United States. The appellants take this appeal, because they hope that you will expand a legislative grant of 321,000 acres of land into a grant of 1,153,000 acres. You are expected to sit as a board of revisers on the acts and doings of the Interior Department.

If the framers of the Constitution and the laws had thought proper that this court, or any other judicial tribunal, should review the proceedings of the Executive in such cases as this, they would doubtless have given the power. But it has been withheld, and the decisions of the Executive have been made final, for reasons which seem to me full of practical wisdom and justice.

I trust the court will look narrowly into every part of this record, and carefully consider the whole case, before giving any judgment either way upon the point which these parties have pressed upon you in their arguments.

I desire to call the attention of the court very specially to the following points:

1. This is a fictitious suit brought here not to determine the rights of the nominal parties, nor to settle any real dispute between them, but to get an opinion which will throw the moral influence of this court against the government, in a matter already decided by the Executive. Therefore the case ought to be dismissed.

2. Assuming that an actual dispute exists between the parties, they have agreed upon a statement of facts which is, in some respects, palpably erroneous and unjust, and in others so defective that no judgment can safely be pronounced upon it.

3. If the court feel bound in such a case to give an opinion, it will be neither necessary nor proper to pronounce upon the construction of the Des Moines River grant. The rights of the parties to the section in suit depend on the conveyances which were made to them by the State of Iowa.

4. The true interpretation of the Des Moines River grant confines it to that part of the river which lies below the Raccoon Fork, as the proper department of the government has decided.

I shall make a few remarks on each of these points, following the order in which I have set them down:

1. I am compelled by the evidence in the record itself to believe that this suit has not been instituted by the plaintiff for his own use, or with any view to the assertion of his own rights, or to redress any injury which he supposes himself to have suffered, but solely for the purpose of getting the opinion of this court for the benefit of other parties not named upon the record. Between Litchfield and the Dubuque Railroad Company there is no controversy. The real plaintiffs are the claimants under the Des Moines grant, and the Government of the United States is the party aimed at as the real defendant. I repeat that I mean no imputation upon counsel, but merely to express the opinion that the whole proceeding is irregular and wrong. The facts are proved by the record, and their legal effect is shown by numerous adjudicated cases, among which it is only necessary to mention that of Lord v. Veazie, 8 How., 251. I invite attention to that case and the authorities there cited, because it corresponds to this so exactly that a distinction between the two is almost impossible.

2. There is such a manifest impropriety in the statement of the facts which the parties have agreed upon, that it is impossible for the court to pronounce judgment safely upon it. It is loaded with statements, certificates, ex parte affidavits, letters, &c., which no suitor in this or any other court has a right to produce, either with or without the consent of opposing counsel. It is true, as set forth in the verdict, that the matters and things therein stated are only to be taken for what they are legally worth. But it must be remembered that illegal evidence is not excluded by courts of justice because it is worthless, but because it is positively mischievous. I cannot say for myself that I fear the effect upon your mind of such affidavits as those of Messrs. Sample and Belknap, or the certificate of Mr. Guy Wells. But when a court receives and reads such things, those who know not what manner of men the judges are, might readily suppose the decision to have been affected by them, more or less. The court is bound, for its own sake, to have them removed out of sight. Such a statement as this should be sent away and refused all entertainment, not merely because it imposes upon the court the necessity of separating the truth from the trash, but because it involves a certain amount of danger to the just administration of the law, or at least to the reputation of the judiciary. But this record is objectionable, not only because it contains too much, but for the reason that it contains nothing or next to nothing, upon the very point in issue.

For these reasons, in case my motion fails upon the other ground, I shall insist that this writ of error be dismissed, and the cause remanded to the court below, with directions to take such measures as may be necessary to purge the stated case of the illegal and inadmissible matter which it contains, and to insert into it a full and specific statement of the titles under which both parties claim, and the nature, extent and duration of the defendant's possession.

3. If Your Honors shall conclude to set aside all these considerations, and determine to give a judgment upon the case, I must be allowed to ask (and I ask it with perfect respect), that your opinion be confined to the respective titles of the parties on record. You will not be disposed to pass upon the rights of other persons who are not properly before you, unless justice to those who are before you make it absolutely necessary. In this case, it is not necessary at all.

The plaintiff declares his title to be derived from the State, as trustee of the Des Moines River fund. The defendant's title is also derived from the State. Both parties claim under the same grantor, and that grantor is admitted to have had a good title. We do not know, indeed, which party has the earlier deed, but the concealment of this fact from the court is no fault of ours. The presumption is against the plaintiff, since the burden was on him of showing a clear title in himself.

Suppose it to be all true that the grant to the State made by Congress in 1846, for the improvement of the Des Moines River, covered the section in suit; and suppose also that the title of the State to this section was made perfect by the selection of the State agent, and the approval of the proper department here. The State kept her title until 1856, and then petitioned Congress for another grant of the same land, to aid her in making a railroad, and got it. After getting this second grant and locating it on the section in suit, she conveyed it away to the defendant, in consideration that a railroad shall be made. The defendant accepts the land from the State, and pays the consideration by making the railroad. After all this, the State conveys the same land to Litchfield. Does Litchfield get a title? Most assuredly not. By accepting the second grant from Congress, locating it on the section sued for, conveying it to the Railroad Company for a valuable consideration, and putting the Company in possession, the State, and all claiming under her by subsequent conveyance, are clearly estopped from setting up another claim under an older title. When a party sells and conveys land, he transfers all the title he has. It would be an intolerable wrong to let the State select the same land under two grants, sell it to one party under the second grant, and then turn her grantee out of possession by the production of the first grant. The whole title of the State had been conveyed away to the Railroad Company before Litchfield's deed, and he, therefore, took nothing by it.

If it be assumed, without evidence, that Litchfield's deed is older than the title of the defendant, there is still no room in the case in point which the parties have tried so hard to raise, namely: the construction of the Des Moines grant. If the plaintiff had a conveyance previous to 1856, his right, whatever it is, will depend on the acts and deeds of the State, in making the several conveyances to himself and the other party.

4. While I confess to some anxiety that this court, for the sake of example, should dismiss the case without giving any opinion about the construction of the Des Moines grant, it shall not be said that I am unwilling to meet the point, if you shall think that it fairly and necessarily arises. I have no fears that your opinion will be opposed to that of the department. I will not urge it upon affidavits, nor waste words in reply to what has been said about the desire of parties interested in the claim to get more lands than the government thought them entitled to. I am very willing to admit that they want a great deal more than they got. But the question to be settled is, how much they have a right to receive.

The simple and naked question presented to the Interior Department was on the construction of the 1st section of the Act of 1846, "that there be and here is granted to the Territory of Iowa, for the purpose of aiding said Territory to improve the navigation of the Des Moines River, from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork (so called), in said Territory, one equal moiety in alternate sections of the public lands (remaining unsold and not otherwise disposed of, incumbered or appropriated), in a strip of five miles in width on each side of said river, to be selected within said Territory by an agent or agents to be appointed by the governor thereof, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States."

Does this give to the Territory one moiety of all the lands on both sides of the river up to its source, or is the grant confined to the lands which lie between the fork and the mouth? What is the extent of this grant? How is the strip described, within which the alternate sections of land are to be taken? It is described as a strip five miles in width on each side of said river. What river? The said river—the river before mentioned and described—that is, the Des Moines River, from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork.

I admit that this, like every other statute, must be interpreted ex visceribus suis with the aid of such lights as may be shed upon it by known historical and geographical facts, together with the authority of those officers whose duty it has been to interpret it heretofore. Where Congress has said one thing plainly and distinctly, in a law passed and enrolled, it cannot be modified, or in any manner changed by proof, however clear, that the committee which reported the bill, or any other member of the body, or even all of them together, meant to say a different thing. But when an obscurely worded law has received a construction at the hands of those who passed it, that construction will not be set aside by any court. So when an officer, whose duty it is to administer and execute the law, gives an official construction to it, his opinion is entitled to equal respect; and when the persons interested in a different construction, have acquiesced in that which the law receives from the officers, the conclusion is still more strong and clear against any opposing view. All this has occurred in the present case.

While the bill was pending before Congress, it was submitted to the commissioner of the land office with an inquiry how much land would be included in the grant. His answer shows that in his opinion no land would be included, except what lay between the mouth of the river and the fork. The House Committee, to whom the subject was referred, acknowledged this to be the true construction, reported the letter of the commissioner, and laid it before the House along with the bill. After the passage of the law, the commissioner of the land office addressed a letter to the Governor of the State, informing him that the range of selection was limited to the lands below the fork, and transmitting plans to guide the State in making its selection. The agent of the State proceeded to make the selections within the limits defined. Both the Governor of the State and the agent appeared to make the selections officially, notified the land office of their selection made below the fork, without pretending to have any claim above. The idea that the grant extended to the source of the river was an after-thought, which did not occur, even to the parties interested, for several years. These facts are kept out of view by the statement of the parties, but Your Honors will find them set forth in Mr. Cushing's Opinion, 7 Opinions, 694.

The first evidence to be found upon record that anybody doubted about the extent of this grant, is in a letter dated Feb. 23, 1848, from Mr. Young, who had then just become commissioner of the Land Office. He suggested that the State was entitled throughout the whole extent of the river within the limits of Iowa. This was pronounced by the Secretary of the Board of Public Works in Iowa, to be "a very liberal opinion," and the claimants have contended for it with more or less pertinacity ever since. But Mr. Young became conscious of his error, and retracted his ill-advised opinion, before doing anything which could commit him to it. He reported the lands above the fork as being vacant and open to sale, and Mr. Polk accordingly issued his proclamation to put them in the market. But the Iowa Board of Public Works had, by this time, become so impressed with their new opinion, that they sent a protest to the Register against the sale of the lands. The sale went on, nevertheless, and considerable quantities of land were sold and pre-empted. This was in the summer of 1848. On the 8th of January, 1849, the delegation in Congress from the State of Iowa addressed a letter to Mr. Walker, then Secretary of the Treasury, in which they argued in favor of stretching the grant up to the source of the river; and on the 2d of March, 1849, the day before he retired from office, Mr. Walker gave them an answer, in which he expressed the opinion that the grant had the whole extent which they claimed for it. He sent the correspondence to the Commissioner of the Land Office for his information and government. This reconverted Mr. Young, or at all events caused him to rescind his last decision against the claim, and on the 1st of June, 1849, he sent an order to the Receiver at Iowa City, directing him to withhold from sale all the odd numbered sections within five miles of the Des Moines, above as well as below the Raccoon Fork.

Still nothing decisive was done to give the State a title to the lands in dispute, when the commissioner reported the facts to Mr. Ewing. He refused his concurrence in Mr. Walker's opinion, and expressed the conviction that the grant did not extend to any lands above the fork. He consented, however, to suspend any sales of the land embraced within the claim of the State, so that an opportunity might be given to apply to Congress for an extension of the grant. From this decision an appeal was taken to the President, who referred it to the Attorney-General, Mr. Johnson. His opinion was in favor of the largest claim which the State had made. But Mr. Ewing continued to oppose it, until he went out of office and was succeeded by Mr. Stuart. Mr. Johnson's opinion was never adopted by the Land Office, as appears from the report of September 26, in which Mr. Butterfield reviews it, objects to its conclusions, and, as I think, overthrows them completely. Mr. Stuart also decided against Mr. Johnson's view, and so did Mr. Crittenden, to whom he submitted the question. But he allowed Mr. Ewing's order to stand until the end of the approaching session of Congress. At this stage of the business a grave error seems to have been committed. The Secretary of the Interior, without changing his conviction, changed his action. He is supposed to have been overruled. But if the President, or any head of a department, entertained an opinion different from his, none of them took the responsibility of placing that fact upon the record. He put his name to an indecisive order, with so many restrictions in it as to leave the matter as open as ever. Mr. McClelland submitted the case to Mr. Cushing, who gave the opinion so much complained of by the plaintiff's counsel, holding that the grant did not extend above the fork; but in view of the complications surrounding the whole matter, he proposed that a part of the claim should be conceded, on condition that the State would agree to accept it and relinquish the remainder. Mr. McClelland made the offer, which was pending without acceptance at the time when Mr. Thompson came into the department. Mr. Thompson insisted upon a categorical answer, and the offer of compromise was refused. Mr. Thompson then decided directly and formally against the claim, the President and Attorney-General concurring. There it was thought to be ended, until this case brought it before the court.

Let us look at these authorities for a moment, and see where the weight of them lies. In favor of the construction which the State contends for, we have a letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office, evidently written without consideration or conference, and retracted immediately afterwards. Then comes the letter of Mr. Walker, which was also retracted, not by himself, to be sure, but by his successor, who had a full right to do so before any action was taken upon it. Afterwards Mr. Attorney-General Johnson expressed an opinion to the same effect; but it was not adopted by the department which had asked for it, nor by anybody else having aught to do with the matter.

On the other hand, the opinion of Mr. Commissioner Shields, given to Congress upon the bill while it was pending, involved the gravest responsibility which an officer could assume. It was adopted by the committee and by the house, as a true construction of the Act. General Shields followed it out when he came to execute the law, and the state authorities, conscious that he was right, fully and freely consented to his view, without any resistance and without complaint. President Polk and the Treasury Department, at the head of which was Mr. Walker himself, decided against the claim when the proclamation was issued for the sale of the lands, and persisted in that decision after the protest from the Board of Public Works. Mr. Ewing was so clear upon the point, that no appeal to the President and no opinion from the Attorney-General could shake his conviction. Mr. Stuart was equally clear, but perhaps not equally firm. The weight of Mr. McClelland's authority and that of Mr. Cushing, is thrown against the claim. Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Thompson have decided against it, more solemnly, if possible, than any of their predecessors. If the opinion of public officers be worth anything at all, there are enough of them here to settle many cases like this. All the actual decisions in the case are against the claim.

It will not fail to be observed by the court, that of the three opinions which have been given in favor of this claim, those of Mr. Young and Mr. Walker are wholly unaccompanied by reasons, and Mr. Johnson's argument is so unsatisfactory that it carries with it no weight except that of his name. He reached his conclusion by transposing the words of the grant, a process which might change the meaning of any law that was ever written. Besides that, his judgment was manifestly influenced by the erroneous doctrine, that in cases of doubt such grants as this should be executed "rather in a large and liberal, than a restricted spirit."

Moreover, he did not regard this question of construction as being important. He took Mr. Walker's letter as conclusive and binding on the government. He thought it immaterial whether it was right or wrong, and declared himself "glad to be of opinion that it could not be legally revoked."

If the court shall reach this part of the case, and be of opinion that the words of the grant are sufficiently ambiguous to leave the intent of the Legislature in doubt, it will then become necessary to determine what rule of interpretation shall be applied to it. Shall the government or the grantee have the benefit of the doubt? A more important question to the public treasury and the morals of the people has never been determined in this court. If it be once settled that acts of this kind are to be construed largely in favor of the parties who get them passed, it will take millions every year, in land and money, to satisfy claimants to whom Congress never intended to give thousands. It is not necessary to show our respect for Congress, by affecting to be ignorant that legislation like this is generally procured upon the solicitation of parties interested. The public and well known history of the country proves that land grants have been sometimes carried by means much worse than solicitation. Will you put it into the power of parties to possess themselves of the public domain or the public money, under grants which they themselves shaped so as to make them unintelligible; that would be throwing the door wide open to the most dangerous and most demoralizing species of fraud. It would be an offer of the most enormous premium to every man whose ingenuity is great enough to practice deception upon Congress. I have no fears that this court will make itself responsible for the consequences which would follow from such a rule.

I do not ask Your Honors to say that a strained construction in favor of the public right should be put on any statute. Let every grantee have what Congress gives him in words which are tolerably plain to the apprehension of intelligent men. But do not give by construction, what the grant itself was not understood to convey. There is no hardship in this. When a legislative body means to give anything, the words can easily be found to express that meaning. It does not happen once in a thousand times, that the language of a grant, construed strictly, carries less than the Legislature is willing to bestow.

But even if you are disposed to repudiate the general rule, or change it so as to give a public grantee the benefit of a reasonable doubt, what could he take by such a doubt as this—a doubt which has no countenance in the law itself—a doubt which the authors of the grant never dreamed of—a doubt which did not enter the heads of the grantees themselves, until it was suggested by a loosely written and ill considered letter from the Land Office—a doubt so dim that it was not seen by the State of Iowa or any of her agents, while they were accepting the law with a construction which confined them to its words—a doubt which was steadily repelled by nearly all the officers of this government, and never entertained by any long enough to be acted on? Doubts may do good service sometimes, but not such doubts as this.

The counsel for both parties made extended replies to the above argument by the Attorney-General, especially denying the charge that there was no real controversy between the parties to the record. In support of this denial, several affidavits were also filed.

As this part of the argument but slightly affects the merits of the case, it is not here given.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

The land in controversy lies within five miles of the Des Moines River, and within the limits of what was the Iowa Territory when the Act of Congress of 1846 (9 Stat. at L., 77) was passed, making the grant to improve the navigation of the Des Moines River from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork; but the land sued for lies nearly sixty miles above the mouth of that fork.

Litchfield, the plaintiff below, claims by virtue of a title derived from the State of Iowa, acting as trustee of the Des Moines River fund.

The Dubuque and Pacific Railroad Company is in possession of the section of land, under a grant from Congress for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Dubuque, on the Mississippi River, to a point on the Missouri River near Sioux City. This grant was made to the State of Iowa in 1856 (11 Stat. at L., 9) and is for every alternate section (designated by odd numbers), for six sections in width on each side of the road. The road was located, the lands designated by the United States, and accepted by Iowa; and then they were transferred to the Railroad Company by the Legislature of that State. The section in dispute is one of those vested in the Railroad Company. This is the younger and inferior title, if the first grant for improving the river extends along its whole length; and the material question in this case is, whether the grant made by the Act of Congress of August 8th, 1846 (9 Stat. at L., 77), for the river improvement, is limited to lands lying next the river; and below the Raccoon Fork. And although this depends on a true construction of the Act, still it becomes necessary to give a brief historical statement of the proceedings before the Executive Department respecting this claim, extending through more than ten years; these proceedings being relied on, either to conclude the title, or to control the construction of the Act of Congress.

They are as follows: By the Act of Congress approved August 8th, 1846 (9 Stat. at L., 77), a grant of land was made to the Territory of Iowa "for the purpose of aiding said Territory to improve the navigation of the Des Moines River from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork, in said Territory, one equal moiety, in alternate sections, of the public lands (remaining unsold and not otherwise disposed of, incumbered, or appropriated) in a strip five miles in width on each side of said river, to be selected within said Territory, by an agent to be appointed by the governor thereof, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States."

The 4th section of the Act provides that the lands shall become the property of the State of Iowa on her admission into the Union, which was very soon expected to occur. The Governor of Iowa was notified by the Commissioner of the General Land Office of this Act, soon after its passage, viz.: October 17, 1846, by letter, in which it is stated that, "under the grant, the Territory is entitled to the vacant lands, in alternate sections, within five miles on each side of the Des Moines River, from the northern boundary of Missouri to the Raccoon Fork."

No objection to this construction was then made by the state authorities, and the agent of the State proceeded to make the selections within the limits above stated.

No question as to the extent of this grant arose until nearly two years after. It appears, however, that a letter dated February 23d, 1848, from Commissioner Young, did not adhere to the restrictions mentioned in the first letter, but its terms seem to concede to it a greater extent. And in 1849 this question was brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury, by the delegation of the State in Congress; they claiming that the State was entitled to land along the whole course of the river to its source. In reply (March 2d, 1849), the Secretary, Mr. Walker, expsesses an opinion that the "grant extends on both sides of the river from its source to its mouth, but not into lands on the river in the State of Missouri." This opinion conceded that nine hundred thousand acres above the Raccoon Fork was within the grant.

In conformity with this view of Mr. Walker, selections of lands above the fork were reported by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for confirmation, to the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ewing; the supervision of the public lands having passed from the Treasury to the Interior Department. Mr. Ewing, upon the ground that the opinion of Mr. Walker had not been carried into effect, held that the same was open for revision; and not concurring therein, refused to approve the selections. But, as Congress was then in session, and might "extend the grant," ordered a suspension of action in the matter.

From this decision of Mr. Ewing an appeal was taken in 1850 to the President, by whom the matter was referred to the Attorney-General, Mr. Johnson, who, in his opinion of July 19, 1850, construed the grant as extending above the Raccoon Fork.

No action appears to have been taken under this opinion of Mr. Johnson; and the question remained open at the accession of the next President, Mr. Fillmore, when it was submitted to the Attorney-General, Mr. Crittenden, who, on the 30th June, 1851, replied that the letter of Mr. Walker had no binding effect on his successor, being but an opinion expressed, not an act done; that the opinions of the attorneys-general are merely advisory; and that the grant, in his opinion, was limited to the lands below the fork. In this opinion it appears that Mr. Stuart (then Secretary of the Interior) concurred; but afterwards, on the 29th October, 1851, he addressed the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the subject, and directed the selections above the Raccoon Fork to be reported for his approval, for the reasons and upon the conditions therein stated, viz.: "that the question involved partakes more of a judicial than of an executive character, which must ultimately be determined by the judicial tribunals of the country." In conformity with this decision, lists of lands above the fork were submitted by the commissioner in October, 1851, and March, 1852, and approved by Mr. Stuart in accordance with the views expressed in his letter of the 29th October, 1851. Acting under this authority, the commissioner, in 1853, submitted lists to Secretary McClelland also, which were approved. The subject was again brought before the Secretary of the Interior in 1856, and by him referred to Attorney-General Cushing. Mr. Cushing, in his reply of 29th May, 1856, advised that a proposition set forth by him be submitted to the State for a final adjustment of the matter. This proposition was not accepted by the State; and in 1858 the subject was laid before Attorney-General Black, whose opinion clearly restricted the grant to the river below the Raccoon Fork; that being in accordance with the construction originally given it at the General Land Office. On mature consideration, we are of opinion that the title of neither party has been affected by the proceedings in the Land Office, or by the opinions of the officers of the Executive Department, but that the claims of the parties under the two Acts of Congress must be determined by the construction to be given to those Acts. This we are required to do in deciding this cause.

The caption of the Act of 1846 informs us that the donation was made to aid in the improvement of the navigation "of the Des Moines River;" and the body of it grants to the Territory (and State) alternate sections, to improve the navigation "of the Des Moines River, from its month to the Raccoon Fork," in a strip five miles in width on each side of "said river." And we are further told (sec. 3d), that "the said River Des Moines shall forever remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from any toll or other charge whatever for any property of the United States, or persons in their service, passing through or along the same."

What navigable river was to be improved, and was in the contemplation of Congress in 1846, when the northern portion of Iowa was a wilderness? Surely not the small streams and brooks reaching into Minnesota Territory, as is here claimed.

Congress recognized the Des Moines River, over which a free passage was secured, to be a stream emptying into the Mississippi; and from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork was the "said river," on each side of which the strip of land granted was to lie.

As proof of which, we refer to the following facts: The bill was introduced into the House of Representatives by Mr. Dodge, the delegate from Iowa Territory, and was the subject of a report by the Committee on Public Lands, which report is a document in the case agreed, and the facts therein stated are admitted. Among these facts, it appears (by a previous report of Captain Fremont, who had officially explored the Des Moines River) that from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork was two hundred and three miles; that it presented no obstacles to navigation that could not be overcome, at a slight expense, by the removal of loose stones at some points, and the construction of artificial banks at some few others, so as to destroy the abrupt bends, and that this was all that would be required to render it navigable; that the variable nature of the bed and the velocity of the current would keep the channel constantly clear.

The committee's report states that the country is occupied and cultivated as high up as the Raccoon Fork; and that a clear and uninterrupted navigation could be secured at an expenditure not great when compared with the object; that the land appropriated by the bill is similar in its character and object to many grants already made by Congress for other western Territories and States, and at the same time less in quantity; but it is believed that it will be sufficient to accomplish the desired improvement; and as evidence of this, Captain Fremont's statement is relied on. The committee was, however, of the opinion that locks and dams might be required at some of the ripples.

Accompanying this report, as a part of it, is a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, obtained by Mr. Dodge (dated May 5th, 1846), in which it is officially stated, "that the amount of unsold land within five miles on each side of the Des Moines River, from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork, proposed to be granted to the Territory of Iowa by House bill No. 106, is estimated at 261,000 acres." The bill No. 106, as reported, was passed into the law before us. When we carry with us the fact that the 261,000 acres of land were surveyed, and the plats recorded in the General Land Office, to which surveys the commissioner's letter referred, it is plain that the river, from its mouth to the Raccoon Fork, was, in the view of Congress, as manifestly as if the outlines of the tract (or strip) had been given by a plan in connection with the river. Of this we have no doubt; but if we had doubts from any obscurity of the Act of Congress, a settled rule of construction would determine the controversy. All grants of this description are strictly construed against the grantees; nothing passes but what is conveyed in clear and explicit language; and as the rights here claimed are derived entirely from the Act of Congress, the donation stands on the same footing of a grant by the public to a private company, the terms of which must be plainly expressed in the statute; and if not thus expressed, they cannot be implied. Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet., 420.

We concur with the following citation and reasoning of the plaintiff's counsel, to wit: Lord Ellenborough, in his judgment in Gildart v. Gladstone, 12 East, 633 (an action for Liverpool dock dues), says: "If the words would fairly admit of different meanings, it would be right to adopt that which is more favorable to the interest of the public, and against that of the company, because the company, in bargaining with the public, ought to take care to express distinctly distinctly what payments they are to receive, and because the public ought not to be charged unless it be clear that it was so intended."

"The reason of the above rule is obvious—parties seeking grants for private purposes usually draw the bills making them. If they do not make the language sufficiently explicit and clear to pass everything that is intended to be passed, it is their own fault; while, on the other hand, such a construction has a tendency to prevent parties from inserting ambiguous language for the purpose of taking, by ingenious interpretations and insinuation, that which cannot be obtained by plain and express terms."

The second ground relied on in support of Litchfield's title is, that he is an innocent purchaser from the State of Iowa of land conceded to belong to the improvement fund by the officers and agents of the United States; and having been certified as part of the grant, and as being one of the odd sections belonging to Iowa, the principal is bound by the acts of his agents, and that these binding acts cannot be revoked at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Interior, as is here assumed to be done.

We have set forth the proceedings on this claim, and have already expressed the opinion that the courts of justice are not concluded by them. The principal reason, however, why the conveyance to Litchfield, under the river improvement grant, cannot be upheld, is this: the Act of Congress was a direct grant to Iowa in fee of an undivided moiety of the whole tract lying on each side of the river from the Raccoon Fork to the Missouri line. Congress had the undoubted power to make the grant and vest the fee.

No authority was conferred on the executive officers administering the public lands to do more than make partition between the tenants in common, Iowa and the United States, in the manner prescribed by the Act of Congress.

The premises in dispute lie sixty miles beyond the limits of the tract granted; it was, therefore, impossible to make partition, under this grant, of lands lying outside of its boundaries; and all attempts to do so were merely nugatory. It follows that the plaintiff below has no title, and his action must fail.

The Attorney-General has intervened, and insists that this action is a mere fiction, and was intended to draw from this court an opinion, affecting the rights of the United States and others, the parties to this suit have nothing at stake, and that the case should be dismissed.

To meet this imputation of contrivance, the parties and their counsel have filed affidavits and statements, from which it satisfactorily appears that the action was brought by a bona fide claimant under the grantee of the river improvement fund against the Railroad Company; and although the case agreed was made up in a friendly spirit, nevertheless the object was to try the title, and this was done at the instance of some of the executive officers.

If the judgment of the district court were affirmed, the defendant below would lose the land; and it being reversed, the plaintiff below loses it. The action was obviously brought to carry out Secretary Stuart's suggestion, when he said, "that the question involved partakes more of a judicial than an executive character, and must ultimately be determined by the judicial tribunals of the country."

We have, therefore, felt bound to hear and decide the cause on its merits; and finding that the plaintiff below has no title, we direct that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and the cause remanded; and that court is ordered to enter judgment for the defendant below.

CHARLES BLIVEN AND EDWARD B. MEAD, Piffs. in Er

v.

THE NEW ENGLAND SCREW COMPANY.

Custom cannot excuse from performance of contract—otherwise, when custom forms part of the contract—evidence of custom, when admissible, and with what effect—when a part of the contract—written evidence construed by court.

The custom of a party to deliver a part of a quantity of goods contracted to be delivered, though invariable, cannot excuse such party from a full compliance with his contract.

To excuse full compliance, mere knowledge of such a usuage would not be sufficient, but it must appear that the custom actually constituted a part of the contract.

But when such custom was well known to the other contracting party, and actually formed a part of the contract, it may furnish a legal excuse for the non-delivery of a proportion of the goods.

Parol evidence of custom, consequently, is generally admissible, to enable the court to arrive at the real meaning of the parties.

Omissions may, in some cases, be supplied by the introduction of the custom; but it is not admitted to contradict or vary express stipulations or provisions of the contract.

Proof of usage is admitted, either to interpret or to ascertain the nature and extent of the contract, in the absence of express stipulations, and where the meaning is equivocal or obscure.

Where defendants adopted a rule to accept all orders for goods, and to fill them in the order they were received, and that rule was well known to the plaintiffs, evidence to prove that the orders had been taken up in turn, and filled in proportion to the orders given by other customers, was admissible

And evidence to show what had been the usage of the defendant's business was also admissible, because that usage constituted an essential part of the several contracts.

Written evidence, as a general rule, must be construed by the court.

The charge to the jury must receive a reasonable interpretation.

NOTE.—Usage and custom, admissibility of, in construction of contracts. See note to Adams v. Otterbach, 56 U. S. (15 How.), 539.

Submitted Mar. 21, 1860. Decided Apr. 9, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Geo. W. Wright, for plaintiffs in error:

1. The delivery of the full quantity of goods agreed upon cannot be excused by any custom to deliver only a part.

Linsley v. Lovely, 26 Vt., 123; The Reeside, 2 Sumn., 567.

2. The custom (as well as the contract) must be mutual. Bliven and Mead might with equal propriety set up a custom when they order 10,000 gross of screws, to receive but 1,000, as the New England Screw Company, on accepting such order unconditionally, to deliver only the smaller quantity.

Here the custom alleged was all on one side. If screws fell in price, Bliven & Mead were obliged to receive the whole. If the screws rose in value, Bliven and Mead could only claim what the Company in its discretion saw fit to deliver them. Such rise took place.

See Holford v. Adams, 2 Duer, 471.

3. The custom proved was illegal, as dangerous, and contrary to the policy of the law.

1. It varied express and written contracts.

Hone v. Mutual Safety Ins. Co., 1 Sand., 187; The Reeside, 2 Sumn., 569.

2. The delivery of goods at the time and in the quantity expressly agreed on, is as obligatory as the payment of money. A debtor's custom to pay his debt "in course, and as far as he consistently can in view of his obligations to his other creditors," will not excuse him from paying his notes given without any such limitation.

4. Custom, to be legal, must be the general custom of the trade, and not (as was this case) the custom of the party only.

What was proved was not properly a custom, but was the habit of the defendants in error, to fulfill their obligations only so far as they found it convenient.

5. If such custom (or habit) could legally be proved, the extent and effect thereof should have been submitted as a question of fact to the jury under the evidence, and not determined by the court.

6. Judgment should be reserved.

Messrs. T. A. Jenckes and E. W. Stoughton, for defendant in error:

1. The evidence of the custom of the New England Screw Company to fill orders in part only, was properly admitted under the general rules, as to the admissibility of evidence of customs and usages.

2. The contracts for the sale of screws by the defendant Company were subject to the custom of the defendant Company, to fill the same in part only; and the contract with the plaintiffs was made, subject to and controlled by this custom.

3. The judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

Mr Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

According to the transcript, the suit was originally instituted in the Supreme Court of the State of New York by the present plaintiffs, who were citizens of that State; but was afterwards regularly removed, under the 12th section of the Judiciary Act, into the Circuit Court of the United States, because the corporation defendants were citizens of the State of Rhode Island.

It was an action of assumpsit, brought to recover damages for the supposed breach of six separate and distinct contracts, in which the defendants, as was alleged in the declaration, stipulated to deliver to the plaintiffs, pursuant to their written orders given at sundry times, certain quantities of screws, usually denominated wood screws, of various sizes and descriptions, as were therein specified. Readiness to perform on the part of the plaintiffs, and neglect and refusal on the part of the defendants to deliver the goods, after seasonable demand, constituted the foundation of the respective claims for damages as alleged in the declaration. Those claims are set forth in eighteen special counts, to which are also added the common counts, as in actions of indebitatus assumpsit. Of the several contracts, the first is alleged to have been made on the 7th day of October, 1852, and the last on the 19th day of April, 1853.

At the May Term, 1855, the parties went to trial upon the general issue. To prove the several agreements, the plaintiffs relied on certain correspondence which had taken place between the parties upon this subject, consisting of letters written by the plaintiffs to the defendants, in the nature of orders or requests for the goods, and the replies thereto written by the defendants.

As appeared by the proofs, the plaintiffs were merchants, engaged in buying and selling hardware, and the defendants were engaged in manufacturing the description of goods specified in the declaration. They were in point of fact the sole manufacturers or the article in the United States, and were constantly receiving orders for the article from their customers faster than they could fill them, and for larger quantities than they were able to produce.

Orders had been given for this article by the plaintiffs prior to the date of this controversy; but the evidence in the case does not show when their dealings commenced. Six orders of like import were given by the plaintiffs, during the fall of 1852 and the early part of the year 1853, for large quantities of the article, of various sizes and descriptions. This suit was brought to recover damages for not filling those orders, which, it is insisted by the plaintiffs, had been accepted without any reservation. Some of them had been filled in part only, and others had not been filled for any amount when the suit was commenced.

It was denied by the defendants that the orders had been accepted without condition. On the contrary, they insisted that the plaintiffs well knew that the supply was greatly less than the demand, and that the orders were only accepted to be filled in their turn, as the defendants were able to produce the article.

To support the first three counts of the declaration, the plaintiffs, among other things not necessary to be noticed, introduced three letters—two from themselves to the defendants, and the reply of the defendants to the same. Reference will only be made to such brief portions of the correspondence as appear to be essential to a proper understanding of the legal questions presented in the bill of exceptions.

Dissatisfaction was first expressed by the plaintiffs in their letter dated on the 30th day of September, 1852. In that communication, they simply refer to the long delay that has occurred in filling their orders, and furnish a memorandum of the amount and sizes of the article claimed by them to be due and not delivered, under their order of the 29th of June of same year. They state that after three months' delay, only about one and one fourth per cent. of the same has been filled, and that they have not a gross of screws under an inch in their stock. Request was also made in the same communication that the plaintiffs would send at once all they could of the article, and the balance of the same as soon thereafter as it was possible. That request was in effect repeated in another letter, written on the 5th day of October, 1852; and on the 17th day of the same month, the defendants replied, saying that the order referred to would be taken up at the earliest possible day.

No further correspondence applicable to the first three counts was introduced by the plaintiffs in the opening of the case.

They then gave evidence to prove the second agreement, as alleged in the fourth, fifth and sixth counts of the declaration. For that purpose they introduced two letters—one from themselves to the defendants, dated on the 15th day of October, 1852; and the other from the defendants to them in reply, dated on the following day. Their letter to the defendants contained an order for three thousand seven hundred and fifty gross of screws, half to be delivered by the 15th day of March then next, and the other half a month later, subject to the regular discount at the time of delivery. That order was given thus early, as the plaintiffs stated, with a view to avoid thereafter the inconvenience they had suffered from not having their orders filled, and because they anticipated a short supply of the article the next season. In the same letter, they informed the defendants that it was given as an additional order, and requested that those previously sent might be filled without further delay.

To that communication the defendants replied, acknowledging its receipt, and saying that the order had been entered in their books, to be executed at the times named. They also referred to the previous orders, saying they would do what they could to fill them before navigation closed on the canals; but added, that they could only take them up in course, as they had a great many orders from other parties in the same condition.

Evidence was then offered by the plaintiffs to prove the third agreement, as alleged in the seventh, eighth and ninth counts in the declaration. To support those counts, two letters were introduced—one from the plaintiffs to the defendants, dated the 4th day of November, 1852; and the reply of the defendants to the same, which was dated on the sixth day of the same month. By the letter first named, the defendants were furnished with another order of the plaintiffs for an additional quantity of screws, and were requested to place the order in their books, to be filled as fast as possible, at a given rate. Previous orders were also referred to in the same letter, and the plaintiffs complain that they have been filled in their turn; adding that they have not a gross of gimlet-point screws in their stores, and earnestly requested the defendants to send them a lot by steamboat on the following day. Two days afterwards, the defendants acknowledged the receipt of the order, and informed the plaintiffs that it had been entered in their books, to be taken up in course.

Those letters constitute the only evidence offered by the plaintiffs in the opening to prove the third agreement.

They then gave in evidence another order from themselves to the defendants, to prove the fourth agreement, as alleged in the tenth, eleventh and twelfth counts of the declaration. It was dated on the 7th day of November, 1852. In the same communication, they stated that they were in great want of a certain description of screws, and expressed the hope that the plaintiffs would send what they could of the article by steamboat without delay, adding: "We have always said, send what you can of our orders as fast as you get a case or two ready, or to that effect." To that letter the defendants replied, under date of the 19th of the same month, saying that the best they could do was to enter the order, to be taken up in course, intimating that perhaps it might be accomplished in about two months.

Similar evidence was given to prove both the fifth and the sixth agreements, as alleged in the six remaining counts of the declaration. Two orders given by the plaintiffs were introduced for that purpose. One was dated on the 10th day of February, 1853, and the other on the 19th day of April, of the same year. They were each for twenty thousand gross of screws; and the defendants were requested to enter the orders in their books, to be filled as soon as possible after they should have completed those previously given. Separate answers were given by the defendants to each of these orders, to the effect that they would be entered in the books of the defendants, to be taken up in course or in their turn, and be filled when they reached them, as far as they should be able to do so, consistently with their obligations to other customers.

No part of the two orders last named had been filled when this suit was commenced. Demand was made of the defendants, on the 30th day of September, 1853, for the delivery of such proportions of the several orders as had not been previously filled. At the same time, the plaintiffs rendered their account, and tendered to the defendants their promissory notes for the respective sums which would become due to the defendants on making such delivery.

Such was the substance and effect of the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs in the opening, so far as it is necessary to consider it at the present time. Many other matters were stated in the correspondence; but as they are not material to this investigation, they are omitted.

To maintain the issue on their part, the defendants, among other things, introduced a letter from the plaintiffs, addressed to them, dated on the 3d day of September, 1852, in which inquiry was made of the defendants why they did not fill the orders given by the plaintiffs. They also stated in the same letter that not a week passed without their hearing of the defendants taking and executing orders from other customers; but admitted, in effect, that they had long since been given to understand the rule of business adopted by the defendants in that behalf, and only complained that precedence was given to the first orders from other customers.

Testimony was also introduced by the defendants, that they had some five hundred customers, and that the orders of the plaintiffs had been taken up and filled in proportion to the orders given by other customers, as the defendants manufactured the article and were able to deliver the goods. To that testimony the plaintiffs objected; but the court overruled the objection, and it was admitted, and the plaintiffs excepted.

All of the orders given by the plaintiffs, except the two last named, were filled in part, and, as the defendants proved, in due proportions to the orders of other customers, as the article was produced. They also proved, that when orders were given and accepted without the price of the article being agreed, it was their custom, and according to the usage of their business, to charge at the rates ruling at the time of the delivery; and if during the interval the discount from fixed rates had increased, the purchaser had the benefit of the allowance; but if prices had risen, and the discount was less, then the purchaser paid according to the increased price. To this testimony, as to the usage of the defendants' business, the plaintiffs objected, but the court overruled the objection; and the testimony having been admitted, the plaintiffs excepted. That practice, however, was not applicable to customers who were not duly notified of the usage, but all such had their orders filled at former rates. Orders from other customers were received by the defendants throughout the period of these transactions, but they refused to accept orders from new parties.

Proof was also offered by the defendants, tending to show that the profit to the manufacturer was less upon the small sizes of the article than upon the large, and it was admitted by their counsel that the market price of the goods advanced after the orders of the plaintiffs were given. Much additional testimony was introduced on the one side and the other, to which it is not necessary to refer, for the reason that it presents no question for the decision of this court. On this state of facts, the presiding justice instructed the jury to the effect that the several contracts for the sale of the goods by the defendants to the plaintiffs were subject to the custom of the defendants to fill the same in part only, and that the plaintiffs, from having been dealers with the defendants, and from the correspondence between them, were chargeable with notice of the defendants' custom to fill their contracts only in the order they were accepted, and in proportion with each other, and not in full, according to the strict terms thereof. Under the rulings and instructions of the court, the jury returned their verdict for the defendants, and the plaintiffs excepted to the instructions. Exception was taken to two of the rulings of the court and to each of the instructions to the jury, but they present only one question for decision and, therefore, may well be considered together. No evidence of general usage or custom in the ordinary sense of those terms was offered in this case, and no question touching the general rules of law upon that subject is presented for the decision of this court. It may also be safely admitted that the custom of a party to deliver a part of a quantity of goods contracted to be delivered, though invariable, cannot excuse such party from a full compliance with his contract, unless such custom is known to the other contracting party, and actually enters into and forms a part of the contract. Mere knowledge of such a usage would not be sufficient, but it must appear that the custom actually constituted a part of the contract. But when it appears that such custom was well known to the other contracting party as necessarily incident to the business, and actually formed a part of the contract, then it may furnish a legal excuse for the non-delivery of such a proportion of the goods as the general course of the business and the usage of the seller authorize, for the reason that such general usage, being a part of the contract, has the effect to limit and qualify its terms. Linsley v. Lovely, 26 Vt., 137. Customary rights and incidents, universally attaching to the subject-matter of the contract in the place where it was made, are impliedly annexed to the language and terms of the contract, unless the custom is particularly and expressly excluded. Parol evidence of custom, consequently, is generally admissible to enable the court to arrive at the real meaning of the parties, who are naturally presumed to have contracted in conformity with the known and established usage. But parol evidence of custom and usage is not admitted to contradict or vary express stipulations or provisions restricting or enlarging the exercise and enjoyment of the customary right. Omissions may be supplied, in some cases, by the introduction of the custom, but the custom cannot prevail over or nullify the express provisions and stipulations of the contract. 2 Add. on Cont., 970. Proof of usage, says Mr. Greenleaf, is admitted either to interpret the meaning of the language of the contracts, or to ascertain the nature and extent of the contract, in the absence of express stipulations, and where the meaning is equivocal or obscure. 1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 292. Its true and appropriate office is to interpret the otherwise indeterminate intention of the parties, and to ascertain the nature and extent of their contracts, arising not from express stipulations, but from mere implications and presumptions, and acts of a doubtful or equivocal character. The Reeside, 2 Sumn., 567. Nothing can be plainer than the proposition that the evidence in the case proved that the supply with the defendants was much less than the demand of their customers. To avoid dissatisfaction, therefore, they were obliged to devise some system which would enable them to do equal justice among those who were properly competing for the article. Accordingly, they adopted a rule to accept all such requests, and to enter the list in a book kept for the purpose, and to fill them as far as possible in the order they were received. They had been in business for some time, and that rule had become the custom of their trade, and, as such, was well known to the plaintiffs during all the time of these transactions. Many of their orders thus given at short intervals had been expressly accepted to be filled in turn or in course, and the correspondence plainly showed that the plaintiffs well knew what was meant by those terms. Evidence to prove that the orders had been taken up in turn, and filled in proportion to the orders given by other customers, was, therefore, admissible, in order to show that the defendants had fulfilled their contract, and done no injustice to the plaintiffs; and it is equally clear that evidence to show what had been the usage of the defendants' business was also admissible, because that usage constituted an essential part of the several contracts which were the subjects in controversy. Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 588. After what has been remarked, one or two additional observations respecting the instructions given to the jury will be sufficient. Written evidence, as a general rule, must be construed by the court, and the first instruction was confined to that purpose. It gives the true exposition of the correspondence, and therefore is not the subject of error. It is insisted by the counsel of the plaintiffs that the second instruction withdrew the evidence of notice from the consideration of the jury.

We think not, and for two reasons. In the first place, it was the proper duty of the court to construe the correspondence, and that of itself was sufficient to justify the charge. But the charge must receive a reasonable interpretation. In effect, the jury were told that the evidence, if true, showed that the plaintiffs had notice of the custom of the defendants in regard to the filling of the orders. It did not withdraw the question as to the credibility of the witnesses from the consideration of the jury, and that was all that could properly be submitted to their determination. In view of all the circumstances, we think the exceptions must be overruled.

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

CHARLES BLIVEN AND EDWARD B. MEAD, Plffs. in Er.,

v.

THE NEW ENGLAND SCREW COMPANY.

Decision in Bliven v N. E. Screw Co., ante, p. 510, affirmed.

All the questions in this case have already been considered and decided by this court in the preceding case, between the same parties.

Submitted Mar. 21, 1860. Decided Apr. 9, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The history of the case and a sufficient statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

See, also, the preceding case, which was between the same parties and involved the same transactions.

Mr. Geo. W. Wright, for plaintiffs in error:

On the specific contracts for screws, for the recovery of the value of which suit was brought, neither of them having been fulfilled, no recovery can be had for the partial performance.

2 Kent's Com., 509; see note a, and cases cited.

Messrs. T. A. Jenckes and E. W. Stoughton, for defendant in error:

If the contracts had been of the character alleged by the plaintiffs in error, their right to strict performance as a condition precedent to paying for the screws actually delivered, would have been waived by their letter of May 19th, 1853, in which they authorized the defendants in error to draw upon them for the value of such as they had received. Not only would this have operated as such waiver, but it is very persuasive evidence, that the plaintiffs in error, at that time, did not pretend that the defendants in error were bound to deliver any specified quantity of screws before being entitled to demand payment of the price.

It is in evidence also, by the testimony of the witness Slocum, that the plaintiffs in error had been customers of the defendants in error for several years, and that the latter had never executed any of their general orders in full; and that they had always been in the habit of making payments upon orders partly executed, as they offered to do by the letter referred to.

The contracts relied upon were not absolute, but the six several orders referred to were accepted conditionally, and with express reference to the usage perfectly well known to the plaintiffs in error.

Upon this subject there was no conflict of evidence, and what the contract between the parties actually was, it was of course the duty of the court to determine.

See, also, abstract of the arguments in the preceding case.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. It was an action indebitatus assumpsit, brought by the present defendants to recover the amount due them for certain goods sold by them to the plaintiffs in error, who were the original defendants. At the May Term, 1855, the parties went to trial upon the general issue. To prove the issue on their part, the plaintiffs introduced a letter from the defendants, dated on the 17th of May, 1853, and addressed to the plaintiffs. In that letter the defendants acknowledged the receipt of the plaintiff's account, but claimed a small deduction for an alleged error. Evidence was then introduced by the plaintiffs, tending to show that account was correct.

Having proved their account, the plaintiffs rested their case.

To maintain the issue on their part, the defendants set up that the goods charged in the account had been delivered to them in pursuance of certain contracts made between the parties, in which the plaintiffs had agreed to sell and deliver to them large quantities of screws usually denominated wood screws, of various sizes and descriptions, but they had failed to fulfill their contracts. They admitted that a part of the goods had been delivered; but, inasmuch as no one of the contracts had been completed, they insisted that a recovery could not be had for a partial performance.

Their defense was sustained by the same evidence as that introduced by them in the preceding case, and the plaintiffs offered the same evidence in reply as they had in the other case, to make out their defense. Similar exceptions were taken by the defendants to the rulings of the court in admitting their testimony as to the course of business, and the usage of the plaintiff's trade. After the evidence was closed, the court instructed the jury that the several contracts for the sale and delivery of the screws by the plaintiffs to the defendants were subject to the custom of the plaintiffs to fill the same in part only. Under that instruction, the jury returned their verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount of the account, together with interest, and the defendants excepted. No question is presented in the bill of exceptions that has not already been considered and decided by this court in the preceding case. For the reasons there given, we think the rulings and instructions of the circuit court were correct, and refer to those reasons for the grounds on which the conclusion in this case rests.

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN AND COMMONALTY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, Plffs. in Er.,

v.

FRANKLIN RANSOM AND UZZIAH WENMAN.

(See S. C., 23 How., 487–491.)

Actual damages—evidence of, necessary—not established by inference—measure of.

Where a plaintiff is allowed to recover only "actual damages," he is bound to furnish evidence by which the jury may assess them.

Actual damages should be actually proved, and cannot be assumed as a legal inference from facts which afford no data by which they can be calculated.

The possible advantage or gain made by defendants by the use of plaintiff's improvement on their machines, is not the measure of his loss.

If he fails to furnish any evidence of the proper data for a calculation of his damage, he should not expect that a jury should work out a result for him by inferences or presumptions founded on subtile theories.

Submitted Mar. 22, 1860. Decided Apr. 9, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

This action was brought in the court below, by the defendants in error, to recover damages resulting from the alleged infringement of a certain patent.

The trial below having resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, the defendants sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

No counsel appeared in this court for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Charles M. Keller, for defendants in error:

As the counsel did not discuss the point on which the case was decided in this court, the argument is not here given.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in error were defendants in an action for infringement of a patent, "for a new and useful improvement in the mode of applying water to fire engines so as to render their operation more efficient."

On the trial, they took some twenty-four exceptions to the rulings of the court in their charge to the jury; but they have not seen fit to appear in this court, and point out to us on which of these numerous exceptions they principally rely for the reversal of the judgment. The defendants in error have not elected to have the writ of error dismissed for want of prosecution, but have filed a printed argument praying for an affirmance of the judgment.

On examination of the record, we find that the bill of exceptions contains no copy of the specification of the letters patent. Without this, we are unable to test the correctness of the construction of the patent by the court below.

But there is one exception which the record enables us to examine, and in which we think there is error.

The defendant's 14th prayer for instruction is as follows:

"The plaintiffs have furnished no data to estimate actual damage, and therefore, in no aspect of the case can they recover more than nominal damages."

If the predicate of this proposition be true, the conclusion was correct, and the instruction should have been given by the court.

Where a plaintiff is allowed to recover only "actual damages," he is bound to furnish evidence by which the jury may assess them. If he rest his case, after merely proving an infringement of his patent, he may be entitled to nominal damages, but no more. He cannot call on a jury, to guess out his case without evidence. Actual damages must be calculated, not imagined, and an arithmetical calculation cannot be made without certain data on which to make it.

The invention in this case was not one which enabled the patentee to make a profit by a monopoly of its use. Nor was it a separate and distinct machine, by the sale of which he could make a profit. The patent is for an improvement in the apparatus of the common fire engine, by which the hydrostatic pressure of the water from the hydrant may be combined with the hydraulic pressure of the engine, and thus add to its power and efficiency. There was evidence tending to show the invention to valuable, and that it could be applied to the engines in use at an expense or $25, thereby greatly increasing the power of the machine. It was proved that the City had applied this invention to fifty engines, but no information whatever of the price or value of a single license is given in the bill; fifty is the co-efficient by which an unknown number is to be multiplied, and without further data the result is still an unknown quantity. If there had been any proof that the selling price of a single license for a single engine was $400, the jury would have had something to support their verdict for $20,000.

In the case of Seymour v. McCormick, 16 How., 485, it was decided by this court, that where the profit of the patentee is derived neither from an exclusive use of the thing patented, nor from a monopoly of making it for others to use, the actual damage which he suffers by the use of his improvement without his license, is the price of it, with interest, and no more. It is to his advantage that everyone should use his invention, provided he pays for a license. The only damage to the patentee is the non-payment of that sum when the infringer commences the use of the invention.

As the plaintiffs in this case did not furnish any evidence upon which to found a calculation of actual damages, the court should have instructed the jury as requested by the counsel. Instead of it, the court instructed the jury as follows:

"If the invention is valuable; if by its use the power and efficiency of the fire engines belonging to the defendant are so increased, that fifty engines used with this improvement are equal in practical effect to seventy-five, or any other number of engines, used without this improvement, the jury are at liberty to infer, if they think the inference a just one, that the defendant, in its corporate capacity, has saved the cost of the purchase and operation of the additional number of engines which would have been required to produce the same results if this invention had not been used; and that the corporate authorities, if they had admitted the plaintiffs rights, would have paid the amount of this additional cost, or a large portion of it, as the consideration for a license to use this invention, rather than to abandon its use; and that the plaintiffs have therefore lost by the infringement what the defendant would have so paid to secure such license. It is for this reason that the benefits received by the defendant in its corporate capacity, from the use of the invention, in the consequent reduction of its expenditures for fire engines, and their management and operation, are proper subjects for consideration in determining the plaintiff's damages; and the jury must determine for themselves, upon the considerations of this and the other facts of the case (if they find that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover), what damages have been actually sustained by the plaintiffs in consequence of the unauthorized and wrongful acts of the defendant, being careful only to give the actual damages proved, and not to speculate upon the possibility or even probability of damages beyond such as are proved to have been sustained by the plaintiffs."

It was of little use to caution the jury from giving speculative or any other than "actual damages," after the large margin of inference and presumption which they were permitted to take in order to find data by which to calculate them.

It was said, in the case to which we have referred, "actual damages should be actually proved, and cannot be assumed as a legal inference from facts" which afford no data by which they can be calculated.

In order to find out the plaintiffs' loss or damage, the jury were allowed by the court to infer that the defendants have saved all the money indicated by the comparative powers of the engines with and without the improvement; and after having made this inference, they may presume that the defendants would have paid this amount to the plaintiff for the use of his improvement.

Thus the possible advantage or gain made by the use of plaintiff's improvement on their machines, is made the measure of his loss. If the plaintiffs, unable to furnish any other data for a calculation, had proved that the defendants had made a certain amount of money by putting out the fires in New York, which the plaintiffs would otherwise have made by use of their invention, he might with some reason contend that this was a proper measure.

But if he fails to furnish any evidence of the proper data for a calculation of his damage, he should not expect that a jury should work out a result for him by inferences or presumptions founded on such subtle theories.

We therefore direct the case to be remanded for a venire facias de novo.

GEORGE B. MOREWOOD, JOHN R. MOREWOOD, AND FREDERICK R. ROUTH, Appts.,

v.

LORENZO N. ENEQUIST, Owner of the Brig GOTHLAND.

(See S. C., 23 How., 491-495.)

Charter-parties and contracts of affreightment are maritime contracts, cognizable in admiralty—conflicting testimony.

New Jersey Steamboat Company v. The Merchants' Bank of Boston, 6 How., 334, affirmed.

Charter-parties and contracts of affreightment are maritime contracts, within the true meaning and construction of the Constitution and Act of Congress, and cognizable in courts of admiralty by process either in rem or in personam.

People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How., 401, considered.

This court will not reverse a decree of the circuit court, merely upon a doubt created by conflicting testimony.

Submitted Mar. 13, 1860. Decided Apr. 9, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, by the appellee, against the appellants, in personam, to recover freight stipulated for in a charter-party.

The district court entered a decree in favor of the libelant. This decree having been affirmed, on appeal, by the circuit court, the defendants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Robert Dodge and R. Johnson, for appellants.

Mr. Charles Donohue, for appellee.

Counsel filed five briefs, in which the evidence in the case and the question of jurisdiction were exhaustively discussed. But as the question of admiralty jurisdiction in personam must be considered as having been conclusively settled, the argument is not here given.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The ship Gothland, owned by Enequist, the libelant, was chartered by Burt, Myrtle & Co., of Batavia, to proceed to Padung, on the Island of Sumatra, there to receive a quantity of coffee; to return thence to Batavia and complete her cargo, and deliver the same in New York, freight to be paid by the assignees of the bills of lading on delivery of the cargo. The libelant's suit is in personam against the consignees or assignees of the cargo, for the amount of freight stipulated in the charter-party.

The only defense alleged in the answer is, that a portion of the merchandise delivered was not in good order, and had been greatly damaged by sweating, caused by want of proper ventilation on the voyage.

This defense was fully discussed and examined both in the district and circuit court, and a decree was entered for the libelant in both.

In the argument in this court, the counsel,

NOTE.—To what places the jurisdiction of admiralty is confined. See note to Allen v. Newberry, 62 U. S., supra.

without abandoning the original defense, have expended much learning and ingenuity in an attempt to demonstrate that a court of admiralty in this country, like those of England, has no jurisdiction over contracts of charter-party or affreightment. They do not seem to deny that these are maritime contracts, according to any correct definition of the terms, but rather require us to abandon our whole course of decision on this subject, and return to the fluctuating decisions of English common law judges, which, it has been truly said, "are founded on no uniform principle, and exhibit illiberal jealousy and narrow prejudice."

The errors of those decisions have mostly been corrected by legislation in the country of their origin; they have never been adopted in this.

We do not feel disposed to be again drawn into the discussion of the arguments which counsel have reproduced on this subject. The case of The New Jersey Steamboat Company v. The Merchants' Bank of Boston, 6 How., 344, was twice argued (in 1847 and 1848) at very great length. The whole subject was most thoroughly investigated, both by counsel and the court. Everything connected with the history of courts of admiralty, from the reign of Richard II. to the present day—everything which the industry, learning and research of most able counsel could discover, was brought to our notice. We then decided that charter-parties and contracts of affreightment are "maritime contracts" within the true meaning and construction of the Constitution and Act of Congress and cognizable in courts of admiralty by process either in rem or in personam.

Lord Tenterden admits that, by the maritime law, "the ship is bound to the merchandise and the merchandise to the ship; and it is a necessary consequence that the contract is as much a maritime contract as a bottomry or respondentia bond, or mariners' wages." See Abbott on Shipping. But in England they cannot have the benefit of this lien or privilege, because courts of common law cannot enforce a lien in rem, and will not permit the court of admiralty to do it. Our district courts had exercised this jurisdiction without question till the case just mentioned came before this court. Since that time no objection has been raised in this court to the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty over contracts of affreightment. See Rich v. Lambert, 12 How., 347, &c., &c.

The numerous briefs of argument filed in this case contain nothing which was not brought to our notice in the former discussions of this subject, except some remarks on the case of The People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How., 401. It has been contended that this case has established the doctrine, that the jurisdiction of our courts of admiralty under the Constitution should be restrained to that which they were permitted to exercise in the colonies before the Revolution. The court decided in that case that a contract to build a ship is not a maritime contract; and though, in countries governed by the civil law, courts of admiralty may have taken jurisdiction of such contracts, yet that in this country they are purely local, and governed by state laws, and should be enforced by their own tribunals. As a cumulate argument, it was stated that the Act of Congress of 1789 was not intended to conflict with the rights of the state tribunals to enforce contracts governed by their own laws, and not strictly of a maritime nature; that such contracts were thus considered at the time the Constitution was formed, and had never been previously cognizable in courts of admiralty as within the category of maritime contracts; and that the contest of jurisdiction in that case "was not so much between rival tribunals as between distinct sovereignties claiming to exercise power over contracts, property and personal franchises." The arguments used in stating the opinion of the court must be referred to the subject before it, and construed in connection with the question to be decided. They had no reference whatever to any former decisions of this court on the question now (it is hoped for the last time) mooted before us.

There is much testimony in the record of this case, on the issue made by the answer, with the usual discrepancy and contradiction in matters of opinion. The question whether the cargo was injured through the negligence and fault of the master, or whether the damage to it was caused by the innate vice of the cargo and its necessary exposure on the voyage, was a very complex one, depending wholly on the opinion of experts. Where witnesses of proper skill and experience have formed their judgment from a personal examination of the subject of the controversy, their opinions are generally more worthy of confidence than those elicited by hypothetical questions, which may or may not state all the accidents and circumstances necessary to form a correct conclusion.

The decision of this case by the district and circuit courts is supported by the testimony of numerous witnesses, who had both the capacity and experience to judge, and had examined the subject of the controversy. We see no reason to dispute the correctness of their judgment, or to enter into a particular examination of the conflicting testimony in order to vindicate the correctness of our own. We have frequently said that appellants should not expect this court to reverse a decree of the circuit court merely upon a doubt created by conflicting testimony.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed, with costs.

v.

THE BLUE RIDGE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C., 23 How., 1, 2.)

Motion to dismiss for want of bond—time given to file bond.

Upon a motion to dismiss the appeal, upon the grounds that no appeal bond was given at the time of granting the appeal, either as a security for costs or supersedeas of execution, the court gave appellant sixty days to give the bond, and file it with the clerk, upon complying with which order, the motion to be dismissed; otherwise, granted.

Argued Mar. 23, 1860. Decided Apr. 16, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia.

The case is stated by the court.

On motion to dismiss.

Messrs. Reverdy Johnson, R. Toombs and T. R. R. Cobb, for appellants.

Mr. P. Phillips, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a motion to dismiss the appeal, on the part of the appellee, upon the ground that no appeal bond was given at the time of granting the appeal, as required by the statute, either as a security for costs, or supersedeas of execution. 1 Stat. at L., pp. 84, 85, secs. 22, 23, p. 404.

It is admitted that no bond was given, but the counsel resisting the motion proposes to give one for the costs, and thus prevent the dismissal, if consistent with the practice of the court. The practice has been alowed in several cases, as will be seen by reference to 10 Wheat., 311; 16 How., 148, and 9 Wheat., 555. In the last case, time was granted within which to give the bond, or the case be dismissed. The bond may be taken and approved before any judge or justice authorized to allow the appeal or writ of error.

Let the appellant have sixty days to give the bond, and file it with the clerk, upon complying with which order the motion be dismissed; otherwise, granted.

v.

OLIVER B. HILLARD AND MOSES C. MORDECAI.

(See S. C., 23 How., 149-167.)

Extent of obligation of surety—when surety discharged by change of contract with principal—when not—settlement, effect of—damages, measure of—question for jury—notice to defendant.

The general rule is, to attribute to the obligation of a surety the same extent as that of the principal.

If the terms of his engagement are general and unrestricted and embrace the entire subject, his liability will be measured by that of the principal, and embrace the same accessories and consequences.

The mere prolongation of the term of payment of the principal debtor, or of the time for the performance of his duty, will not discharge a surety or guarantor.

There must be another contract substituted for the original contract, or some alteration in a point so material as in effect to make a new contract, without the surety's consent, to produce that result.

But when the essential features of the contract and its objects are preserved, and the parties, without objection from the surety and without any legal constraint on themselves, mutually accommodate each other, so as better to arrive at their end, there is no ground for the surety to complain.

Where a settlement between the parties did not embrace the subject to which the warranty applied, nor contain any release or extinguishment of the covenants concerning it, the guarantor cannot plead it in bar.

All questions of damages are, strictly speaking, for the jury; but there are certain established rules, according to which they ought to find.

The amount that would have been received, if the contract had been kept, is the measure of damages.

Introduction of the notice to the defendant, of the defects in the work, was proper.

Argued Mar. 21, 1860. Decided Apr. 16, 1860

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

This was an action on the case brought in the court below, by the defendants in error, against the plaintiff in error, as guarantor of the performance of a certain contract, to recover damages resulting from an alleged failure to perform said contract.

The trial in the court below resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, for $6,000 and $1,869.15 costs; whereupon the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles Tracy and William Curtis Noyes, for plaintiffs in error:

1 The court erred in the construction of the defendant's agreement.

It was the contract of a surety which is to be taken strictissimi juris, and is not to be enlarged by a liberal or loose interpretation.

Leggett v. Humphreys, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 66-76; Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat., 681, 703; Wright v. Johnson, 8 Wend., 512, 516.

The motive and design of the writing was, to protect the plaintiffs against the loss of the money they were to advance. It, therefore, guarantied a performance of the contract by the delivery of the articles, and that if they were not delivered, the money should be refunded with interest.

There is nothing in the surety's agreement which binds him to answer for the breach of any warranty which the principals have contracted to make. The sealed agreement binds the manufacturers to warrant the engine capable of driving six run of stones, but the guaranty has no connection with such a prospective warranty. The surety's obligation must be and is definite; he is liable at once or never; the articles are delivered or they are not; if delivered, he is clear; if not delivered, he is at once liable to refund the money advanced, but nothing else.

The essential idea of having money refunded in gross, apparent on the face of the paper, shows that it was a total non-performance alone which would charge the surety, and the mention of that sum necessarily excludes all other liability.

The surety cannot be supposed to have intended to assume an indefinite liability for ultimate defects in articles accepted and used by the plaintiff, and as to which the defendant was wholly ignorant.

2. The undertaking of the defendant was satisfied by the performance of Hopkins & Leach's contract.

The receipt which went forth from the plaintiffs was justly relied upon by the defendant, as a full discharge of the contract; and he acted upon it in relinquishing valuable securities which he held for his indemnity. The plaintiffs are, therefore, estopped from denying the performance so evident by their receipt.

The plaintiffs treated this settlement with Hopkins & Leach as a determination of the suretyship. Thus, on Dec. 27, 1848, being nine days after the settlement, they gave notice to Hopkins & Leach of the failure of the engine. But they never gave any notice to the defendant till the last of May, 1849.

3. The defendant's obligations as surety were discharged by the acts and agreements of the plaintiffs and Hopkins & Leach.

The new agreement, to which the defendant was not a party, gave till the third rise of water in October to complete the delivery. Such new agreement was made upon a good consideration, and was valid and binding. It made a permanent and material change in the contract.

Whether the change was for the benefit of the one party or the other, or both, it was, in either case, a change of the contract and discharged the surety.

Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat., 681, 703; Burge; Surety, 203–206; Pit. Pr. & Sur., 208; Theob. Pr. & Sur., 154; Par. Merc. L., 67; Brigham v. Wentworth, 11 Cush., 123; Dickerson v. Commissioners, 6 Ind., 128; Hunt v. Smith, 17 Wend., 179, 180; Walrath v. Thompson, 6 Hill, 540; 2 N. Y., 185; Mc Williams v. Mason, 6 Duer., 276; Bangs v. Strong, 7 Hill, 250; Samuel v. Howarth, 3 Mer., 272.

The fact that the time of performance originally contracted for had already arrived, and Hopkins & Leach might be deemed in default of performance, makes no difference in the application of the rule. Plaintiffs chose to waive the default and make a new contract. If the plaintiffs had insisted on the default, then Hopkins & Leach would have kept the engine and the defendant would have been liable only for the advances previously made, being then only about $4,000, and he would have been more secure of indemnity by reason of the engine, so far as built, being still the property of Hopkins & Leach.

It is material to the risk or safety of the surety, that the advances be made as specified in the contract to which he is surety.

An advance made before the time it should be made or after it, or in a different kind of medium, is equally a departure from the conditions of the suretyship.

4. The court erred in refusing to charge the jury, as requested by the defendant's counsel, in relation to the rule of damages.

The engine, boilers and appurtenances thereof had a definite price fixed by the contract, viz.: $3,150. The parties had set this as the value of such articles, properly made and fully answering to the terms of the contract. In any assessment of damages for failure to deliver such articles, that price must be taken as the test of value.

Whatever rule of damages might be applied, this element of the price of an engine of the specific dimensions and sufficient to drive six run of stones, was an essential consideration, and the instruction asked for should have been granted.

Cary v. Gruman, 4 Hill, 625.

5. The court erred in admitting the paper called a survey.

This paper was an unsworn statement, made ex parte, and contained allegations of particular facts, and also expressions of opinions of the persons signing it.

Messrs. G. C. and L. W. Goddard, for defendants in error:

First. The first exception in the case was as to the admission of this survey:

It was competent evidence to show that notice and information were sent to defendant; and in this light only was it put in evidence.

It being proper evidence for one purpose, and the exception being general to its entire exclusion, it is not well taken.

Camden v. Doremus, 3 How., 515.

It was, however, admissible for all purposes, as the defendant had already introduced evidence as to its contents, as had the plaintiff also, without objection.

Second. The next exception is to the refusal to nonsuit. This cannot be done against the will of the plaintiff.

Elmore v. Grymes, 1 Pet., 469; De Wolf v. Rabaud, 1 Pet., 476; Crane v. Morris' Lessee, 6 Pet., 598.

Third. The remaining exceptions are to the charge.

The construction given to the guaranty is correct.

The last clause of the contract with Hopkins & Leach is, that they would give security for the money and for the fulfillment of this contract. And then, on the same paper, follows the guaranty, by which the defendant guaranties the performance of the within contract on the part of Hopkins & Leach; and also agrees to refund the money paid on it, if not performed.

The charge of the court on the alleged enlargement of the time for completing the contract, was correct.

Such an acquiescence in delay on the part of Hopkins & Leach as was testified to, would not, as matter of law, discharge the defendant; but a material alteration of the contract by the parties would discharge him.

The time for the putting up the engine, etc., was not fixed by the contract. They were to be put up "when the foundations are finished and ready for the reception of the machinery," of which Hopkins & Leach were to have ten days' notice. There was no change in this.

An agreement with the principal for delay does not discharge the surety, unless it is one which the principal can enforce; one which is valid in law, and made on sufficient consideration.

McLemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat., 554; Vilas v. Jones, 10 Paige, 79.

The contract was under seal, and could not be varied by parol so as to be obligatory on the parties to it.

Davey v. Prendergass, 5 Barn & Ald., 187; Gahn v. Niemcewicz Exrs., 11 Wend., 312.

The account and statement was no discharge of Hopkins & Leach on their contract.

The engine had not been tried in connection with the mill; and of course it could not be determined whether it would drive the mill, with six or any run of stones, and whether that part of the contract had been performed.

If the defendant's guaranty of the "performance of the contract" extended to the quantity and sufficiency of the work when done, then he had no right to assume, if he did, that his liability thereon ceased when the last payment was made to Hopkins & Leach; for that payment might, and in fact did, become due before the mill was complete and before the engine could be tried.

There was nothing in the memorandum of settlement to mislead him.

Whether the contract was performed or fulfilled in the sense of the contract and as guarantied, could only be ascertained at Wilkesbarre. And the defendant was bound to ascertain, before he could act on such assumption to the prejudice of the plaintiffs.

The guaranty was co-extensive with the obligations of the contract.

Non-performance by Hopkins & Leach was what the guaranty looked to—was what it was required for, and what it was given to provide for. By the contract, the plaintiffs were entitled to security for the money and for the fulfillment of the contract.

The guaranty, to meet this, follows its terms, and secures the performance, and the return of the money if not performed.

What amount of money or what damages the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, depended on the evidence as to non-performance; which was fairly submitted to the jury under instructions, which were not excepted to.

In respect to the amount of recovery or the rule of damages, the court charged that if the jury found the engines, etc., were insufficient to drive six run of stones, the damages should be such sum as would supply the deficiency.

The cause was tried in 1856. The plaintiffs were then out of pocket in money paid to Hopkins & Leach, over $8,000, including interest, with little or no benefit from it. Besides which, they had "expended large sums of money to put the engines, etc., in a condition to run," and then the engine would not do the work required by the contract.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

In September, 1847, Hillard & Mordecai employed the firm of Hopkins & Leach to make at Elmira, in New York, and deliver to them at Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, a steam engine, and apparatus necessary to put the same in complete operation, of the best materials and in the most substantial and workmanlike manner, according to specifications, and warranted to be of sufficient capacity and strength to drive six run of stones, and the gearing and machinery necessary for flouring and gristing purposes. Also, to make and deliver the cast iron, wrought iron, steel and composition work for driving six run of stones, and the machinery attached, of the best materials and workmanship. These they were to erect and put up on a foundation prepared by Hillard & Mordecai, who were to afford the proper aid for that purpose. The machinery was to be completed and delivered at Wilkesbarre upon the first safe and navigable rise in the water of the river (Chemung) in the ensuing spring; and Hopkins & Leach were to give a responsible individual for security for the money paid on the contract, and for its fulfillment, Hillard & Mordecai agreed to pay $2,000 the 1st of December, 1847; $2,000 the first of February, 1848; and the remainder upon the completion of the work, for which payments they were to be allowed interest. Before the first payment, the defendant subscribed an agreement, indorsed on the contract, as follows: "For value received, I hereby guarantee the performance of the within contract on the part of Hopkins & Leach; and in case of non-performance thereof, to refund to Messrs. Hillard & Mordecai all sums of money they may pay or advance thereon, with interest from the time the same is paid." This suit was brought on this guaranty by Hillard & Mordecai for the insufficiency of the work done by Hopkins & Leach. On the trial they adduced testimony to show that the engine and apparatus set up by Hopkins & Leach were not of the best material, nor of substantial and workmanlike construction, and had not strength to drive six run of stones, and in improving them they had sustained expense and loss; that from the middle of December, 1847, till December, 1858, the time when the work was finished, they had advanced $5,500, and that only a trifling balance existed at that date, which was paid before the work had been tested by use; that afterwards, and in that month, defects were discovered, of which Hopkins & Leach had notice. In consequence of which, they made efforts to improve their work; but in June, 1849, the plaintiffs procured an examination to be made by three machinists and engineers, whose report upon the imperfection of the machinery was communicated to Hopkins & Leach and to the defendant, and who were required to amend their work. This notice and report were read to the jury, the defendant excepting to their competency. The defendant, after the case of the plaintiff was submitted to the jury, insisted to the court that his contract was merely a guaranty, either of the performance of the agreement by Hopkins & Leach by the delivery of the machinery, or the refunding of the moneys that might be paid before that event; and that the advances of the plaintiffs, being in drafts or notes, and not within the time limited by the contract, the defendant was not liable at all, or if liable, only to the extent of the payment of $4,000, until they had fully performed their contract; and the plaintiffs having fully paid off Hopkins & Leach, and receipts being given, the defendant had a right to consider his guaranty as at an end.

The court overruled a motion to nonsuit the plaintiff, and instructed the jury that the defendant was responsible on his contract, not only for the non-payment of the money advanced to Hopkins & Leach in case they failed to make and deliver the engine and machinery, but also for the full and faithful performance of all of the agreement of Hopkins & Leach. The general rule is, to attribute to the obligation of a surety the same extent as that of the principal. Unless from the terms of the contract an intention appears to reduce his liability within more narrow bounds a restriction will not be imposed by construction contrary to the nature of the engagement. If the terms of his engagement are general and unrestricted, and embrace the entire subject (omnem causam), his liability will be measured by that of the principal, and embrace the same accessories and consequences (connexorum et dependentium.) It will be presumed that he had in view the guaranty of the obligations his principal had assumed. Poth. on Ob., 404; 3 M. & S., 502; Boyd v. Moyle, 2 C. B.,.644.

In the case before us, the contract of the surety is not in the alternative, but consists of two terms: one, that the principals shall perform their engagement, not merely by their delivery of some machinery, but of such machinery as the contract includes; the other, that if there be a non-performance, whether excusable or not, the money advanced on the contract shall be secured to the plaintiffs to the extent for which their principals are liable.

The defendant, to sustain his defense that the plaintiffs had varied their agreement with Hopkins & Leach, adduced testimony to the effect that the latter had informed them of their inability to complete the work "by the first safe and navigable rise in the river," and that they assented to the delay proposed by them till another rise; that a portion of the work was sent in April, and a portion in June, and a portion in October, and that the plaintiffs were not ready to receive it until October, and it was not erected until December, 1848, at which time a settlement took place, and the plaintiffs paid the small balance then due.

The circuit court instructed the jury that the waiver by the plaintiffs of the punctual delivery of the engine and machinery did not constitute such a change in the contract as to discharge the guarantor. That a mutual alteration of the contract by the principal parties would operate to discharge the defendant as a guarantor; but an acquiescence on the part of the plaintiffs in a longer time than was specified in the contract for fulfillment, especially as the time of fulfillment was somewhat indefinite, would not, as matter of law, operate to discharge the defendant; and the court declined to charge the jury "that if they believed that the performance of the contract was essentially altered or varied, or the time of the delivery of the machinery at Wilkesbarre extended upon good consideration, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover."

The agreement of Hopkins & Leach comprised the manufacture of complicated machinery of distinct parts and different degrees of importance, and these were to be transported to a distance, there to be set up in connection with other works about which other persons were employed. That such a contract should not be fulfilled to the letter by either party is not a matter of surprise. The convenants are independent; and there is nothing that indicates that a failure on either part to perform one of these covenants would authorize its dissolution, or that the breach could not be compensated in damages.

The evidence does not allow us to conclude that there was any intention to change the object or the means essential to attain the object of the original agreement. In its execution, there were departures from its stipulations; but these seem to have been made on grounds of mutual convenience, and did not increase the risk to the surety. He was fully indemnified by his principals until after the settlement between the plaintiffs and Hopkins & Leach.

It is clear that the mere prolongation of the term of payment of the principal debtor, or of the time of the performance of his duty, will not discharge a surety or guarantor. There must be another contract substituted for the original contract, or some alteration in a point so material as, in effect, to make a new contract, without the surety's consent to produce that result. But when the essential features of the contract and its objects are preserved, and the parties, without objection from the surety, and without any legal constraint on themselves, mutually accommodate each other, so as better to arrive at their end, we can find no ground for the surety to complain. The circuit court presented the question fairly to the jury, and the exceptions to the charge cannot be supported. Trop. de Caution, 575; Baubien v. Stoney, Speer, Ch., (S. C.,) 508; 11 Wend., 312.

The defendant adduced testimony to show that the plaintiffs accepted the engine and machinery; that an account was stated between the plaintiffs and Hopkins & Leach of the work done and money paid, and an acknowledgment of its settlement entered upon it, and signed by the parties; that Hopkins & Leach exhibited this account to the defendant, and demanded a return of the securities they had deposited with him for his indemnity, and that they were yielded on the credit given to that acknowledgment. He requested the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed that the defendant, relying upon the receipt given by the plaintiffs, settled with Hopkins & Leach, and surrendered to them securities he held to indemnify him against the liability he assumed by his guaranty, and such surrender and discharge were made after the settlement between Hopkins & Leach and the plaintiffs, and upon the faith of it, the plaintiffs are bound by such settlement and receipt, so far as the same relates to the defendant, they having put it in the power of Hopkins & Leach to procure the surrender of such securities for the defendant. This prayer finds its answer in the agreement of Hopkins & Leach, and the guaranty of the defendant.

The material of which the machinery was to be composed, and the workmanship and capacity of the manufacture, were warranted. The defects in the machinery were latent, and could only be ascertained by its use. The settlement between the parties did not embrace the subject to which the warranty applied, nor contain any release or extinguishment of the covenants concerning it. The cause of the present suit is not the same as that included in the stated account, or acknowledgment entered upon it.

The present suit originates in the contract between Hopkins & Leach and the plaintiffs. The former could not plead that settlement in bar of a similar suit against them; and consequently their guarantor cannot. They have misconceived the import of that settlement without the agency of the plaintiffs, and are not entitled to charge them with the consequent loss.

The circuit court instructed the jury, that if they found the engine, boilers, and apparatus for steam power, were sufficient to drive six run of stones suitable for grinding, the damages to be found should be such as would enable the plaintiffs to supply the deficiency, and that they were not required to assume the contract price as the full value of such machinery.

The principle thus laid down coincides with that in Alder v. Keighly, 15 M. & W, 117. "No doubt," say the court in that case, "all questions of damages are, strictly speaking, for the jury; and however clear and plain may be the rule of law on which the damages are to be found, the act of finding them is for them. But there are certain established rules, according to which they ought to find; and here is a clear rule: that the amount that would have been received, if the contract had been kept, is the measure of damages if the contract is broken." This rule was reaffirmed in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch., 841. The exception to the introduction of the notice to the defendant and the report accompanying it, cannot be sustained. It was proper for the plaintiffs to notify the principals and their surety of the defects in their work, and to call upon them to amend it. The report was not introduced as testimony of the defects, nor can we assume that it was used for that purpose.

Upon the whole record, our conclusion is there is no error, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

MARTIN VERY, Plff. in Er.,

v.

GEORGE C. WATKINS.

(See S. C., 23 How., 469–476.)

Conversation, between trustee and co-surety of defendant, when inadmissible—what errors not grounds of reversal—inadmissible paper—what is a valid levy—property levied on may be left in possession of another—when property in trustee's possession may be levied on—surety exonerated when principal is—demand, how made of receiver.

A conversation between witness and a co-surety of defendant, defendant not being present at the conversation, is inadmissible to fix upon defendant as co-surety a separate liability for an alleged breach of the bond by their principal, for which they had made themselves mutually responsible.

Assignments of error, which are complaints because the court admitted evidence directly pertinent to the issues which had been made by the pleadings, are not grounds of reversal.

A paper in the handwriting of the deceased co-surety of the defendant was inadmissible to show that the testimony of the other witnesses was not consistent with an appraisement which they had made, pursuant to an order of the court.

If the officer charged with the duty to make a levy has a view of the goods and they are in his power, and he declares that he makes a levy or seizure of them in execution, it is a valid levy.

It cannot be implied that a levy by a marshal was incomplete because he left the property where it was when the levy was made.

After a levy has been made with a fi. fa. upon goods and chattels, the officer may confide them to another person for safe keeping.

An execution is leviable upon the property in the possession of a trustee of defendant, where it was allowed by him, voluntarily, to remain.

In an action to make a security liable for an alleged breach of his bond, he is entitled to have the benefit of any irregularity which his principal could have resisted.

Under a decree authorizing one to demand property of a receiver, the demand should be made under a certified copy of that part of the decree, permitting the demand of the property, and requiring its surrender, with a receipt upon it, either by such one or his attorney, that the goods were surrendered by the receiver.

Such a certificate the court would have directed to be put on file, as a voucher for the protection of the receiver from further responsibility to the parties, and as evidence that its decree had been executed in that particular.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. Stillwell, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. A. Pike and Geo. C. Watkins, in person, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 3d of March, 1841, at Little Rock, Arkansas, one James Levy gave his obligation with a mortgage for $4,000, with interest, due six years after date, to one Darwin Lindsley, who soon after assigned the obligation to Martin Very, the plaintiff in error. In March, 1843, Levy paid to Very $2,000, and at the same time executed a promise, in writing, to pay the residue of the debt in jewelry and other wares, which Very agreed to receive in payment, to be selected within a year from that time, from Levy's stock of goods. Very refused to perform the agreement, and in 1848 brought an action on the original obligation, to which Levy pleaded the agreement by way of accord and satisfaction, with an offer to perform on his part. The Supreme Court of Arkansas, on an appeal, held it to be, in equity, a clear accord and satisfaction, upon a good consideration, because the creditor by that arrangement received payment of nearly half of the debt in advance, and because the residue was to be paid almost four years before the debt became due. In the mean time, Very brought a bill to foreclose the mortgage in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Arkansas, to which Levy set up the same defense by way of answer. In April Term, 1850, the court sustained the defense of Levy, and decided that Very should select from the stock of goods in question a sufficient amount, according to their value, on the 3d March, 1844, to satisfy the rest of the debt. It then became necessary to appoint a receiver in the cause. John M. Ross was appointed receiver, and gave a bond, with E. Cummins and Geo. C. Watkins as securities, in the penal sum of $5,000, with the condition that he would faithfully discharge his duties as receiver, with respect to such goods as might be brought into court, and that he would carefully keep and dispose of them in conformity with such order and decree as the court might make in that suit.

In consequence of Very's refusal to abide by his agreement, Levy was obliged to keep his stock of goods on hand to tender them to Very, according to the agreement. But Levy had other creditors, who seized upon the same goods in execution, and they were in possession of the sheriff when Ross was made receiver, and from the sheriff he received them. The next step was an order from the district judge, directing Very to select from a box of jewelry in the hands of the receiver such an amount, according to the value of the goods in March, 1843, as would be sufficient to discharge the balance of the debt due to him. This he refused to do, and then the clerk of the Supreme Court of Arkansas was directed, with the assistance of two skillful and disinterested persons, to make a selection from the goods for Very.

It was done. A report was made, that the value of the goods in March, 1844, had been $5,777, and that according to that value a selection had been made to the amount of $2,002.59, to pay Very's claim upon Levy, and that the goods had been set apart for that purpose, with an inventory. A final decree was then made, authorizing Levy to withdraw the remainder of the goods from the hands of the receiver, adjudging also that Very should take the selected goods in payment of the residue still due upon the bond and mortgage, and that Ross, the receiver, should deliver them to him on demand. Very refused to abide by that decree, and prosecuted an appeal to this court. Here the decree of the court below was affirmed. On its return, Very refused to pay the costs. Levy had to pay them in order to get a mandate from this court to carry its decree into execution. Under these circumstances, Levy sued out a writ of execution, and directed it to be levied on the goods belonging to Very, still in the hands of Ross. The receiver and the marshal returned it without further action on the writ. A venditioni exponas was then issued, and the goods were sold by the marshal for $260, the full value of them at that time, in their then condition. Three years and six months passed, and then Very, having acquiesced all of that time in what had been done, commenced this suit to recover from Watkins, as the security of Ross, damages for a breach of his bond, alleging that he had carelessly kept the jewelry which had been in his possession as receiver, and for not having surrendered it to him when he demanded it, as under the decree of the court he had a right to do.

Watkins filed three pleas to this action. The first is a detailed narrative of the proceedings in the suit between Very and Levy to the appointment of Ross as receiver, and showing that, by the decree, Very had been required to receive, in satisfaction of the debt due to him by Levy, jewelry to the amount of $2,002.59; and that from that decree they had appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the decree of the court below had been affirmed with costs. Very v. Levy, 13 How., 345. And further stating, that Levy had paid the costs of the suit in the Supreme Court, and that the jewelry, still being in the hands of Ross, had been levied upon and sold by the marshal, and that the proceeds of it were applied to the repayment of Levy of the costs, which Very was bound to pay by the decree.

Watkins, in his second plea, denied that the jewelry had been injured from the careless keeping of Ross; and his third plea is a denial that Very had ever demanded it from Ross.

Upon the trial of the case, the plaintiff excepted to the rulings of the court, as well for excluding as for admitting testimony.

We have examined with some pains the plaintiff's assignments of error, without finding cause for sustaining either of them. The first is, that the court refused to permit a witness to testify to a conversation between himself and Cummins, the co-surety of Watkins, for the purpose of fixing upon the latter a liability, in this action, to the plaintiff. It seems that Watkins was not present at that conversation. Whatever it may have been, it was inadmissible; and had Cummins been alive; and had he been called as a witness to narrate it, he would not have been a competent witness to fix upon his co-surety a separate liability for an alleged breach of the bond by their principal, for which they had made themselves mutually responsible. The argument of the counsel for the defendant in error is unanswerable upon this point.

The second, third, fourth, fifth and sixth assignments of error are complaints because the court admitted evidence directly pertinent to the issues which had been made by the pleadings, and defensive as to the imputed negligence of Ross in keeping the goods committed to him as receiver, and as to their condition, quality and value when they were turned over to him under the order of the court; and as to their condition when it was levied upon by the marshal to pay the costs of the Supreme Court.

The seventh assignments of error was the refusal of the court to admit a paper in the handwriting of Cummins, the deceased co-surety of the defendant, to show that the testimony of the other witnesses, Dort and Kirk, was not consistent with the appraisement which they had made, pursuant to the order of the court. It was clearly inadmissible.

The eighth and ninth assignments of error relate to the levy upon the jewelry by the deputy-marshal; and the court is asked to instruct the jury: "If the levy was made without seeing the jewelry and taking it into possession, they should disregard it as any evidence of any levy; as, in law, a levy upon personal property —which jewelry is—cannot be made without having a sight of it, and taking possession thereof."

The court refused the instruction as asked; but said to the jury, that to make a valid levy on goods and chattels on a writ of fi. fa., if the officer charged with the duty has a view of them, and they are in his power, and he declares that he makes a levy or seizure of them in execution, such is a valid levy, without taking them into his possession.

The objection to this instruction seems to be, that there had been an insufficient seizure, because the officer did not take manual possession of the box containing the jewelry, but left it in the keeping of Ross, who had pointed it out to him when he came to make the levy. But the evidence establishes that a levy was made by the officer, and that he returned the execution to the marshal, for further proceedings upon it.

It cannot be implied that the levy was incomplete, on account of the box having been left where it was when the levy was made, where it had been kept by Ross whilst he continued to be receiver, and where it remained afterwards, from Very not having demanded it, as he had a right to do and should have done.

After a levy has been made with a fi fa. upon goods and chattels, the officer may confide them to another person for safe keeping, until there has been a settlement of the judgment and payment of all costs.

The court, in giving this instruction to the jury, went further than it was necessary to do, without, however, having interfered with the right of the jury to find from the evidence whether or not a levy had been made.

The tenth assignment of error relates to the instruction of the court, that by the decree of the court below in August, 1850, and the affirmance of it by this court in 1851, Ross ceased to act as receiver, and from thenceforth held the jewelry in question only as the trustee of Very. That decree put an end to the controversy, excepting to what remained to be done under the mandate of the court for the execution of its decree. It is true that Ross, as receiver, had not been discharged by a formal order upon motion when the decree was made; but it is also true that the jewelry, by the decree, was made the property of Very, and that he could have demanded it from Ross, and that he could not justifiably have refused to deliver it. It was the property of Very for all purposes, as any other that he owned, or which could have been conveyed to him by any kind of title. It was, as such, liable for his debts. It seems to have been considered by the counsel of Very as liable for the costs of appeal in the Supreme Court, which Very had neglected to pay. Levy, however, paid them, and obtained an execution against Very for his reimbursement, which was as well leviable upon this property, still in the possession of Ross, as upon any other. It was allowed by him voluntarily to remain where the law had placed it, without having made any proper demand for it under the decree. We do not consider the application for it by Mr. Fowler, as the attorney of Very, a proper demand. Mr. Fowler's relation to him was not that special attorneyship which authorized him to demand it in the manner that he did. No doubt that both Mr. Cummins himself and Mr. Fowler thought themselves empowered, as attorneys in the suit, to withdraw it from Ross, to make a private sale of it for the payment of the costs due by Very.

But Ross had responsibilities in the matter under the decree, which gave him the right to withhold it from the counsel of one of the parties, until a demand was made upon him, according to what the course of equity practice requires to be done under such decrees. It matters not what causes he may have assigned to Mr. Fowler for not delivering the jewelry to him, for, in a controversy to make the security of Ross liable for an alleged breach of his bond, the former is entitled to have the benefit of any irregularity which his principal could have resisted. According to the practice in equity, under such a decree as this is, authorizing Very to demand the jewelry, the demand should have been made under a certified copy of that part of the decree, at least, permitting Very to demand the property, and requiring Ross to surrender it, with a receipt upon it, either by Very or by his attorney, that the goods were surrendered by Ross. Upon the return of such a certificate, the court would have directed it to be put on file with the other papers in the suit, as a voucher for the protection of Ross from further responsibility to the parties, and as evidence that its decree in that particular had been executed. Such a course is not merely a form, to be followed or not, as parties to such a decree may please, but it is a cautionary requirement, to prevent further litigation, by exactness in the performance of a decree in equity. Had it been observed in this instance, this suit would not have been brought.

The instruction as given is in conformity with the decree. Having examined every assignment of error, we shall direct the judgment of the court below to be affirmed.

THE ORIENT MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Er.,

v.

JOHN S. WRIGHT, use of MAXWELL, WRIGHT & COMPANY.

(See S. C., 23 How., 401-412.)

Open policy, what is, and effect of—when same attaches—rules governing same—construction of such a policy—when and how premiums to be settled.

An open or running policy, enables the merchant to insure his goods shipped at a distant port when it is impossible for him to be advised of the particular ship upon which the goods are laden, and therefore cannot name it in the policy.

The party insured can insure the cargo "on board ship or ships," on condition of declaring the ship upon the policy and giving notice to the underwriter as soon as known, and if possible, before the loss of the ship on board of which the goods have been laden.

The underwriter agrees that the policy shall attach, if the vessel be seaworthy, however low may be her relative capacity to perform the voyage; and for the additional risks he may thus incur, he finds his compensation in an increase of the premium.

The ship must be seaworthy, or the policy will not attach; but the degrees of seaworthiness are various; and the rates of premiums are varied by the underwriters according to the different estimates they form of the character and qualities of the vessels to which they relate.

The principles of law and rules of construction governing policies of this description stated.

Where the parties agree, that in respect to vessels rating lower than A 2, the premiums on the risks shall be fixed at the time they are declared or reported; when thus fixed, and the premium paid or secured, the policy attaches upon the goods from the time they are laden on board the vessel.

The mere declaration of the ship, on board of which the goods are laden, is not sufficient to complete the contract, as something more is to be done by the assured; he must pay or secure the additional premium which the underwriter has reserved the right to fix, at the time of the declaration of the risk.

NOTE. — Insurance. Different kinds of policies. Valued policy. See note to Ins. Co. of Virginia v. Mordecai, 63 U. S., supra.

Where the vessel declared or reported by the assured was rated below A 2, and the company had reserved the right to fix at the time the additional premium, and unless assented to by the assured, and the premium paid or secured, the contract of insurance, in respect to the particular shipment, did not become complete or binding; held, that the premiums were to be settled when the risks were reported; not at any other period.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

This action was brought in the Superior Court of Baltimore City, by the defendants in error, on a certain policy of insurance.

On petition of the plaintiff in error, the cause was removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The trial below resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for $17,365.13 with costs; whereupon the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. Hamilton, Jr., and F. B. Cutting, for plaintiff in error:

The contract of insurance contained in the record is commonly called an open or running policy, and is issued when the shipments to be protected thereby, the time of making them, the vessel or vessels carrying them, the ports of destination, and the value or amount of cargo, and other circumstances material to the risks to be borne by the underwriter have no present existence, or are unknown to either of the parties.

The contract is necessarily incomplete, though binding upon the underwriter to the extent of the agreement. It contemplates that if the assured shall desire to avail himself of his right to be protected under it, he shall, when the risks to be insured are known to him, or within a reasonable time thereafter, make a declaration, return, or report of them to the underwriter, with all essential particulars, in order that the premium to be charged may be estimated by the insurer, and if agreed to, may be entered with the particulars upon the policy which is "open" to receive them.

Until the return by the merchant of risks, not known at the time of making the agreement to insure, no basis exists upon which the consideration or premium for assuming the hazards could be estimated or named by the underwriter; consequently, an open or running contract to insure separate sums upon unascertained future successive and distinct shipments to be thereafter declared or reported by the merchant, is an agreement that the underwriter will assume the risk as to them, at and from the lading thereof, in consideration that the assured will pay, or agree to pay, such premium as shall be, in good faith, named by the insurer, as an adequate compensation for the risks to be assumed by him.

2. The premium is the price, and is the sole consideration for which the underwriters agreed to indemnify the assured against loss. The rates of premium at which he can afford to take hazards, is the basis upon which the whole business of insurance rests. It is vital that the insurer should have the power to determine his rate of charge, leaving it, of course, optional with the merchants to accept or reject. Hence, under the agreement contained in the policy in controversy as the risk to be insured at the time when it was effected were not known and did exist, it was impossible to estimate the premiums to be paid, and therefore an agreement being necessarily incomplete, various reservations were made, and amongst others, the essential ones, to add an additional premium upon the cargo to be shipped by vessels rating lower than A 2, or by foreign vessels. That the premiums or risks should be fixed at the time of the indorsement, and such clause to apply as the Company may insert as the risks are successively reported.

Mr. Wright had the option to make shipments by vessels of this description, and the right to claim the benefit of contract by paying, or agreeing to pay, the additional premium which the Company might, in good faith, charge for the risk.

1 Duer, Ins., 66, sub. 11; 1 Phil. Ins., 2, 8.

8. In such cases, there are as many different contracts of insurance as there are different subjects to insure, and these contracts are as distinct as if each was made the subject of a separate policy.

When the company has, in good faith, estimated and determined the rate of premium which it deems to be commensurate with the risk reported to it, and the merchant considers it too high and refuses to agree to it, the contract, as to that shipment, has not become complete.

The merchant has a right to be protected by the policy, at and from the lading of the cargo, if he chooses to agree to pay the premium demanded by the company therefor; but if he chooses, he may decline to pay it, in which case as the whole consideration fails, the company may refuse to enter the risk, or if an entry has been made, may strike it from their books.

4. The schooner Mary W. did rate lower than A 2; consequently, when Mr. Wright made the declaration or return of the shipment by her to the Company, it had the right to determine in good faith the additional rate which in its judgment would be adequate to the character of the risk that he desired should be insured. The contract makes no provision, in case the parties cannot agree on the premium, for its adjustment by arbitration or otherwise, and in such case the law does not undertake to make a price for them.

5. Mr. Wright did refuse to agree to pay either of the rates of premium, which the Company in good faith determined. He denied the right of the Company to estimate the risk, denounced the rates named by it as exorbitant, offered to leave the dispute to arbitrators, and finally offered to pay, at a less rate, &c.; consequently, the contract between the parties, to insure the cargo of The Mary W., was never complete.

When Wright refused to pay or to agree to pay either of the rates of premium demanded, the Company was free from liability. His refusal went to the entire consideration on which alone it had engaged to be liable at all.

Messrs. R. J. Brent and H. May, for defendants in error:

The principle of construing an insurance policy is to be most liberal towards assured.

The premium note being given and the amount agreed to, makes a new contract perfect and complete by extension on the old terms.

The premium note is conclusive, whether paid or not.

The policy takes effect from date of premium note, though policy delivered after.

Lightbody v. N. A. Ins. Co., 23 Wend., 18.

The adverse argument is most unreasonable, because it is virtually the claim of a power ex parte to annul the contract already attached and in force.

1 Phelps, Ins., 123; Royalton v. Turnpike Co., 14 Vt., 311; 1 Duer, 162, secs. 7–10.

Intention of parties must be on the whole contract, even by overruling grammatical construction.

Morey v. Homan, 10 Vt., 565.

If the risk had once attached, premium note could not be refused payment or returned.

8 Johns., 1.

The last clause retains one and one half per cent. on all returned premiums.

The contract was irrevocable the moment the premium and extension was reported and approved.

1 Pars. Cont., 406, 407, note, K; Tayloe v. Merchants' Insurace Co., 9 How., 390.

The contract is not the less complete because an increased premium was left open for subsequent agreement.

This was decided in U. S. v. Wilkins, 6 Wheat., 135, and not overruled, as supposed, in 17 Ohio, 192.

But here is an express obligation to pay an increased premium, and that is itself as good as if the increased premium had been paid at the time—promise for promise is a good consideration.

1 Pars. Cont., 373–376; 19 How., 323.

Now, as to the effect of the indorsement leaving the premium not fixed at the time, we insist—

1. That the average premium was fixed in the very extension of the policy, liable to be increased or abated.

2. The right to fix the rate in the case of The Orient must be reasonable, and not exercised so as to annul the contract.

1 Duer, 162, secs. 7–10; 1 Phil. Ins., 123; 14 Vt., 311.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The suit was brought by the plaintiff below upon a policy of insurance covering a quantity of coffee laden or to be laden on board the "good vessel or vessels" from Rio de Janeiro to any port in the United States, "to add an additional premium, if by vessels lower than A 2, or by foreign vessels."

The policy contained the following clause in respect to premiums: "Having been paid the consideration for this insurance by the assured, or his assigns, at and after the rate of one and one half per cent., the premiums on risks to be fixed at the time of indorsement, and such clauses to apply as the Company may insert, as the risks are successively reported." The policy bears date 27th July, 1855. The Company subscribed at the execution $22,500 as the amount insured.

On the 30th July, 1855, the policy was altered by agreement of parties by striking out the words, "vessels not rating lower than A 2," as it originally stood, and inserting the words now in the instrument, namely: "an additional premium, if by vessels lower than A 2, or by foreign vessels."

On the 4th January, 1856, the Company subscribed an additional sum of $15,000, and on the 19th April following, the sum of $25,000.

Premium notes were given at the time the different sums were subscribed, at the rate of premium mentioned in the body of the policy.

The agent of the Company at Baltimore, who negotiated this insurance, the defendants being a New York Company, states that when applications are made to enter risks on running policies, they are indorsed at once by him, and the report of such indorsement transmitted to the Company in New York, which names the premium, and this is communicated to the assured; that the premiums specified in the body of the policies are nominal, and the true premiums to be charged are fixed by increasing or reducing the nominal premiums when the risks are reported; and that the nominal premiums taken on the delivery of a running policy are returned, if no risks are reported.

In the latter part of August, 1856, the plaintiff applied to the agent at Baltimore for an indorsement on the policy of the coffee in question, laden or to be laden on board a vessel called The Mary W., from Rio de Janeiro to New Orleans, which application was communicated to the Company in order that they might fix the premium. The Company at first declined to acknowledge the vessel as coming within the description in the policy, on account of her alleged inferior character and unfitness for the voyage; but the plaintiff insisting upon the seaworthiness of his vessel, and his right to the insurance within the terms of the policy, the Company fixed the premium at ten per cent., subject to the conditions of the policy, or two and one half per cent., as against a total loss. This rate of premium the plaintiff refused to pay.

The coffee was shipped on The Mary W. at Rio de Janeiro for New Orleans, on the 12th July, 1856, at which period she started on her voyage, and was lost on the 29th of the month upon rocks, the master being some seventy miles out of his reckoning at the time.

Evidence was given on the trial, on the part of the Company, tending to prove that The Mary W. was rated below A 2, and even that she was unfit for a sea voyage, being originally intended, when built, in 1846, as a coasting vessel, and prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they find from the evidence the vessel, at the time of the application for the indorsement of her cargo upon the policy, was rated in the office of the Company and other offices of underwriters in New York lower than A 2.

and being so rated, the Company offered to make the indorsement at the premium fixed by them, and that on the premium being communicated to the plaintiff, he refused to pay it or assent thereto, then he is not entitled to recover, which prayer was refused; and the court thereupon instructed the jury, substantially, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for the loss, so far as the rate of premium was concerned, upon deducting such additional premium to the one and one half per cent., as in the opinion of underwriters may be deemed adequate to the increased risk of the coffee shipped in a vessel rating below A 2.

The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff.

The material question presented in the case is, whether or not the Company were under a contract, with any of the terms and conditions of the policy, to insure this particular cargo of coffee on board of the vessel Mary W. at the time the loss occurred; for, unless the contract is found there, none existed between the parties, as it is admitted none was entered into at the time the vessel was reported and the risk declared. The plaintiff has assumed the affirmative of this question, and insists that the Company was bound by the terms of the policy to cover the coffee from the time it was laden on board the vessel at Rio as soon as the risk was declared, and this whether the vessel rated below A 2 or not. This is necessarily the result of the position claimed, as it denies to the Company the right to fix an additional premium, even if it should happen that the vessel rated below A 2; that then, or in that event, it is contended, the additional premium becomes a question of mutual adjustment between the parties, and if they disagree, to be determined by the courts. On the part of the Company, it is insisted that, according to the special provisions in the policy, in case the vessel reported rated below A 2, the contract is inchoate and incomplete until the payment or security by the assured, of the additional premium to be fixed at the time by the Company.

The contract of insurance in this case arises out of an open or running policy, which enables the merchant to insure his goods shipped at a distant port when it is impossible for him to be advised of the particular ship upon which the goods are laden and, therefore, cannot name it in the policy.

A relaxation in this respect has been permitted by the laws and practice of commercial countries; and the party effecting the insurance is allowed to insure the cargo "on board ship or ships," on condition of declaring the ship upon the policy and giving notice to the underwriter as soon as known, and if possible before the loss on board of which the goods have been laden. The underwriter, who consents to insure upon policies of this description, of course, has no opportunity to inquire into the character or condition of the vessel, and agrees that the policy shall attach, if she be seaworthy, however low may be her relative capacity to perform the voyage; and for the additional risks he may thus incur, he finds his compensation in an increase of the premium. A higher premium is always demanded where the vessels to which the insurance relates are not known.

The ship, indeed, must be seaworthy, or the policy will not attach; but the degrees of seaworthiness or of the capacity of a ship to perform a given voyage are exceedingly various; and it is well known that the rates of premium are varied by the underwriters according to the different estimates they form of the character and qualities of the vessels to which they relate.

In the case of an insurance of goods shipped from and to port or ports designated, or on a voyage particularly specified, the ship to be afterwards declared, and the rate of premium to be paid is ascertained, and inserted in the body of the policy at its execution, the contract becomes complete, and the policy attaches upon the goods from the time they are laden on board the vessel, as soon as the ship is declared or reported, provided the shipment comes within the description in the policy. But until the declaration is made by the assured, it is inchoate and incomplete; and, if not made at all, the risk is regarded as not having commenced, and the assured is entitled to a return of his premium.

The principles of law and rules of construction governing policies of this description appear to be well settled, as may be seen by a reference to the authorities collected in the text writers.

1 Arnold, ch. 7, sec. 2, pp. 174–179, Perkins' ed.; 1 Phillips, ch. 5, sec. 2, pp. 174–177; 2 Parsons, ch. 1, sec. 2, pp. 34–35, and ch. 6, pp. 198–199; 3 Kent's Ch., p. 256; Entwisle v. Ellis, 1857, 2 Hurl. & Nor. (Exch.), 549; Langhorn v. Cologan, 4 Taunt., 330; E. Carver Co. v. Manf. Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 214.

But the policy before us is materially different from the class of open or running policies adopted in England and upon the continent at an early day, and which appear to be generally if not universally in use at the present time. Instead of determining the amount of premium and inserting it in the policy at the time of its execution upon the shipments to be afterwards declared, as in the case of the policies we have been considering, the parties here agree, that in respect to a certain class of vessels, namely: those rating lower than A 2, the premiums on the risks shall be fixed at the time they are declared or reported; when thus fixed, and the premium paid or secured, the policy attaches upon the goods from the time they are laden on board the vessel. The mere declaration of the ship on board, of which the goods are laden, is not sufficient to complete the contract, as something more is to be done by the assured to bring the subject within the special stipulations in the policy; he must pay or secure the additional premium which the underwriter has reserved the right to fix, at the time of the declaration of the risk.

The premiums specified in the body of the policy are nominal; and the true premiums to be charged are fixed by increasing or reducing the nominal premiums when the risks are reported. This, it was proved, was the established custom of this Company, and of which the assured is chargeable with notice. Indeed, this custom appears to have been acted upon in connection with this policy, and with the dealings of the parties under it.

On the 13th August is indorsed on it: Brig Windward, from Rio de Janeiro to Baltimore —value of shipment $4,750, at 1½ per cent. premium; and on the 20th November: Brig T. Walters, from same place to Philadelphia—value of shipment $2,375, at 1¼ per cent. premium. The premiums for insurance of these two shipments are ¼ per cent. less than the rate in the body of the policy.

We have said, that where the vessels to which the insurance relates are not known to the underwriter, a higher premium is always demanded, as he has no opportunity to inquire into the character or capacity of the vessel for the voyage; which information is readily accessible where the ship is known, by reference to the book of the register of vessels kept by the underwriters, in which the name, master, rate and present condition are entered.

Now, the change made in this policy, and in others of the class, in the time of fixing the premium, from that of the execution of the policy to the time when the risk is reported, places the underwriters, in respect to fixing the premiums, on the footing of insurance of goods to be shipped on board a vessel named, the underwriters possessing all the information possessed in that case, in respect to the character of the vessel. As the effect, therefore, of this change in the terms of the policy is to reduce the rate of premium, it is as beneficial to the assured as to the underwriter—which, doubtless, led to his assent to this mode of insurance. It is true, that in respect to vessels to be afterwards declared, and the premiums on the risks to be fixed at the time declared or reported, the parties stand on the footing of original contractors, the underwriter having the right to fix the premium, and the applicant the right to assent or not, as he sees fit; and, undoubtedly, mutual confidence must exist, in order to the successful working of the system. On the one side, the underwriter might be unreasonable in the amount of the premium claimed; and on the other, the applicant, who is presumed to have the earliest advices of the ship on which his goods are laden, might conceal her condition when reported, and impose upon the underwriter. Injustice might be practiced in this way by both parties, if this mode of dealing with each other may be assumed.

But this would hardly be just as to either party, and especially when the interest of both is concerned to deal justly and honorably with each other. The business of the underwriter depends essentially upon the good faith with which he deals with his customers; and this motive, as well as the great competition that exists in the business, may be well relied on to prevent any unreasonable advantage. But, at worst, the applicant is not bound to pay the premium, if unreasonable; and may at once be insured in any other office, and claim a return of premium, if any, advanced. The evidence in the present case furnishes no ground for apprehension, as the premium charged was not unreasonable, but the contrary.

But, be the argument ever so strong in respect to the opportunities to deal unjustly with each other, it is quite clear, upon the fair if not necessary construction of the terms of the policy, both parties have agreed to submit to them, for the sake of the better means furnished to ascertain the true character of the risks, and thus reduce the rate of premium below that which was charged under the old system, where it was fixed in the absence of knowledge on the subject; and the period of time these policies with this change of the terms has been in use, for aught that appears, without complaint or dissatisfaction, affords evidence that all apprehensions of unfair dealing are imaginary.

We have said that, according to the true construction of the terms of this policy, where the vessel declared or reported by the assured was rated below A 2, the Company had reserved the right to fix at the time the additional premium; and unless assented to by the assured, and the premium paid or secured, the contract of insurance, in respect to the particular shipment, did not become complete or binding. The court below held the contrary, the instruction to the jury maintaining that the contract was complete and binding as soon as the vessel was reported; and that, if the parties could not agree as to the additional premium, the question was one for the courts to settle; thus placing this policy upon the footing of those where the full premium was fixed, and paid or secured, at the time of the execution, and in which no special provisions concerning the premium are inserted.

These special clauses are very explicit, and are inserted in this policy for the benefit of the Company. We think, independently of the usage and practice of the Company under these policies, the import of the language used cannot well be mistaken.

The right is expressly reserved to charge an additional premium upon all vessels reported rating below A 2; and again, the premiums on risks are to be fixed at the time of indorsement —that is, when the vessels are reported to be noted on the policy. If the construction rested alone upon the right to add additional premiums upon a given rate of vessels, that might be some ground for the agrument that the time for fixing them was open; and if the parties could not agree, the law must determine the question. But when the parties themselves stipulated, not only that in the particular case additional premium shall be charged, but that it shall be fixed at the time the risk is made known, there would seem to be no room for doubt or dispute in the matter. In the present case, there is also the additional special provision, namely: "and such clauses to apply as the Company may insert as the risks are successively reported," thus providing for any unforeseen or extraordinary risks that might be claimed under the policy.

Even if an arbitrator had been agreed upon to fix the additional premium, and he had refused, the contract would have been at an end, as the courts could not appoint one (Wilks v. Davis, 8 Mer., 507; Milne v. Gery, 14 Ves., 400; Code Napoleon, 1591, 1592; 1 Troplong de vente, Nos. 146, 160); and certainly they could not fix the premium in this case, on the disagreement of the parties, without assuming the right to make a contract for them. The premiums were to be settled when the risks were reported, not at any other period.

In the case of policies on goods "in ship or ships," to be afterwards declared, and where the full premium is paid or secured at the execution, the policy, even in that case, is a mere outline of the contract, to be completed on making the declaration; but if not made within the terms of the policy, the contract is at an end as respects the particular shipment.

In Entwisle v. Ellis, 2 Hurl. & Nor., Exch.,

549, 556. 1857, Channell, B., observed, speaking of a policy of this description, at the time of the making of the policy, certain particulars were agreed upon—others were left to be settled. The policy was to be on rice, to be warranted free from particular average, to be sent "in ship or ships." Something more was wanting to make a binding contract. The parties can only fill up such particulars as are left in blank so as to be consistent with the policy.

Applying this principle to the policy in the present case, regarding the special clauses therein something more is required to make a binding contract than the declaration of a ship rating lower than A 2 to bring the subject within the policy; the additional premium fixed by the company was to be paid or secured.

We have found very few cases in the books upon the peculiar class of policies before us, and no mention of them in the text writers on the subject of insurance. The case bearing more directly than any other upon the point in question is Douville v. The Sun Ins. Co., 12 La. Ann., 259.

The contract of insurance there was in an open or running policy of the class in which the full premium was paid or secured at the execution. But a modification was afterwards made, by which "it was agreed that this policy shall cover merchandise to the address of the assured from European ports to New Orleans, via Boston or New York, subject to additional premium as per tariff."

The court held that by the terms of the policy the party desiring to be insured upon any particular shipment of merchandise was bound to present to the Company an invoice of the goods (this had been provided for in the policy), and pay or secure the premium; that the party was not bound to report any shipment except at his election, nor could the Company demand premium on the same, unless presented for insurance; and that, on a policy of the class before the court, there must necessarily exist as many contracts of insurance as there are indorsements on the policy of separate shipments.

We have examined this case more at large, from the novelty of the questions involved, as they do not seem to have been the subject of consideration by the courts or text writers, than from any difficulty we have felt in the view to be taken of them; and from the examination we have given to the peculiar features of the policy, we entertain no doubt but that the changes made, and which have been particularly referred to, will be found in practice beneficial both to the insured and insurer.

The only defect, perhaps, existing, is the want of a provision for the case, which may happen, where the declaration or report of the ship is not made until the loss is known—that is, where the ship and the loss are reported together. According to the old form of the policy, the full premium being ascertained and fixed at the date of it, it is well settled that, though the declaration is not made till the loss is known, if made with due diligence after advices of the ship, the underwriter is liable. There may be some difficulty in applying that rule to the class of policies before us. It was rejected in the case of Douville v. The Sun Ins. Co., above referred to.

Upon the whole, after the best consideration we have been able to give to the case, we are satisfied the ruling of the court below was erroneous, and the judgment must be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

THE SUN MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Er.,

v.

JOHN S. WRIGHT, use of MAXWELL, WRIGHT & Co.

(See S. C., 23 How., 412–420.)

Orient Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wright, ante, p. 524, affirmed—waiver by insurance company.

The questions involved are substantially the same as have been examined in the case of the same plaintiff against the Orient Mutual Insurance Company, and the decision in that governs the present one.

Where the plaintiff objected to the premium, and the Company, in answer to this, responds, that it had reserved the right in the policy to fix the premium in case of vessels rating below A 2, and that it could not consent to its determination by a third person; held, that there was no waiver of this right of fixing the premium on the part of the Company.

Argued Mar. 18, 1860. Decided Apr. 23, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

This action was brought in the Superior Court of Baltimore City, by the defendants in error, on a certain policy of insurance.

On petition of the defendant, the cause was removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for $17,365.13, with costs; whereupon the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court. See, also, the preceding case, which is substantially the same as this.

Mr. F. B. Cutting, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. R. J. Brent and H. May, for defendants in error.

See argument in the preceding case.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The suit below was upon a policy of insurance brought to recover a loss upon coffee on board the vessel Mary W. on a voyage from Rio de Janeiro to a port in the United States. The above questions involved are substantially the same as have been examined in the case of the same plaintiff against the Orient Mutual Ins. Co., and the decision in that governs the present one.

It was insisted in this case, on the part of the plaintiff below, that the Company had waived the question as to premium on the declaration or report of The Mary W., as it was bound by the act of the agent in making the indorsement on the policy, who added simply the words, "not to attach if the vessel proved unseaworthy."

The Company were advised, by a letter of their agent, dated August 28, 1856, of the application of the plaintiff to have the coffee in question on The Mary W. entered on his policy; and on the 25th of the month they answered, directing the agent to inform the plaintiff of the facts the Company had previously communicated to R. C. Wright, a brother, in relation to the vessel, and that they regarded her an entirely unfit vessel for a cargo of coffee, and should not consider the policy as attaching to the cargo.

The correspondence with R. C. Wright on the subject was under date of the 14th August, same year, and which related to a different shipment of coffee on the same vessel.

The plaintiff, notwithstanding the objections of the Company, insisted upon his right to have the coffee covered by the policy, and so advised the agent, who communicated the information to the Company. On the 26th of the month, they, still insisting that the vessel was unfit for such a cargo, instructed the agent to inform the plaintiff that if he claimed the property to be covered by the policy, he must consider it subject to the risk of the policy not attaching from the unseaworthiness of the vessel. Upon this, the agent entered the coffee upon the policy, with the words, "not to attach if vessel be proved unseaworthy," and so advised the Company. They, on receiving this advice, immediately informed the agent that the indorsement was a practical nullity, and directed him to inform the plaintiff that they conceded his right to be covered by the policy, and that they had no other remedy but to name a premium commensurate to the risk, and fixed the premium at ten per cent., subject to the conditions of the policy, or two and a half per cent. upon a total loss. In answer to this, the plaintiff objected to the premium, insisting, if The Mary W. rated below A 2, the Company were only entitled to an equitable rate of premium; and if they and he could not agree, it was a proper case for a reference.

The Company, in answer to this, respond, that they had reserved the right in the policy to fix the premium in case of vessels rating below A 2, and that they could not consent to its determination by a third person. The plaintiff again denied the right of the Company to fix the premium, and thus the correspondence terminated.

It is quite apparent that there was no waiver of this right of fixing the premium on the part of the Company, nor was it claimed or suggested in the communications between the parties at the time.

Judgment reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

Mr. Justice Clifford, dissenting:

I dissent from the opinion of the court in this case; and inasmuch as the question presented is one of considerable importance, I think it proper to state the reasons of my dissent.

John S. Wright, the present defendant, sued the plaintiffs in error on a policy of insurance, to recover for a total loss of a cargo of coffee, shipped from Rio de Janeiro to New Orleans on the schooner Mary W. As appears by the bill of lading, the goods were shipped at the port of departure as early as the 12th day of July, 1856, and the vessel sailed for New Orleans on the same day. She had stormy weather after her departure; and on the 29th day of August following she was wrecked upon the rocks, and all her cargo was lost. Notice of the shipment was received by the plaintiff on the 23d day of August, 1856, and on that day he notified the agent of the defendants, residing in Baltimore, of the same, and requested him to enter under his policy the cargo of the vessel, which consisted of coffee, valued at $18 per bag.

By the terms of the policy the plaintiff was insured, "on account of whom it may concern —loss payable to them, lost or not lost—at and from Rio de Janeiro to a port of the United States, on one half of five thousand bags of coffee, each two hundred bags in running marks and numbers, in order of invoice, subject to separate average, upon all kinds of lawful goods and merchandise laden on board of the good vessel or vessels, beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from and immediately following the loading thereof on board the said vessel at the place of shipment as aforesaid, and so shall continue until the said goods and merchandise shall be safely landed at the place of destination, as aforesaid."

Another clause was that "the said goods and merchandise hereby insured are valued at $18 per bag, as interest may appear."

Payment of the consideration by the assured is expressly acknowledged by the terms of the policy, at and after the rate of one and one half per cent.—to return one fourth per cent., if direct to an Atlantic port; to add an additional premium, if by vessels rating lower than A 2, or by foreign vessels, subject to such addition or deduction as shall make the premiums conform to the established rate at the time the return is made to the Company.

Some reference to the correspondence between the parties becomes necessary, in order that the true nature of the controversy may be fully and clearly understood.

Defendant is a Corporation, doing business in the City of New York; but they have an authorized agent in Baltimore, where the defendant resides. Their agent informed them by letter, under date of the 23d of August, 1856, that the plaintiff on that day had requested him to enter this cargo under his policy; and in the same letter stated the amount of the goods and the name of the vessel. To that letter the defendants replied three days afterwards, saying that they considered the vessel entirely unfit for a cargo of coffee, and should not consider their policy as attaching thereto.

That information was communicated to the plaintiff by the agent on the following day; but the plaintiff insisted that the goods were covered by the policy; and on the same day the defendants were informed by their agent that the plaintiff did so insist. They were also furnished by their agent at the same time with a letter from the plaintiff, giving his reasons for insisting that the cargo should be entered under the policy. In that letter he stated that the sole object of open or running policies would be defeated, if the underwriters were at liberty to decline any risk that might arise under them; and repeated, that he considered the defendants bound, by the spirit as well as the letter of their policy, to cover the goods at risk on this vessel.

Each party was thus fully possessed of the views of the other, and of all the circumstances of the case. Neither appears to have entertained a doubt as to the validity of the contract, and the only matter in dispute between them was the fitness of the vessel for such a cargo. But they had further correspondence, which it is important to notice, in order to understand the real nature of the controversy between the parties. Following the order of events, the next letter is the reply of the defendants to their agent, which is dated the 26th day of August, 1856, three days before the loss, and more than forty days after the vessel had departed on her voyage. In that letter they say, after acknowledging the receipt of one to which it the was a reply, that, with regard to the case of the schooner under the policy of the plaintiff, they can only repeat their belief that she is an unfit vessel for such a cargo, which makes her an unseaworthy risk, and request their agent to say to the plaintiffs, that if he deems the property covered by the policy, he must so consider it subject to the risk of the policy not attaching from the unseaworthiness of the vessel.

Pursuant to that letter, the agent of the defendants, two days afterwards, wrote to the plaintiff, that the president of the Company "has requested me to say to you, that he will cover for the schooner Mary W., but you must consider it subject to the risk of the policy not attaching from the unseaworthiness of the vessel," and made the indorsement on the policy as follows, dating it on the preceding day:

"August 27, 1856. Schooner Mary W., Rio de Janeiro to New Orleans, on ¼ cargo, 1,880 bags of coffee, at $18 per bag—not to attach if vessel be proved unseaworthy—$16,470."

When that indorsement was made, in my judgment the contract became complete, leaving the additional premium to be equitably adjusted between the parties, according to established rate of vessels rating under A 2; or in case of dispute, to be settled, like any other controversies, by the judicial tribunals. E. Carver Co. v. Manuf. Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 214.

On the following day the agent informed the defendants that he had made the indorsement. To that letter they replied on the 29th day of the same month, saying, in effect, that the condition inserted in the indorsement was practically a nullity; and as a reason for that conclusion, they add that no risk attaches if the vessel is proven to be unseaworthy; but the difficulty is, so to prove it. After some other remarks, which it is not important to notice, they go on to say, that no other remedy remains except to name a premium commensurate with the risk, which they therein insist it is their right to do. Accordingly, they fix ten per cent., subject to the conditions of the policy, or two and a half per cent. against a total loss, and direct their agent to notify the plaintiff of their action in the premises, that he may determine on which rate he wanted the risk entered. That notice was given to the plaintiff by the agent on the 2d day of September following. He objected to the rates named as exorbitant, but admitted the right of the Company to an equitable rate, and insisted that the cargo was covered by the policy. His views were communicated by the agent to the defendants on the 3d day of September, 1856, and on the following day they struck the risk from their books.

Evidence was introduced by the plaintiff that the premiums specified in the body of running policies are nominal, and that the true premiums to be charged are fixed by increasing or reducing the nominal premium when the risks are reported. Premium notes were given by the plaintiff in this case at the policy rate of one and one half per cent., and were paid by him to the defendants at their maturity long before the loss in this case. Sums paid for premiums on running policies, according to the custom of this Company, are returned if no risks are reported, but with a deduction of a half per cent., which is retained by the Company for their services. According to the testimony of the agent, he had no power to bind the Company from the time of the application for insurance until the answer thereto was received from the Company.

On this state of the case, the presiding justice instructed the jury as follows: "If the jury shall find, from the evidence, that the defendants executed the policy of the 27th of July, 1855, and received from the plaintiff the premium therein mentioned; and that their duly authorized agent in this city made the indorsements on the policy which have been offered in evidence; and shall further find that 1,880 bags of coffee belonging to the plaintiff were shipped on the 12th day of July, 1856, at Rio, on board the schooner Mary W., to be carried to New Orleans; and that when the schooner left Rio she was seaworthy and in good condition; and shall further find that the vessel and cargo were subsequently on the voyage totally lost by one of the perils insured against; and that the schooner was rated lower in New York than A 2, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover for one half the value of the coffee so lost, at $18 per bag, less such additional premium beyond the 1½ per cent., as in the opinion of underwriters may be deemed adequate for the increased risk to a cargo of coffee shipped in a vessel rating below A 2, with interest from thirty days after such time as the jury may find the defendants were furnished by plaintiff with the preliminary proofs of his loss."

Under the instructions of the court, the jury returned their verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendants excepted. That instruction, so far as it is necessary to consider it at the present time, affirms that, by the true construction of the policy, the contract between the parties under the circumstances of this case, as disclosed in the evidence, was complete when the shipment of the goods was reported by the plaintiff, and the indorsement was made upon the policy by the authorized agent of the defendants. In that view of the case I entirely concur. When the report was forwarded by the agent, the only objection made to the risk was, that the vessel was unsuitable, or that she was unseaworthy. That objection was repealed, and finally the plaintiff was told, that if he insisted upon the indorsement, it would only be upon the condition that the policy should not attach if it turned out that the objection of the defendants was well founded. He accepted the condition, and the indorsement was so made. After the indorsement was made, it was too late for the defendants to reconsider the position they had voluntarily assumed. E. Carver Co. v. Manuf. Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 214.

Suppose they had a right, as a condition precedent, to demand the payment of the additional premium before making the indorsement; they did not insist upon the right, but voluntarily waived it. They had already received the policy rate of one and one half per cent., and to the present time have neglected to refund the same. Prepayment of the policy rate was a sufficient consideration to uphold the contract; and certainly it will not be denied that that they might waive the right to claim prepayment of whatever might be due to them for the additional premium contemplated by the policy. But their right to demand the additional premium as a condition precedent to the indorsement cannot be admitted. Such a construction would defeat the policy and, therefore, must be rejected, unless the language of the instrument is imperative to that effect. 1 Phil. Ins., sec. 438, and Kewley v. Ryan, 2 H. Bl., 343. Policy rate is not the actual rate of adjustment between the parties in any case under this instrument, unless, perchance, it happens to be the established rate at the time the return is made to the Company. Crawford v. Hunter, 8 T. R., 16, note.

Addition or deduction from policy rate is to be made in all cases so as to make the sum paid and received conform to the established rate. Something, therefore, remains to be done in respect to every risk, irrespective of the character of the vessel. In case the shipment is by a vessel rating under A 2, or by a foreign vessel, an additional premium may be added; but there is no stipulation in the instrument that it shall be paid in advance of the instrument; and there is nothing in the language of the instrument from which to infer that such was the intention of the parties. That inference was wholly gratuitous, and in my judgment, unfounded. When adjusted, the sum to be paid must conform to the established rate at the time the return was made to the Company.

If the parties cannot agree what the established rate was at that time, like other matters of controversy, it must be settled by the judicial tribunals. Harman v. Kingston, 3 Camp., 150; 1 Arnold, Ins., 175, 177; Smith's Mer. L., 208; U. S. v. Wilkins, 6 Wheat., 144. Unless this be the true construction of the policy, then it is a delusion which ought to be shunned by every business man. Loss often occurs before the notice of the shipment The assured cannot adjust the additional premium until he knows by what vessel the shipment has been made, so that, if it be true that the contract is incomplete until the additional premium is adjusted and paid, then open or running policies for the insurance of goods from distant ports are valueless. They are worse than valueless, as generally understood, because they have the effect to delude and deceive.

For these reasons, I am of the opinion that the judgment of the circuit court ought to be affirmed.

JOHN F. CALLAN AND MICHAEL P. CALLAN, Appts.,

v.

CHAS. W. STATHAM ET AL.

(See S. C., 23 How., 477–481.)

Deed, when fraudulent as to creditors—proof of payment of consideration, necessary to sustain—possession, and other facts—price below true value.

Upon a creditor's bill to set aside a deed, the court below decreed that the deed was fraudulent as against creditors, because the price was considerably below its true value, and because the evidence in respect to the payment of the consideration stated in the deed, was unsatisfactory.

Proof of payment of the consideration was vital to uphold the deed where the evidence was in defendant's possession and the transaction was secret.

The want of such proof is nearly, if not quite, fatal to the validity of the deed as against creditors.

Other facts also tended to justify the decree, to wit: The continuance of the vendor in the possession of the premises, the same after the deed as before; his heavy indebtedness; and suits pending and maturing to judgments against him; all of which were well known to the vendee.

Argued Mar. 28, 1860. Decided Apr. 23, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. S. Cox and H. W. Davis, for appellants:

1. It is maintained for the appellants that the pleadings did not justify the decree of the Circuit Court. The bills deny that the consideration, recited in the deed of Oct. 16, 1854, actually passed. The answers aver that it did, and show that it was paid partly by surrender of a note for $4,000, and partly by a cash payment. These answers are responsive and are not disproved by any evidence and are, therefore, conclusive.

Feigley v. Feigley, 7 Md., 537.

The deed not being voluntary and fraudulent per se, actual fraud must be alleged and proved, not only against the grantor, but also against the grantee.

Stat. 13 Eliz., ch. 5, sec. 6; Story, Eq. Jur., sec. 353.

All the authorities hold that a bona fide purchaser without notice of fraud, is not affected by the grantor's intent to defraud creditors.

See Astor v. Wells, 4 Wheat., 466; Union Bank v. Toomer, 2 Hill, Ch., 27; Storer v. Herrington, 7 Ala., 142; Pope v. Andrews, 1 S. & M. Ch., 297.

2. But supposing the pleadings sufficient, what are the alleged evidences of fraud?

1. The inadequacy of the consideration.

It appears that the consideration was not inadequate; that the complainant's witnesses overestimated the value of the property; that the title was defective; and that this consideration entered into the consideration of value.

2. The next evidence of fraud relied on is John F. Callan's continuance in possession of the property after his conveyance to his brother, and his receipt of rents from it.

Whatever might be the case in regard to the personal estate, possession of real estate is no evidence per se, of fraud.

Positive denials of fraud in the answers, cannot be overcome by mere suspicion.

Glenn v. Grover, 8 Md., 212; 9 Gill, 215; 7 Wend., 259.

3. But it is maintained further by the appellants:

1. That John F. Callan's interest in the property was such as creditors cannot reach. He did not pay anything for it, but had merely a right to acquire title hereafter on condition of paying within a certain time. On such an interest no common law execution could be levied;

VanNess v. Hyatt, 13 Pet., 294; Hopkins v. Stump, 2 Harr. & J., 301; Sawyer v. Morte, 3 Cranch, C. C., 331; Bogart v. Perry, 1 Johns. Ch., 52;

Nor can it be reached in equity.

2. A conveyance of such an interest cannot be considered fraudulent against creditors.

Messrs. A. Austin Smith and Chilton & Davidge, for appellees:

1. The decree is right, and ought to be affirmed.

After reviewing the circumstances of the case, the counsel said:

The indicia of fraud relied on are:

The insolvency of the grantor and pendency of suits against him about ripening into judgment, known to the grantee; the inadequacy of price; continued possession and enjoyment of the property by the grantor after the deed; the failure to show the payment of the alleged consideration; the antedating the deed and withholding the same from the record; the evasive and uncertain character of the answers; the falsity of John F. Callan's answer and its adoption by M. P. Callan, the grantee; the blood relationship of the parties; the inconsistency of the grantee's conduct, if bona fide; the secrecy of the transaction; the sweeping grant in the deed, and the admitted previous intent by the grantor to defraud his creditors, are so numerous and well established as hardly to require authority. The following are relied on in support thereof:

Hudgins v. Kemp, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 45; Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns., 536; Parker v. Holmes, 2 Hill, Ch., 95; Lee v. Hunter, 1 Paige, 519; Miller v. Tollison, 1 Harp. 2. The appellants attempt to explain the inadequacy of price by assailing their own title. This objection to the title, however, is not taken by either appellant in his answer. It is not pretended that it was known to Michael P. Callan, or influenced the price.

If he had regarded the title as bad, it is inconceivable that he should have purchased at all; and even if there were no inadequacy, the other badges of fraud remain.

Under the Statute of 13 Eliz., the conveyance must be, not only for a valuable consideration, but bona fide. Both must concur.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia.

The suit below was a creditor's bill, filed by Statham and others, the appellees, to set aside a deed made by J. F. Callan and wife to M. P. Callan, on the 16th October, 1854, conveying lot No. 8, in square No. 456, with the improvements, in the City of Washington, and to subject it to the payment of the plaintiff's judgments.

Judgments to an amount exceeding $3,000 were recorded against J. F. Callan, 5th May, 1855. The deed was recorded 14th April, 1855.

A second bill was filed against the same parties and others, on the 9th August, 1856, by Austin Sherman, a judgment creditor of J. F. Callan, for the purpose of setting aside the same deed, and subjecting the property to the payment of his judgments recovered 2d April, 1855, and exceeding in amount $9,000.

The two suits were consolidated, as the same proofs were equally applicable in respect to the charge of fraud in the execution of the conveyance sought to be set aside. The court below decreed that the deed was fraudulent as against creditors, and directed the property to be sold, and the proceeds to be brought into court for distribution. The case is here on an appeal from that decree.

At the date of the deed of October, 1854, Callan was heavily in debt—several suits impending over him and maturing to judgments, to which the property in question would have been subject. The conveyance was made to a brother, for the consideration, as stated in the deed, of $4,900. The premises conveyed, according to the estimate of witnesses who were well acquainted with them, were worth at the time, exceeding $15,000, assuming the title to be good, which will be noticed hereafter. The vendor continued to possess and occupy the property after the conveyance the same as before, leasing the buildings and collecting the rents in his own name, and not accounting to the vendee for the same. Indeed, the vendee seems to have taken no part in the management of the property; nor does it appear that he has exercised any act of ownership over it since the purchase, and down to the taking of the proofs in these cases.

In the answer of Callan, the vendor, to the bill of Statham and others, to the charge that the consideration mentioned in the deed was not paid, he simply states that it had been fully paid by his brother, the vendee. The vendee, for his answer, adopts the answer of his co-defendant.

In their answer to the bill of Sherman, they concur in stating that $4,000 of the consideration was paid by the surrender of a note the vendee held against the other party, and $900 in cash, and that the payment was not made in presence of any third person.

No proof was given by the defendants in respect to the payment of the consideration, with a view of sustaining the allegation in the answers. They rely entirely upon the rule of pleading, that the answers are responsible to the bill, and to be taken as true till overthrown by proof on the other side. As they aver the payment was a transaction between themselves, and the principal part a note held by the vendee, which he surrendered, the evidence in respect to which is, therefore, exclusively within their own knowledge, it would have been more satisfactory if they had given some proof in support of the answers, especially when there were other accompanying circumstances, tending to excite distrust and suspicion as to the bona fides of the deed.

As it respects the defect in the title, relied on to reduce the value of the property, it appears that J. F. Callan, in November, 1840, took a lease of this property from one W. Robinson, trustee of Alice Jennings, Alice joining in the lease for the term of her natural life, for the annual rent of $200; and in which lease it is agreed that, upon the death of the said Alice, the lessee shall have the right to purchase the estate for the price of $3,000; upon the payment of which, Robinson binds himself and his heirs to convey the title. Alice died in May, 1851, and Robinson some years earlier.

It is insisted, on the part of the defendants, that the heirs of Robinson, and also of Alice, refuse to carry into execution this contract, and have refused to accept the $3,000. There is some obscurity upon the evidence, as it respects the precise state of this question at the time of the deed from Callan to his brother, in October, 1854. It is claimed, on the part of the judgment creditors, that this money had been paid and that the deed from the heirs was kept back in fraud of their rights. Perhaps the better opinion is, upon the facts, that the money has not been paid and that the property is subject to this incumbrance. It is clear, however, that there is no serious embarrassment in the way of clearing the title on payment of the money.

It appears, by some arrangement, not particularly explained, with the heirs, after the death of Alice, Callan agreed to pay the interest on the $3,000, and which has been paid down to the month of July, 1854; and the case shows that, upon the payment of the purchase money, with the interest, from the period last mentioned, the title can be obtained. It would have been remarkable if this right of purchase had not been preserved, as it appears Callan has put on the property improvements to the amount of from $7,000 to $10,000.

The question as to the title is only important as entering into the estimate of the value of the property, and as tending to rebut the undervaluation of the price, as charged in the bill. It is clear, however, admitting the property to be subject to the payment of $3,000, that the price was considerably below its true value.

But, independently of this consideration, there are other facts in the case that may well justify the decree below—the most important, perhaps, the unsatisfactory evidence on the part of the Callans in respect to the payment of the consideration stated in the deed. This proof was vital, in order to uphold a deed in other respects surrounded with suspicion. The evidence was in their possession; and their admission that the transaction was secret made the proof still more indispensable on their part. The want of it, under the circumstances, is nearly, if not quite, fatal to the validity of the deed as against creditors.

The continuance of the vendor in the possession and occupation and full enjoyment of the premises, the same after the deed as before, and absence of interest in the subject manifested by the vendee, are circumstances not satisfactorily explained; also, the heavy indebtedness of J. F. Callan, and suits pending and maturing to judgment—all well known to the vendee.

We are satisfied the decree of the court below is right, and should be affirmed.

v.

BENJAMIN FORD.

(See S. C., 23 How., 49–65.)

Usage, when admissible to explain instrument—effect of, how limited—cannot add to or vary contract—ambiguity—surety—verbal negotiations, prior to written contract—when contract binds principal, not agent.

There must be ambiguity or uncertainty upon the face of a written instrument, arising out of the terms used by the parties in order to justify extraneous evidence of usage; and, when admissible, it must be limited in its effect to the clearing up of the obscurity.

It is not admissible, in order to add to or engraft upon the contract new stipulations, nor to contradict those which are plain.

Proof of usage is inadmissible where there is no ambiguity or uncertainty in the terms of a contract, and the condition sought to be annexed was not by way of explanation or interpretation, but in addition to the contract.

Where plaintiff agrees to deliver flour, in consideration of which the defendants agree to pay the price, parol evidence, of usage to superadd as a surety a given sum of money, is inadmissible.

Any conversations and verbal understanding between the parties at the time, were merged in the contract, and parol evidence is inadmissible to engraft them upon it.

The court below was right in excluding the evidence of the usage from the jury; 1, because the usage was not proved; and 2, it was incompetent to vary the clear and positive terms of the instrument.

Where the name of the principal is disclosed in the contract, and the place of his residence, as the person making the sale through his agent—this fixes the duty of the performance upon him, and exonerates the agent.

Argued Apr. 19, 1860. Decided Apr. 30, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the court below by the defendant in error, to recover damages resulting from the alleged breach of a certain contract.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $12,161 damages, and $68.50 costs; whereupon the defendants sued out this writ of error.

The facts of the case are very fully stated by the court.

Messrs. William F. Frick, J. P. Benjamin and J. Nelson, for plaintiffs in error:

The plaintiffs in error in this court will insist:

1. All the evidence on the case ought properly to have been submitted to the jury, and was sufficient, if they believed it, to establish the existence of an usage, among a certain class of flour dealers in the City of Baltimore, accustomed to deal in "time contracts," under which either the buyer or seller might demand security, by way of a margin to be put up by both, whenever the faithful performance of such a contract should be considered doubtful by either party.

2. There was evidence in the cause, which ought properly to have been submitted to the jury, tending to show that both the agent of the plaintiff below and the defendants, made all their "time contracts" for flour, with reference and subject to such an usage.

3. The usage, as proved, was a reasonable and lawful usage.

4. The effect of the usage was not to vary and contradict the contract; but to add to it something incidental and not inconsistent with it; and that on this ground proof of the usage was admissible, although the contract was in writing. The agreement for a "time" sale of flour, on certain terms and for a margin, being one and simultaneous, and a part only of the contract having been reduced to writing, parol evidence of the residue was properly admissible.

5. The agent of the plaintiff below had a right to contract in reference to the usage so as to bind his principal.

6. That not only by the rules of legal presumption, but by necessary inference from the facts, the credit in this case was given exclusively to the agent, and the principal had no right of action on the contract; and that even if this were otherwise, the rule of damages, as applied to the case, was erroneous.

1. The proof shows the existence of a distinct class of traders, accustomed to deal in "time" contracts for flour. The custom contended for, is confined to that class of dealers.

The custom is simply that a right is reserved to both parties to call for a "margin."

The usage, as proved, goes further. It definitely fixes the time at which the security may be demanded, its nature and amount, and the right of the demanding parties forthwith to rescind the contract on the refusal or failure of the other to comply with the demand. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff in error came fully up to the standard required.

2. The true and only object of introducing evidence of usage, is to ascertain and give effect to the intentions and understanding of the parties to a contract. The proof must, therefore, be such as to show that the parties knew and adopted the usage as part of their contract, or, as it is commonly expressed, that they contracted in reference to it.

The validity and binding effect of usage does not depend upon the extent to which it is adopted, but upon the fact whether or not the contract is made in reference to it. Unless this were so, there could be no such thing as a valid usage confined to a particular place, or business, or branch of business, or to the business of particular individuals or companies. Yet, all such exist and have been legally recognized, and a fortiori where the usage of the particular company or individual is expressly referred to, and made part of the contract.

Gabay v. Lloyd, 3 Barn. & C., 798; Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. v. Goddard, 14 How., 456; Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 581; Mills v. Bank of U. S., 11 Wheat., 488; Loring v. Gurney, 5 Pick., 16; McDowell v. Ingersoll, 5 S. & R., 101; Knox v. Rives, 14 Ala., 249.

3. It is admitted that the custom must be reasonable and lawful. The theory on which a usage is adopted is, "that it is a part of the contract." Therefore, any and every rule of law which may be controlled by the positive and express stipulations of parties, may be controlled to the same extent by usage. The true scope of the rule is, that no usage can make valid a contract which the law prohibits or incorporate elements in the contract which are, in themselves, unlawful. Tested by these rules, the custom proved in this case is neither unreasonable or unlawful. It is an incident to the contract, without which the contract itself is amenable to the charge of being unfair and immoral. This usage, properly understood, is designed to protect the fair and responsible trader from the insolvent gambler, and to convert what might be in its design a wager merely, into a valid contract in its effect.

4. While it is clear that evidence of usage is not admissible to vary or to contradict, either expressly or by implication, the terms and provisions of a written contract; it is equally so, that in commercial transactions extrinsic evidence of custom and usage is admissible, to annex incidents to written contracts in matters in respect to which they are silent.

Hutton v. Warren, 1 Mees. & W., 475.

Hence, an established custom may add to a contract stipulation not contained in it, on the ground that the parties may be supposed to have had these stipulations in their minds, as a part of their agreement, when they put upon paper or expressed in words the other part of it.

2 Pars. Cont., 49, and cases in note z; Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 581; Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet, 25; Syers v. Jonas, 2 Welsb., H. & G., 111; Queen v. Inhab. of Stoke upon Trent, 5 Ad. & E., N. S., 303.

Where the agreement between the parties is one and entire, and only a part of this is reduced to writing, it would seem that the residue of the contract, though not resting on usage, may be proved by extrinsic evidence; and this even where the residue of the contract, resting in parol, may operate when disclosed, to put the legal rights and responsibilities of the parties in reference to the subject matter of the contract, in a different position from that in which the written part of it places them.

2 Pars. Cont., 65; Jeffery v. Walton, 1 Stark., 267; 2 Eng. C. L., 385; Knapp v. Harden, 6 Car. & P., 745; 25 Eng. C. L., 630; 1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 304; Coates v. Sangston, 5 Md., 131.

5. Bell, being the general agent in Baltimore of the defendants in error, for the sale and purchase of flour for him, had authority to make a "time" subject to the call for a "margin," so as to bind his principal. That the principal in New York, in authorizing his Baltimore agent to sell flour for him generally on "time" contracts in the latter market, was bound by the usages of the "time" flour trade in that market, is clear.

Pollock v. Stables, 12 Q. B., N. S., 765; Sutton v. Tatham, 10 Q. B., 27; Bayliffe v. Butterworth, 1 Welsb., H. & G., 425.

The principal cannot defend himself on the ground that he did not know of the general or special usage.

Story, Ag., secs. 60, 96; Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet., 34.

6. The instruction given by the court below had the effect of withdrawing from the jury all the evidence showing that the credit given in the transaction was to the agent, Bell, exclusively.

The rule laid down by Story as a presumption of law is, that "a foreign factor buying or selling goods, is ordinarily treated, as between himself and the other party, as the sole contracting party; and the real principal cannot sue or be sued on the contract."

Story, Ag., sec. 423; see, also, more especially secs. 268, 290, and 400.

This is the established English doctrine.

Russ. Fact. & Bro., 288; 2 Liv. Ag., 249; Paterson v. Gandasequi, 15 East, 62; Addison v. Gandasequi, 4 Taunt., 574; Thomson v. Davenport, 9 Barn. & C., 78; Smyth v. Anderson, 7 Man., Gr. & S., 21, 62 Eng. C. L.

The rule, as stated by Story in the four sections above quoted, has never been directly questioned in this country, except in one case (Kirkpatrick v. Stainer, 22 Wend., 244), and then by a divided court.

It is reaffirmed by him (and in that case examined) in note 1 to sec. 268, 5th edition of 1857, Story, Ag., and has been adopted in McKenzie v. Nevius, 22 Me., 143; Alcock v. Hopkins, 6 Cush., 490; Merrick's Estate, 5 Watts & S., 14.

It is, however, an open question whether the rule extends to the different States of the Union, as jurisdictions foreign to each other. There are dicta in 22 Wend., above referred to, to the effect that it does not. But the point has never been expressly made and decided in that way.

On the contrary, in Newcastle M. Co. v. Red River R. R., 1 Rob. La., 145, it was directly held that it did apply to the different States as a reasonable presumption; and this would seem to be the true doctrine.

The term used in the books is principals "beyond seas;" and in construing these words in Acts of Limitation, they are held to refer to other States of this Union.

And so bills of exchange are foreign bills when drawn by a party in one state upon one in another State. Story, Bills, secs. 22 and 23; Buckner v. Finley, 2 Pet., 586.

So, both Scotland and Ireland are foreign to England for the purposes of this rule.

This rule, in the absence of any evidence on the question "to whom credit was given," creates a conclusive presumption of exclusive credit to the agent. It is of course liable to be rebutted, but the onus is on the principal. In this case there is nothing to remove the weight of presumption. On the contrary, the proof is all the other way.

The absconding, of itself, was a virtual abandonment of the contract by Bell.

Roper v. Coombes, 6 Barn. & C., 534; Planche v. Colburn, 8 Bing., 14; Keys v. Harwood, 2 Com. B., 905; Dubois v. Delaware Can. Co., 4 Wend., 285.

If it did not give an absolute right to the other party to treat the contract as rescinded, it, together with the insolvency, reasonably entitled him to ask for security for its performance.

In every contract of purchase and sale, so long as it is executory and the rights of third parties do not intervene, the insolvency of either party qualifies his rights, and adds to the ordinary rights and remedies of the other.

See Smith v. Bowles, 2 Esp., 578; 1 Pars. Cont., 2d ed., 447; Story, Sales, sec. 321; Sands v. Taylor, 5 Johns., 395; Girard v. Taggart, 5 Serg. & R., 84; Vargas v. Newhall, 15 Me., 317.

Messrs. George William Brown and F. W. Brune, Jr., for defendant in error:

The defendant in error contends:

First. The evidence is not sufficient to establish a general usage in Baltimore, by which either party to a contract to deliver flour at a future day is entitled to demand a margin or a security of the other.

Second. Such usage, if proved, would not be valid and binding, because,

(a) It is not reasonable and certain. It opens the door to fraud and deception, and offers facilities to parties to escape from contracts which appear likely to occasion loss.

(b) The usage is not generally known in Baltimore.

(c) Usage may explain the meaning of terms terms, but cannot avail to contradict or vary a written contract. To permit it to do so, would be in violation of a settled rule of evidence and of the Statute of Frauds.

Third. If the conversation with reference to the usage is of any avail at all, it can only bind Bell personally, and was intended only to do so.

Fourth. The testimony of Ballard would be inadmissible to show the usage of Bell in reference to his own contracts, in a case like this, where it would vary or contradict a written contract; but it certainly cannot bind the plaintiff, who does not appear to have had any knowledge of notice thereof.

Fifth. Even if the usage be proved, and be good in law, and binding on the plaintiffs, the defendants cannot avail themselves of it, because the margin was expressly claimed on the ground of contract, and not of usage.

Sixth. Because the notice was not addressed by Ballard to the plaintiffs in New York, but was directed to Bell in Baltimore, and sent to his counting-room after he had disappeared.

Seventh. Bell was not the plaintiff's agent for the purpose of receiving any such notice; and even if he were, a notice addressed to an absconding agent and sent to his counting room and so sent, in fact, because the agent was known to have disappeared, is not sufficient to bind the principal. Good faith and fair dealing require that the notice should have been sent to the plaintiff in New York.

Eighth. But the notice did not give the plaintiff reasonable time to comply, even if it had been communicated to him by telegraph, which it was not. It was left at Bell's counting-room before 12 M. on the 21st., and gave notice to deposit $5,000 in the Merchants' Bank of Baltimore on the following day.

Ninth. The defendants did not comply with their own notice—they state that on the 22d, they would deposit $5,000 in the Merchants' Bank, and required Bell to do the same; but they made no such deposit, and therefore, under no circumstances, could the plaintiff be required to do so.

Tenth. The defendants had no right to require the arbitrary sum of $5,000 in cash, on a contract on which, at the time of the demand, they were in fact losers; and therefore no security at all was necessary.

Eleventh. Nor had the defendants the right to select the place of deposit, under penalty of a cancellation of the contract.

Twelfth. Nor had Ballard, the broker who made the contract, any right to give a notice to put up a margin.

Thirteenth. The instructions of the court are correct and cover the whole case. The rule of damages as laid down is sustained both by reason and authority.

Fourteenth. Ford is principal, and has a right to sue.

The following authorities are relied on to establish the proposition that the written contract cannot be varied or contradicted by the proof of usage: that the alleged usage is not properly proved; and if proved, is not valid.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The suit was brought by Ford against the defendants in the court below upon the following contract:

BALTIMORE, November 7, 1855.

For and in consideration of one dollar, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I have this day purchased from J. W. Bell, agent for Benjamin Ford, New York, for account of Oelricks & Lurman, Baltimore, ten thousand barrels superfine Howard Street or Ohio flour, deliverable, at seller's option, in lots of five hundred barrels, each lot subject to three days' notice of delivery, and payable on delivery, at the rate of nine dollars and twenty-five cents per barrel, viz.:

2,000	barrels,	seller's option,	all	December, 1855.
4,000	"	"	"	January, 1856.
4,000	"	"	"	February, 1856.
10,000

L. E. BALLARD, Broker.

Approved:

OELRICKS & LURMAN.

The 2,000 barrels deliverable in December were delivered, accepted, and paid for, as per contract. The 4,000 barrels to be delivered in each of the months of January and February were duly tendered to the defendants and payments demanded, and which were refused.

The only objection to the acceptance of the flour at the time tendered was the refusal of Ford to a demand made upon his agent to deposit $5,000 in one of the banks in Baltimore to secure the punctual delivery of the flour at the time mentioned. This demand for a deposit of money was denied by the plaintiff, on the ground that the contract contained no such stipulation.

After much testimony given by both parties on the trial, on the subject of a usage among the dealers in flour in the City of Baltimore to demand on time contracts a deposit of money (or margin, as it is called), and the right to rescind the contract if refused, the court charged the jury, that if they shall find, from the evidence, the defendants entered into the contract given in evidence, and that the plaintiff offered to deliver the flour therein mentioned according to its terms, and that when the offer was made he had the requisite quantity of flour to comply with the contract, and could have delivered it if the defendants had been willing to receive it, and that they had refused, then the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The court further instructed the jury, that the rule of damages was the difference between the contract price of the flour and the market value in the City of Baltimore on the several days of the tenders, with interest on this sum, in the discretion of the jury. The jury found for the plaintiff.

One of the principal grounds of objection to the ruling of the court is, its refusal to submit the question of usage, which was the subject of evidence on the trial, to the jury.

The witnesses, introduced by the defendants to prove the usage, speak in a very qualified manner as to its existence, as well as to the instances in which they have known it to have been adopted or acquiesced in; and all of them admit they have no knowledge that it was general among the dealers. Some of them state that they recognized and had acted upon a custom in their own business, under which either party to the contract might require a margin to a reasonable amount, to be put up to secure the performance, and that the contract might be rescinded if the party refused; that they could not say such was the general custom; that different persons have different customs; some consider there is such a usage, and some do not. One witness states that he had, at all times in his business, considered it to be a right which might be exercised by either party to a time contract, whenever he apprehended a risk; that if the party was solvent, he supposed there was no right to demand it; another, that in his business he had always considered such contracts to be subject to the right of either party to demand the margin; that the occasion of exercising it was rare, as contracts made by his house were made with responsible persons; that he did not know that this was a general usage in Baltimore. The broker who negotiated the contract for the defendants states that he considered it a clearly understood right of both parties to such contracts to demand a margin to a reasonable amount; that he entertained the belief, from conversations with various merchants on the subject; that he recollected but one instance where, when the demand was made, the margin was put up, which was a margin of twenty-five cents on the barrel in a contract for 500 barrels.

There were ten witnesses, flour merchants for many years in the city, who state that they knew of no such usage.

It will thus be seen, from a careful analysis of the evidence, that the defendants wholly failed to prove any general or established usage or custom of the trade in Baltimore, as claimed in the defense. Every witness called on their behalf fails to prove facts essential to make out the custom in the sense of the law; on the contrary, most of them expressly disprove it. They express opinions upon the subject of a margin as a right to be exercised in their own business, but admit that it is not founded upon any general usage; and none of them speak of its having been claimed or exercised in his own business but in one or two instances. Whether a usage or custom of the kind set up existed in the trade in Baltimore, was a question of fact to be proved by persons who had a knowledge of it from dealing in the article of flour. Opinions of persons, as to what rights they might exercise in their own business in respect to time contracts, fall far short of any legal proof of the fact, especially when they admit that there was no general usage of the kind known to them.

Then, as to the precise limit or character of the custom claimed, the opinions of the witnesses are various and indefinite. The margin, they say, must be reasonable, but the pretended usage contains no rule by which a reasonable margin may be determined. It is said the amount may be referred to merchants. But there is no evidence that this is a part of the custom, or that any such mode of adjusting it ever occurred in the trade. Some of the witnesses state, that the margin must be a sum of money sufficient to make the party safe according to the state of the market. One states that, at the time the demand was made in this case for a margin, flour had fallen, and the price lower than the price in the contract; yet this, in his judgment, did not affect the right to make the demand, as the general opinion among dealers was, that the price would advance; that there were great fluctuations in the price, and that, in such a condition of things, a reasonable margin would depend upon the extent and character of the fluctuations, and upon the speculative ideas of the future value of flour.

The broker of the defendants, who purchased this flour, states his view of the reasonableness of the margin, which is the difference between the intrinsic value of the flour and its speculative value; by intrinsic value, he says he means the cost of the production; and by speculative value, the price at which it was rating above its intrinsic value; and to a question what, in his opinion, would be a reasonable margin under the custom, when flour in the market was lower than the contract price, he answered that he considered the demand reasonable in this case, because he believed flour was going up to $12 per barrel. It would be difficult to describe a custom more indefinite and unsettled.

But, independently of the total insufficiency of the evidence to establish the usage, we are satisfied, if it existed, the proof would have been inadmissible to affect the construction of the contract. This proof is admissible in the absence of express stipulations, or where the meaning of the parties is uncertain upon the language used, and where the usage of the trade to which the contract relates, or with reference to which it was made, may afford explanation, and supply deficiencies in the instrument. Technical, local, or doubtful words may be thus explained. So, where stipulations in the contract refer to matters outside of the instrument, parol proof of extraneous facts may be necessary to interpret their meaning. As a general rule, there must be ambiguity or uncertainty upon the face of the written instrument, arising out of the terms used by the parties, in order to justify the extraneous evidence, and when admissible, it must be limited in its effect to the clearing up of the obscurity. It is not admissible to add to or engraft upon the contract new stipulations, nor to contradict those which are plain. 2 Kent's Com., 556; 3 Ib., 260, and note; 1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 295; 2 Cromp. & J., 249, 250; 14 How., 445.

Applying these principles to the contract before us, it is quite clear that the proof of the usage attempted to be established was inadmissible, and should have been rejected. There is no ambiguity or uncertainty in its terms or stipulations, and the condition sought to be annexed was not by way of explanation or interpretation, but in addition to the contract. The plaintiff agrees to deliver a given number of barrels of flour on certain days, at the price of $9.25 per barrel, in consideration of which the defendants agree to receive the flour, and pay the price. This is the substance of the written contract. But the defendants insist, that besides the obligations arising out of the written instrument, the plaintiff is under an additional obligation to give security, whenever called upon, for the faithful performance; and this, by the deposit in bank of the sum of $5,000. The written instrument bound only the personal responsibility of the plaintiff; the parol evidence seeks to superadd, not a responsible name, as a surety, but, in effect, the same thing, a given sum of money. The parol proof not only adds to the written instrument, but is repugnant to the legal effect of it.

It was also urged on the argument that this contract was entered into between the defendants and the agent of the plaintiff, with the understanding at the time that it should be subject to the usage; but the answer to this is, that no such usage existed; and if it did, the terms of the contract exclude it. Any conversations and verbal understanding between the parties at the time were merged in the contract, and parol evidence inadmissible to engraft them upon it.

We are satisfied the court below was right in excluding the consideration of the evidence of the usage from the jury: 1, because the usage was not proved; and 2, if it had been, it was incompetent to vary the clear and positive terms of the instrument.

An objection has been taken on the argument, which was not presented to the court below, but which, it is insisted, is involved in the exception to the charge; and that is, inasmuch as it appears upon the evidence that the plaintiff was a resident of New York, and the contract made at Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, by an agent, the presumption of law is that the credit was given exclusively to the agent, the principal being the resident of a foreign state; and hence, that the contract, in legal effect, was made with the agent, and not with the principal, and the former should have brought the suit.

This doctrine is laid down by Judge Story in his work on Agency, and which was supposed to be the doctrine of the English courts at the time, and founded upon adjudged cases. Story, Ag., sec. 268, and note; secs. 290, 423. It did not, however, at the time, receive the assent of some of the courts and jurists of this country. 2 Kent's Com., pp. 630, 631, and note; 22 Wend., 224; 3 Hill., 72. And the doctrine has recently been explained, and Judge Story's rule rejected by the English courts. In the case of Green v. Kopke, 36 Eng. L. & Eq., 396, 399, 1856, the court denied that there was any distinction, as it respected the personal liability of the agent, whether the principal was English or a foreigner. The Chief Justice observed: "It is in all cases a question of intention from the contract, explained by the surrounding circumstances, such as the custom or usage of the trade when such exists. No usage," he observes, "was proved in the present case, and I believe none could have been proved." Again, he observed: "It would be ridiculous to suppose that an agent, for a commission of one half per cent., is to guaranty the performance of a contract for the shipment of 1,000 barrels of tar." The case was finally put upon the intent of the parties, as derived from the construction of the contract, and which was, that the defendant contracted only as agent, and not to make himself personally liable. Willes, J., doubted if evidence of custom was admissible to qualify the express words of the contract, so as to make the agent liable.

See, also, 14 Com. B., p. 390; Mahony v. Kekule, 5 El. & B., pp. 125, 130.

In the present case, the broker's note, and which is approved by the defendants, affixing the firm name, is too clear upon the face of it to admit of doubt as to the person with whom the contract was made. The purchase is from "J. W. Bell, agent for Benjamin Ford, of New York," and the case shows that Bell had full authority. The name of the principal is disclosed in the contract, and the place of his residence, as the person making the sale of the flour, through his agent. This fixes the duty of performances upon him, and exonerates the agent.

The judgment of the court below, affirmed.

v.

SAMUEL NORRIS.

(See S. C., 23 How., 358-368.)

Mexican will—probate not necessary to admit as evidence—what execution of, valid—evidence of custom as to when competent and prevailing—instructions to jury—declarations of testator—question for jury.

Mexican will, not inadmissible as testimony, because it had never been admitted to probate, and because the witnesses that were present at its execution had never been examined to establish it as an authentic act.

Is not null, because it does not appear on the face of the will that the witnesses were present during the whole time of the execution of the will, and heard and understood the dispositions it contained.

Such testaments are not required to make full proof of themselves; and the observance of formalities, which do not appear on the face of the will, may be shown by testimony dehors the instrument.

Evidence of a custom in California, as to the manner of making wills, was competent.

And if it became prevailing and notorious, so as that the assent of the public authorities may be presumed, upon principles existing in the jurisprudence of Spain and Mexico, the acts of individuals, in accordance to it, are legitimate.

The instruction to the jury, that the testator and witnesses should alike hear and understand the testament, and that, under these conditions, its publication as the will of the testator should be made, embraced all that was necessary.

Proof of the signatures of the deceased witnesses and of the testator, and of a declaration by him that he had made a will with a similar devise, was competent.

It was a proper question to be submitted to the jury, whether under the circumstances of the case, it was probable the formalities required by the law were complied with.

Argued Apr. 17, 1860. Decided Apr. 30, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Districts of California.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, to recover seven eighths of the rancho "De! Passo," granted on Dec. 20, 1844, by Governor Micheltorena to Eliab Grimes.

The plaintiff claimed as heir at law of said Grimes. Defendant claimed under his devisee by codicil.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant; whereupon the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. C. Cushing, J. P. Benjamin, R. H. Gillet, L. Janin and E. L. Goold, for plaintiff in error:

We assume that it is the Hispano-Mexican law in force in Mexican California.

The rule of public law is general, that the validity of a devise of real estate depends on the lex loci.

2 Kent's Com., p. 518; Faelix, Droit Int. Pr., 8d ed., liv. 2, tit. II., ch. 1; Ennis v. Smith, 14 How., 400; Sto. Confl. L. sec. 474; Perkins' Jarm., Wills, 1.

If the question were affected by the consideration of domicil or citizenship, or of locus rei actae, the result would be the same here: for if a will, it was a will made in Mexican California, by a Mexican Californian, there domiciled, and of land situated in Mexican California.

Hence the legal questions involved are to be judged by the Hispano-Mexican law, subject to no other qualification, if any, than construction of that law by the state courts of American California.

The Hispano-Mexican law, regarding the execution of wills, is found in Pandectas Hispano-Mejicanas, Vol. XI., p. 604, No. 3290, 3291; Novisima Recopilacion, l. 1 and 2, tit. 18, lib. 10; Recopilacion, l. 1 and 2, tit. 5, lib. 5; Leyes de Toro, No. 3, amending the Ordenamiento de Alcala.

All these legislative provisions are to the same effect, so far as pertinent here, and with the commentaries of the received legal expositors, are assumed to be the law of the subject-matter.

Suggestion occurs, however, in a late case, that of Tevis v. Pitcher, hereinafter cited, 10 Cal., 465, that although the construction of the devise is so subject to the Hispano-Mexican, yet the proof of the will is not, but depends on the common law of the United States—that is to say, English law, whether common, equity, ecclesiastical, constituting together the basis of the unwritten municipal law of the common law states.

And on these premises, the court in that case proceeds to infer that to establish it, there is need only to prove the handwriting of the signers.

We do not admit the applicability or the soundness of these legal suggestions.

Messrs. E. M. Stanton, Reverdy Johnson and Edmund Randolph, for defendant in error:

1. The testamentary instrument under which the defendant claims, belongs to the class known as open wills, which took effect as a deed at the death of the testator, previous to the establishment of the present State Government of California, and is not required by the laws of the state to be probated.

2. Under the Mexican law, three witnesses to an open or unsealed will, without an escribano or alcalde, were all that were required; and under the custom existing in California prior to the establishment of the state government, two were sufficient.

Panaud v. Jones, 1 Cal., 504; Castro v. Castro, 6 Cal., 158; Tevis v. Pitcher, 10 Cal., 465.

3. Custom may be proven, and when proven has the effect of law.

Panaud v. Jones; Castro v. Castro, above cited; Von Schmidt v. Huntington, 1 Cal., 55; Tevis v. Pitcher, 10 Cal., 465.

4. A usage or custom once recognized by judicial decision, becomes the law of the land, and no further proof is necessary to establish it, and no evidence is admissible to contradict the fact as laid down by the court.

Cookendorfer v. Preston, 4 How., 326; Edie v. East India Co., 2 Burr., 1221; Posten v. Rassette, 5 Cal., 468; Tevis v. Pitcher, 10 Cal., 465.

5. The rule of evidence is the law of the forum, and such law must prevail in all judicial proceedings.

6. The witnesses being all dead, the will is to be proved by proving the handwriting of all the subscribers to it.

7. The will in this case has three competent attesting witnesses—the number required even by the strict rules of the Mexican law.

Panaud v. Jones, 1 Cal., 504; Tevis v. Pitcher, 10 Cal., 465.

8. By custom, as established by proof in this case, and by judicial decision in the case of Panaud v. Jones, Castro v. Castro, and Tevis v. Pitcher, two witnesses are sufficient, and the will is good.

9. Upon proof of the signatures, the witnesses being all dead, the presumption of law arises, that all the formalities essential to the due execution of the will were complied with.

Price v. Brown, 1 Brad., 291; Jauncey v. Thorn, 2 Barb. Ch., 40; Peebles v. Case, 2 Brad., 129; Tevis v. Pitcher, 10 Cal., 465.

And presumptions are to be liberally indulged in favor of the due execution of wills, when, from lapse of time or other circumstances, it may be difficult to prove the facts directly.

Jauncey v. Thorn, cited above.

10. The admissions of the testator were admissible as rebutting evidence.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff claimed, as the assignee of heirs at law of Eliab Grimes, deceased, the title and possession of an undivided seven eighths of a parcel of land in Sacramento County known as the rancho del Paso, containing ten square leagues, being the land granted to Eliab Grimes by Micheltorena, Governor of California, the 20th December, 1844. The defendant resisted the claim as the assignee of Hiram Grimes, who is a devisee of the land by a codicil to the last will of Eliab Grimes, which is in the Spanish language, and of which the following is a translation:

"SEAL FIRST—EIGHT DOLLARS.

Provisionally empowered by the maritime custom-house of the port of Monterey, in the Department of the Californias, for years eighteen hundred and forty-four and eighteen hundred and forty-five.

PABLO DE LA GUERRA.

MICHELTORENA.

[SEAL.]

I, Eliab Grimes, a Mexican citizen by naturalization, having to add a codicil to my testament heretofore made, and desirous of doing it in conformity with law established in this republic, do make and declare it to be of my will and intention, in presence of the alcalde of this jurisdiction, his secretary, and two witnesses of assistance, as follows:

Codicil 2d. I give and bestow to Hiram Grimes, my nephew, all the right and title which the government concedes to me to the rancho known (or named) as the 'rancho del Paso,' in Upper California, situated on the American River, as is delineated and appears in the plan and title, the original of which exists in the public archives of Monterey, together with all the cattle, horses, and other animals, that are on said rancho, as also all the buildings and laboring and cooking utensils, and all other property of mine which is met with on said rancho, deducting always a certain portion of all the cattle, horses, and other animals, and of their produce, for those who have had the care of said rancho, in payment of their services, according to the agreement made.

And in order that it may be evident, I sign in the manner above expressed this 18th day of April, 1245, at the pueblo of San Francisco de Asis, and at the same time there remains deposited a copy in the archives of the same.

ELIAB GRIMES.

Before me, in the absence of the two alcaldes.

ROBERTO T. RIDLEY, Sindico.

Witnesses:

NATHAN SPEAR.

GUILLERMO HINCKLEY."

The verdict and judgment in the circuit court were in favor of the defendant; and the cause is presented to this court upon exceptions to decisions of the presiding judge in the course of the trial.

The defendant, to sustain the codicil, established, by the admission of the plaintiff, the genuineness of the signatures of the testator and of the witnesses to the codicil, and that they were all dead, the testator having died in 1848. He also adduced the testimony of a number of witnesses to prove the existence of a custom in California as to the mode of making wills prior to any change in the Mexican law by the state government, and that Grimes, shortly before his death, had informed a witness that he had devised his place of del Paso, with the stock on it, to Hiram Grimes, his nephew, and desired of him some aid for his nephew in the settlement of his affairs. No other testimony is reported in the bill of exceptions. It was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the codicil was not competent as evidence, nor sufficient to transfer property.

1. That the codicil had never been admitted to probate in California, and that the proof of the signatures to the codicil was not sufficient to establish its validity.

2. That there is no statement in the paper itself tending to show that the disposition was dictated by the testator in presence of the witnesses, or read over to the witnesses in the presence and hearing of the testator, they being present at one and the same time, without interruption or turning aside to any other act, and having been so dictated, or so read over, was declared by the testator to the witnesses to be his last will and testament.

3. That three witnesses of assistance are necessary to the validity of a will, and that the sindico, not having professed to act as a witness, and being without authority to receive wills in that capacity, the codicil is void for want of the sufficient number of witnesses, and that this deficiency could not be cured by proof of any custom at variance with the written law.

The court did not support these objections, but instructed the jury that a will, executed under the Mexican laws, in presence of only two witnesses, affords no sufficient proof of the execution. But if they should be satisfied, from the proofs in this case, that a uniform and notorious custom existed uninterruptedly for the space of ten years in California, which authorized the execution of wills in the presence of two witnesses only, and which custom was so prevailing and notorious that the tacit assent to it, of the authorities, may be presumed, then the proof of such a custom, and for such a length or time, will operate a repeal of the prior law, and that two witnesses will be sufficient. On the contrary, if a custom of the character described and for the period mentioned was not proved to their satisfaction in such case, if three witnesses have not attested to the codicil, it is a nullity.

The court further instructed the jury, that if, from the evidence and under the instructions given, they should find three witnesses required, and they will inquire whether each and all of the three witnesses to the will is or are competent; that the will being written in the Spanish language, if either of the witnesses did not read or speak that language, and could not understand the disposition of the property made by it, and that the testator was in the same predicament, such witness would be incompetent, and unless the custom was established, the codicil would be null; but if the custom was established, that custom would control the case; and if the signatures of the testator and of a sufficient number of witnesses is established, in the absence of countervailing testimony, the jury may infer a due execution of the will. This selection from some twenty exceptions will sufficiently present the questions that were considered in the circuit court and have been discussed at the bar of this court.

These instructions require an examination of the law of California, previously to its organization as a State, relative to the execution of a testament, and the modification of that law by the revolution made in its legal system after that event. The law of Spain was introduced into Mexico, and forms the basis of its jurisprudence. By the laws of the Council of the Indies, it was provided in all cases, transactions and suits, which are not decided nor provided by the laws contained in that compilation, nor by the regulations, provisions, or ordinances, enacted and unrepealed concerning the Indies, and by those which may be promulgated by royal orders, the laws of the kingdom of Castile shall be observed comformably to the law of Toro, with respect as well to the substance, determination and decision of causes, transactions, suits, as to the form of proceeding. The Partidas (6 part, tit. 1, l. 1, 2) describes two kinds of wills. "The one is that which is called, in Latin, testamentum nuncupativum, which means a declaration openly made before seven witnesses, by which the testator makes known, by words or in writing, who the persons are whom he institutes as his heirs, and the manner in which he disposes of his other property." This form of will is of Roman origin, and can be traced to the modes of testamentary disposition employed in the time of the Republic. Originally the form was wholly nuncupative, but the use of writing was allowable before the testamentum in scriptis was introduced.

The Partidas proceeds to describe the other form of will—"that which is called, in Latin, testamentum in scriptis, which means a declaration made in writing, and in no other way. This will ought to be made before seven witnesses, called at the instance of the testator for that purpose. Each of the witnesses ought to write his name at the end of the will; and if one of them should not know how to write, either of the others may do it for him, at his request. We also say that the testator ought to write his name at the end of the will; and if he should not know how, or could not write, then another may do it for him, at his request."

The witnesses were formerly required to superscribe and seal as well as sign the will. If the testator desired to conceal the contents of his will from witnesses, he could do so, either by writing the will, or procuring it to be written, and inclosing it in an envelope, and by writing his name and causing the witnesses to write their names on the envelope, with the declaration that the paper contained the last will and testament of the testator.

The essence of the testamentum in scriptis consists in the writing, and whether it was published to the witnesses who subscribed and attested it, or was concealed from them, was not a fact of any consequence. But the writing contained in the envelope was subject to no formality. It might be written by the testator, or by the hand of another. His signature to the will itself was not required.

The announcement to the witnesses that it was his will, and their attestation of that declaration, and the sufficiency of the seals, were the only securities against forgery or fraud. Other formalities were added, and a rigid exaction of those that were prescribed, rendered this form of testamentary disposition onerous. On the other hand, the nuncupative or oral will was subject to the objections that the witnesses might die, or fail to remember the declarations of the testator, or misrepresent them. In the process of time, the form of making a will orally became unfrequent. The olographic will and the mystic will served the purpose of those who desired to conceal the disposition of their property; while the written will, prepared by a public officer, and attested by witnesses, was the form commonly used on the continent of Europe.

The last-named form, with a reduced number of witnesses, was permitted in Spain by the law of Toro. This testament might be made before a notary public, but he was not indispensable. If made before a notary public, there should be three witnesses of the vicinage; but if there was not a notary, five witnesses were necessary, unless they could not be had, in which event three witnesses of the place, or seven strangers, would be sufficient. 1 Tapia Febrero, 364.

The authentication of the will by the intervention of judicial authority is also of Roman origin.

Savigny traces the changes in that administration, and explains the manner in which this system penetrated the jurisprudence of Europe: 1 Sav. hist. du droit Ro., 83; and the result, as it affects the question under consideration, is clearly ascertained in the writings of the civilians.

Ricard says: "It results from what has been established, that the depositions of the seven witnesses before the judge, when the nuncupative will has not been drawn up in writing at the time it was made, is in a manner of the essence of the testament, since it could not have effect without those depositions." * * * "But in respect to those that were drawn up in writing," he says, "the opening and reading that were made after the death of the testator contributed nothing to the validity of the testament, and served only to verify the seals of the witnesses, and to render the testament public. We see, however, from laws of the title, in what manner shall testaments be opened (quem ad mob. testam. oper.) in the Code and Digest, that it was the ordinary practice for those who were interested in the execution of the testament to apply to the prætor, who obliged the testamentary witnesses to come before him to admit or deny their signatures and seals, and of which he made a proces verbal; and that this is the practice in the countries where the Roman law prevails."

Ricard des don., 1325–1398.

The Mexican jurists agree that the written testament from its form is not a public and authentic act, and that it is necessary, to the full enjoyment of their rights, that those interested in the will should invest it with that quality. They show that such a person may compel the production of a will from private custody, and that the witnesses may be examined in reference to all the circumstances relative to the execution of the will, and the capacity and death of the testator; and if it shall result from these that the testament is legal, the judge may order it to be protocoled, and it obtains the faith due to an authentic or public act. These writers describe the measures to be taken in case of the death or absence of the witnesses, in order to obtain the same result. 2 Sala Mex., 127, 128; 2 Curia Felip. Mej., 327; 2 Febrero, Mej., ch. 25, section 5.

We do not consider it necessary to inquire whether the elevation of this writing to the grade of an authentic act was a necessary condition to the support of a suit upon it by an heir or legatee in the ordinary tribunals in the Department of California. We think it is clear that the heir was not restrained from entering upon the inheritance, by the fact that this was not done; and that there are circumstances that would have authorized the heir to maintain a suit, even though the testament could not be produced. The right exists independently of that evidence. Merlin, verbo preuve, Gab. des preuves, 368, 450. This testator died in 1848. His devisee seems to have taken possession of the property bequeathed to him. There is no testimony of any action by the tribunals in California previous to the organization of the state government. We know that the political condition of California from the time of the death of the testator until the organization of that government was chaotic, and no inference can be drawn from such an omission. Immediately after the organization of that government, the common law of England was introduced, and the ancient legal system of the department abrogated. No provision was made for the probate of wills that had been executed before the introduction of that system. "The Statute of the State," says the Supreme Court of California, "fails to require wills executed before its passage to be probated;" and "this was not a casus omissus," but "the Legislature actually intended to exclude them from the operation of the statute altogether, leaving their validity to rest upon the laws under which they were made."

Grimes v. Norris, 6 Cal., 621.

And in Castro v. Castro, 6 Cal., 158, they say, that a will is regarded by the courts of England and the United States as a conveyance, and takes effect as a deed, on proof of its execution, unless there be some express statute requiring it to be probated." Conceding, therefore, that, under the Mexican system, the preliminary proof of the will before some public authority was necessary to give it probative force in a court of justice, that condition has been altered by the statutes of California before adverted to.

Our conclusion is, that the codicil was not inadmissible as testimony, because it had never been admitted to probate, and because the witnesses who were present at its execution had never been examined to establish it as an authentic act. The next inquiry will be, whether the codicil is null because it does not appear on the face of the will that the witnesses were present during the whole time of the execution of the will, and heard and understood the dispositions it contained. The laws that prescribe these formalities do not require that express mention shall be made of their observance under the penalty of the nullity of the testament.

In Bonne v. Powers, 3 Mart., N. S., 458, the question arose in Louisiana upon a will made in 1799, before the change of government.

The Supreme Court say: "The Spanish law did not require, as our code does, it should appear on the face of the instrument itself that all all the formalities necessary to give effect to a will previous to the signature of the testator and the witnesses had been complied with." In Sophis v. Duplessis, 2 La. Ann., 724, the Supreme Court say: The principle invoked by the defendants, that a will must exhibit upon its face the evidence that all the formalities required for its signature have been fulfilled, has no application to nuncupative testaments under private signatures. Such testaments are not required to make full proof of themselves, and the observance of formalities which do not appear on the face of the will may be shown by testimony dehors the instrument. Biec, in his supplement to Esriche, reports the case of a mystic will attached for nullity, because the solemnities required for those of that class, in the law of the Partidas, before cited, did not appear to have been followed. The supreme tribunal of justice in Spain sustained the will. Sap. al. dic. v. Testamento. And the same conclusion is maintained by the French jurists upon similar statutes. Merl. Rep. v. Testament.

In order to show that the codicil was valid and translative of property, the defendant introduced evidence of a custom in California as to the manner of making wills, and the jury were instructed that the evidence was competent; and that, if the custom was so prevailing and notorious that the tacit assent to it of the authorities may be presumed, it will operate to repeal the prior law. The civilians state that customs which are opposed to written law are held to be invalid, unless they have been specially confirmed by the supreme power of the State, or have existed immemorially; and it is not material whether they consist in the non-observance of the written law, or in the introduction of principles or practices opposed to such law; that every valid custom presupposes a rule, observed as binding by the persons who are subjected to it by an unbroken series of similar acts; and that it belongs to the sound, legal discretion and conscience of the tribunals to determine by what testimony such a custom can be established.

Lind's Study of Juris., 14, 17, and note.

The Spanish codes recognize these principles. They say, to establish a custom, the whole or greater part of the people ought to concur in it; that ten years must have elapsed amongst persons present, and twenty at least amongst persons absent, in order to its being introduced; that it may be proved by two sentences of judges or judgments given upon or according to it; that, being general and immemorial, it may repeal or alter the anterior law, the approbation of the prince being supposed or presumed.

De Asso & Rodri. Inst., ch. 1; 1 Febrero, 55.

The custom under consideration is one of a general nature, and its existence for the period must be assumed from the verdict of the jury. It is a rule of property pervading in its application, and necessary to be known in order that judicial administration should be carried on. The recognition of such a rule, if it exists, was, therefore, to be looked for from the superior and supreme tribunals of the State of California. In the case of Panaud v. Jones, 1 Cal., 497–505, the Supreme Court say: "The custom with respect to the execution of wills, so far as the testimony goes, appears to have prevailed generally and for a long time in California. It may have been the universal practice from the first settlement of the country." In Castro v. Castro, 6 Cal., 158, this observation is cited, and the court say: "that it is shown from the testimony of various witnesses, that two [witnesses to a will] were sufficient under the customs of California." The same fact is restated in the case of Tevis v. Pitcher, 10 Cal., 465.

Nor is such a change in the mode of transfer of property a singular fact in the history of the American States. Several cases are mentioned in the opinion of the court in Panaud v. Jones, above cited, and a similar instance is mentioned in Fowler v. Shearer, 7 Mass., 14.

Nor is the existence of such a departure from the written law extraordinary, when the circumstances of the early history of the department are understood. The most important of the arrangements for the colonization of the department related to the establishment of the military districts and presidios, and the mission establishments in close proximity to them. The priests and soldiers were the most conspicuous and influential members of the department, and exerted supreme in its political and economical arrangements. The Spanish laws relieved the soldier from the inconvenient formalities that attended the execution of the ordinary nuncupative or closed testament, and authorized himto make a nuncupative will before two witnesses, or an olographic will.

The canon law distinctly reprobates (præscriptam consuetudinem improbamus) the requirement of seven or five witnesses for the testation of a will: "secundum quod leges humanæ decernunt;" * * * "quia vero a divina lege et sanctorum Patrum institutis et a generali ecclesiæ consuetudine id noscitur esse alienum cum scriptum sit, in ore duorum vel trium testium stet omne verbum." Decret. Greg. lib. 3, tit. 26 ch., 10.

The precept and example of these dominant classes in the department may possibly have exercied a controlling influence in forming the habitude of the population on this subject. And if it became prevailing and notorious, so as that the assent of the public authorities may be presumed, upon principles existing in the jurisprudence of Spain and Mexico, the acts of individuals, in accordance to it, are legitimate. This codicil was written in the Spanish language; and it is to be inferred that there was testimony that the testator and one or more of the witnesses understood that language imperfectly.

The instructions of the circuit court required the jury to find that the testator dictated the contents of the codicil to the witnesses, they being assembled at the same time, and that it should be then read in the presence of all, so that it was understood by all, and that the testator should then have declared it to be his last will; and the court informed them that if the testator did not understand the language, and there was not present any one who explained and interpreted the codicil in the presence and hearing and understanding of the witnesses, the document was not a valid instrument; and also, if neither the testator nor a sufficient number of the witnesses understood the language of the codicil, and that it was not valid.

The Roman law did not require the witnesses to a Latin will to understand the Latin language: "nam si vel sensu percipiat quis, cui rei adhibitus sit, sufficere." It is admitted by the civilians that a testator may dictate his will in his own language, and the will may be drawn in another, provided that the witnesses and notary understand both. The object of the law is that the instrument shall express the intentions of the testator, and it does not require the reproduction of his exact words. Whether the witnesses should understand the language of the will, has been the subject of much contest among those writers; and names of authority may be cited in favor of either opinion. But the current of judicial authority seems to have decided it is not necessary that the witnesses to a testament should comprehend the language in which it is written; and the same authority has settled that the witnesses should understand the language of the testator.

Escriche dicc. verb. interprete.

The instruction of the presiding judge to the jury, that the testator and witnesses should alike hear and understond the testament, and that, under these conditions, its publication as the will of the testator should be made, embraced all that it was necessary to be said upon this part of the case.

The last inquiry to be made refers to the weight to be given to the testimony adduced in support of the factum of the codicil. This consists of the proof of the signatures of the deceased witnesses and of the testator, and of some declaration by him that he had made a will with a similar devise. We comprise, among the witnesses to the will, Ridley, the sindico. It does not appear that a sindico was charged with any function in the preparation or execution of testaments by the law or custom of California. Nor is it clear that the sindico in the present instance expected to give any sanction to the instrument by his official character. He attests the execution of the will, and we cannot perceive why the description of himself which he affixes to his signature should detract from the efficacy of that attestation.

The binding force and legal operation of this codicil are to be determined by the law, as it existed when the codicil was made. But the mode in which it should be submitted to the court and jury, and the effect to be given to the testimony that accompanied it, depend upon the law of the forum at the time of the trial. The evidence of the signatures of the testator and witnesses was competent; and it was a proper question to be submitted to the jury, whether, under the circumstances of the case, it was probable the formalities required by the law were complied with. As suppletory proof that the testator had made the codicil, and was acquainted with the contents of the instrument, the admission or declaration offered as evidence was competent testimony.

Upon a review of the whole case, our opinion is, there is no error in the record, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

JUAN M. LUCO AND JOSE LEANDRO LUCO, Appts.,

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

(See S. C., 23 How., 515-543.)

Mexican land claim—should be found in the archives—testimony of officers cannot supply or contradict records.

Mexican title to Rosa, after a careful examination of the testimony, is pronounced false and forged.

As a general rule, no grant of land purporting to have issued from the late Government of California should be received as genuine by the courts of the United States, unless it be found noted in the registers, or the espediente, or some part of it be found on file among the archives, where other and genuine grants of the same year are found.

The testimony of the late officers of that government cannot be received to supply or contradict the public records, or establish a title of which there is no trace to be found in the public archives.

Argued Apr. 12, 1860. Decided Apr. 30, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a full statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. C. Cushing and C. Benham, for appellants:

Are the papers false?

Upon this issue the theory of the defense is, that the claimants have forged two several grants to the land claimed; that the first was a very base counterfeit, which would not serve as a title paper; that consequently they procured another (as to whether a forged one or an antedated one, counsel and court below both seem to be indifferent); that that other is the one upon which we now rely. These propositions they claim to have proved directly by the testimony of two of their witnesses, Horace Hawes and Raphael Guirado, and indirectly by circumstances attendant upon the title, its history, and the mode of conduct of the case.

There is an attempt to dispose of what militates against this theory of defense, by impeachment, cross-examination, analysis and comparison.

On our part, in reply, we contend, in the first place, that the testimony of Hawes and Guirado must be rejected, and that the case stands as if their depositions had never been taken, and that it will be considered upon the other testimony alone.

Leaving Hawes and Guirado out of view, we find that the testimony of other witnesses has been taken to maintain the theory they were expected to establish. In discussing it, I shall follow the order of the court below in its opinion rejecting the claim. That opinion is not in the record; but it has been printed, and as I am informed very kindly furnished to the court by the distinguished gentleman who delivered it—the Honorable Ogden Hoffman. That opinion does full justice to the case of the government.

The opinion makes the following points against the claimants:

1. The claim was not presented in time, and no explanation of the fact was given.

2. The archives afford no evidence of the genuineness of the papers.

(a) The grant is not registered there.

(b) There is no record of approval there.

(c) There was no espediente there; but on the contrary all there is of it, the petition and marginal decree of concession, was produced from the claimant's custody; no explanation was given as to where it had been; who had it; how or under what circumstances we had got it.

(d) The grant is not numbered, and no gap is left for it in the numbers on the espedientes made about the time of its date, or in the numbers of entries of grants in the so called book of Toma de Razon.

3. There was no possession. Rosa himself has so declared.

4. No claim of ownership, recognized and acquiesced in by the public authorities, or even by the neighbors and colindantes.

5. The signatures are forged.

6. The seal on our grant is false.

7. The description of Pico's office, written at the head of the grant, is not the proper one.

8. The principal witnesses for the claimants are impeached.

9. It is strange that other grants made about that time were not approved until the next ordinary session of the Departmental Assembly.

10. The mere fact of so many suspicious circumstances arraying themselves against us, though each may be answered, is overwhelming against us.

These points were discussed seriatim by the counsel. But the discussion being chiefly confined to the evidence, only the following brief abstract of parts of the argument is here given.

The testimony offered to prove a forgery, is that of certain persons introduced as experts.

This testimony is inadmissible.

At the time it was offered, Pio Pico had not been called to disprove his signature. He should have been called by the government in the very beginning.

When the object is to disprove handwriting, the supposed maker is the best evidence and must be called.

1 Phil. Ev., 223-225, p. 43, and note 918; 2 Phil., Ev., 555, and note 423; 3 Phil. Ev., p. 1332, et infra., p. 1337; Gurney v. Langlands, 5 Barn. & Ald., 330.

To say the least, it argues very ill for the conviction on the minds of the government agents of the forgery, that they did not call Pio Pico. McKnight, Orlando, who thinks Pico's signature was made by Covarrubius; that it is stiff and clumsy, while certain specimens are, as he says, natural and without restraint. This person is not accustomed to Spanish documents, and confesses that he does not consider himself an expert in relation to them.

Purdy, J. H., who thinks the same as McKnight, and finds the capital p, and the rubric differently shaped from specimens shown him, confesses also that he does not know the Spanish language; is not accustomed to compare Spanish documents; does not consider himself an expert in relation to them; and does not see well.

It is submitted that this testimony is entitled to less than the usual weight of the best of the kind. It is pronounced by all the books the weakest and most unreliable of testimony.

1 Phil. Ev., 493, note 918, p. 1332.

The opinion of other witnesses is taken, not because of their skill as experts, but of their assumed knowledge of Pico's signature. These persons do not agree in the reasons they give for their opinion.

"If witnesses, concurring in the result, clash in their reason, this will take from the general force of their testimony, however confident they seem.

Constable v. Steibel, 1 Hagg. Eccl., 56.

Their conclusions are drawn from dissimilitude appearing on comparison, and if admissible, which we contend they are not, they are entitled to little consideration as against those drawn from similitude.

Young v. Brown, 1 Hagg. Eccl., 556; Bell v. Norwood, 7 La., 96; Constable v. Steibel, 1 Hagg. Eccl., 56; Murphy v. Hagerman, 1 Wright, 292; Crisp v. Walpole, 2 Hagg., Eccl., 531.

It is thought that all that is said and attempted to be proved against the genuineness of Pico's signature, is mere refining in the presence of the proofs of genuineness offered on the part of claimants.

Pio Pico himself says, upon inspection of a traced copy of the title papers, that the signatures appear to be his, and that he believes he put them there at the time they purport to have been put there. This was testimony in chief, and is palpably from inspection of the papers, not from recollection. When cross-examined, he admits at first that he speaks from inspection. But he finally appeals to his recollection, and confirms the genuineness therefrom.

Many witnesses also prove the genuineness directly.

A forger would have been unlikely to adopt a rare mode of making the most striking letter.

It is absurd to say Pico's signature is a forgery in the presence of his testimony. He would as soon have antedated for us as sworn falsely for us.

Pico should have been impeached. He has not been.

This is all the testimony which tends to establish a forgery, exclusively. The other testimony in the case is equally applicable to antedating, as to forgery.

It is said that the seal on our grant differs from that on our certificate of approval, which latter is admitted, and proved by the government's own witness to be genuine; and that, inasmuch as Covarrubias says he does not remember more than one seal, the impression on our grant is false.

We do not admit that the difference claimed to exist between the impression on the grant and that on the approval proves, by any means, that they were made by different stamps. These stamps were very rude; they were prepared for printing by greasing them and holding them on the blaze of a candle, until the soot and grease made a coloring matter; they were then applied to the paper, not by a machine, which would give a just impression, but by the hand.

The differences visible in the two impressions consist only of minute differences between the spaces of parts of the objects on the impressions, or of differences in the relative angles of two or three letters of the inscription. All these differences are mechanical, only occasioned either by the want of uniform density and proportion in the lamp black and grease with which the impression is made, or in the want of precision or uniformity in the action of the hand in applying the stamp. There seems a greater difference as found occurring accidentally in all such impressions, and they may be produced experimentally at will with any stamp, either employing wax, or still more employing lamp black and grease.

As to any deduction to be drawn from our not producing an impression from the archives similar to the one impugned, we protest against it. If the government desire to predicate an argument upon the fact, if fact it is, that the archives present no impression like the one in our grant, it should have been proved. We do not admit that there is any ground of suspicion in this circumstance. Until it is proved that there is but one die, there is no reason to suspect the genuineness of the seal at all. It has the same legend and device as the others have.

This seal is vindicated by the two other seals; they are admitted to be genuine, and the stamp that made them is proved to have been delivered into the hands of Frémont as early as the change of flags; the presumption is, that it has remained in the custody of the government ever since.

The seal was not necessary upon these papers; it was not required by law. Covarrubias would not have put on a false seal when none is necessary. He is the man who made the grant. He says so, and it is in his handwriting. He knew the law. He was the very man to know exactly what was required; he had been Secretary of State.

It is affirmatively proved to be genuine.

"After proving the seal, it will be presumed to have been properly affixed, and it will lie on the opposite party to show that it was affixed by a stranger."

Lord Brounker and Sir Robert Atkyns, Skin., 2, cited in 3 Phil., 1062, note 717.

If it be supposed we found two blank papers with the genuine seals on them, we ask, why did we not write the grant and approval on them, and the petition and marginal decree on an unsealed one? This theory is forbidden by the fact that this is not the stamped seal, the habilitating seal, but it is the governor's seal, put on acts in his office, to attest their genuineness as his, not to show the paper was lawful. If it be supposed that we had access to the genuine stamp, why not use it on all the papers?

Or, if we forged the stamp, why not make a fac simile? We have as fine artists in San Francisco as there is in the world, and the seal is a very rude one.

Some of the witnesses for the claimants are sought to be impeached, and many witnesses examined for that purpose; but all of those who are attacked are so corroborated, that even if successfully impeached as to character, they must be believed in this instance.

The attack, however, upon their character gives us no concern. We conceive we have repelled it by proof of good character, and we are perfectly contented to submit the matter to the judgment of the court, upon the testimony of our witnesses in support.

After we have repelled the suspicion arising from each circumstance, we are gravely told it still remains that we were surrounded by many suspicious circumstances.

In the first place, it is to be observed that there are not so many circumstances as the theory of the attack upon this title presupposes. On the contrary, they are but few. There are two or three great facts in the case; each of these is attended by minor circumstances which follow it as necessary consequences; and yet these two or three facts are marshaled with consummate generalship, not alone, but in the van of all these followers.

Thus, we have the petition in our own hands —an irregularity, if you please, a suspicious one; but certainly its suspicious character is not heightened by the other facts of which it was the cause, namely: absence of our grant from the so-called book of Toma de Razon from Jones' list, from list of numbers on the entries in that book, and the fact of our espediente not bearing any number on itself. Again; De la Rosa is a garrulous, eccentric, and perhaps unhappy old man, a fact irrelevant in itself, but very significant in view of his declarations, seeming poverty, and dependence, and petty occupations.

Of course we cannot answer these groups of circumstances collectively—they have no relations inter se; we must answer them severally, dealing with isolated circumstances by themselves; it is the bundle of fagots, not susceptible of being broken when united, but quite successfully to be destroyed if taken apart, and broken one by one.

It is absurb to say that the suspicious circumstances are severally explained and yet collectively survive. It is submitted, the claim is valid and must be confirmed.

Messrs. J S. Black, Atty-Gen., and P. Della Torre, for appellees.

[The argument of these counsel was able and elaborate in support of the defense, based on the fraudulent character of the claim. As it was chiefly confined to the discussion of the facts and evidence, it is not deemed of importance to this report.]

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants, Juan Manuel Luco and Jose Leandro Luco, filed their petition with the Board of Commissioners for ascertaining and settling land claims in California, on the 13th of September, 1854. This was after the time limited by the Act of Congress of 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 631). But, on their application, Congress passed a special Act (July 17, 1854, 10 Stat. at L., 784) authorizing the presentation of their claim.

They claim under a grant made to one Jose de la Rosa, dated 4th of December, 1845, and purporting to be signed by Pio Pico, as acting governor, and countersigned by Jose Maria Covarrubias, secretary. This document was deposited in the surveyor-general's office on the 25th of October, 1853, and had attached to it a paper, purporting to be a petition, by Jose de la Rosa to the governor, setting forth that the government was indebted to him in the sum of $4,650 for services as printer, and praying for the sobrante, or lands remaining between certain ranches of Vallejo and others.

The boundaries of the land prayed for are set forth very distinctly, but without any limitation as to the quantity of land contained therein. On the margin of this petition is the usual order for title, purporting to be signed by Pio Pico on 8th of November, 1845.

There is also attached a paper, purporting to be a certficate of approval by the Departmental Assembly, certified by the signatures of Pio Pico and Jose M. Covarrubias, and dated 18th of December, 1845.

This grant is for land within certain boundaries, and unrestricted as to quantity. Its confirmation was vigorously opposed by the counsel for the government. They alleged that the documents produced to support the claim were forgeries, supported by perjuries of persons who had conspired to defraud the government of an immense body of valuable land. Upon this issue the parties went to trial before the commissioners, who found in favor of the United States. The case went by appeal to the district court, where much additional testimony was taken, a thorough investigation made, and these documents were again adjudged to be forgeries.

The appeal to this court compels us, however unpleasant the task may be, to pass upon this issue of fact, in which the character and conduct of others, besides the parties, will necessarily be made the subjects of discussion.

This claim first made its public appearance in 1853, after the lands had been surveyed by the United States Government as vacant. Previous to such survey, the public officers had used every diligence to discover whether any person possessed any title or claim to these lands, but the inhabitants of the district, and the owners of adjoining lands, were all ignorant of any claim, by possession, grant, or otherwise.

The lands within the boundaries of this alleged grant amount to 270,000 acres, or thereabouts.

The person to whom the grant purports to be made was almost a pauper, and though not actually a servant, yet a dependent of General Vallejo, residing in Sonoma, gaining a precarious livelihood by making and mending clothes and tinware, acting as alcalde, printer, gardener, surveyor, music teacher, and attending to a grocery and billiard table for Vallejo; and during all this time, from the date till the public appearance of this title, wholly unaware of his wealth and immense possessions, and always representing himself as a poor man, while he had in his possession a title to 270,000 acres of valuable land.

The archives of the Mexican Government furnish not the slightest trace of any such grant; although all the other grants made in the same year and month, and on the same day, are carefully recorded and registered, and the espedientes found on file.

These facts might well justify the government officers in questioning the authenticity of this grant, whatever the character and standing of the parties might be, who pretend to establish it by their testimony.

The claimants, in order to establish their title, examined Jose M. Covarrubias, who was secretary of the governor, Pio Pico, at the time the grant purports to have been signed. He testifies that "it is in his handwriting, and the attestation is his signature; that he does not remember to have seen Pio Pico sign it; but that his signature appears to be genuine, and he believes he signed it."

We shall have occasion to notice the testimony of this witness more particularly hereafter. At present we only say, that there is no reason to doubt the truth of his statement, so far as he attests his own acts; but that he wrote and signed it on the day it bears date, needs confirmation; for, if it was so written and signed by him on that day, he should be able to give some reason why it does not appear on the register with the other grants made on the same day. It is true, he attempts to do this by alleging that he registered it in some other book not found in the archives, but he cannot give a reason why all other grants were on the book found, and this one alone in some unknown register. If it was so written and signed by him on the 4th of December; 1845, it is incumbent on the claimants to give some account of it—to show why it was kept secret till 1853. If in possession of the grantee, why it was not produced and laid before the commissioners; why the petition and marginal order forming part of the espedients, if there was one, is found in the possession of the grantee; and where and when the certificate of approval was found and kept.

These and many other questions, which demand a solution, the claimants have not endeavored to answer. But they endeavor to prove —1st, that this grant was seen about the time it bears date; and 2d, that Rosa had a ranch on this tract of land, with a stock of cattle and horses, and resided on it, for a time at least, with his wife and family, up to 1849, claiming it as his own.

The chief witnesses to establish these facts, besides numerous others, called to prove the possession, are Jose de la Rosa, Mariano G. Vallejo, and his brother, Salvador Vallejo. More than twenty witnesses have been called to prove that the character for veracity of these persons is so bad that they should not bebelieved on their oaths. As many testify to their good character, and especially to that of Mariano G. Vallejo.

There is proof also of declarations of Rosa that Vallejo was indebted to him or his false swearing for the property he possesses: "That the only right way of swearing was by the priest, with the Catholic cross," and that "he was not afraid of the laws from the way the Americans swore witnesses."

Such testimony of admissions is of very little value, and is, generally, not worthy of regard; and the testimony as to character is so equally balanced, that we do not feel at liberty to reject any portion of it for that reason. There are many more satisfactory tests of the truth of parol testimony than that of character of the witnesses. Where the facts sworn to are capable of contradiction, they may be proved by others not to be true; and when they are not, the internal evidence is often more convincing than any other. A shrewd witness, who is swearing falsely to something which cannot be disproved by direct testimony, will confine his recollection wholly to that single fact, professing a want of recollection of all the facts and circumstances attending it. An inexperienced witness, whose willingness to oblige his friend exceeds his judgment, will endeavor to give verisimilitude to his tale by a recital of imaginary circumstances. A stringent cross examination will generally involve the latter in a web of contradictions, which will be in a measure evaded by the other, with the answer that he "does not recollect." Where many witnesses are produced to the same facts, and they contradict one another in material circumstances, they prove themselves unworthy of credit.

It would be a tedious, and we believe an unnecessary task, to examine severally the testimony of the 120 witnesses examined in this case, and test their respective credibility on the principles we have stated. With the exception of a few remarks on the testimony of the witness already alluded to, we shall, therefore, content ourselves with stating the result of our examination, without an attempt to vindicate its correctness by exhibiting the process by which it has been attained.

Jose de la Rosa was called by the claimants, and examined. Having sold to the claimants without general warranty, he was a competent witness. He was the person who might elucidate and explain the many difficulties and suspicious circumstances connected with this transaction, if they were capable of explanation. But, instead of it, we find his examination in chief exceedingly brief. He is asked to prove the signatures of Pico and Covarrubias from his knowledge of their signatures. He is then asked if he ever had in his possession this grant, and when and where he received it. To which he answers, that "he received it from Don Mariano G. Vallejo, in Sonoma, in the latter part of December, 1845."

He is then asked if he ever had in his possession the certificate of approval, and when and where he received it. To which he answers, that it was delivered to him by Vallejo in the beginning of the year 1846.

With this meager statement of matters, impossible to be contradicted except by Vallejo himself, the claimants conclude their examination in chief. The cross-examination fully confirms the wise caution of the claimant's counsel in not troubling the witness with too many questions.

When asked to explain his circumstances since 1846, he answers, that "he is rich; that his wealth consists in money at present; formerly in horses, cows, oxen, houses and land, and a house in Sonoma. Of mares and horses (he says) I have probably had five hundred, but not all at one time. From 1846 to 1847, I had 500 head of cattle; that in 1846 he had four hundred upon the rancho of Julpines." Now, all this has been proved by numerous witnesses to be utterly false. It would be tedious to notice all the absurdities and contradictions of himself, to be found in this cross-examination, as to the mode in which he has disposed of his wealth

With regard to the existence of this grant, Mariano G. Vallejo testifies that he received it by a courier from the governor, in December, 1845; that he handed it to Rosa, "and he was much pleased." That this was the only paper received by him, and that is all. On cross-examination, he said he had seen the petition before he saw it on the files of the Land Office, but not the approval.

Again; in answer to another question, he denies ever having seen any paper but the grant at the time he received it, or afterwards, till he found the three papers connected together in the Land Office. In this he contradicts not only himself, but Rosa, who says he received the certificate of approval from him.

This testimony, instead of solving the difficulty as to the origin and history of this grant, leaves it in greater obscurity than it was before.

The testimony offered to prove the possession and improvements is so contradictory as to furnish material evidence of its untruth. One witness describes the house built by Rosa as made of poles; another declares that it was an adobe house, and that Rosa resided in it with his family; and as the house was near the Sacramento road, he had frequently seen them in it, and their cattle, horses, &c., on the land, up to the year 1849; another, that the house was more than eight leagues from the road. One says that he lent Rosa horses to convey his family to the rancho; another, that he took them in a boat; while Rosa himself ignores the boat, and swears he had horses of his own, and had no need to borrow, and that his family or himself had never resided anywhere but in the town of Sonoma, forty miles distant from the land—sometimes visiting his rancho for two or three days. Another, after swearing to the fact of residence by Rosa and family on the land, admits, on cross-examination, that he never saw the land.

The testimony for the United States establishes beyond a doubt that the whole of this testimony is a mere fabrication; that Rosa never resided on the land; that he had no cattle or horses, but lived in the town of Sonoma, a dependent of General Vallejo; with difficulty gaining a precarious support from his numerous avocations; always declaring to the tax assessors that he had no real property, except a small lot in Sonoma, and no personalty beyond a cow and a horse.

Thus far the testimony produced by the claimants, instead of dispelling the suspicions attached to this grant, has only increased them—forcing on our minds the conviction that a grant attempted to be supported by perjury must necessarily itself be false.

The first public appearance of this claim, therefore, cannot be dated earlier than the 18th of March, 1853, when Jose de la Rosa makes his conveyance to the claimants, reciting this paper of 4th of December, 1845, for the alleged consideration of $15,000. This deed describes the land by boundaries, and is entirely silent as to quantity.

Now, we need not have recourse to the testimony of Rafael Guirado of the conversation overheard in the house of Vallejo between him and the claimants, and the alleged confessions of Vallejo with regard to this grant. Some doubts have been cast upon the character of this witness for veracity, and the testimony of such declarations and admissions is generally worthy of little reliance. Nevertheless, his story has an air of probability when connected with other evidence in the case, that forbids the conclusion that so great a simpleton as Guirado could ever have invented it.

The United States, in order to support this issue, are not bound to show by whom a scheme of fraud has been concocted, or how, when, and where, it was executed. It will be sufficient if they can show facts inconsistent with the allegation that the deed in contest existed on the day or year of its date. It is possible that the officers of the late government may execute grants since their power has ceased; and when called to prove their authenticity, may forget to mention the fact that their deeds are antedated. We regret to say that the testimony in this case justifies and demands this assertion.

Three facts, tending to prove the authenticity of this grant, are proved by claimants: 1st, that the petition now produced in connection with the grant was signed by Jose de la Rosa; 2d, that the marginal order on the same is in the handwriting of Covarrubias, the secretary, being the only instance in which he has been known to have acted as clerk to make such entry; 3d, the título and certificate of approval are in his handwriting, and signed by him.

Admitting these facts, to be proved, we must inquire whether there is sufficient evidence to convince us that these documents were not executed at the time of their date, but some seven years thereafter.

I. We have already shown that this grant made its first public appearance in 1853, when it suddenly came forth, as is alleged, from the chest or pocket of Jose de la Rosa, and was immediately transferred to the claimants.

II. That the grantee himself, examined as a witness, can give no consistent or probable history of its origin, or why he had always lived in ignorance of it; or, if its existence was known to him, why he kept it a secret, or why a poor and garrulous old man should never mention it to friend or neighbor till about the date of its public appearance; or what possible motive could be found for a millionaire living as a pauper for so many years, and then disposing of his immense estate for a trifle.

III. We have shown, also, that the testimony of the witnesses, called to prove a long possession and claim under this title, is a tissue of falsehoods.

These facts alone would be sufficient to condemn this grant, and show that it had no existence before 1852; but if any doubts should still exist, that which remains to be stated will certainly dispel them.

IV. It is proved that the counsel to whom the claimants first made application for his services to obtain a confirmation of this grant, on examination of the document presented to him as evidence of title, refused to be so employed, because the deed produced was a palpable forgery; that it was not the instrument now produced; that it had the signature of the secretary, Covarrubias, forged so badly that his name was twice misspelt in different ways, while the present is written by Covarrubias himself and is, consequently, free from such blunders.

It has been argued that this testimony should be rejected as incompetent, because counsel has revealed the secrets of his client. To this it is answered, that the relation never existed, the counsel having refused to stand in that relation to the claimants. The right of privilege from examination was neither claimed by the counsel nor by the claimant, and the witness being examined without objection, we are not required to decide how far a counselor who has been requested and refused to be a partaker with persons attempting to defraud the government may plead his privilege, and refuse to answer. Having answered without objection, it cannot affect his credibility that he is willing to expose a fraud under these circumstances. As a witness, his testimony is unimpeached and uncontradicted, and unwillingly confirmed by Covarrubias.

V. When the application was made to Congress, the petition and certificate of approval do not appear to have been found, and were not annexed to the grant till it appeared on file in the Land Office.

VI. There is not attempt to account for the fact that the petition, instead of being annexed to the espendiente, is found in the hands of claimants, and not among the archives, where the espedientes of all the authentic grants made in that year are found. To account for this fact, Covarrubias, in his first affidavit, testified "that it was the practice of the office to return the petition with the grant." But when his deposition was taken, with cross-examination, he is forced to confess the untruth of the first statement, and admits, what is a well known fact, that the petition formed part of the espediente always preserved on file among the archives.

VII. No trace of this grant is to be found among the archives of the government; it is not found on the registry of grants for that year, while authentic grants made in that year and month, and day of the month, are found on the files and registry.

VIII. The seal on this paper differs from that found on authentic grants of the same date, and Covarrubias himself admits that there was but one seal used in the office while he was secretary. This seal, on careful examination by persons qualified to judge, is proved to be a forgery.

IX. The signature of Pio Pico and his rubric, when compared with a large number of his authentic signatures found in the archives, and those made on the same day in which the grant in question is dated, is found to differ in many particulars from that found on this paper. His official signatures are remarkable for their uniformity Many excellent judges have carefully scrutinized and compared these signatures, and declare the signatures in question are forgeries. Two of them express the opinion that the person who wrote the body of the instruments made the signatures also.

We have ourselves been able to compare these signatures by means of photographic copies, and fully concur (from evidence "oculis subjecta fidelibus") that the seal and the signatures of Pico on this instrument are forgeries; and we are the more confirmed in this opinion by the testimony of Pico himself, found on the record. In a brief affidavit made on the 9th of June, 1853, he swears, without hesitation, that "the document bearing date December 4, 1845, was signed by him." But in his deposition taken in this cause on the 27th of February, 1857, while this issue was pending, he appears to testify with very great caution. He seems to have drawn out a certain formula of words on which it is clear that a conviction of perjury could never sustained, whether his testimony was true or false. The answer is in these words, and three times repeated in the very same words:

"I cannot now remember in regard to the original document mentioned in said interrogatory, but the signature, as appears in the traced copy, appears to be my signature, and I believe it was placed there by me at the time the document bears date." His memory appears to be much weaker than his faith, as it might have been supposed that such a sale of territory would have attracted his attention sufficiently to be remembered forever after.

X. This certificate of approval by the Departmental Assembly bears date at a time when the public records and minutes of that body show that it was not in session. It is dated on the 18th of December, 1845, and the resolution of approval appears to have passed on the 11th of the same month.

The records of the proceedings of the Assembly at the close of 1845, and beginning of 1846, are preserved They show that on the 8th of October, 1845—

"The sessions of the Assembly were suspended for the rest of the year, in consequence of permission having been granted to the Señores deputies, who reside out of this capital, to retire to the places of their residence, in view of the injuries they must suffer in consequence of their salaries due them respectively, as functionaries, not being paid."

A publication of the foregoing in all the pueblos of the department was ordered to be made, October 11th, 1845.

The next session of the Assembly, as shown by its journals, was on the 2d March, 1846. The journals state that the governor and certain deputies, who are named, had "assembled for the purpose of reopening the ordinary sessions, which, by a resolution of the body, had been suspended for the balance of last year, whereupon the proceedings of the 8th day of October of the last year were read and approval," &c.

It is evident that no ordinary session of the Assembly was held on the 11th December, the day on which this grant is certified to have been approved.

It is contended, however, that extraordinary sessions were held, of which no record was kept and the testimony of several witnesses has been taken, to establish the fact.

But this attempt to supplement or falsify these records has wholly failed, and more especially as it appears that all the other grants admitted to be genuine, and which are of a date later than the adjournment, were presented and approved after the Assembly reassembled, on the 2d of March, 1846; and the form of words used in the certificate of approval of this one differs from the eleven others, dated between November 22d, 1845, and December 19th, 1845.

In conclusion, we must say, that, after a careful examination of the testimony, we entertain no doubt that the title produced by the claimants is false and forged; and that, as an inference or corollary from the facts now brought to our notice, it may be received as a general rule of decision, that no grant of land purporting to have issued from the late Government of California should be received as genuine by the courts of the United States, unless it be found noted in the registers, or the espendiente.

or some part of it, be found on file among the archives, where other and genuine grants of the same year are found; and that owing to the weakness of memory with regard to the dates of grants signed by them, the testimony of the late officers of that government cannot be received to supply or contradict the public records or establish a title of which there is no trace to be found in the public archives.

Let the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

v.

WILLIAM A. WASHBURN AND JOHN A. KEITH.

(See S. C., 23 How., 309-312.)

Motion to dismiss—when denied—merits.

Where the record suggests many points connected with the real merits, and in respect to proper pleadings in equity, which cannot be considered upon motion to dismiss, the court will refuse the motion, but will allow it to be brought to the notice of the court again, when the case shall be argued upon its merits.

Motion filed Apr. 20, 1860. Decided May 1, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

On motion to dismiss.

Mr. R. W. Thompson, for appellants.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

Albert G. Porter, Esquire, a counselor of this court, and who was concerned as counsel in the court below for certain petitioners, claiming an interest in the matter in controversy adverrely to the appellants, asked to be permitted, as amicus curiæ, to move for the dismissal of this appeal, alleging for cause that it had been irregularly brought to this court, in this particular, that the appeal had been taken only by a part of the complainants, and that such of them as had been omitted were not parties to the appeal.

The record discloses the following facts:

The appellants filed in the circuit court a bill to set aside, as fraudulent, a conveyance of property, and to subject it to the payment of their claims against William A. Washburn and associated with him as a defendant John A. Keith, the grantee of the conveyance. The bill was separately answered by Washburn and Keith, and proceedings were had in the case, until at December Term, in 1858, the issue was made up upon bill, answer, replication and exhibits. At that term of the court, December 21, 1858, a number of persons, claiming also to be creditors of Washburn, filed a petition by their counsel, Hall, McDonald and Porter, praying to be made parties to the bill, as complainants, and to be permitted to share in such distribution as might be made out of the property charged to have been fraudulently conveyed by Washburn to Keith, in the event of the courts decreeing that it had been so done, and that it was liable for the payment of Washburn's creditors. The court directed these petitioners to be made parties to the bill of the appellants, as complainants, and under that order the decree now appealed from was made.

But before the decree was rendered, the cause was referred to a master, to report the sums due to the creditors, as they were then appearing to be so in the original bill and other proceedings of the cause. It was done. Subsequently a decree was rendered, declaring Washburn's conveyance to Keith void and fraudulent. In consequence of it, a large sum was made out of the property and deposited in court for distribution. And the court decreed that it should be ratably distributed between the appellants and those other creditors of Washburn who by its orders had been made parties to the original bill. It is from this decree that the appellants have brought the case to this court. They had insisted, before the court rendered its decree, that being the original complainants, they were entitled to have their claims paid in full, and that the remainder of the fund might then be distributed, in the discretion of the court, pro rata, amongst the other creditors of Washburn. But the court overruled the motion, and ordered the money to be paid ratably to the creditors. It is from this decision and decree that this appeal has been brought, so as to have it decided, whether, in the particular just mentioned, it is not erroneous.

It also appears that the appellants were judgment creditors of Washburn when they filed their bill to set aside his deed to Keith, and that the other creditors, who have been made participants in the fund to be distributed, are not so. And we gather from the proceedings in the cause, that their application to be made parties to the original bill was with the view to defeat the appellants of any legal or equitable priority which they may have acquired for the payment of their claims over the other creditors, either from their being judgment creditors, or from their vigilance in first filing a bill to set aside the conveyance from Washburn to Keith. We do not mean now to decide those points upon this motion, nor any other point connected with the merits of this controversy. All such points will claim the attention of the court upon the argument of the case hereafter. The record also suggests an inquiry, whether those persons who were made parties to the original bill and who have become, by the decree of the court, participants in the fund to be distributed, were necessary parties to the bill, or were allowably so, in their then attitude in respect to their claims against Washburn. And in no other way can the question of right between themselves and these appellants in the fund be reached; for the former, having accomplished their purpose, for which they were made parties, are neither willing to appeal from the decree nor to be considered as parties to this appeal.

The record, indeed, suggests many points connected with the real merits of the controversy, and others in respect to proper pleadings in equity, which cannot be considered and determined upon a motion to dismiss the appeal summarily for any irregularities in the process by which it has been brought to this court. We therefore refuse the motion for the dismission of the appeal; allowing it, however, to be brought to the notice of the court again, when the case shall be argued upon its merits.

This course has often been taken by this court upon a motion to dismiss a case, for irregularities in the appeal or writ of error, similarly circumstanced as this is.

THE UNITED STATES, Appt.
v.
VICENTE P. GOMEZ.

(See S. C., 23 How., 326-341.)

Motion to dismiss—dismissal is not affirmance—effect of—order for dismissal, when vacated.

On motion of the Attorney-General to vacate the order dismissing the cause, and to recall the mandate, it appeared that no appeal had been granted, and that the cause was not before this court when the appellee made his motion to docket and dismiss it. Motion granted.

A motion to docket and dismiss a cause from the failure of the appellant to file the record within the time required by the rule of this court, when granted, is not an affirmance of the judgment of the court below.

It only remits the case to the court below, to have proceedings to carry that judgment into effect, if in the condition of the case there is nothing to prevent it.

That is for the consideration of the judge in the court below, with which this court has nothing to do, unless his denial of such a motion gives to the party concerned a right to the writ of mandamus.

The case being before the court also upon a motion for mandamus, they will not consider it, because this court had no jurisdiction of the case when it was dismissed, and the appellee had no right to make that motion.

In a case in which the court had no jurisdiction, and the judgment in the court below had been obtained by contrivance, the court will vacate the order for the dismission of the case, and recall the mandate.

Argued Feb. 10 and Apr. 13, 1860. Decided May 1, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court. See, also, the opening statement in the abstract of appellee's brief given below.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., for appellants.

Messrs. R. H. Gillet, Reverdy Johnson and D. E. Sickles, for appellee:

This is a California land case, which was docketed and dismissed in the Supreme Court, and a mandate sent down to the District Court for the Southern District of California, where the cause was originally tried and decided in favor of Gomez.

There are now pending in this court four motions:

1. A motion by the Attorney-General to vacate the order of dismissing the cause, and to recall the mandate.

2. A motion by Gomez, for a mandamus to the said district court, to compel it to file the mandate, and to remit the execution of the decree of the district court confirming said land claim.

3. A like motion by Gomez, for a like writ to compel the said district court to dismiss proceedings before it by the United States, to open the decree below, and to grant a new trial.

4. A motion for a mandamus to compel the Surveyor-General of California to survey the land comfirmed to Gomez by the decree of the district court.

These four motions are to be heard at the same time in this court:

First. An appellate court will not allow the clerk who sent up the transcript, to impeach his own record by ex parte affidavits, or otherwise.

Second. The question, whether Sloan & Hartman were the attorneys of Gomez in the district court, not having been denied by the latter, nor questioned by the court at the time, cannot now be inquired into by the opposite party.

Third. There is evidence of notice of prosecuting the appeal in the district court without reference to the paper signed Hartman & Sloan.

The appearance of the United States on the hearing is evidence of the service of notice, and they are estopped from setting up that they were not properly there. At all events it shows a waiver of notice, and stands upon the same ground as appeals and writs of error in the Supreme Court, where appearance has always been held sufficient, rendering a citation unnecessary.

Wood v. Lide, 4 Cranch, 180; Brockett v. Brockett, 2 How., 241; Yeaton v. Lenox, 7 Pet., 220; Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How., 150.

Fourth. The inferior court has no authority to determine whether the appellate tribunal had jurisdiction of the cause before it, but was bound to obey the mandate of the latter.

In Skillern's Exec. v. May's Exec., 6 Cranch, 267, this court said: "It is too late to question the jurisdiction of the circuit court, after the cause has been sent back by the mandate."

In Ex parte Sibbald v. The U. S., 12 Pet., 488, this court said: "The inferior court is bound by the decree as the law of the case, and must carry it into execution, according to the mandate; they can examine it for no other purpose than execution; or give other or further relief; or review it upon any matter decided on appeal, for error apparent; or intermeddle with it further than to settle so much as has been remanded."

"After a mandate, no rehearing will be granted, and on a subsequent appeal, nothing is brought up but the proceeding subsequent to the mandate."

In West v. Brashear, 14 Pet., 51, this court said: "The mandate of the Supreme Court to the circuit court must be its guide in executing its judgment or decree on which it issued."

In Chaires v. The U. S., 3 How., 611, this court said: "The court below can only execute the mandate of this court. It has no authority to disturb the decree, and can only settle what remains to be done."

In the Bradstreet case, 7 Pet., 634, this court granted a mandamus against Judge Conkling, requiring him to cause certain records to be made up in certain cases, and to enter judgment.

The authority to issue a mandamus, was considered in Stafford v. The Union Bank of Louisiana, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 275, 283.

Fifth. The court cannot now go behind its decision and reconsider it after the term at which the cause was docketed and dismissed, the mandate having been issued and served.

Sixth. The court below had no authority to entertain and grant the motion of Gitchell to open the decree, reinstate the cause, and hear further testimony after the term at which the decree was made.

Ex parte Sibbald v. The U. S., 12 Pet., 488; Cameron v. McRoberts, 3 Wheat., 591.

Seventh. If the decree could be reopened and the cause reinstated, it could not be done upon the evidence and grounds stated in the judge's return.

Eighth. The defendants not applying to the court to consider and determine the question whether the cause was properly appealed from the land commission, the judge was not authorized to investigate and determine that matter on his own motion.

Ninth. Whether the cause was properly appealed and properly in the district court, cannot be tried here as an original question, and can only be heard upon appeal.

Tenth. The effect of recalling the mandate, and vacating the rule to dismiss the appeal, and refusing the writs of mandamus asked for, would continue and promote litigation, and withhold from an innocent purchaser his legal rights.

Eleventh. It is the duty of the Surveyor-General of California to survey this land claim.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause was docketed and dismissed in this court upon the motion of the appellee, and a mandate sent to the district court from which the transcript of its record was obtained, for proceedings to be taken by that court to give the complainant the benefit of its confirmation to the land in question.

The Attorney-General now moves for the rescission of the order of dismission, and that the mandate may be recalled.

He does so, alleging that no appeal had been granted to the United States, in the court below, by which the cause could be brought to this court for its revision; because there was then pending in the court below, when the claimant obtained the transcript, a motion for the review of the decree which had been given confirming the claimant's title; secondly, that the court had also under its advisement a motion concerning an appeal.

And the Attorney-General further alleges, that the appeal from the decision of the Board of Land Commissioners rejecting the petition, and also that the appeal from the district court to this court, are fraudulent.

The charges as to the first two rest upon the records which the appellee presented to this court, to have the cause docketed and dismissed.

The Attorney-General relies upon depositions and other papers which are on file in the District Court for Southern California, and which have been transmitted to this court by Judge Ogier, to establish the charge of a fraudulent combination between the then District Attorney of the United States, Pacificus Ord, Esquire, and the claimant of the land in controversy, and his assignees, to allow them to obtain from the district court a reversal of the land commissioners' decree rejecting the claim.

W. C. Sims, the Clerk of the District Court for the Southern District of California, deposes that the document on file, giving notice that the claimant intended to prosecute an appeal from the decree of the Board of Land Commissioners, is in the handwriting of Mr. Ord, with the exception of the figures No. 278 and the signature of E. O. Crosby.

The purpose for which this affidavit was made is, to show the interested connection between Mr. Ord and the claimant of the land, from the beginning of the institution of his suit to establish his right, and its influence upon the official conduct of Mr. Ord afterward, in every proceeding in the cause, after it had been removed from the Northern District of California to the Southern.

Mr. Ord was originally the attorney of Gomez before the Board of Land Commissioners, and filed his petititon there as such on the 9th February, 1853. He was not then district attorney, but he became so on the 1st of July, 1854, before the land commissioners decided the case against his client. After his appointment, and after an order had been obtained, at his instance, to remove the cause from the Northern District of California to the Southern, of which he was the district attorney, and whilst the cause was pending in the latter, he took from Gomez, for the nominal consideration of $1.00, a transfer to himself for one half of the land in controversy. This Mr. Ord admits in his affidavit presented to this court by counsel. The conveyance to him bears date on the 24th of November, 1856. It was acknowledged, on the same day, by Gomez, before a notary public of the County of San Francisco, and was, at the request of Mr. Ord, recorded in the County of Merced on the 26th November, 1857; was also filed for record in the County of Fresno on March 26th, 1858, and again recorded by Mr. Ord, in Monterey County, the 3d May, 1858. A copy of that conveyance is now before us. These dates show that no record of the conveyance to him was made until after the claim had been confirmed by the district judge, upon his representation that, as district attorney, there was no objection to its confirmation; in other words, that he thought the claim a valid claim, and was within the rulings of the court in other claims of the same kind.

We shall cite the notice in its words, for, as it had been in fact the subject of the court's action, and could not have been so without the knowledge of Mr. Ord, and without his agency, it devolves upon him the task to disprove the declarations of Mr. Hartman of the forgery of the name of the law firm of Hartman & Sloan to the paper. We ought to remark, however, that Mr. Sloan, of the firm, is not shown by any paper to have had any personal agency in the matter. The notice is: "Now, on this day, came the parties, the appellant by Hartman & Sloan, and the appellee by P. Ord, United States District Attorney: whereupon, on motion of the attorney of the appellant, it is ordered that the transcript and papers transmitted from the northern district court be filed in this court, and that the petition for a review of the same be entered thereon, and that the claimant have leave to proceed in said cause, the same as if it had been originally filed in this court." On the same day, a petition was filed for a confirmation of the claim.

After the confirmation of it in the manner as will hereafter be stated, Mr. Sloan, upon being told of the motion, and that it was signed by the firm of Sloan & Hartman, but, in fact, as if the style of their firm was Hartman & Sloan, made his affidavit under a commission instituted by Judge Ogier, that neither as a member of the firm of Sloan & Hartman, nor otherwise, was he ever retained or employed in the case; that he never wrote nor authorized to be written any petition or other paper in the case; that he never had seen such a petition; that he had never authorized anyone to use his own name, or that of the firm of Sloan & Hartman, in the case; and that, if the paper was signed as it is represented to be, it had been without any consultation with him, or his consent or approbation.

The notice for a review of the decision of the Board of Land Commissioners by the district court, signed, as has been said, by E. O. Crosby, and wholly in the handwriting of Mr. Ord, was given after his connection as attorney for Gomez had ceased, and after he had become the half owner of the land. Mr. Crosby does not appear afterwards in the suit as the retained attorney of Gomez, nor does it appear in any other proceeding in the record of the case that he ever was so. It does not appear that Mr. Crosby was ever recognized by the land commissioners or by the district court as the attorney of Gomez, from which we infer, as the notice was in the handwriting of Mr. Ord, that Mr. Crosby was his agent for the purpose of obtaining a review of the case in the district court. Afterward, upon its being found out that the land in controversy was in the Southern District of California, and not in the Northern, a petition was filed for its removal to the southern district, which was granted.

At this point began those irregularities which, until explained, must leave an unfavorable impression in respect to Mr. Ord's discharge of his official obligations to the United States.

The motion made for the removal of the cause to the southern district is said to have been signed by E. W. F. Sloan, Esquire, and presented by him in open court; and the order, said to have passed, recognizes that as a fact. On the same day, the firm of Hartman & Sloan is reported in the transcript to have filed a notice of appeal with the clerk of the district court for the southern district. The paper has all of the formality and substance which such a paper should have, but Hartman & Sloan deny the fact of having had any agency in making such a motion; and these separate affidavits would be sufficient to sustain their disclaimer, were it not, so far as Hartman is concerned, that his subsequent conduct in the case shows a connection between himself and Mr. Ord, which throws suspicion upon both; and that is aggravated by Hartman's deposition, by that of other persons, and by the narrative given by Mr. Ord of his conduct in the suit.

Hartman then makes his affidavit, that he had no knowledge who made and caused the petition to be filed, nor by whose authority and direction the same was done. But he states that, whilst attending the June Term of the Southern District Court in 1857, Mr. Ord, then United States District Attorney, asked him if he would do him the favor to present a claim to the court for confirmation, stating it was a case in which there would be no opposition on the part of the government. That, not suspecting there would be anything wrong about a claim to which the government had no objection, he consented to do so; that, on the same day, the court being in session, and he being seated at the bar table, Mr. Ord passed to him the transcript in the case of Gomez v. United States, which he read to the court without any remarks, supposing it to be the case of which Mr. Ord had spoken to him; that after he had finished reading it, Mr. Ord remarked to the court that there was no opposition upon the part of the government to a confirmation; whereupon the court replied, that there being no objection, the claim would be confirmed, as a matter of course. Mr. Hartman continues his narrative of his further connection with the case and with Mr. Ord, six months after, at the December Term of the court, when it was held at Los Angeles. He says that then Mr. Ord remarked to him that it had been omitted, at the time of the confirmation of the claim, to have a decree signed by the judge; that Mr. Ord requested him to draw a decree, and to present it to the judge, to be signed nunc pro tunc. He says that he did so without knowing or suspecting that Mr. Ord had an interest in the land claimed by Gomez. This statement by Hartman of his agency in the confirmation of the claim, and in getting a decree upon it six months afterward at the instance of Mr. Ord, is denied by the latter in his affidavit, excepting as to his declaration to the court that the government had no objection to the confirmation of the decree. The latter he admits in stronger terms than have been given. We shall use the affidavit for other purposes, and will have it printed in connection with this opinion, in justice to Mr. Ord, that the relations between himself and Mr. Hartman may be properly estimated from their respective declarations concerning it, only remarking now that there is proof that Mr. Hartman had subsequently declared himself to have been the attorney of Gomez in the case; that he had been so in all that he had done in the case; and that he had charged and demanded a fee for his services. It is not necessary for us to attempt to reconcile these differences, but it has certainly turned out unfortunately for Mr. Ord, in raising a violent presumption, from the manner in which they acted in the cause, that there was a concert between them to reverse the decision of the commissioners, and to obtain a decree in the district court for the claimant.

Besides the motion of the Attorney-General to vacate the order dismissing the cause, and to recall the mandate, a motion has been filed by the claimant for a mandamus to compel the judge of the district court to file the mandate, and to permit the execution of the decree confirming the claim. Another motion has also been made by the claimant for a mandamus to compel the judge to dismiss the proceedings before it upon the part of the United States, to open the decree, and to obtain a new trial. And there is also a third motion for a manda- mus to compel the Surveyor-General to survey the land confirmed to Gomez.

We shall not go into the consideration of these motions, but will confine ourselves to that of the Attorney-General, using, however, such depositions as have been made under each of them, which correspond with and confirm the record presented to the court by the appellee, when he moved to have the cause docketed and dismissed.

Judge Ogier, in a return made to the first motion for a mandamus, certifies that the cause was tried by him upon the appeal from the land commissioners, and that he gave a judgment confirming the claim under the following circumstances:

Mr. Hartman presented the cause to the court, stating only its title and its number upon the docket, and Mr. Ord appeared for the government, and stated that there was no objection by the United States to its confirmation. As a matter of course, without inquiry or examination, that he directed a judgment of confirmation to be entered, but that no decree was given at that term of the court, nor was a motion made for one, or any motion for an appeal by the United States to the Supreme Court. At a subsequent term of the court, E. J. McKewen, representing Mr. Ord, made a motion for an appeal in this cause and in several others; that, being then in doubt if an appeal could be given after the expiration of the term of the court at which judgment was rendered, he took the subject under an advisement, and that then Mr. McKewen suggested that the same point was under consideration in another case before the Supreme Court, which determined him to reserve his decision until that point was ruled here; then that Mr. Hartman offered a judgment of confirmation, Mr. Ord assenting thereto, on behalf of the United States, and it was ordered.

The case remained in this condition, the right of the United States to an appeal being reserved until the 7th day of December, 1858, when Mr. Gitchell, having succeeded Mr. Ord as district attorney, filed a motion for leave to withdraw Mr. McKewen's motion for leave to appeal, and also filed another motion for a rehearing of the cause, substituting the last for a motion which had been made by Mr. Stanton, then in San Francisco, and also representing the United States as its specially retained attorney. A day was then fixed, with the consent of all the parties, for hearing the pending motion. When the day arrived, Mr. Gitchell made a motion for a continuance, with an affidavit setting forth that the decree which had been given for the confirmation of the claim had been fraudulently obtained from the court, Mr. Ord having become the owner of half the land in controversy by a conveyance from the claimant, and that he had conspired with Gomez, or his assignees, to permit the judgment to be given for Gomez without a contest on the part of the United States. A copy of the conveyance from Gomez was filed with the consent of the claimant.

Mr. Gitchell's motion for a continuance was refused, on the ground that the proper motion under his charges was to ask for leave to file a bill of review. But Judge Ogier, feeling and thinking that he had improvidently given a judgment of confirmation, did continue the hearing of the motions to obtain proofs, if any could be had, concerning the contrivance by which he had been imposed upon. A commission was issued by him for that purpose, and under it Mr. Sloan made the affidavit denying all connection and attorneyship for Gomez, as has already been recited in this opinion. The case then remained in the district court as it was when the motions which were made, without any further action upon that for an appeal.

This narrative has been given from documents, depositions, and declarations of the parties concerned in the case, and also by other persons, apparently disinterested, in respect to the land. They will be found either on the record upon which the cause was docketed and dismissed in this court, or in the book of exhibits sent to this court by Judge Ogier, which were obtained to enable him to act understandingly upon the merits of the case. The case being still before the court, we do not perceive any irregularity in the proceedings. Besides the motion for granting the appeal, the court had jurisdiction of the cause to determine what proceedings the claimant was entitled to, under the circumstances of the case, to get the benefit of the decree, by survey or otherwise.

We will now proceed to show, from the record of the case filed in this court by the claimant, and from the official declarations of the clerk of the district court from whom the record was obtained, that this court had no jurisdiction in the case when it was docketed and dismissed.

Mr. Sims, the clerk of the court, deposes, that in this case a transcript was called for by letter, signed W. W. McGarrahan; that, when that letter was received, no appeal had been allowed to carry the case to the Supreme Court, and that a motion for that purpose was still under the advisement of the court. The deputy-clerk, Mr. Coleman, however, sent to McGarrahan a transcript, which was received by McGarrahan; and that not being satisfactory, it was returned to the clerk, with a letter from McGarrahan, stating in what particulars it was deficient; and among them, that it was deficient in not having a copy of the order for an appeal to the Supreme Court, which McGarrahan suggested would be found on the minutes of the court. To this letter a reply was given by Mr. Stetson, who had succeeded Mr. Coleman as deputy, containing an order for an appeal, as it appears on the transcript before us. It is difficult to determine how such an order found its way into the second transcript of the record, when it was not in the first, and when the clerk deposes that no such order had ever been given. The order for an appeal may have been drawn in anticipation of the action of the court upon the pending motions, and left in the clerk's office unintentionally, and supposed by the deputy-clerk to have been passed by the court, or it may have been drawn by Mr. Ord and left in the office, to keep up the semblance of his having faithfully represented the United States in the case, or it may be that some one of the parties interested in the land had surreptitiously placed it in the transcript to accomplish the purpose of having the case docketed and dismissed in this court. Dates will, in some measure, throw light upon the matter. It was written and dated on the same day that the court took under its advisement the motion relating to the appeal. Such antagonism in the action of the court upon the same subject-matter of such importance as this was, would, indeed, be extraordinary; and the record shows that it does not exist.

It is a delicate and most unwelcome task which we are performing; but it must be done in order that violated justice may be vindicated, and that official purity of conduct in our courts may be preserved and be unsuspected.

The record upon which this case was docketed and dismissed, in connection with the book of exhibits sent to this court by Judge Ogier, establish, in our view, the following facts:

That Mr. Ord became the purchaser of half the land in controversy from Gomez, the claimant, when he was the District Attorney of the United States; that whilst he was district attorney, he prepared in his own hand the paper signed by S. O. Crosby, for the removal of the cause from the Board of Land Commissioners to the district court; that Mr. Ord did not, officially, as district attorney, represent the United States in the case in the district court, in any one particular, but allowed it to be done by others, who were interested in establishing the claim of Gomez, to whom he gave his official confidence, and who are shown by the record not to have been the retained attorney of Gomez; that he permitted a judgment to be taken against the United States without argument, or the production of proof to establish the validity of the claimant's right to the land, by saying to the court, in his official character, that the United States had no objection to the confirmation of the claim. And it is established by the record itself that no appeal has been given to the United States by the court below. Mr. Ord admits that he relies upon the declaration only of the person to whom he confided the order which he drew for an appeal, that it had been granted by the court.

Under such circumstances, we conclude that no appeal had been granted; that the cause was not before us when the appellee made his motion to docket and dismiss it.

A motion to docket and dismiss a cause from the failure of the appellant to file the record within the time required by the rule of this court, when granted, is not an affirmance of the judgment of the court below. It remits the case to the court to have proceedings to carry that judgment into effect, if in the condition of the case there is nothing to prevent it. That is for the consideration of the judge in the court below, with which this court has nothing to do, unless his denial of such a motion gives to the party concerned a right to the writ of mandamus. The case is before us, also, upon such a motion, but we do not consider it upon the ground that this court had no jurisdiction of the case when it was docketed and dismissed, and that the appellee had no right to make that motion, under the rule of this court. All that we shall now do will be to correct an irregularity in the order given by this court in a case in which we believe it had no jurisdiction, and because the circumstances of it disclose that the judgment in the court below had been obtained by contrivance, and with the consent of the district attorney, in violation of his obligations to the United States, from which he necessarily anticipated a benefit, being then owner of half the land in controversy.

In vacating the order for the dismission of the case, and recalling the mandate, we do no more than to correct a proceeding improvidently allowed by the court, under a misrepresentation to it of the actual condition of the cause in the court below. Orders of the same kind for misrepresentation have often been made and allowed. We cite two cases from the English reports. In Stewart v. Agnew, in Shaw's Reports, it was held to be incompetent to repeal a case formerly argued, and on which judgment had been pronounced by the House of Lords, but that the judgment might be amended on a point in which no decision had been given by the court of session, and on which no argument had been had, through misrepresentation stated in the House of Lords by the party against whom the judgment was pronounced. 1 Shaw, App. Cas., 413.

In Ex parte White v. Courtenay, 4 H. of L. Cas., 313, it was ruled upon petition that a judgment of the house given on appeal cannot be reversed; but when such appeal and judgment have been obtained by suppression and misrepresentation, the house will afterwards discharge the order granting leave to appeal, and the order constituting the judgment thereon.

Much was said in the argument of this motion concerning declarations and a correspondence of the Attorney-General in relation to an appeal having been taken in the court below for the United States. It matters not what they were, or how the attorney treated the matter, if he was deceived as to the actual fact of an appeal having been allowed. If it turns out to be that it had not been, any admission to the contrary cannot affect the United States.

Since the case was argued, the counsel for the claimant, with the consent of the Attorney-General, has placed before us an affidavit made by Mr. Ord, in explanation of his conduct in the trial of the cause in the district court, embracing his connection with Gomez, and his purchase from him of half of the land in controversy. We believe it to be proper to give him the benefit of his own narrative and, therefore, shall direct his affidavit to be printed in the forthcoming volume of the reports of this term of the court, with this opinion. (See Appendix to this volume.)

We direct that the order for docketing and dismissing this cause shall be vacated, and that the mandate which followed it shall be recalled.

The motion of the Attorney-General for such purpose is granted.

THE STATE OF ALABAMA, Compt., v. THE STATE OF GEORGIA.

(See S. C., 23 How., 505-515.)

Cession to the United States by Georgia—extent of—line of, on Chattahoochee River—navigation of river.

By the contract of cession between the United States and Georgia, Georgia ceded to the United States all of her lands west of a line beginning on the western bank of the Chattahoochee River where the same crosses the boundary line between the United States and Spain, running up the said Chattahoochee River and along the western bank thereof.

This language implies that there is ownership of soil and jurisdiction in Georgia in the bed of the River Chattachoochee, and that the bed of the river is that portion of its soil which is alternately covered and left bare, as there may be an increase or diminution in the supply of water, and which is adequate to contain it at its average and mean stage during the entire year, without reference to the extraordinary freshets of the winter or spring, or the extreme droughts of the summer or autumn.

The western line of the cession on the Chattahoochee River must be traced on the water line of the acclivity of the western bank, and along that bank where that is defined; and in such places on the river where the western bank is not defined, it must be continued up the river on the line of its bed, as that is made by the average and mean stage of the water as expressed in the conclusion of the preceding paragraph.

By the contract of cession, the navigation of the river is free to both parties.

Argued Dec. 14, 1859. Decided May 1, 1860.

THE bill in this case was filed in this court, under its original jurisdiction, by the State of Alabama against the State of Georgia, for the purpose of ascertaining the boundary line between said States.

The facts involved in the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. E. S. Dargan, P. Phillipps and —— Belser, for complainant:

The object of the bill is to ascertain and fix the precise line that separates Alabama from the State of Georgia.

The decision in the case of Howard v. Ingersoll, 13 How., 381, does not fix the line with such degree of certainty as to enable either State, to say, without controversy, here is the limit of my jurisdiction. For this purpose this bill is filed.

The legal question depends upon the construction of the compact or deed of cession by which Georgia ceded to the United States her right and jurisdiction to the territory that now forms the State of Alabama, north of the 31st degree north latitude. The particular words are, "beginning on the western bank of the Chattahoochee River, where the same crosses the line between the United States and Spain, running thence up said River Chattahoochee and along the western bank thereof," &c.

To fix the precise point let us commence at the beginning.

On the western bank of the Chattahoochee River, where the same crosses the line between the United States and Spain, running thence up said River Chattahoochee and along the western bank thereof, &c.

This point must be on the bank and where the river crosses said line. To fix the point, therefore, we must find the line that separated the United States from Spain at the time the deed was executed. This line was the 31st degree of north latitude, and the beginning point was where the river crosses this line. Therefore, we must go to the river on this line and drive our beginning stake. This stake must be at the river, but on the bank. Is it to be driven at high or low water mark? That question will solve the case. For if at low water mark there is nothing which will justify diverging from low to high water in our ascent up the river, and e converso, if we are to begin at high water mark, taking the deed for our guide, we cannot fix this stake at any point other than at the usual or common low water mark; for it would be unreasonable to suppose that the parties to the deed of cession contemplated either very high or very low water. They meant the river in its usual or ordinary state or condition, and along the line of the river but on the bank in the then condition of the river, they intended the land should run.

If we are to look to the word "bank," we find that this term, properly understood, will fix the line at the same point. This means the rising ground above low water mark, or ordinary low water mark, and which is usually covered by high water or freshets. True it is that at some places the bank may be almost perpendicular, and rise many feet above the highest flow of the water; but such places are most usually and aptly called bluffs.

Such being the meaning of the term, all must see at once that it is an indefinite guide, when we seek by it to fix on a precise point of locality; for the term "bank of a river" may cover more or less space; at some places it may be but a few feet, at others it may cover a space from fifty to a hundred yards.

Vattel, pp. 263, 264.

"If the terms used by the contracting parties be vague or indefinite, or if they are susceptible of a more or less extended signification, we should look to the nature of the things to which these terms relate, and presume the intention of the parties to be in accordance with reason and equity."

I assert that locating the line at high water mark would be detrimental to Alabama and without benefit to Georgia, because on the banks of the Chattahoochee have sprung up towns and villages, and the space between high and low water mark is used for landings, &c. If Alabama has no jurisdiction over this space, she cannot punish for crimes or offenses there committed, and it must be done by Georgia. This would be alike inconvenient to Georgia and prejudicial to Alabama; hence the convenience of the parties, as well as reason and equity, designate the line of low or ordinary water as the line intended by the parties.

Handly v. Anthony, 5 Wheat., 374.

The case of Howard v. Ingersoll, 13 How., 381, I do not conceive to be an authority upon the question presented in this case. The court were unanimous in reversing that case, but the opinion settles nothing as regards this.

[The following propositions and authorities were also given by the counsel for the complainants:]

By the common law rule, the riparian owners of land have the center of the river as their boundary, where the river is not navigable. Rivers not navigable are those not affected by the ebb and flow of the tide.

Hendrick v. Cook, 4 Ga., 242; Bullock v. Wilson, 2 Port., 486; Ex parte Jennings, 6 Cow., 528.

To limit this general right of ownership, there must be a clear and distinct reservation. If this is left in doubt, the general right will prevail.

Deerfield v. Arms, 17 Pick., 42; Morgan v. Reading, 3 Sm. & M., 405; Middleton v. Pritchard, 3 Scam., 521; Vatt. Law Nat., 121.

The "shores" and "banks" have the same significance. The former applies to that portion of a river where the tide ebbs and flows; the latter, to the portion of the land between high and low water mark, where the tide does not ebb and flow.

Starr v. Child, 20 Wend., 152; 4 Hill, 376; Arnold v. Mundy, 1 Halst., 1.

To exclude the general right of the riparian, it is not sufficient to describe a line "running down the stream by certain courses and distances," if they are not marked on the ground, nor by the designation of marked lines or monuments, standing on the "margin of the stream."

Cockrell v. McQuinn, 4 Mon., 64; Bruce v. Taylor, 2 J. J. Marsh, 161; Cold Springs v. Tolland, 9 Cush., 495; Coovert v. O'Conner, 8 Watts, 470.

The mere description of a boundary as on, or to, or by a "bank," will not exclude a stream, any more than the boundary on the margin of a stream.

Ang. Wat., 22; Ex Parte Jennings, 6 Cow., 536; Lamb v. Rickets, 11 Ohio, 314.

Having regard to the parties to the grant, and the use to which the granted premises were to be applied, the construction must be the same as if the lands were described as lying to the west of the river.

Handly v Anthony, 5 Wheat., 374; Garner's case, 3 Grat., 655.

Act of Congress, 7th April, 1798.

Messrs. Charles J. McDonald, C. C. Gibson and L. Stevens, for the defendant.

After stating the case substantially as the complainants' counsel stated it, the counsel said: Georgia contends that there is no room for interpretation, and that the language taken in its usual, common sense, is intelligible and well understood, and cannot be made plainer by any interpretation.

It is respectfully contended that these articles are to be acted upon by this court and considered in the same light as independent sovereignties ought rightfully to act upon and regard them, in deciding for themselves under the law of nations. It is a great and leading maxim of the law of nations, that it is not permitted to interpret what has no need of interpretation.

Vattel, II., ch. 17, sec. 263.

Counsel referred to the dictionaries of Walker and Webster as to the meaning of the word "bank." The language used imports that the line through the entire distance over which the controversy extends, is on the bank of the river, on its surface, and that the bank supports it; and that because, for a part of this distance, the bank is inundated at times, while for the balance, the water never reaches its summit, does not vary the case. The bank is there, and the line is on it, unmoved by floods or ebbs. Every bank must have a lower margin, a side and a summit, and it follows that an object placed on the bank can be neither on its lower margin nor on its side, but on its summit. The bank of a river is that outer bed line so marked by the running of the water of the river that "it requires no scientific exploration to find or mark it out. The eye traces it in going up or down the river in any stage of the water."

Howard v. Ingersoll, 13 How., 381.

This outer bed line most usually distinguishes itself by an acclivity rising above and from the well marked bed of a river, readily discerned by the eye from the appearance and condition of the soil, and in the meaning of the terms of this cession, most clearly, a line "on" and "along," this bank, is upon the most elevated part or place of that acclivity.

But it is contended that the word "bank" has another meaning, which would place it on the margin of the stream when from the drought it had receded to its lowest point; or that the bank of the river is made the boundary by the articles of agreement, and not a line of the bank. As such a pretension is made, we must seek for what was probably the intention of those who drew up the agreement.

Vattel, II. ch. 17, sec. 270.

It is to be presumed that superfluous words are never used in such treaties; but if the construction contended for by Alabama be correct, the following words are without meaning: "of a line beginning on the western bank of," and "along the western bank thereof;" for, by simple ceding all the jurisdiction and soil west of Chattahoochee River, the territory west of the river would have been ceded, and no part of the river. It could never have been the intention of the parties, therefore, that the line should run along on the low water mark of the river.

Counsel then referred to the Constitution of Georgia, 1798; the Act of the Legislature of Georgia, February, 1799, empowering certain commissioners to sell to the United States all or any part of the territory, &c., &c., and the Act of the succeeding session of the Legislature, appointing an additional commissioner, as sustaining his view that the State of Georgia never intended to relinquish any part of its right to the jurisdiction of the Chattahoochee River.

The Government of the United States in this transaction was not obtaining a cession from a stranger. That government held nothing in antagonistic interest with Georgia, could not covet aught of Georgia she did not will to pass, nothing that did not comport both with her interest and dignity to cede. It could not have entered into the purposes of the United States to accept such a grant as this, that should ever receive "an extensive interpretation." Clearly the United States did not purpose to become either the sole or joint owner, with Georgia, of any part of the Chattahoochee River, and we claim as a just conclusion in the consideration of this cause, upon well established principles, that it was the duty of the United States to have explained herself clearly and fully, and to have inserted in the cession such terms as would have fully notified Georgia that it was the purpose of the United States Government to acquire "jurisdiction and soil," in that part of the bed of the Chattahoochee River that lies west of the low water mark of the river.

Vattel, II. ch., 17, sec. 245.

It is a sufficient reply to the claims set up in this bill, in behalf of the citizens of Alabama living upon and owning the lands adjoining the Chattahoochee River, that if citizens live upon the soil of Georgia, their allegiance is to Georgia, and she holds herself amply able and always ready to protect them in all that might be prejudicial to them.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves a question of boundary between the States of Alabama and Georgia.

Alabama claims that its boundary commences on the west side of the Chattahoochee River at a point where it enters the State of Florida; from thence up the river along the low water mark, on the western side thereof, to the point on Miller's Bend, next above the place where Uchee Creek empties into such river; thence in a line to Nickajack, on Tennessee River.

Georgia denies that the line intended by the cession of her western territory to the United States runs along the usual low water mark of the perennial stream of the Chattahoochee River, but that the State of Georgia's boundary line is a line up the river, on and along its western bank, and that the ownership and jurisdiction of Georgia in the soil of the river extends over to the water line of the fast western bank, which, with the eastern bank of the river, makes the bed of the river.

The difference between the two states must be decided by the construction which this court shall give to the following words of the contract of cession: "West of a line beginning on the western bank of the Chattahoochee River, where the same crosses the boundary between the United States and Spain, running up the said river and along the western bank thereof."

In making such construction, it is necessary to keep in mind that there was by the contract of cession a mutual relinquishment of claims by the contracting parties, the United States ceding to Georgia all its right, title, &c., to the territory lying east of that line, and Georgia ceding to the United States all its right and title to the territory west of it.

We believe that the boundary can be satisfactorily determined and run in this suit, from the pleadings of the parties, notwithstanding their difference as to the locality and direction of it on the Chattahoochee River.

Georgia is interrogated in certain particulars in the bill, which the complainant thinks will produce answers illustrative of the right of Alabama to the boundary which is claimed. Georgia answers them separately, having previously given a correct and literal copy of the contract. It is as follows: "The State of Georgia cedes to the United States all the right, title and claim, which the said State has to the jurisdiction and soil of the lands situated within the boundaries of the United States south of the State of Tennessee, and west of a line beginning on the western bank of the Chattahoochee River, where the same crosses the boundary line between the United States and Spain; running thence up the said River Chattahoochee, and along the western bank thereof, to the great bend thereof, next above the place where a certain creek or river called Uchee (being the first considerable stream on the western side above the Cussetas and Coweta towns) empties into the said Chattahoochee River; thence in a direct line to Nickajack, on the Tennessee River; thence crossing the said last mentioned river; and thence running up the said Tennessee River and along the western bank thereof, to the southern boundary line of Tennessee."

In answer to the first question, Georgia admits what is alleged in the bill in relation to the definition of the boundaries of the Territory of Alabama by an Act of Congress, passed in 1817, and the subsequent grant of admission of the State of Alabama into the Union with the same boundaries in the year 1819; and the conclusion from it is, simply, that the eastern boundary line of Alabama is the western boundary line of Georgia, but that, so far as that line runs along the western bank of the Chattahoochee River, Georgia denies that it runs along the usual or low water mark; but, on the contrary, Georgia contends that it runs along the western bank at high water mark, using high water mark in the sense of the highest water line of the river's bed; or, in other words, the highest water line of that bed, where the passage of water is sufficiently frequent to be marked by a difference in soil and vegetable growth.

Georgia also answers affirmatively the other interrogatory in the bill with the same qualification, that what she claims is a right to exercise jurisdiction over all lands up to the water line of the western bank of the river's bed.

Georgia also says, that while she regards the description of the banks of the river given in the bill as highly drawn, she admits it to be more applicable to the southern part of the bank than to that part of it sixty or seventy miles above the thirty-first degree of north latitude. It is admitted that in some places the banks are flat, but that in other places, especially in the upper portion of the river, the banks are generally steep and well defined, so much as to be familiarly known as the "Bluffs of the Chattahoochee;" and that the banks of the river in a number of places along the dividing line between the two States are low and flat, and that in freshets the water spreads as far as half a mile beyond the line to the west, and in a few places further than the western line of the river's bed, over low lands, which Georgia does not claim to be under its jurisdiction.

These declarations and admissions upon the part of Georgia simplify the controversy, and narrow it to the claim of the respective parties, as heretofore set forth.

The contract of cession must be interpreted by the words of it, according to their received meaning and use in the language in which it is written, as that can be collected from judicial opinions concerning the rights of private persons upon rivers, and the writings of publicists in reference to the settlement of controversies between nations and states as to their ownership and jurisdiction on the soil of rivers within their banks and beds. Such authorities are to be found in cases in our own country, and in those of every nation in Europe.

Woolrych defines a river to be a body of flowing water of no specific dimensions—larger than a brook or rivulet, less than a sea—a running stream, pent on each side by walls or banks.

Grotius, ch. 2, 18, says a river that separates two jurisdictions is not to be considered barely as water, but as water confined in such and such banks, and running in such and such channel. Hence, there is water having a bank and a bed, over which the water flows, called its channel, meaning, by the word "channel," the place where the river flows, including the whole breadth of the river.

Bouvier says banks of rivers contain the river in its natural channel, where there is the greatest flow of water.

Vattel says that the bed belongs to the owner of the river. It is the running water of a river that makes its bed; for it is that, and that only, which leaves its indelible mark to be readily traced by the eye; and wherever that mark is left, there is the river's bed. It may not be there to-day, but it was there yesterday; and when the occasion comes, it must and will—unobstructed—again fill its own natural bed. Again, he says, the owner of a river is entitled to its whole bed, for the bed is a part of the river.

Mr. Justice Story, in Thomas v. Hatch, 3 Sumn., 178, defines shores or flats to be the space between the margin of the water at a low stage, and the banks to be what contains it in its greatest flow; Lord Hale defines the term "shore" to be synonymous with flat, and substitutes the latter for that expression. Mr. Justice Parker does the same, in Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass., 436, 439.

Chief Justice Marshall says the shore of a river borders on the water's edge; and the rule of law, as declared by the court in 5 Wheat., 379, is, that when a great river is a boundary between two nations or states, if the original property is not in either, and there be no convention about it, each holds to the middle of the stream.

Virginia, in her deed of cession to the United States of the territory northwest of the Ohio, fixed the boundary of that State at low water mark on the north side of the Ohio; and it remains the limit of that State and Kentucky, as well as of the States adjacent, formed out of that territory. 3 Dana (Ky), 278, 279; 5 Wheat., 378; Code of Virginia, 1849, pp. 49, 34; 1 St. Ohio, 62. By compact between Virginia and Kentucky, the navigation is free. A like compact exists between New York and New Jersey, as to the Hudson River and waters of the Bay of New York and adjacent waters.

Webster's definition of a bank is a steep declivity rising from a river or lake, considered so when descending, and called acclivity when ascending.

Doctor Johnson defines the word "bank" to be the earth arising on each side of a water. We say properly the shore of the sea and the bank of a river, brook, or small water. In the writings of our English classics, the two words are more frequently used in those senses; for instance, as when boats and vessels are approaching the shore to communicate with those who are upon the banks.

Bailey, in his edition of the Universal Latin Lexicon of Facciolatus and Forcellinus, says that ripa, the bank of a river, is extremitas terræ quod aqua alluitur et proprie dicitur de flumine; ut litus de mare, nam hoc depressum est declive atque humile, ripa altior fere est præruptior; and again, ripa recte definitur id quod flumen continet, naturalem vigorem cursus sui tenens.

Notwithstanding that there are differences of expression in the preceding citations, they all concur as to what a river is; what its banks are; that they are distinct from the shore or flat, and as to what constitutes its channel.

With these authorities and the pleadings of this suit in view, all of us reject the low water mark claimed by Alabama as the line that was intended by the contract of cession between the United States and Georgia. And all of us concur in this conclusion, that by the contract of cession, Georgia ceded to the United States all of her lands west of a line beginning on the western bank of the Chattahoochee River where the same crosses the boundary line between the United States and Spain, running up the said Chattahoochee River and along the western bank thereof.

We also agree and decide that this language implies that there is ownership of soil and jurisdiction in Georgia in the bed of the River Chattahoochee, and that the bed of the river is that portion of its soil which is alternately covered and left bare, as there may be an increase or diminution in the supply of water, and which is adequate to contain it at its average and mean stage during the entire year, without reference to the extraordinary freshets of the winter or spring, or the extreme droughts of the summer or autumn.

The western line of the cession on the Chattahoochee River must be traced on the water line of the acclivity of the western bank, and along that bank where that is defined; and in such places on the river where the western bank is not defined, it must be continued up the river on the line of its bed, as that is made by the average and mean stage of the water, as that is expressed in the conclusion of the preceding paragraph of this opinion.

By the contract of cession, the navigation of the river is free to both parties.

It was accordingly ordered, adjudged and decreed by this court, that the bill of complaint be dismissed, and that each party pay its own costs in this court; and it is further ordered by this court, that the clerk do forthwith send to the Executive of each of the aforegoing States a certified copy of this decree.

Nor can this court be thus compelled, on an appeal by the Attorney-General, to become the arbiters of a dispute in which the government has no concern.

The Act of Congress (3d March, 1851, section 13), points out the mode in which contesting claimants may litigate their respective rights to a patent from the government.

Instead of an appeal to this court to settle the rights of M. in a proceeding in which he is no party, the claimants under him, if there be any, should proceed in the mode pointed out by the Act.

Argued Feb. 1, 1860. Decided May 4, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by Charles White, for the confirmation to him of a claim to a certain tract of land.

The Board of Commissioners entered a decree confirming the claim. The district court having affirmed this decree, on appeal, the United States took an appeal to this court.

The facts, upon which the decision in this court rests, appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and J. J. Crittenden, for appellants.

Messrs. E. L. Goold, C. Cushing, V. E. Howard, R. H. Gillet and P. Phillips, for appellee.

The argument, being confined to the evidence, is not here given.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

It is clear, from the evidence in this case, that, as against the United States, either Ortega or Miranda has a just claim to a confirmation of his title to the tract in dispute. But whether Ortega was landlord, and Miranda his tenant, or which of the claimants has attempted to overreach the other, are questions in which the government has no interest. The United States officers are not bound to settle this dispute between these parties in these proceedings. Nor should either party be permitted to carry on their litigation, by assuming to act for the government, and thus take the advantage of their opponents, by fighting under its shield and at its expense. The District Attorney of California had neither interest nor authority to represent Miranda in order to defeat Ortega; nor can this court be thus compelled, on an appeal by the Attorney-General, to become the arbiters of disputes in which the government has no concern.

The patent, issued in pursuance of the Act of Congress, which authorizes these proceedings, is conclusive only between the United States and the claimants. It does not affect the interest of third parties.

The Act of Congress (3d March, 1851, section 13) points out the mode in which contesting claimants may litigate their respective rights to a patent from the government.

Instead of an appeal to this court to settle the rights of Miranda in a proceeding in which he is no party, the claimants under him, if there be any, should proceed in the mode pointed out by the Act, which provides: "That if the title of the claimant to such lands shall be contested by any other person, it shall and may be lawful for such person to present a petition to the district judge of the United States for the district in which the lands are situated, plainly and distinctly setting forth his title thereto, and praying the said judge to hear and determine the same; a copy of which petition shall be served upon the adverse party, thirty days before the time appointed for hearing the same. And it shall and may be lawful for the district judge, upon the hearing of such petition, to grant an injunction to restrain the party at whose instance the claim to the said lands has been confirmed, from suing out a patent for the same until the title thereto shall have been finally decided; a copy of which order shall be transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office: and thereupon no patent shall issue until such decision has been made," &c.

It appears from the record that Valentine, who purchased the title of Miranda at sheriff's sale, had filed his claim before the Board of Commissioners for confirmation, and afterwards withdrew his petition Now, if Miranda or his assignee makes no claim; if he admits the tenancy, and does not allege that Ortega has fraudulently overreached him, the government surely has no right to claim that the land shall be considered as part of the public domain. It cannot set up Miranda to defeat Ortega, or the contrary, admitting, as it must, that either of them can show a claim worthy of confirmation in the absence of the other. Nor can third persons be admitted to interfere, to use the claim of one to defeat the other.

If the heirs or assigns of Miranda object to the issuing of the patent to Ortega or his assigns their remedy is clearly pointed out. They can have their rights tried where the witnesses are known, where they may be examined ore tenus before the court, or before a jury, if the court chooses so to order. They have a far better tribunal to settle this question than if they were permitted to appeal to this court, to guess out the truth from conflicting depositions.

Now, if this court should enter a judgment affirming that of the district court, it would appear as if we had decided the title of Ortega to be superior to that of Miranda, and that Miranda was the tenant of Ortega. This we are unwilling to do; for, if there be bona fide claimants of the Miranda title, such a judgment might seem to conclude them. Nor can we reverse the judgment, for this would imply that we considered Miranda had the better title, and that he or his assignees might be justified in attempting to get the judgment of this court in their favor, in this oblique and irregular manner, under the protection of the Attorney-General.

We have concluded, therefore, to remand the record to the district court, with directions to suspend further proceedings till the heirs or assigns of Juan Miranda, if they see fit so to do, may have an opportunity to contest the claim under Ortega, according to the provisions of the 13th section of the Act of 3d March, 1851, entitled "An Act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," and have such further proceedings as to justice and right may appertain.

And now, to wit: May 1, 1860, the court having reconsidered the opinion and order before made in this case, do now order and adjudge that the decree of the district court in favor of the appellees be reversed and set aside, and the record remitted for further proceedings in the case.

We do this that the district court may not be trammeled in their future consideration of the case on all its merits, but without intimating an opinion as to the validity of the grant to Antonio Ortega. It is due to the Attorney-General to say that, on the argument of the case, he challenged this grant as fraudulent; and it is because we do not think the whole evidence on that point was fully developed on the former trial below, that this order is made.

v.

THE BALTIMORE STEAM PACKET COMPANY, Owners of the Steamers LOUISIANA AND GEORGE W. RUSSELL.

(See S. C., 23 How., 287-309.)

Collision—rules of navigation—lookout.

Collision between steamboat and schooner.

The schooner kept on her course; the steamer did not diverge from her course till within ten seconds or less of a collision, and then the order on the steamer was to starboard the helm, instead of porting it, in contravention of the rules of navigation.

The steamer had a right to pass on either side, but it was her duty to keep clear and give a wide berth to the sailing vessel; having neglected this duty till the danger of a collision was imminent, such a movement only increased the danger of a collision.

Steamers navigating in the thoroughfares of commerce must have constant and vigilant lookouts stationed in proper places on the vessels.

Elevated positions, such as the hurricane deck, are not so favorable situations as those on the forward deck, near the stem.

Argued Apr. 26, 1860. Decided May 4, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, by the appellants, to recover damages resulting from a collision. The district court entered a decree in favor of the libelants. This decree, on appeal, was reversed by the circuit court, and a decree entered dismissing the libel; whereupon the libelants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Wm. Mead Addison and R. R. Battee, for appellants:

1. It is the right and duty of sailing vessels when meeting steamers, to hold their course, and of the steamers, to give way to them.

St. John v. Paine, 10 How., 588; The Oregon v. Rocca, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 572.

2. The schooner, from the time the steamer hove in sight until a moment or two before the collision, steadily held her course. The answers of the defendants; the evidence of the witnesses for the defense, and the evidence of the libelants, all concur in this; and there is not a witness who alleges the contrary.

3. It was the right of the schooner to change her course, when her continuing to hold it would have caused her to be run down.

N. Y. and Liverpool U. S. Mail Steamship Co. v. Rumball, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 372.

4. If the danger of being run down was imminent, and the schooner made a false maneuver when a right one would have saved her, even then then the steamer is responsible; for she ought not needlessly to have run so close to the schooner as to excite such well founded apprehensions of danger, as to have disturbed the judgment of those in charge of her.

The Genesee Chief, 12 How., 444.

5. The account of the disaster set up in the answer, and given by Captain Russell and second mate, Ward, is incredible, because it is impossible it can be correct.

6. The schooner, in attempting to avoid the steamer, turned to the right, and thus conformed to the rule of navigation established and promulgated by the Supreme Court, in the case of The Oregon v. Rocca, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 572; The Friends, 1 W. Rob., 479.

7. The steamer violated said rule by turning to the left, and thereby caused the collision.

8. There was not on the steamer "a trustworthy and constant lookout," "whose whole business was to discern vessels ahead or approaching." The omission is, prima facie, evidence that the steamer is in fault.

The New York v. Rea, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 225; Genesee Chief, 12 How., 449; Chamberlain v. Ward, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 458; 10 How., 585.

The pretended lookout was stationed in the pilot house, and not in the forward part of the vessel, where he should have been.

Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How., 607; St. John v. Paine, 10 How., 585; Chamberlain v. Ward, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 571.

9. The person alleged to have been acting as lookout, was not "actually and vigilantly employed in his duty as lookout" (12 How., 459); but was, in effect, the helmsman.

10. The fact that the steamer was engaged in carrying the U. S. Mail, furnishes no excuse for proceeding at a speed endangering the lives and property of citizens.

The Rose, 2 W. Rob., 3; The Iron Duke, 2 W. Rob., 885; Rogers v. The St. Charles, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 112.

11. In cases of collision between steamers and sailing vessels, prima facie "the steamer is chargeable with fault." "The exception to this rule must be clearly established by strong circumstances, to excuse the steamer."

N. Y. and Va. Steamship Co. v. Calderwood, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 246; The Oregon v. Rocca, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 572.

Mr. Wm. Schley, for appellees:

In support of the decree of the circuit court, the appellee respectfully insists:

1. The change of the course of the schooner was the proximate and only cause of the collision; and if such change had not been made, the vessels would have passed each other in safety.

2. The change of course on the part of the schooner at the time and under the circumstances, was a gross and inexcusable fault.

3. The pilot house on the steamer Louisiana was the best position for the lookout on the steamer; and there was no want of care and no error of judgment on board the steamer in this respect.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants, owners of a schooner called The William K. Perrin, charge in their libel that between nine and ten o'clock of the evening of 20th of February, 1858, as the schooner, laden with oysters, was on her way down the Chesapeake Bay, she was run into and sunk by the steamboat Louisiana; that it was a bright moonlight night, and the schooner, though of only forty-three tons burden and deeply laden, could be and was seen at the distance of a mile.

The answer admits the collision and the result of it. It admits, also, the schooner was seen at the distance of two or three miles; that the steamer was proceeding at the rate of fourteen miles an hour, "heading due north," and the schooner holding her course nearly due south. But it alleges, as an excuse, that while the steamboat and schooner were meeting on parallel lines, the schooner suddenly changed her course and ran under the bows of the steamer.

This is the stereotyped excuse usually resorted to for the purpose of justifying a careless collision. It is always improbable, and generally false.

There is not the usual conflict of testimony in this case; for the single person on board of the steamer who was able to give any account of the collision, who acted as pilot, and by whose want of vigilance and skill the collision was caused, does not materally contradict, but rather confirms, the testimony of the libelants. The facts of the case are as follows:

The steamer Louisiana, of eleven hundred tons burden and five hundred horse power, was on her way coming up the wide bay of the Chesapeake, steering a due north course, between nine and ten o'clock at night. The small heavy-laden schooner is seen two or three miles off, coming in an opposite direction. The captain of the steamer (whose theory of action appears from his own testimony to be, that all small vessels are bound at their peril to get out of the way of a large steamer carrying the United States mail) although he had seen the schooner, and knew that the vessels were approximating at the rate of over twenty miles an hour, retires to the cabin. It was his watch and his duty to be on deck as officer of the deck. He leaves on deck one man, besides the colored man at the wheel, to act as pilot, lookout, and officer of the deck. These two persons constituted the whole crew on duty, besides firemen and engineers. This person, who had to perform these treble functions, was the second mate. His theory is, that the best place for a lookout is in the pilot house, where, he says, "I generally lean out of the window, and have an unobstructed view." Accordingly, as pilot, he remained in the pilot house to direct the steersman; and as lookout, he occasionally leaned out of the window.

The result shows the value of this theory with regard to the place and person proper for a lookout. The schooner kept on her course, as the rules of navigation required her to do, on the presumption that the steamer would diverge from her course so as to leave a free berth to the schooner, as it was the duty of the pilot of the steamer to do. The boats were approximating at the rate of six hundred yards a minute, or one hundred yards in ten seconds. A slight turn of the wheel of the steamboat, if given in due season, would have left a wide berth for the schooner. But this, by his own account, was neglected by this pilot and lookout, till within ten seconds or less of a collision; and then the order was to starboard the helm, instead of porting it, in direct contravention of the rules of navigation.

The steamer, it is true, had a right to pass on either side, and it was her duty to keep clear and give a wide berth to the sailing vessel; but having neglected this duty till the danger of a collision was so imminent that it was probable the schooner would be making some movement to avoid destruction, such a movement only increased the danger of a collision.

The man at the wheel of the schooner had his orders to keep steady on his course south. It is proved, without contradiction, that this order was strictly complied with till the pilot or steersman heard the noise of the steamer's wheels; and being warned of her approach by the lookout, he looked under the boom, and discovered the steamer almost on him; when, in order to save his own life and the lives of the crew, he ported his helm and received the blow on the larboard side the schooner, near the stern, instead of the bow. The point of collision confirms, beyond a doubt, this view of the case.

The hypothesis set forth in the answer to excuse this collision, that the boats were passing on parallel lines, three hundred yards apart, and that, when within one hundred or one hundred and fifty yards of passing each other, the schooner turned round and run herself under the bows of the steamer, is not only grossly improbable in itself, but contradicted by the testimony, and is a mathematical impossibility.

With this pregnant example of the value of the theory of lookouts contended for in this case, let us compare it with the rules established by this court. Without referring to the numerous cases, the correct doctrine on this subject will be found laid down by Mr. Justice Clifford, in delivering the opinion of this court in Chamberlain v. Ward, 21 How., 570:

"Steamers navigating in the thoroughfares of commerce must have constant and vigilant lookouts stationed in proper places on the vessel." They must "be persons of suitable experience, and actually and vigilantly employed on that duty." "In general, elevated positions, such as the hurricane deck, are not so favorable situations as those more usually selected on the forward deck, near the stem." "Persons stationed on the forward deck are less likely to overlook small vessels deeply laden, and more readily ascertain their exact course and movement."

The entire disregard of these rules of navigation by the steamer, and the consequent destruction of property, demonstrate their correctness and utility.

In fine, we are of the opinion that the collision in this case, and destruction of the schooner Perrin, was caused wholly by the negligence and inattention to their duties of the officers who navigated The Louisiana, and that the steamboat should be condemned to pay the whole damage incurred by the said collision.

Let the decree of the circuit court, reversing the decree of the district court, be reversed.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney, dissenting:

I dissent from the judgment of the court. It is a case of collision on the Chesapeake Bay, and involves principles and rules of decision of great interest in the navigation of its waters, where sailing vessels and steam vessels are continually meeting and passing each other in the night as well as in the day. I think it my duty, therefore, to state the principles of law and the evidence in the case, upon which my opinion has been formed.

The rules of law applicable to a case of this description, as established by this court, I understand to be the following:

1. The vessels, whether sailing vessels or steamboats, must be manned and in charge of a crew competent to navigate them on the voyage in which they respectively engaged.

2. It is the duty of each vessel to have a lookout, acquainted with his duty, and faithfully discharging it, and stationed at that part of the vessel which will best enable him to see any impending danger, and promptly warn the helmsman of the point from which it is approaching.

3. It is the duty of a sailing vessel, when meeting a steamboat, to keep on her course, unless she is prevented by the change or direction of the wind; and it is the duty of the steamboat to keep out of her way, passing on the starboard or larboard side, as the steamboat may prefer.

4. Each vessel has a right to act on the presumption that the other knows its duty, and will act accordingly. But if the steamboat fails to shape her course to avoid the sailing vessel, in proper time and at a sufficient distance, the steamboat is answerable for the disaster, although the collision may, in fact, have been produced by an erroneous movement made by the sailing vessel in the moment of peril, and intended to avert the impending danger.

5. The distance at which a steamboat should pass must in some degree depend on the wind and weather, and on the light or darkness of the time and the size of the respective vessels. And, in order to excuse an erroneous movement on the part of the sailing vessel, the proximity of the steamboat, her course and speed, must be such that a mariner of ordinary firmness, and competent skill and knowledge, would deem it necessary to alter his course to enable his vessel to pass in safety. But, in order to justify this, the dangerous proximity must be produced altogether by the steamboat.

These principles and rules of navigation are distinctly laid down in the cases of The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 461, and The N. Y. & Liverpool U. S. Mail St. Co. v. Rumball, 21 How., 383, 384, and have been recognized and maintained by this court in many other cases of collision between steamboats and sailing vessels. It would be tedious, and is unnecessary, to enumerate them, as they all affirm the same rules of navigation.

I have stated them in separate propositions, because it is of the first importance that they should be clearly defined and understood. And impartial justice requires that they should be administered and enforced where they apply to the sailing vessel, as well as to those propelled by steam. Indeed, it is impossible for the steamboat to perform its duty of keeping out of the way at a safe distance, unless the sailing vessel performs its duty by keeping steadily on her course when the wind will permit. And those who intrust their property in sailing vessels, or their cargoes to the care of persons ignorant of their duty, or incompetent in any other respect, have no just right to ask that others who have committed no fault should be compelled to share in their loss.

Keeping in view these established laws of navigation, I proceed to examine as briefly as I can the testimony; and first, the conduct and management of the schooner Perrin, the sailing vessel.

The collision took place near the mouth of the Rappahannock, at about ten o'clock on the night of the 28th of February, 1858. It was a moonlight night, and a vessel under sail, without lights, could be seen at the distance of three or four miles.

The schooner was an oyster boat, of about forty tons burden, and about sixty feet long, and eighteen feet beam. She belonged to Philadelphia, and had obtained a cargo of oysters in the Patuxent River, and sailed from the river about two o'clock of the day above mentioned, down the bay, for the capes of the Chesapeake, bound for her home port. It was a cold night, the wind from the northwest, a stiff breeze, nearly fair, but coming rather from the western land. The sails of the schooner were consequently spread out on her larboard side—that is, on her eastern side, as she went down the bay. She moved at the rate of six or seven miles an hour. Her crew consisted of Charles Ogden, captain, and five other persons, including the oystermen on board; and the latter, when not dredging for oysters, assisted in navigating the vessel.

At half past eight o'clock, on the night of the disaster, the captain and all of the crew, except the witnesses, William J. Miles and Charles Cory, went below to sleep; and from that time until the collision, no one but these two men were on deck, or assisted in any way to navigate the vessel and, therefore, have no knowledge of what led to the disaster.

In weighing the testimony given by these two witnesses, it must be borne in mind that both of them have a direct interest in the result of the case, and will share largely in the damages that they may, by their testimony, recover from the steamboat. Cory says, that two thirds of the oysters belonged to Miles and himself, and Ogden, the captain, after one third and the expenses were taken out. Each of these witnesses, therefore, is giving testimony in his own cause to support his own claim; and they are substantially parties prosecuting the suit, although they appear only as witnesses in the record. They may be admissible from necessity. But it is a departure and exception to the general rules of evidence, long and well established in courts of common law and equity, and goes always strongly to their credit; and the facts stated by such witnesses, as well as their manner of stating them, are carefully scrutinized by courts of justice, in considering the case. The wisdom and custom of the common-law rule will, I think, be apparent when we examine the testimony of Cory and Miles.

Cory's account of himself is this: he has been following the water as an oysterman four years and a half, during the oyster season; and on such occasions, when he is not dredging for oysters, it is a part of his duty to help to navigate the vessel and to help to look out, and he is always in one of the watches. But he had never before been down the bay below the Patuxent. He was the lookout and the only one, in this part of the voyage. He says he saw the steamboat when about three or three and a half miles off; that he was walking on the larboard—that is, the leeward and eastern side of the vessel, and saw the steamboat between the night head and fore shroud of the schooner; and she was to the leeward, larboard and eastward; and that, immediately upon seeing her, he said to Miles, the helmsman, "hadn't you better keep away?" and about five minutes afterwards, asked him again, if he hadn't better keep away; and receiving no answer to either question, he seems to have supposed that he had performed his whole duty as a lookout; for he appears to have made no further effort to communicate with the helmsman, and to have taken no further concern in the navigation of the vessel, before the collision happened.

It is evident from this testimony, given by the witness himself, that he was utterly unfit for a lookout, and performed none of his duties. He was not at the bow or near the head of the vessel, nor even on the windward side, where the sails would not have obstructed his view ahead, but was walking on her larboard or leeward side, and must have been aft of the foremast, as he first saw The Louisiana between the night head and the fore shroud. This was no place for a lookout, for the foresail and head sails were directly before him, and made it impossible for him to see the bearing or distance of any vessel approaching directly ahead, or on her larboard or eastern bow. And although he swears that he did, notwithstanding these obstacles, see her to the leeward and eastward of his vessel, he obviously contradicts himself, when he immediately after states that he twice advised the helmsman to alter his course more to the east; for if he really thought the steamboat bore to the east of south, his advice to the helmsman was to put to the schooner directly in her way, instead of avoiding her; nor can the slightest reliance be placed upon his statement that the steamboat was to the eastward, or that the schooner was standing due south when he first saw the steamboat, or that she did not change her course until she luffed to the west a moment or two before the collision; for he had no compass before him; had never before been in that part of the bay, and under such circumstances could form no accurate judgment of the cardinal points of the compass. It was simply impossible that he could know whether the steamboat bore some points to the east or west of south, or that his vessel was heading due south, or two or three points to the east or to the west of south; or whether she did not vary in her course two or three points as she was approaching the steamboat before she changed directly to the west.

It would seem that he placed himself on the larboard side under the lee of the mainsail to shelter himself from the cold northwest wind, and in that situation it is literally impossible that he could know the precise course the schooner steered, or the bearing of the steamboat when he first saw her, and as he approached her; and it is equally impossible that he should have given the advice he did to the helmsman, if he really thought the steamboat bore east from the schooner.

The testimony of Miles, the only other material witness for the libelants, will show that he was as unfit for a helmsman as Cory was for a lookout, and that the facts he states are as little to be relied on.

He says he has been following the water as an oysterman thirteen or fourteen years, and accustomed to take the helm for the last four or five years; and it does not appear that he was ever before in that part of the Chesapeake Bay; he was standing on the larboard side of the vessel, the same side with the sails, with his right hand on the helm, and from his position could see nothing ahead without going upon one knee, and looking under the boom; and when Cory told him there was a light ahead, he looked under the boom, and saw The Louisiana about one half or three quarters of a point to the eastward of the schooner.

Now, when he saw the steamer approaching, it was his duty, according to the repeated decisions of this court, to stand by his helm, with his eye on the compass, and keep the vessel steadily in her course, and rely on the lookout for information as to the approach and bearing of the steamboat; his own course at the time, he says, was due south.

But instead of doing this, he immediately took upon himself the additional duty of lookout, under circumstances that made it impossible he could perform either. He was on his knee from a half to three quarters of an hour before the collision took place, watching the steamboat under the boom of his vessel. He says, indeed, that he did not watch her all the time, but watched his course; yet he tells us the boom was only three or three and one half feet from the deck and, therefore, in order to look under it, he was obliged not only to go on his knee, but to bring his head down to within two or three feet of the deck; and in that posture, while watching the steamboat, it was absolutely impossible for him to know the exact course he was then steering, or form a correct judgment of the distance or bearing of the steamboat, for the compass was hid from him by the sides of the binnacle in which it stood, and his view ahead, and on the eastern bow of his vessel, obstructed by the foresail and head sails, which were spread out on the same side. And when he speaks of bearings and distances, he speaks, necessarily, not by the compass, but from vague conjectures, and states facts of which he could have no certain knowledge, and was not in a situation to form an opinion upon which any reliance could be placed. He admits that where he stood, with the compass before him, he could not see The Louisiana, and consequently could not see how she bore by the compass.

Again; he says Cory was looking out at the time of the collision, and was a competent lookout; yet his own testimony shows that he did not think so, nor places the slightest confidence in him; for as soon as Cory reported the steamboat in sight, he took upon himself the duty of lookout, as well as helmsman, although he was at the stern of the vessel, and could see nothing ahead except under the boom. And from the time The Louisiana came in sight, he was so absorbed in these double duties, or confused and bewildered by the appearance of the steamboat, that he does not appear to have remembered there was such a person as Cory on deck; he asked no information from him, and did not even hear him when he twice advised him to keep his vessel off; yet Cory was standing within a few feet of him, with nothing but the mainsail between them, and he had heard readily and distinctly when he reported to him that the steamboat was in sight.

He says he kept his course due south. I have already said he could not know the fact, as a large portion of his time was passed in watching the steamboat, with his head in a position which made it impossible for him to see his compass. And with his right hand on the helm, and stooping low on the larboard side to see under the boom, his right arm would naturally and necessarily follow the movement of his body to the larboard, and draw the tiller with it, and cause the vessel from time to time, with such a strong wind pressing on her mainsail, to head towards the west, and edge nearer and nearer to the due north line in which The Louisiana was moving, and thus, by his own incapacity and fault, produce the proximity which so much alarmed him, and induced him suddenly to change his course to the west. It is true, the lookout on board The Louisiana says she appeared to be standing south, and that he did not observe any change until she suddenly luffed to the west. But Captain Russell states, and every seaman knows, that you cannot, in the night, determine the precise course which an approaching vessel ahead is steering; and coming, as this schooner did, with a free wind, she might frequently vary from her general course, from time to time, one or two points, for two or three minutes, and the most vigilant lookout on the steamboat fail to discover it or observe it; yet, at the speed at which she was going, she would, by the slightest movement of the helm to the larboard, or the least relaxation of the hold of the helmsman, head more to the west, and approach nearer to the line of the steamboat, and increase the danger of a collision.

Indeed, Miles admits that his vessel did vary a little, but not enough, he says, to take her from her course; he does not, however, tell us how much she varied, nor what variance he thinks necessary to take her from her course, nor how long it continued, nor in what direction. It is obvious, from what he says of his own position and movements, that every variation from her general course must have been towards the west.

I do not think it necessary to comment further on the evidence given by these two witnesses. Testifying in the manner I have stated, and under the influence of a direct pecuniary interest in the result, I cannot think their statements would be entitled to any weight against the steamboat, even if uncontradicted by other testimony; but in all of its essential parts it is contradicted by disinterested witnesses who were on board of The Louisiana, and I proceed briefly to state the testimony of Captain Russell, and Ward, the second mate, who are the only two material witnesses on behalf of the steamboat. The disaster happened in the captain's watch, during which the second mate, Ward, was the lookout, and charged with the running of the vessel; the wheelsman was a colored man, and could not, therefore, be examined as a witness; but it is abundantly proved that he was an experienced wheelsman, and accustomed to perform that duty on steamboats, and was fully competent and trustworthy.

Captain Russell and the mate have for many years been engaged in the navigation of steamboats up and down the bay, at all seasons of the year; are both pilots of long experience, and well acquainted with the dangers to be apprehended, and are accustomed to meet and pass vessels at all hours of the night and of the day. Neither of them have any pecuniary interest in the result of this controversy, and they are both men of undoubted character for intelligence and veracity.

It has indeed been said, that the answer of Captain Russell to the libel, and his testimony as a witness, contradict one another, and that, on that account, credit ought not to be given to his testimony; but I can see no discrepancy between them. In his answer, he speaks in general terms of the disaster and the causes which led to it, and that is all that was proper or usual to state in an answer. When examined as a witness, he enters more minutely into the circumstances, and mentions his momentary absence from the deck just before The Perrin changed her course to the west, but there is no contradiction or discrepancy in this; and it is hardly just to a witness to select a detached sentence from the answer, and another from the testimony, to show an apparent contradiction, when the two papers, read throughout, are perfectly consistent with each other, and substantially the same; and in both his answer and his deposition as a witness he supports and confirms the testimony of Ward, the lookout, in every fact material to the decision of the case. Ward says he was stationed in the wheel-house, or pilot house, as the place is indifferently called; the house is about sixty feet from the bow, upon the upper deck, and elevated about twenty-five feet; he stood by the side of the wheelsman on the larboard side of the house, and the wheelsman on the starboard, about four feet from him; and the compass was in the wheel-house, in front of the wheelsman.

It has been argued that the lookout ought to have been at the bow, and some passages in the opinions of this court in former cases are relied on to support this objection. But the language used by the court must always be construed with reference to the facts in the particular case of which they are speaking, and the character and description of the vessel. What is the most suitable place for a lookout, is obviously a question of fact, depending upon the construction and rig of the vessel, the navigation in which she is engaged, the climate and weather to which she is exposed, and the hazards she is likely to encounter, and must, like every other question of fact, be determined by the court upon the testimony of witnesses—that is, upon the testimony of nautical men of experience and judgment. It cannot, in the nature of things, be judicially known to the court as a matter of law. All that the law prescribes is, the rule that the lookout shall be stationed in that part of the vessel where he can most conveniently and effectually discharge the duty with which he is charged. And all of the experienced pilots who have been examined as witnesses in this case, accustomed to the navigation of the bay, well acquainted with the form and construction of The Louisiana, unite in testifying that the place where Ward was stationed was the best and most suitable; and they point out the serious disadvantages that might arise from stationing him at the bow. There can hardly be a rule of law which requires a steamboat to station a lookout in a place where he cannot effectually perform his duty. In a vessel propelled by sails, he is uniformly stationed at the bow, because, in any other part of the vessel, his view ahead would be obstructed by the head sails and rigging. But this reason does not apply to steamboats constructed like The Louisiana.

Taking it, therefore, as fully established by proof, that Ward, the lookout, was competent, and stationed in the proper place, I proceed to state his testimony, which is as follows:

He saw the schooner when about three or four miles off. The steamboat was heading a due north course, and the schooner appeared to be heading south, and bore by the compass north half east on the starboard (eastern) side of the steamboat. When the two vessels approached within the distance of 300 or 400 yards, the schooner bore north one point east on the starboard side of The Louisiana; and when within about 150 yards of the schooner, in order to give a wider space in passing, he headed the steamboat north by west, which left the schooner bearing two points east on her starboard bow. He had just steadied his boat in this course when he discovered that the schooner altered her course, and was heading west across the bay, and continued to hold that course until the collision took place. The moment he discovered that the schooner had changed her course, he gave the signal to stop and back, which was instantly obeyed. But the vessels came together before the headway of the steamboat was entirely stopped.

The testimony of this witness, supported as it is by that of Captain Russell, can hardly be impeached by such testimony as that which has been given by such witnesses as Cory and Miles.

And I regard this as the true history of the disaster, and of the movements of the vessels by which it was produced.

The facts established by this proof, that the schooner bore north half east when first seen at the distance of three or four miles, and north one point east when at the distance of about 300 yards, show that, from the causes I have before mentioned, she had not maintained her course due south during that time, but had been luffing and edging to the west, so as to bring her nearer and nearer to the due north line in which the steamboat was steering; for, if they had approached each other in parallel lines, the schooner would have borne more and more to the east, and would have been directly east when they passed, and would, therefore, when within 300 yards, have borne more than one point to the east of north. But even then, if she had continued to hold her course due south, and the steamboat had continued hers due north, they would have passed in safety, but nearer, indeed, than a steam vessel of the size of The Louisiana ought to pass so small a vessel as the oyster boat. But when the steamboat changed her course one degree more to the west, it is evident that they would have passed each other not only in safety, but at a convenient and sufficient distance; for, it will be observed, that, for the distance of one hundred and fifty yards at which the steamboat changed her course, she was proceeding slowly backing with all the force of her machinery, and with so much effect that her headway was nearly stopped when they came in contact. This is proved, by the character of the injury inflicted. It is true that the side of the schooner was broken in, and an opening made, through which the water rushed in, and filled and sunk her in a few minutes. The witnesses for the libelants, who examined the schooner at Norfolk after she had been raised and carried into port, say that the blow "had hit the main beam across the break of the quarter, and split it—knocked the knees out from each side of it, and cut her down to light water mark." But it did not even upset her. Cory, indeed, says that her stern was driven under the water. But Miles, who was at the stern, does not support him. On the contrary, he says the blow threw him to the windward (that is, to the opposite side), and that he went up the rigging of his vessel until he got on the bow of the steamboat. He does not intimate that he was in danger of being washed overboard or plunged into the water. Now, with the immense weight and size of The Louisiana, coming stem on, against the broadside of the comparatively slender and frail timbers and planks of this little oyster boat, if the headway of the steamboat had not been very nearly stopped before she struck the schooner, the injury inflicted must have been much greater than that described by the witnesses. If she had been moving at even one third of her ordinary speed, she would unquestionably have buried this little boat in the water, and passed over her. These facts of themselves show that her rate of speed for these 150 yards, taking it all together, could not have averaged, at the outside, more than four or five miles an hour.

Now, the schooner changed her course to directly west almost simultaneously with the reversal of the engine of the steamboat, approaching her line of movement nearly at a right angle, and was moving from east directly west during the time the steamboat was passing over this 150 yards. She was moving, also, with equal or greater speed, for all of the witnesses agree that she was sailing at the rate of six or seven miles an hour; and when she changed her course to west, she was in full headway, with all sails set, and must have maintained, during that time, at least very nearly the speed at which she had before been sailing; and this being the case, she must, in order to bring the vessels into contact, have passed nearly the same distance to the west which the steamboat, while backing, had passed to the north—that is, 150 yards; and consequently, if she had held on her course, would have passed at that distance, or nearly so, to the eastward of the steamboat.

It has, indeed, been said that the collision was immediate after the change of course by the schooner, and the backing of the steamboat; and calculations have been presented to show that it must have been so, because, from the combined speed of the two vessels, taken together, the 150 yards would be passed over in a few seconds. But this argument has no foundation in the evidence; for the steamer was not proceeding at her ordinary speed, but backing all the way, and had nearly stopped when she came in contact with the schooner. And the latter vessel was not meeting her from an opposite direction, but standing directly across her path, leaving the steamboat to pass over these 150 yards, and at the reduced rate of speed of which I have spoken, before the vessels could come together.

In reference to this part of the evidence, it is, perhaps, hardly necessary to notice the evidence of Miles, who says they were within thirty yards of the steamboat when he changed his course to the west. No one, I presume, will think that his testimony in this respect is entitled to any weight, when in conflict with the testimony of Captain Russell and the mate, Ward, who were both in a position to see perfectly what was before them, and accustomed, by long experience, to measure distances on the water by the eye, while Miles was looking under the boom of his mainsail with his head near the deck, and his vision obstructed by the sails and rigging of his own vessel. He was in no position to form a correct judgment of distances any more than of bearings; and even Cory contradicts him, and says, that "we did not change our course until we were within 150 yards, if, indeed, we were more than 100 yards from The Louisiana." He, in effect, corroborates the testimony of Captain Russell and Ward.

It has been said, also, that the steamboat ought to have slowed her speed before she approached so near as 150 yards to the sailing vessel. But this argument loses sight of the fact that, until the schooner changed her course to the west, those on board of the steamboat had no reason to suppose that there was the slightest danger of collision, or any reason for slackening her ordinary speed. They had a right to presume and, indeed, were bound to presume, that the schooner would steadily hold on the course she was steering, and the steamboat had shaped its course to keep out of her way, and pass her at a safe and convenient distance. And the moment they discovered that the schooner had changed her course, and was heading in a direction that might produce collision, she instantly stopped and backed, and took every measure in her power to avert the danger. But until the change of course by the schooner, there could be no reason and no obligation whatever to slacken her speed; for it can hardly be supposed that a steamboat is bound to stop or slacken her speed whenever she sees a sailing vessel coming in an opposite direction, and wait to see whether she will conform to the rule laid down by this court, and hold her course, or suddenly change it to cross the line in which the steamboat is moving. Such a rule would make steamboat navigation of very little value on the Chesapeake. But unless such is to be the rule, I can see no ground for imputing it as a fault to the steamboat, that she did not slacken her speed until she came within 150 yards, when it is admitted that the schooner did not change her course to the west until she had come within that distance of the steamboat.

As relates to the general rate of speed of the steamboat, no one acquainted with the navigation of the Chesapeake has ever suggested or supposed that it was dangerous to life or property on that wide bay; and there is no evidence from which such an inference can be drawn. The fact that The Louisiana carried the mail, and was obliged to proceed at the rate of fourteen or fifteen miles an hour, in order to fulfill her contract, certainly gave her no rights or privilege beyond those of any other steam vessel, nor exempted her in any degree from the care, caution and watchfulness in speed, as well as in everything else, required of others. The fact that a contract was made is perhaps some evidence that the public authorities of the United States, having all the means of information within their reach, were satisfied that the rate of speed required was not dangerous to the life or property of our citizens who are accustomed to navigate the bay.

It is unnecessary to remark upon the testimony given by the captain of The Keyser, which sailed from the Patuxent in company with The Perrin. He was, he says, three quarters of a mile off, and could in the night, even by moonlight, have no certain and accurate knowledge of the bearing of the colliding objects towards each other as they approached, or the particular incidents of the collision; the more especially as both vessels were ahead of him, and to leeward and hidden from him by his own sails as he stood at his helm. He says, too, that before the collision, he paid very little attention, and what he did see was by looking under his boom.

Neither do I attach any importance to conversations and statements made on board The Louisiana after the collision. Declarations made in conversation are apt to be loose and unguarded—are often misunderstood, and, in my judgment, entitled to very little weight in any case, and least of all in a case like this, where the minds of all had been excited and agitated by the scene through which they had so recently passed.

There is no other evidence in the record which appears to be material to the points I am discussing, and I forbear, therefore, to refer to it. This opinion already occupies more space than I anticipated. But, as the full statement of the testimony cannot be given in the report of the case, I have found myself unable to present the facts truly and fairly, as I understand them, in fewer words.

I fully agree with the court, that the strictest supervision should be held over steamboats. But it is impossible for them to perform the duty of keeping out of the way, unless the sailing vessel is held to the correlative duty of keeping her course. Even-handed justice requires that the law of navigation should be as obligatory upon the sailing vessel as it is upon the steamboat. This is a question of property, and the rights of the parties are to be ascertained and determined by the rules of law. And where the evidence shows, as I think it does, that The Louisiana performed her duty, and took proper measures to keep out of the way, and her efforts were counteracted and defeated by the sailing vessel, and a collision forced upon the steamboat by the incapacity and misconduct of those in charge of The Perrin, I cannot think that the steamboat should be charged with any part of the damage which the sailing vessel brought upon itself. Those who intrust their property on the water to incompetent hands have no just right to complain of disasters, and claim indemnity for losses arising altogether from the incapacity and unfitness of those of whom they have confided it, and still less have Cory and Miles, whose incapacity and misconduct were the sole cause of disaster.

And entertaining this view of the controversy, I dissent from the judgment of the court.

THE UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
JAMES R. BOLTON.

(See S. C., 21 How., 341-353.)

Mexican land claim—proof of records necessary, to admit copy of same—conditions not fulfilled and no possession—when claim invalid.

In a Mexican claim, where it appears the claim was not presented to the Departmental Assembly, and not the slightest evidence exists in the archives of any petition, order, or the record of a grant, held, that claimant was bound to prove that records showing a compliance with the laws of colonization did exist when the copy he produces was given, before he could prove their loss and their contents.

The Regulations of 1828 directs that a proper record shall be kept of all the petitions presented and grants made, with maps of the lands granted; this record is the evidence of a grant.

When the government institutes inquiries in reference to the subject, it is entitled to require the production of that official record.

The record evidence which is required to support a claim is considered in the case of Cambuston, 61 U. S., 59, and more at large at this term in the case of Fuentes v. U. S.

Where the claim was first made known to the public in 1850, and there is no proof to show that any of the conditions of the grant have been fulfilled, and there was no judicial power sought or obtained, and no claim made for the land as the grantee thereof, to give the community at large any information concerning it; held, that the validity of the grant has not been sustained.

Argued Apr. 5, 1860. Decided May 4, 1860.

APPEAL from the United States District Court for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by the appellee, for the confirmation to him of a claim to a certain tract of land.

The Board of Land Commissioners entered a decree confirming the claim. The District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California having affirmed this decree, the United States took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and W. B. Reed, for appellants.

Points on the part of the United States:

I. That on the facts disclosed in this record the pretended grant of Feb. 10, 1846, and the order for the delivery of the temporalities of the mission Dolores to the priest Santillan, dated Jan. 15, 1846, are fraudulent.

II. That if the grant be a genuine paper, it is utterly invalid as conferring any right on the grantee, because:

1. It is antedated.

2. If not antedated, it never was delivered.

III. If genuine, not antedated and delivered, it was not made in conformity with the Colonization Act of 1824, and the Order of 1828, as held to be essential in the cases of The U. S. v. Cambuston, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 59; U. S. v. Sutter, 62 U. S. (21 How.); 64 U. S., U. S. v. Rose, (23 How.), 262.

IV. It is invalid under any assumed powers of the Departmental Assembly, either the Departmental Act of 28th May, 1845, or Pico's proclamation of October, as a secret and private sale to Santillan, never submitted to the Assembly.

V. Aside from any power attributed to the Departmental Assembly it was invalid as made by Pio Pico before the 15th of April, 1846, when he was sworn as governor, under the authority of the Federal Government.

VI. It is invalid as a grant to one who claims to have been administrator of the lands in question.

See Figueroa's Regulations of 1834; Febrero Mej. Econo., tom. II., p. 233, tit. 40, cap. 2, sec. 5; Civil Code of La., arts. 2965, 2966; Poth. Mandat, Nos. 148, 149, 166, and note on art. 450; Poth. Oblig., No. 513; Toullier, t. 10, p. 482; Ibid., 18, p. 300.

On the general principle of the invalidity of a purchase by a trustee or person in official relation, the following authories, elementary and adjudicated, are referred to:

1 Sto. Eq., 218, 221, 308, 328; Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat., 421; Sto. Ag., 210, 215; Davoue v. Fanning, 4 Johns. Ch., 199; Michoud v. Girod, 4 How., 503.

VII. The conditions of the grant, as well those prescribed by the Colonization Act, as those specified in the grant itself, never were complied with, and no equity requiring its confirmation is raised against the United States, especially as both the grant itself and the Colonization Act require a process of judicial possession and definition of limits.

VIII. The claimant is estopped from setting up a secret grant thus obtained, the acts and silence of Santillan from 1846 to 1855, operating as a virtual abandonment of all his rights. This is well established by the general doctrine of equitable estoppels.

See Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & E., 474; 1 Story, Eq., 384, 204, 220, 695, 769, 770; Gregg v. Wells, 10 A. & E., 90; Engle v. Burns, 5 Call. Messrs. R. J. Walker, J. Mason Campbell, St. George T. Campbell and John W. Dwinelle, for appellee:

I. The evidence as to the proof of the grant is abundant and conclusive.

II. As to the official character of the person making the grant.

By the Act of the Mexican Congress of 6th May, 1822, the "primer vocal" of the Departmental Assembly, being made Governor ad interim in case of vacancy, Pio Pico as primer vocal of the Assembly, became Provisional Governor of the Californias on Micheltorena's expulsion.

See Carey Jones' Report, 15, 98, 111, 109, 101, 73, 78.

Part of the evidence offered by the United States in this case is a grant made by Pico. He was recognized as Governor by the Supreme Government of Mexico.

See, also, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 566; U. S. v. Sutherland, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 363.

III. As to the subject of the grant, viz.: Mission lands within the ten littoral leagues. This court has decided that the mission lands were secularized and grantable like other public lands.

U. S. v. Ritchie, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 525; U. S. v. Cervantes, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 555; U. S. v. Sutherland, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 363.

It has further decided that grants might be made to natives within the ten littoral leagues under the Colonization Laws.

Arguello v. U. S., 59 U.S. (18 How.), 539; U. S. v. Cervantes, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 555.

That Santillan was a native, is not disputed. Even were he a Mexican Indian (which the United States failed to prove), this court has settled his right to take under the Colonization Laws, equally as a native of Spanish blood.

U. S. v. Ritchie, 58 U. S.(17 How.), 540.

IV. The Colonization Laws had not been suspended in regard to the Dolores mission lands. No authority has been shown warranting the Executive of the National Government to suspend the Colonization Laws. The power of suspension was exercised where deemed necessary by Congress, as the legislative authority.

See Jones' Report, 68.

V. As to the capacity of Santillan to take, being a priest. Bishop Alemany, his diocesan, a prelate of the Roman Catholic church and acquainted with its laws, proves that Santillan was one of the secular clergy, and so authorized to take property, which the regular clergy are not.

VI. Has the governor pursued the course marked out for him under the Act of 1824 and the Regulations of 1828?

[On this point the counsel reviwed the case at length.]

VII. The foregoing points cover the power of the governor to make, and Santillan to take, the grant. The fact of its actual execution and delivery, its conformity to the Regulations of 1828, and the performance of the prescribed conditions by the grantee. But as it appears by the opinion of the commissioners, that it was argued before them that the grant had been executed after Pico had ceased to be governor, and that it was antedated, it may be necessary to argue the question of fraud or forgery. [The argument on this point had reference almost exclusively to the evidence.]

On the question of estoppel, see Sutter's case before Commissioners and District Court and Supreme Court of California; also, Gunn's case, 6 Cal., 268.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

In March, 1852, the appellee presented his claim to the commissioners for settling land claims in California for a parcel of land situated in the County of San Francisco, and bounded north by what was formerly known as Yerba Buena; northwest by lands of the presidio of San Francisco; west by the lands of Francisco Haro; south by the lands of Sanchez; and east by the Bay of San Francisco, with a reservation of the curate's house, the church of Dolores, and other previously granted lands within the external boundaries of the tract, which include 29,717 acres; and the claims previously granted within those boundaries are 19,531 acres; leaving, as the unquestioned claim of Bolton, 10,186 acres. The orignal claimant is Jose Prudencia Santillan, a secular priest, who, together with his general agent, Manuel Antonio Rodriguez de Poli, in April, 1850, upon the recited consideration of $200,000 conveyed it to Bolton, the appellee. An interested party testifies that, in 1851 and in 1854, it was worth, at a low estimate, more than two million of dollars. The claim was confirmed in 1855 by the Board of Land Commissioners, and in 1857 their decree was affirmed in the district court. The grant to Santillan bears date the 10th February, 1846. It purports to have been made by Pio Pico, "first member of the Assembly of the Department of the Californias, and charged with the administration of the law in the same," and to be signed by Covarrubias, as secretary. It recites that the priest Santillan has petitioned for a grant, for his own benefit, of all the common lands known as belonging to the mission of Dolores, as well as the houses of the rancherias of the mission, which were in a state of abandonment; and that, thereupon, the governor had proceeded to grant them, subject to conditions:

1st. He shall pay, as a compensation for said grant, all the debts that exist against the mission.

2d. He shall petition the proper judge for the judicial possession, in virtue of the grant, of all the lands and houses conveyed; and in the mean time, the possession which he has of the houses and lands, in his capacity of administrator, appointed as such by the prelate of the missions of the College of Our Lady of Guadaloupe, in Zacatecas, for the temporalities of the mission of Dolores, shall serve as legal.

3d. The judge who shall give the possession shall have it measured and marked with the customary landmarks, the contents being three square leagues, more or less.

4th & 5th. That the houses of the curate, and the church of Dolores, and the property which some persons hold under good titles, shall be respected, and that the title be recorded.

The claimant exhibits a letter from Covarrubias to Santillan, dated 15th January, 1846, which informs him of an order made by the governor to the administrator of the mission to make formal delivery of all the appurtenances of the mission Dolores to Santillan, that he (Santillan) may administer the temporalities of the mission.

In March, 1850, Santillan published a notice in a newspaper in San Francisco, which stated that the governor, Pio Pico, on the 10th February, 1846, had granted to him all the uncultivated lands and all the unoccupied houses appertaining to the mission; that the grant was made and is recorded in the City of Los Angeles, and that it was written by Covarrubias, then secretary of the governor; that in the month of January, 1846, an order had issued to the administrator of the mission, to put Jose Prudencia Santillan in possession of the temporalities of the mission, which was done; and that the grant, being made one month after, recognizes and refers to this order of the government, and provides that the possession under the order was for the purposes of the grant. This notice was designed to warn persons from trespassing on the land, or purchasing titles from the justice of the peace, acting in the capacity of alcalde in San Francisco. The grant itself was recorded shortly after in the county records of San Francisco; and in May, 1852, the claim was filed, with a petition demanding its confirmation, before the Board of Land Commissioners, sitting at San Francisco.

In its support, four principal witnesses were relied on, namely: Jose Maria Covarrubias, Cayetano Arenas, Jose Matias Moreno, and Narcisco Botello. Covarrubias' deposition was filed with the petition. He was secretary of the government when the grant bears date, and deposes that he wrote the document; that Governor Pio Pico signed it, and that he, Covarrubias, countersigned it as secretary; all of which was done in the secretary's office at Los Angeles, at the time the grant bears date. He says the paper there exhibited was one of those delivered to the party, and that he believes it is a substantial copy, if not a literal one, of an order of the governor for the purposes therein stated.

Arenas states that he was employed as an officer in the office of the secretary of the government; that he saw the grant now filed before the Board of Land Commissioners, produced at the office of the secretary of the government in the month of February, 1846, about the time it bears date. "It is a document given out by the government to Padre Santillan." He declares the signature of the governor and secretary to be genuine; that he saw the document made; also, that had the grant remained in the secretary's office, it is probable he should have seen it. Being asked whether a note of the grant was ever made in any book of titles, he answers that there were then only loose sheets of paper kept, on which to note titles at Los Angeles, the regular book being at Monterey; and that a note of this title was made on said loose sheets of paper. "I wrote the note of this title myself." The sheets of paper were stitched together.

Moreno proves that he was appointed government secretary as successor to Covarrubias, and came into office on the 1st day of May, 1846, and continued to act as secretary until the country was conquered in July following. He is asked, on behalf of the claimant, "Whilst acting as secretary, did you ever see a paper purporting to be a petition of Jose Prudencia Santillan for a grant of the land of the ex-mission of Dolores, or any other paper in relation to said grant?" and answers, "I never did."

He further states, that he had never seen any such grant, or any papers relating thereto. "All I recollect is, that I saw the name of Padre Santillan in the book in which the note of titles was taken; it was on the last page, but I do not know whether it was in relation to a grant or not. The book contained nothing but the notes which were taken of titles.

Narcisco Botello deposes, that he was a deputy of the Departmental Assembly during the first four months of 1846, and served as one of the committee on public lands; and during that time the original espedients and grant made to Santillan, of the mission of Dolores and its lands, came up for action before the Assembly; that the title was duly submitted and approved. He swears to its confirmation in the most precise terms. To meet this evidence, it is suggested for the United States that the Assembly never acted on sales of land made by the governor of mission property; and this may be true, but the grant to Santillan was not a sale of the mission of Dolores. It is in form an ordinary colonization grant, made according to the Act of 1824 and the Regulations of 1828, and under their authority; nor can the recital in it—that Santillan shall pay the debts of the mission—affect the title. The title is vested, whether the debts were or were not paid. The petition and grant were undoubtedly proper papers to be submitted to the Assembly for approval.

Under the Acts of Colonization, the records of the Departmental Assembly in 1846, during the time that Botello says he acted on the committee of public lands, are well preserved. The different meetings and daily proceedings of that body are minuted in regular form in the journals. From these it appears that its first session for 1846 commenced on the 2d day of March, and on that day Norega and Arguello were appointed the committee on public lands; and in the session of the 4th of March, Señor Botello obtained a leave of absence for a term not exceeding three months. His absence is usually noted at the end of each day's proceedings, and his name does not again appear as an acting member until the 15th of June. On the 1st of July he was elected temporary secretary of the Assembly, in the absence of Olvera, the regularly appointed secretary. Botello certainly did not belong to the committee of public lands during the year 1846.

The first report of the governor to the Assembly respecting the disposal of lands was of forty-five grants to sundry individuals, and was made the 8th day of May, and referred to the committee. The committee reported favorably, and the grants were confirmed in the session of June 8d. The decree of confirmation includes grants down to May 3d, 1846. That of Santillan is not among them.

The decrees of confirmation are distinct, regular and definitive, and there is no reason to suppose that any grant that had been made was reserved from the Assembly. And, in addition, Moreno proves that, whilst he acted as secretary to Governor Pico, he never sent to the Departmental Assembly any espedients or grant of lands to Santillan. And as it was his official duty to do so, he can hardly be mistaken. We deem it true beyond controversy that Botello was not one of the committee on vacant lands; that the claim of Santillan was not presented to the Departmental Assembly; and that the statement of Botello, in his deposition of his official relation to this grant, is without any foundation in truth.

Covarrubias having stated that Padre Santillan filed a petition for a grant of the mission lands of Dolores, and that Governor Pico made an order on which the grant was founded, it becomes necessary to inquire whether such petition and order ever existed in the archives; and secondly, the probability of their being lost, as not the slightest evidence now exists in the archives of any petition, order, or the record of a grant.

Moreno states that he took possession of all the archives, when he came into office as successor of Covarrubias. Arenas says this was the next day after Covarrubias had resigned, in February, 1846. Moreno states that it was on the 1st day of May, 1846. It is certain that Moreno submitted to the Assembly the titles confirmed in June. He proves that no such papers were ever seen by him; and as he was examined on behalf of the claimant to prove the authenticity of this grant, and whatever might conduce to that end; and as he was interrogated relative to the existence of papers properly connected with it, if authentic, and remaining in the public repository under his official care; and as he denies knowledge of the deposit or existence of such papers, his testimony raises a strong presumption that the requirements of the Colonization Laws were not complied with on this subject. We are confirmed in this opinion by the examination of other testimony.

Arenas says he took the name of the title and the number and date of the grant; that is to say, of the grant then before him, and then delivered to Santillan. But he says nothing of the petition nor decree conceding the land. All that Covarrubias states is, that there was a petition and decree of the governor, on which papers the grant was founded. But he does not swear that they were filed or recorded.

As respects the probability of a loss of Santillan's title papers, Moreno proves, that when the United States forces suppressed the Mexican Government of California, in August, 1846, by order of Governor Pico, he deposited the archives belonging to the secretary's office in boxes, and placed them in the house of Don Louis Vigines, in Los Angeles; and he knows nothing further of them. And Olvera proves that he made a similar deposit of the records of the Departmental Assembly at the house of Don Louis Vigines. This occurred about the 10th of August, 1846. He says that he then had expedientes in his charge as secretary of the Assembly. How many does not appear. Up to this time, it is not assumed that any documents were lost.

Commodore Stockton directed the removal of these archives, and for that purpose they were taken possession of by Colonel Frémont; and after some delay and some exposure, they were eventually delivered to Captain Halleck, of the United States army, at Monterey, then acting Secretary of State under the Military Governor of California. Captain Halleck proves that when delivered to him they were in a bad condition, being much torn and mutilated. They were shortly after arranged, numbered and labeled.

It is a historical fact, that the expedientes and grants made for some ten years before the year 1846 are referred to in an index, and in a register known as the Toma de Razon—the former made by Manuel Jimeno, who was the government secretary before Covarrubias. And as the title papers to which reference is made in this index, and the register, are found in the archives as they now exist, it is reasonable to suppose that those expedientes made in 1846 were carried with equal safety, as they came into Colonel Frémont's hands, according to the testimony of Moreno and Olvera, in the same condition; and according to the testimony of others, they were transported in the same manner, and were continued in the same custody; and it is true that the expedientes of 1846 are apparently as well preserved as the others; but from the loss of the Toma de Razon, and the absence of a contemporary catalogue like Jimeno's index, we have not the same assurance of their entire existence.

Be this as it may, the claimaint was bound to prove that records showing a substantial compliance with the laws of colonization did exist when the copy he produces was given to Santillan before he could be heard to prove their loss and their contents.

In deciding on this controversy, we are to be governed by the laws and usages of the Mexican Government administered in the Department of the Californias (as respects the granting of lands) before the conquest of the country, and according to the principles of equity. These are the rules prescribed by the Act of March 3, 1851, sec. 11 (9 Stat. at L., 631).

The laws and usages applicable to this claim are found in the Regulations of 1828.

Lands were to be granted "for the purpose of cultivating or of inhabiting them;" and the mode of obtaining a grant is prescribed to be by an address to the governor, setting forth the petitioner's name, profession, &c., describing distinctly, by means of a map, the lands he asks for. Then the governor was to obtain the necessary information whether the petition embraced the legal conditions, both as regards the land and the applicant. This being done, the governor was required to proceed to make an order for the formal grant to be drawn out, which he should execute.

Sec. 11 directs that a proper record shall be kept of all the petitions presented and grants made, with maps of the lands granted.

This record is the evidence of grant. It being made, the governor (sec. 8) shall signa document, and give it to the party interested, to serve as a title, wherein it must be stated that said grant (to wit: the record) is made in exact conformity with the provisions of the laws. In virtue of this document issued to the party, possession of the lands shall be given. But the document is not sufficient of itself to prove that the governor has officially parted with a portion of the public domain, and vested the land in an individual owner. This must be established before the Board of Commissioners by record evidence, as found in the archives, or which had been there, and has been lost. The título given to the party is merely a certificate by the governor of the acts that have been done in the regular course of official procedure towards the disposal of a part of the public domain. Among individuals, this certificate serves the purpose of evidence. But when the government institutes inquiries in reference to the subject, it is entitled to require the production of that official record, which it has prescribed to its officer, for its own security, and as a necessary condition of a legal administration, and a necessary precaution against fraud. That a petition was presented by Santillan is stated incidentally, but indistinctly, by a single witness (Covarrubias); and this unsatisfactory statement is disproved by the absence of the record and the evidence of his successor, Moreno. The claim, as presented to the Board of Commissioners and the district court, has no legal foundation to rest upon.

The degree of record evidence which is required to support a claim of the above description is considered and adjudged in the case of U. S. v. Cambuston, 20 How., 59, and more at large in the decision made at this term in the case of Fuentes v. The United States; so that a further consideration on that head is not required in this case.

Such being the legal condition of this claim, the next question is, how does it stand on its equities.

The grantee is one of the eighteen secular priests who were in California. He arrived at the mission of Dolores either in 1844 or 1845, probably in the latter year. He was of Indian extraction, and in necessitous and distressed circumstances. A number of witnesses say he subsisted on alms. A grant to a priest for his own benefit is a singular fact in California. The bishop elect since 1850 says: "I learned that Padre Santillan obtained a grant of land from Governor Pio Pico. I know of no other instance excepting this, and have heard of no other case in which the grant has been made to a priest personally, and for his own benefit." Berreyesa, when pressed for the reason for the retention of a casual conversation in his memory for so long a period, says: "It was an unusual thing for a mission to be granted to a Padre for it was thought that the Padres could not hold such property, and it seemed strange to me."

But the grant was made to this necessitous Padre upon the primary condition that, "in consideration of this grant, he shall pay the debts of the mission which exist up to this time." It would seem that a grant of land with such a condition, to such a person, was a vain thing. There is no testimony to show what the amount of the debt assumed by Santillan was, to whom it was owing, when and how it was contracted, or what security was required for its payment. Neither Pio Pico nor Covarrubias afford the slightest information of the manner in which the consideration was to be paid.

Until the spring of 1850, none of the large community then building up a city on the land in dispute had any suspicion that this poor man claimed to be owner, in his own right, of ten thousand acres of land, with an outer boundary including three other grants and embracing nearly thirty thousand acres.

He had made some claim for the church as a priest and administrator of the mission, and had caused the papers of the mission to be examined by a competent lawyer, and endeavored to repel intruders at his door, by some title which he supposed might exist among the documents of what had been an important missionary establishment. No title was found which vested this property in the church, and superseded the public title; and then this claim was first made known to the public.

There were at that time a thousand settlers on the land claimed, holding their possession and titles by purchases made from a justice of the peace, appointed under the authority of the Military Government of the United States in California, and who professed to make grants not exceeding fifty varas square, but with a reservation of the claims of individuals and that of the United States. Of course, these claimants expected to receive an acknowledgment, or some recognition, of their title by the United States. The Padre Santillan seems to have been much excited by his contest with these occupants. In September, 1849, he constituted O'Connor, an attorney at law, and Salmon, a merchant, his attorneys, and authorized them to enter into possession, for the uses and benefits of the mission of Dolores, and of which he was pastor, of lands, tenements and hereditaments, that he had a right to enter into, possess and enjoy, and the same dispose of by lease, for the benefits and objects of the mission, with all the powers that he possessed by virtue of his pastoral care and tutorship, in his own right, and the rights of others represented by him. "He also empowered them to ask, demand, recover and secure, the sum or sums of money now due or owing for occupancy and use of the lands, houses tenements and hereditaments, belonging to the parties represented by him, or belonging to him by virtue of his office."

The attorney mentioned in this deed is a leading witness to discredit the genuineness of the grant.

He had no notice or imagination of its existence when this power was accepted. In November, 1849, the Padre Santillan, with Dr. Poli, made a journey to Santa Barbara, the place of residence of Covarrubias, and on his return intimated to his friends "that he had been to the governor, and that the Americans could not rob the church any longer;" that he had the paper, "in which were all his hopes;" "that he was well off;" and used other exultant expressions, which denote that the acquisition of the deed was newly made, and that a great change was effected by it in his condition and feelings. In the month of March, 1850, he announced to the public of San Francisco that such a grant was in his possession, with other circumstances before detailed, and in the month of April conveyed the land to the claimant.

The testimony does not disclose what was the depository of this grant in Santa Barbara, nor when, nor under what circumstances it was placed there, nor under what circumstances withdrawn. Neither Santillan nor Dr. Poli have been examined as witnesses: nor was Pio Pico interrogated in reference to the authenticity of the grant.

There is no proof to show that any of the conditions of the grant have been fulfilled. The testimony as to the payment of any portion of the mission debts is vague and unsatisfactory. There was no judicial possession sought or obtained, and no claim made for the land as the grantee thereof, to give the community at large any information concerning it.

Our opinion, consequently, is, that the validity of the grant has not been sustained, and that the decrees of the Board of Commissioners and the district court are erroneous and must be reversed, and that the cause be remanded to the district court, with directions to dismiss the claim.

v.
JAMES B. LARUE, CARLISLE P. PATTERSON AND JOHN R. FOURATT.

(See S. C., 23 How., 435–438.)

Ferry between Oakland and San Francisco—rule of construction of grants, by Legislature to corporations—doubtful words construed more strongly against grantee.

The Town of Oakland did not possess the power under its charter to grant an exclusive right of ferries between that place and the City of San Francisco.

It is a well settled rule of construction of grants by the Legislature to corporations, whether public or private, that only such powers and rights can be exercised under them as are clearly comprehended within the words of the Act or derived therefrom by necessary implication, regard being had to the objects of the grant.

Any ambiguity or doubt arising out of the terms used by the Legislature must be resolved in favor of the public.

A forced interpretation, the court is not at liberty to give.

If the meaning of the words be doubtful, they shall be taken most strongly against the grantee and for the government, and therefore should not be extended by implication beyond the natural and obvious meaning of the words; and if these do not support the claim, it must fall.

Argued Apr. 24, 1860. Decided May 4, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellant, to restrain the defendants from running a ferry between the City of San Francisco and the City of Oakland, claiming an exclusive right of ferries between said cities in himself.

The defendants demurred. The court sustained the demurrer and entered a decree dismissing the bill, whereupon the complainant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson, for appellant:

The right to keep a ferry in England is an incorporeal hereditament, being a franchise granted by the Crown, or depending on prescription, which presupposes a grant.

5 Com. Dig., 291; 1 Nott & McC., 387.

In respect to the establishment and regulation of ferries, the state government have succeeded to the prerogative and jurisdiction of the crown.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1.

It is no objection to the grant of a ferry privilege, that it is to extend over public navigable waters and arms of the sea.

15 Pick., 253.

There can be no doubt as to the power of the Legislature to establish or authorize the running of a ferry between San Francisco and Oakland, and it is well settled that the Legislature of a State may confer upon a city or a town, by an act of incorporation, the authority to establish and regulate ferries within certain districts, in as ample manner as they themselves possess it.

Costar v. Brush, 25 Wend., 631; Fanning v. Gregoire, 16 How., 525.

It was said by the circuit court that every grant of power to a corporation was to be construed most strongly against the grantee, and that nothing passes by implication, and that though the words in the charter of the Town of Oakland "Regulate and keep in repair," were applicable to ferries, yet that the word "make" was not properly applicable, and that, therefore, it was possible that the board of trustees might regulate ferries, provided there were any established, but could not create them. The word "make" signifies to "create," to call into being, to construct, to establish.

There is no verb in the English language more comprehensive, and I presume no judicial authority can be found which discards the word "make" as inappropriate to express the idea of establishing a ferry.

See Stark v. McGowen, 1 Nott & McC., 387; 1 Harg. Law Tracts, ch. 2, page 6.

It is only in cases of doubt that the grant by the sovereign is to be construed favorably to the grantor. Here there is no occasion to resort to any such rule of construction, nor is there any such rule; so that nothing passes in the grant of a charter, or other franchise, by implication.

1 Salk., 142; 14 Vin., tit. Grants, Z, 29; Fitz., tit. Grants, 41.

The second objection to the right claimed by the appellant was, that if the board of trustees had the power to license or create ferries, they exceeded their power in attempting to make a grant so extensive as this one. That they, at least, had no express power to grant an exclusive right.

Gales v. Anderson, 18 Ill., 418, has been cited as sustaining that view. That case, however, depended upon peculiar statutes of Illinois.

In B. & L. R. R. Co. v. S. & L. R. R. Co., 2 Gray, 1, 32, 33, the doctrine that a Legislature cannot devest itself of power over a particular subject, so as to prohibit a subsequent Legislature from acting on the same subject-matter, was held to have no application to grants of franchises.

In the case of Costar v. Brush, 25 Wend., 631, it was held, that the Legislature of a State may confer upon a city or town by Act of incorporation, the authority to establish and regulate ferries, and that a corporation so vested with the power, may, in its discretion, in establishing a ferry, grant exclusive privileges, and the exercise of this power is binding on the corporation and the public.

To open up and maintain this ferry with suitable steamboats, required a great deal of care, skill and attention, and a vast outlay of capital. No one could be found willing to invest so much money and to incur the obligations imposed by law, without being protected by the grant of an exclusive right. The establishment of a new ferry so near to an old one as to divert its patronage and diminish its profits, is an invasion of the rights of the latter by the common law.

There is no difference between a franchise by prescription and a recent grant from the Crown, in that respect.

See Trotter v. Harris, 2 Young & J., 285; Huzzey v. Field, 2 Cromp., M. & R., 432; Willes, 508; 6 Mees. & W., 234; 3 Bl. Com., 219; 1 Nott & McC., 387; 1 Hayw., 457; 1 Day, 21; 3 Murph., 57.

Counsel then reviewed the statutes of California relating to the subject.

Laws of 1850, p. 97; Laws of 1851, p. 183; Laws of 1853, p. 85; Laws of 1855, p. 188.

The plaintiff holds a ferry franchise, with all the rights and privileges, and all the responsibilities and obligations imposed by law. He is bound to maintain and keep it up, whether there be opposition or not. The defendants are usurping the franchise of a ferry, without grant or prescription. In regard to the power of courts of equity to relieve in such a case, see 1 Nott & McC., 387; 9 Johns., 507; 7 N. H., 35; 2 Gray, 1; Moor v. Veazie, 32 Me., 343.

Mr. Edward M. Stanton, for appellee:

The Bay of San Francisco is an arm of the sea. Navigation thereof, by the laws of the United States and the laws of California, is free, and exempt from any private exclusive right.

Acts of California, 14th April, 1858.

2. The Act incorporating the Town of Oakland conferred on that Corporation no exclusive right of property or interest in any ferry, but only a power to regulate ferries over waters within the corporate limits; and the corporation having no such right, could not confer it upon Carpenter and his assigns.

3. The power of the Corporation did not extend to ferries across the Bay of San Francisco, or beyond the corporate limits.

Mills v. St. Clair, 8 How., 569.

4. The power to regulate ferries, conferred by the Legislature upon the corporate powers of Oakland, was a public trust to be exercised for the public interest, and the alleged grant of a private, exclusive right for 20 years to Carpenter and his assigns, was a violation of that trust, inoperative and void.

15 Pick., 243.

5. By the grant of power conferred upon the corporate authority of Oakland, the State of California did not surrender its general power to regulate ferries as might be required by the public interest, and the Act of 14th April, 1853, prescribing free navigation of the Bay of San Francisco, exempt from any ferry laws, regulated and controlled any ordinance, contract or provision of the Town of Oakland.

Counsel also referred to the following cases: Minturn v. LaRue, 1 McAll., 371; Regents v. Williams, 9 Gill & J., 401; State v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 12 Gill & J., 446; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat., 518.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California.

The bill was filed by the complainant in the court below to restrain the defendants from running a ferry between the City of San Francisco and the City of Oakland, on the opposite side of the bay, and which, it is claimed, is in violation of the exclusive privileges belonging to him under the authority of law. The authority, as set forth in the bill, is derived from the Charter of the Town (now City) of Oakland. The 8d section of the charter (passed May 4, 1852) provided that "the Board of Trustees shall have power to make such by-laws and ordinances as they may deem proper and necessary;" among other things, "to lay out, make, open, widen, regulate and keep in repair, all streets, roads, bridges, ferries" &c., "wharves, docks, piers, slips" &c.; "and to authorize the construction of the same;" and with a view to facilitate the construction of wharves and other improvements, the lands lying within the limits aforesaid (that is, of the corporation), between high tide and ship channel, are hereby granted and released to said town."

It is admitted, if the authorities of the Town of Oakland possessed the power under the charter to grant an exclusive right of ferries between that place and the City of San Francisco, the complainant has become vested with it. The question in the case, therefore, is, whether or not the power was conferred by this 8d sec. of the charter.

It is a well settled rule of construction of grants by the Legislature to corporations, whether public or private, that only such powers and rights can be exercised under them as are clearly comprehended within the words of the Act or derived therefrom by necessary implication, regard being had to the objects of the grant. Any ambiguity or doubt arising out of the terms used by the Legislature must be resolved in favor of the public. This principle has been so often applied in the construction of corporate powers, that we need not stop to refer to authorities.

Now, looking at the terms of the grant in this case, and giving them their widest meaning, either separately or in the connection in which they are found, or with the object for which the power was conferred, we find, indeed, a power to establish and regulate ferries within the corporate limits of the town, but not an exclusive power. Full effect is given to the words in which the power is granted, when the simple right is conceded to establish and regulate ferries. If the grant had been made to an individual in the terms here used, the question would have been too plain for argument. In our judgment, it can have no wider interpretation, though made to a corporation. It must be remembered that this is not the case where the Crown or the Legislature has aliened to a municipal corporation its whole power to establish and regulate ferries within its limits, as may be found in some of the ancient charters of cities in England and in this country. In those cases, the municipal body, in respect to this legislative or public trust, represents the sovereign power, and may make grants of ferry rights in as ample a manner as the sovereign. The error, we think, in the argument for the appellant is, in confounding this grant with these ancient charters, or those of a like character. But on referring to them, it will be seen that the form of the grant is very different, much more particular and comprehensive, leaving no doubt as to the extent of the power. Costar v. Brush, 25 Wend., 631. So here, if the Legislature had intended to confer their whole power upon this corporation to establish and regulate ferries within its limits, or a power to grant exclusive ferry rights therein, a very different form of grant would have been used—one that would have expressed the intent of the law maker to part with the exclusive power over the subject, and vest it in the grantee. In the form used, no such intent appears or can be reached, except by a very forced interpretation, which we are not at liberty to give, according to well settled authority. Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet., 422; Mills v. St. Clair Co., 8 How., 569; Fanning v. Gregoire, 16 How., 524, 534.

In Mills v. St. Clair Co., the court, speaking of a ferry grant, said that in a grant like this by the sovereign power, the rule of construction is, that if the meaning of the words be doubtful, they shall be taken most strongly against the grantee and for the government and, therefore, should not be extended by implication beyond the natural and obvious meaning of the words; and if these do not support the claim, it must fall. And again, in Fanning v. Gregoire, speaking on the same subject, the court say: The exclusive right set up must be clearly expressed or necessarily inferred, and the court think that neither the one nor the other is found in the grant to the plaintiff, nor in the circumstances connected with it.

As the Town of Oakland had no power, according to the above construction of the charter, to establish an exclusive right of ferries within its limits, it follows that it did not possess the power to confer upon others an exclusive privilege to establish them.

The power conferred is to make (meaning to establish) and regulate ferries, or to authorize the construction (meaning the establishment) of the same.

We think the court below was right, and that the decree must be affirmed.

SALVADOR CASTRO, Appt.,
v.
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS, Commissioner of the GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

(See S. C., 23 How., 438–443.)

Object of Act of 1851 as to California land claims —provisions of—contests between subsequent claimants—decision of Commissioner of Land Office, when upheld.

The primary object of the Act, "to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," approved 3d March, 1851, was to distinguish the vacant and public lands from those that were private property.

For this purpose, an inquiry into pre-existing titles became necessary. To accomplish this, every person claiming lands in California, by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government, was required to present the same to a Board of Commissioners.

The government has no interest in the contests between persons claiming ex post facto the grant; nor is this government charged to decide between such claimants.

The refusal of the Commissioner of the Land Office to issue a patent upon this survey, was an appropriate exercise of the functions of his office.

Argued Apr. 25, 1860. Decided May 4, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

This case arose upon a petition filed in the court below, by the appellant, for a writ of mandamus to be directed to Thomas A Hendricks, Commissioner of the General Land Office, requiring him to issue a patent to the petitioner for certain lands.

The court below entered a decree refusing the writ, whereupon the petitioner took an appeal to this court. A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. H. P. Hepburn and R. J. Brent, for appellant.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant petitioned the circuit court for a writ of mandamus, to be directed to the Hon. Thomas A Hendricks, Commissioner of the Land Office, commanding him to prepare and provide a patent to the appellant for a parcel of land in California, which had been confirmed to him by the decree of the District Court for the Northern District of California, and is described in a survey approved by the Surveyor-General of that State.

Is appears from the petition and answer, and the papers filed in the circuit court, and forming a part of the record, that in the year 1839 the Governor of California granted to Antonio Buelna a tract of land known as San Gregorio, of the extent of four square leagues, a little more or less, as is shown in the sketch attached to the espediente. In 1849 the representatives of Buelna (his widow and her husband) sold to the appellant one league of land in the location of San Gregorio; and in 1852 they executed a deed, conveying the same land, by the description of one league of land, in the place known by the name of San Gregorio, on the coast north of Santa Cruz, being part of a tract of land of four leagues, granted by the government to Antonio Buelna, and the same is declared to be situate and bounded as follows, and containing one league, more or less: commencing at a stake marked A, in the Cañada de los Tunis, where the Arroyo de los Tunis comes out of the mountains; thence running southerly with the ridge of the mountains to the stake marked B in the Arroyo Hondo; thence following said Arroyo Hondo until it meets the Arroyo de San Gregorio; thence, following the Arroyo de San Gregorio, to a stake marked C on a white rock in the mountain, situate on the west side of said

Arroyo; thence northwardly, about two miles, to a high conical peak of the mountain, on which is a placed stake marked D; thence eastwardly to the place of beginning.

Separate claims were presented by the widow of Buelna and Salvador Castro for their respective portions of the rancho San Gregorio, and separate decrees of confirmation were made in the district court. The decree in favor of Madame Buelna is for three square leagues of the land within the boundaries described in the plan attached to the espediente, and referred to in the original grant, copies of which are on file in the cause. Salvador Castro was confirmed to the tract of land described in the deed by the metes and bounds before mentioned, with the addition, "being portion of the four leagues granted April 16, 1839, by J. B. Alvarado to Antonio Buelna, and known as San Gregorio, the tract hereby confirmed containing, by estimate, one square league, and being the same land described in the conveyance to the claimant." The two decrees were communicated to the Surveyor-General of California in 1857, and his returns are filed as testimony in the cause. He has laid off to Madame Buelna the three square leagues confirmed to her, and has surveyed for the appellant a tract within the specific calls of the deed and decree of fifteen thousand seven hundred and 54-100 acres. It is apparent, from this statement, that the Surveyor-General has entirely disregarded the limits of the rancho San Gregorio, and the restrictions as to quantity in the grant of Alvarado, Governor of California, of April, 1839. But these, for the object before the court, were the controlling calls in the deed, as well as in the decree. The primary object of the Act, "to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," approved 3d March, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 631), was to distinguish the vacant and public lands from those that were private property; and for this purpose, an inquiry into pre-existing titles became necessary. To accomplish this, every person claiming lands in California, by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government, was required to present the same to a board of commissioners. The mesne conveyances were also required, but not for any aim of submitting their operation and validity to the board, but simply to enable the board to determine if there was a bona fide claimant before it under a Mexican grant; and so this court have repeatedly declared that the government had no interest in the contests between persons claiming ex post facto the grant. United States v. Sutter, 21 How., 170.

The authentic evidence of what is private property, is to be found in the grants of the Government of California, and not in the mesne conveyances. Nor is this government charged to decide between claimants in the condition of those interested in the rancho San Gregorio. It was entirely competent for the district court to connect the claims arising under the same grant, and it will be its duty, in superintending the execution of the decrees of that court in such cases, to look to the evidence furnished by the grant itself as overruling in determining questions of boundary and location.

In the case of The United States v. Fossatt, 21 How., 445, this court had occasion to refer to the limits of the authority of the courts of the United States under the Act of the 3d March, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 631), before cited. We stated in that case, that if questions of a judicial nature arose in the settlement of the location and boundary of the grants confirmed to individuals, the district court was empowered to settle those questions upon a proper case being submitted to it before the issue of the patent; and in such a case, the judgment may properly extend to the confirmation of the survey, and an order for a patent to issue. But it was not the expectation of this court that the Surveyor-General should make returns to the district court in every case, nor did they imply that the validity of a survey depended on the recognition of that court, or its incorporation into a decree of the court. The Surveyor-General of California was charged with the duty to cause all private claims which shall be finally confirmed to be accurately surveyed, and to furnish plats for the same; and in the location of the said claims, he was invested with such power and authority as are conferred on the Register of the Land Office and Receiver of the Public Moneys of Louisiana, in the 6th section of the "Act to create the office of Surveyor of the Public Lands for the State of Louisiana," approved 3d March, 1831 (4 Stat. at L., 492). Under this Act the Surveyor-General exercises a quasi judicial power; and the claimant with an authentic certificate of the decree of confirmation, and a plat or survey of the land, duly certified and approved by the Surveyor-General, is entitled to a patent. But then, the Commissioner of the Land Office, by virtue of enabling Acts of Congress, exercises a supervision and control over the acts of the subordinate officers charged with making surveys; and it is his duty to see that the location and survey made by that officer under the decree of the court, and which has not had the final sanction of the judicial tribunals, is in accordance with the decree.

The refusal of the Commissioner of the Land Office, to issue a patent upon this survey, was an appropriate exercise of the functions of his office, and the decree of the circuit court refusing a mandamus is affirmed, with costs.

v.

THE STATE OF LOUISIANA.

(See S. C., 23 How., 445–448.)

Louisiana law taxing property of decedent—when not invalid by the Treaty with U. S.—construction of such treaty.

By a statute of Louisiana, it is provided that "each and every person, not being domiciliated in this state, and not being a citizen of any other State or Territory in the Union, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on all sums actually received from a succession of a deceased person."

The third article of the Convention between the U. S. and the King of Wurtemberg, is, that "the citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal property within the states of the other, by testament, and their legatees, being citizens or subjects of the other contracting party, shall succeed to their said personal property, and may take possession thereof, paying such duties only as the inhabitants of the country, where the said property lies, shall be liable to pay in like cases."

The Act of Louisiana does not make any discrimination between citizens of the State and aliens in the same circumstances, and was nothing more than the exercise of the power which every State or sovereignty possesses.

The Treaty does not regulate the testamentary dispositions of citizens or subjects of the contracting powers, in reference to property within the country of their origin or citizenship.

The case of a citizen or subject of the respective countries residing at home, and disposing of property there in favor of a citizen or subject of the other, is not embraced in this article of the Treaty.

Argued Apr. 25, 1860. Decided May 4, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of Louisiana for the Eastern District.

This case arose upon opposition made by the State of Louisiana to the account filed in the settlement of the succession of John David Fink, deceased, in the Second District Court of New Orleans. The State claimed a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of certain legacies left by said Fink, one of her citizens, to certain subjects of the King of Wurtemberg.

The levying of the tax was resisted on the ground that the legatees were exempt therefrom by virtue of the third article of the Convention of Wurtemberg of April 10, 1844. The said court entered a judgment allowing the State the tax claimed.

The Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana having affirmed this judgment, on appeal, the defendants sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Miles Taylor, for plaintiff in error:

Treaties made under the authority of the United States are the supreme law of the land. U. S. Const., art. 6.

The Convention between the United States and Wurtemberg (8 Stat. at L., 588), was entered into by the governments of the two countries for the advantage of both. Art. 3 of that Convention was designed by Wurtemberg to secure to her subjects at home the right to receive inheritances falling to them in the United States, in the same manner and on the same terms as if they were citizens of the United States, as well as to obtain for those of her subjects who came into the United States, the right to dispose of their personal property by testament, donation or otherwise; and the fact that an emigrant from Wurtemberg became naturalized under our laws, can have no effect to deprive the heirs of the one naturalized of the benefit stipulated for in their interest when the Treaty was made. This is clear upon the principles which should govern in the construction of treaties.

But this is not all. Under the jurisprudence of the United States with respect to the position of her own citizens who see fit to have themselves naturalized in other countries, the fact of naturalization would not work such a change in the condition of the citizen or subject as would destroy the relations previously existing between him and his native country, when her interest or those of her people required those relations to continue.

4 Am. Law Jour., 461; Talbot v. Janson, 3 Dall., 133, 152, 158.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for defendant in error:

1. By the terms of the Treaty itself, it does not include the case now before the court. This is not the case of a citizen of the United States disposing of property in Wurtemberg, nor of a subject of Wurtemberg who disposes of property in the United States; but it is the case of one of our own citizens dying at home and disposing of property lying within the State of which he was a citizen and in which he died.

2. If the case were within the Treaty, the result would be the same, because the exemption extends only to such duties as are not imposed on the inhabitants of the country where the property lies. Now, by the law of Louisiana, the duty would be levied on the legacies accruing to these parties, even if they were citizens of Louisiana. Our own citizens are compelled to pay this tax, if they reside abroad.

The State v. Poydras, 9 La. Ann., 166.

3. The United States had no power by treaty to interfere with or control the right of the State of Louisiana to tax property within its limits, or to control or regulate the descent of property in the State. These powers were not conferred by the States on the General Government, and remain vested in the State.

Const. U. S., 9th Amendment; see, also, Federalist, Nos. 32 and 34; Sto. Const., sec. 1508, and authors there cited.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error made opposition to the account filed in the settlement of the succession of John David Fink, deceased, in the Second District Court of New Orleans, because the executor did not place on the tableau ten per cent. upon the amounts respectively allowed to certain legatees, who are subjects of the King of Wurtemberg. By a statute of Louisiana, it is provided that "each and every person, not being domiciliated in this State, and not being a citizen of any other State or Territory in the Union, who shall be entitled, whether as heirs, legatee, or donee, to the whole or any part of the succession of a person deceased, whether such a person shall have died in this State or elsewhere, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on all sums, or on the value of all property which he may have actually received from said succession, or so much thereof as is situated in this State, after deducting all debts due by the succession." The claim of the State of Louisiana was resisted in the district court, on the ground that it is contrary to the provisions of the third article of the Convention between the United States of America and His Majesty, the King of Wurtemberg, of the 10th April, 1844. That article is, that "The citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal property within the States of the other, by testament, donation, or otherwise; and their heirs, legatees and donees, being citizens or subjects of the other contracting party, shall succeed to their said personal property, and may take possession thereof, either by themselves, or by others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their pleasure, paying such duties only as the inhabitants of the country, where the said property lies, shall be liable to pay in like cases." This court, in Mager v. Grima, 8 How., 490, decided that the Act of the Legislature of Louisiana was nothing more than the exercise of the power which every State or sovereignty possesses of regulating the manner and terms upon which property, real and personal, within its dominion, may be transmitted by last will and testament, or by inheritance, and of prescribing who shall and who shall not be capable of taking it. The case before the District Court in Louisiana concerned the distribution of the succession of a citizen of that State, and of property situated there. The Act of the Legislature under review does not make any discrimination between citizens of the State and aliens in the same circumstances. A citizen of Louisiana domiciliated abroad is subject to this tax. The State v. Poydras, 9 La. Ann., 165; therefore, if this article of the treaty comprised the succession of a citizen of Louisiana, the complaint of the foreign legatees would not be justified. They are subject to "only such duties as are exacted from citizens of Louisiana under the same circumstances." But we concur with the Supreme Court of Louisiana in the opinion that the Treaty does not regulate the testamentary dispositions of citizens or subjects of the contracting powers, in reference to property within the country of their origin or citizenship. The cause of the Treaty was, that the citizens and subjects of each of the contracting powers were or might be subject to onerous taxes upon property possessed by them within the States of the other, by reason of their alienage. and its purpose was to enable such persons to dispose of their property, paying such duties only as the inhabitants of the country, where the property lies, pay under like conditions. The case of a citizen or subject of the respective countries residing at home, and disposing of property there in favor of a citizen or subject of the other, was not in the contemplation of the contracting powers, and is not embraced in this article of the Treaty. This view of the Treaty disposes of this cause upon the grounds on which it was determined in the Supreme Court of Louisiana. It has been suggested in the argument of this case, that the Government of the United States is incompetent to regulate testamentary dispositions or laws of inheritance of foreigners, in reference to property within the States.

The question is one of great magnitude, but it is not important in the decision of this cause, and we consequently abstain from entering upon its consideration.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, is affirmed.

v.

THE MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF VICKSBURG.

(See S. C., 23 How., 443–445.)

Affidavit to pleading, when waived by demurrer —pleading, when demurrable by state law for want of such affidavit.

Plea of non est factum was filed without an affidavit of its truth, which is required by a statute of Mississippi to authorize its reception. Held, that the filing of the plea is only irregular, and a demurrer or replication to it is a waiver of the affidavit, upon the general principles of pleading.

But in courts of States in which this statute exists, a plea of non est factum, without the affidavit required by it, is demurrable. Such is the practice in Mississippi.

The circuit court may maintain the rules of pleading prescribed by the statutes of a State, or adopt the usual practice in the state, if not contrary to an Act of Congress.

Where the practice in the circuit court conforms to the state practice, it would be a surprise upon the plaintiff, and might work injustice, if we were to sustain the plea under such circumstances.

Argued Mar. 30, 1860. Decided May 4, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi.

The history and facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for plaintiffs in error:

Defendants in error rely on their plea of non est factum, and contend that a demurrer to such plea cannot be maintained. This is undoubtedly true at common law, but the State of Mississippi has, by statute, changed the common law on this subject, and the Circuit Court of the United States in that circuit has adopted the Mississippi law on the subject of pleading. This fact need not appear on the face of the record, for it is judicially known to the court. Now, the Statutes of Mississippi on this subject provide "that no plea in abatement shall be admitted or received, unless the parties offering the same shall prove the truth thereof by oath or affirmation, as the case may require; and no plea of non est factum offered by any person charged as obligor, covenantor or guarantor of a deed, shall be admitted or received, unless the truth thereof shall in like manner be proved by oath or affirmation.

Hutch. Dig., 846.

"Whenever any suit shall be commenced in any of the courts of this State, founded on any writing, whether the same be under seal or not, the court before whom the same is depending shall receive such writing as evidence of the debt, promise, undertaking or duty for which it was given, and it shall not be lawful for the defendant or defendants to deny the execution of any such writing, unless it be by plea supported by affidavit of the truth thereof, to be filed therewith at the time such plea is filed.

See, also, Rev. Code of Miss., 518.

These statutes speak for themselves. The plea in question was filed unlawfully, and was not a legal denial of the execution of the bond sued on, because not supported by "affidavit of the truth thereof, filed therewith."

The transcript contains the whole record as certified, and this court cannot presume, in opposition to the certificate, that the affidavit was filed.

The plaintiff had, it is true, the right to move the court to strike out the plea, but he had also the right to question its sufficiency by demurrer.

The plain meaning of the statute is, that the plea of non est factum, unless accompanied by affidavit of its truth, shall not be sufficient in law on its face to constitute a denial of the fact of the execution of the deed. In Mississippi, under the statute, the plea would be treated at any stage of the cause as a nullity, being "deficient in one of the substantial requisites of the statute."

Prewitt v. Bennett, 7 S. & M., 101; Templeton v. Planters' Bank, 5 How. Miss., 171.

But the plea was properly demurred to as defective under the law, and the demurrer was the proper and regular mode of disposing of it, under the law of Mississippi.

Smith v. Bank, 6 Sm. & M., 314; Johnston v. Beard, 7 Sm. & M., 214.

The construction put by the state courts on their own statutes is, of course, adopted by this court, under its repeated decisions.

Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Pet., 264; McCracken v. Hayward, 2 How., 612.

Finally, the judgment of the court below was erroneous, even if the demurrer was properly overruled. Under the Mississippi practice, the judgment should not have been final, but respondeat ouster.

Randolph v. Singleton, 12 Sm. & M., 439.

Messrs. George E. Badger and J. M. Carlisle, for defendants in error:

As to the plea of non est factum, it is supposed that the objection may be, that the plea was not verified by the oath or affirmation of "the party offering the same."

How. & Hutch. Dig., tit. Pleading and Practice, 589.

To this it may be answered: 1st. That it does not appear that there was not the required affidavit. It is no part of the plea, and is not necessarily a part of the record. In the court below, so far as appears by the record, no reference was made to the supposed absence of an affidavit, and upon this writ of error it will be presumed that there was an affidavit if necessary, as the plea was received and treated as a plea, and its sufficiency and substance questioned by general demurrer.

2d. It is the office of a demurrer to call in question the sufficiency of a declaration, plea, &c., upon what appears on its face, without reference to any extrinsic matter; but the affidavit is no part of the plea; it may be waived, either expressly or by implication.

1 Ch. Pl., chap. 9; Steph. Pl., 44; Richmond v. Tallmadge, 16 Johns., 311.

The filing of the plea without an affidavit is an irregularity; but if the plaintiff treats it as a plea pleaded, he has waived the objection.

See Bray v. Haller, 2 J. B. Moore, 218; Rex v. Cook, 2 Barn. & C., 618.

And as to the precise question here, it has been expressly ruled by this court on a special demurrer for want of an affidavit, in Bank v. Slocomb, 14 Pet., 60, a case arising under the same statute of Mississippi. The court said that it could, at most, only have been urged as an objection to the receiving of the plea, but could not be relied on as ground of demurrer.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff instituted this suit upon a sealed instrument, made in the name of the City of Vicksburg, payable to bearer. The defendant pleaded fifteen pleas; to ten of which the plaintiff demurred, and judgment was rendered for the defendant on the demurrer. Some of these pleas involved important questions touching the validity of the instrument, which have, since the decision of the circuit court, been the subject of discussion in the Supreme Court of Mississippi and in this court. It is conceded that nine of the pleas were insufficient, and that the demurrers should have been sustained to them. The remaining plea is the ordinary non est factum. This was filed without an affidavit of its truth, and this is required by a statute of Mississippi to authorize its reception. But the defendant contends that it is the office of a demurrer to call in question the sufficiency of a declaration or other pleading upon what appears upon its face, without reference to any extrinsic matter; that the affidavit is not a part of the plea; it is only that which is necessary to authorize the plea to be placed on file, and it may be waived either expressly or by implication. The filing of the plea is only irregular, and a demurrer or replication to it is a waiver. Upon the general principles of pleading, we assent to the accuracy of this argument.

Commercial & R. R. Bank of Vicksburg v. Slocomb, 14 Pet., 60; Nicholl v. Mason, 21 Wend., 339.

But in courts of states in which this statute exists, a plea of non est factum, without the affidavit required by it, is demurrable. Such is the practice in Mississippi.

Smith v. Com. Bank of Rodney, 6 Sm. & M., 88; Johnston v. Beard, 7 Sm. & M., 214; Bancroft v. Paine, 15 Ala., 834; 4 Ala., 198.

We do not question the power of the circuit court to maintain the rules of pleading in the manner of applying the statutes of a State, or it may adopt the usual practice in the State, if not contrary to an Act of Congress.

We learn that the course of practice in the circuit court conforms to the state practice. We suppose that it would be a surprise upon the plaintiff, and might work injustice, if we were to sustain the plea under such circumstances.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

When judgment will be affirmed with ten per cent. damages—amendments allowed to pleadings, not grounds of error.

Where defendants, on refusing or neglecting to plead, were defaulted and judgment was given for plaintiff, and defendants sued out a writ of error, but failed to appear, and have not assigned error in this court, and it is obvious, from an inspection of the transcript, that there is no error in the proceedings, the judgment affirmed with ten per cent. damages.

Motions to amend mere formal defects in the pleadings are always addressed to the discretion of the court, and their allowance is never the subject of error.

No counsel appeared in this court for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. R. H. Gillet, for defendants in error:

First. The practice of an inferior court is not the subject of review upon a writ of error. Marine Ins. Co. of Alexandria v. Hodgson, 6 Cranch, 206; Simms v. Hundley, 6 How., 1; Turner v. Yates, 16 How., 14, p. 29.

Second. The amendments permitted to be made to the plaintiff's declaration, were within the discretion of the court below, and cannot be reviewed or reversed on error.

The reasoning and cases cited under the preceding point fully sully sustain the above position.

Third. The assessment of the damages by the court below on a default, is not the subject of review upon a writ of error.

Fourth. There being no grounds for an arrest of judgment on account of incurable defects in the declaration, there can be no error in the judgment which can be reviewed and corrected by this court.

Not a solitary objection was made to any proceeding in the court below. It follows that there is no error to correct, and the judgment must be affirmed.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon a writ of error to the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin. It was an action of debt upon a judgment recovered by the present defendant against the plaintiff in error, in the District Court of the United States for the Second Judicial District of the Territory of Minnesota. As originally framed, the declaration did not contain any caption specifying the term of the court when it was filed, or the return day of the process on which it was founded. In point of fact, it was filed on the 30th day of December, 1857, and the process was regularly returnable to the succeeding January Term of the district court, to which this writ of error issued. Service of the summons upon the defendants was duly made on the following day, and the record shows that they subsequently appeared and demurred to the declaration, showing for cause the formal defects before mentioned. On the 18th day of January, 1858, the plaintiff, by leave of the court, amended his declaration, obviating the defects shown by the demurrer.

No exceptions were taken to the order of the court granting leave to amend, and, for aught that appears to the contrary, the amendment was made without objection.

After the amendment was allowed, the court overruled the demurrer, and the defendants refusing or neglecting to plead to the merits of the case, they were defaulted. Whereupon the plaintiff moved for judgment, and filed a duly certified copy of the former judgment on which the suit was founded. Reference was then made of the cause to the clerk to compute the interest, and on his report being made in writing, judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the former judgment, together with interest on the same.

On this state of the record, the defendants sued out a writ of error, and removed the cause into this court, but have failed to appear and prosecute their writ of error. They did not except to the ruling of the district court, and have not assigned error in this court, and it is obvious, from an inspection of the transcript, that there is no error in the proceeding. Motions to amend mere formal defects in the pleadings are always addressed to the discretion of the court, and are usually granted as a matter of course, and their allowance is never the subject of error. That point has been so frequently decided, that we do not think it necessary to cite authorities in its support.

Under these circumstances, the counsel for the defendant in error moves that the judgment be affirmed, with ten per cent. damages. By the twenty-third rule of this court, it is provided that in all cases where a writ of error shall delay the proceedings on the judgment of the inferior court, and shall appear to have been sued out for delay, damages shall be awarded at the rate of ten per centum per annum on the amount of the judgment, and the said damages shall be calculated from the date of the judgment in the court below, until the money is paid.

That rule is applicable to this case, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed, with costs and ten per cent. damages.

THOMAS WHITRIDGE ET AL., Claimants of the Schooner FANNIE CROCKER, Appts.,

v.

JOSHUA DILL ET AL.

(See S. C., 23 How., 448–455.)

Collision between two schooners—want of lookout—rules of vessel astern passing the vessel ahead.

In case of collision in Chesapeake Bay, between two schooners, in the evening, the vessel of the respondents was held in fault because she had no lookout; and the neglect of that precaution contributed to the disaster, and in all probability was the sole cause that produced it.

If the vessel of the respondents was not sufficiently to the windward to have passed the other vessel in safety, then she was also in fault, because she did not seasonably give way and pass to the right, or adopt necessary precautions to pass in safety.

Where a vessel astern, in an open sea and in good weather, is sailing faster than the one ahead, and pursuing the same general direction, if both vessels are close-hauled on the wind, the vessel astern, as a general rule, is bound to give way, or to adopt the necessary precautions to avoid a collision.

The vessel ahead, on that state of facts, has the seaway before her, and is entitled to hold her position.

Argued Apr. 27, 1860. Decided May 4, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, by the appellees, to recover damages resulting from a collision. The district court entered a decree in favor of the libelants for the full value of the vessel and cargo. This decree having been affirmed, on appeal, by the circuit court, the respondents took an appeal to this court.

(3 Wheat.), 546. Rights of steam and sailing vessels with reference to each other, and in passing and meeting. See note to St. John v. Paine, 51 U. S. (10 How.), 557.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George W. Brown and F. W. Brune, Jr., for appellants.

Mr. John H. B. Latrobe, for appellees:

The colliding vessel was clearly and alone in fault.

1. Because here was no proper lookout.

2. Because, even after The Smith was seen, there was negligence in not taking the proper means to avoid the collision.

In support of these positions, the following authorities are relied on:

St. John v. Paine, 10 How., 585; Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How., 607; The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 461; The New York, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 225; Wood v. Davis, 59 U. S. Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Maryland. The libel was filed in the district court on the 31st day of March, 1855. It was a proceeding in rem against the schooner Fannie Crocker, and was instituted by the libelants as the owners of the schooner Henry R. Smith, to recover damages on account of a collision which took place between those vessels on the 9th day of March, 1855, in the Chesapeake Bay, whereby the latter vessel was run down and totally lost. As alleged by the libelants, their vessel sailed the day previous to the collision, from Hampton Roads, in the State of Virginia, laden with a valuable cargo of oysters, and bound on a voyage to New Haven, in the State of Connecticut.

They also allege, that at half past eight o'clock in the evening of the day of the collision, the wind being then from the northwest, and blowing a fresh breeze, and when their schooner was heading one point to the eastward of north, close-hauled on the wind, another schooner was seen on their larboard quarter, about one third of a mile distant; that the strange schooner sailed faster than the vessel of libelants, and soon came up with and abeam of their vessel, when she put her helm up, bore away, and coming down on the vessel of the libelants, head on, struck her abreast the cabin, and so damaged her that she sunk in a few minutes, leaving the master and crew only time to escape on board the colliding vessel.

Many other facts and circumstances are stated in the libel to show that those on board the vessel of the libelants were not in fault, and that the collision was accasioned wholly through the unskillfulness and negligence of those in charge of the vessel of the claimants. In their answer, the claimants admit the collision, and that the vessel of the libelants was lost, but they deny that the circumstances attending the disaster are truly stated in the libel.

According to their account of the circumstances, it became necessary for The Fannie Crocker, between eight and nine o'clock in the evening of that day, and just before collision, to tack, in order to alter her course. At that time, as they allege, she was heading towards the southern and western shore, but being under a double-reef mainsail, foresail and jib, and in ballast trim, she failed to go round. Similar attempts, as they allege, were several times repeated, but without success. Finding that the vessel would not go round, the master then gave the order to wear ship, and in executing that order the main peak was lowered to enable the vessel to wear rapidly; but when the main boom passed over the deck, the wind caught the sail and threw it over the main gaff, and tore the sail from the leech-rope, rendering it perfectly useless. While assisting to execute this order, one of the seamen had his leg caught in the fore sheet, and was severely injured, when all hands, except the master, who was at the wheel, went to relieve the seaman. After disengaging the seaman from his dangerous situation, the rest of the hands, as the claimants allege, were called to haul in the mainsail, which was then dragging in the water, and at this juncture another vessel, which subsequently proved to be the schooner of the libelants, was seen on the starboard quarter of the claimants' vessel, some three or four lengths off. In order to prevent the two vessels from coming in contact, the claimants allege that the helm of their vessel was put hard up, with a view to go to the stern of the strange vessel; but the effort was unavailing, and the two vessels came together, and, as the claimants allege, wholly through the carelessness and unskillful management of those in charge of the other vessel, in not altering their course in proper time to avoid a collision.

Some particularity has been observed in stating the defense, in order that the respondents may have the full benefit of the position they have assumed.

Two witnesses only were examined, on the part of the libelants, in respect to the circumstances of the disaster. In the district court a decree was entered for the libelants, allowing them the full value of their vessel and cargo; and on appeal to the circuit court, that decree was affirmed: whereupon the respondents appealed to this court.

From the pleadings and evidence, it satisfactorily appears that The Henry R. Smith was a schooner of one hundred and thirty-four tons, and that she was laden with oysters, and bound on a voyage to New Haven, in the State of Connecticut. She was a stanch vessel, well manned and equipped, showed a proper light at the time of the collision, and had a sufficient and competent lookout. On the other hand, The Fannie Crocker was a schooner of two hundred and twenty-two tons, sailing in ballast, and was bound on a voyage from Dighton, in the State Massachusetts, to Baltimore, in the State of Maryland. Like the other vessel, she was stanch, and well manned and equipped, but failed to show a light at the time of the collision, and had no sufficient lookout stationed on any part of the vessel. All of the witnesses state that the night was clear, and that there was no difficulty in seeing objects, without lights, at considerable distance. They mention no circumstance tending to authorize the conclusion that the collision can be justified or excused on account of the character of the night or the difficulties of the navigation. Occurring, as it did, inside of the capes, in the open bay, of a clear night, with no difficulties to encounter, except a fresh breeze from the northwest, it is obvious that one or both of the vessels must be in fault. They were both sailing in the same general direction; but the vessel of the respondents, being in ballast, and the larger of the two, was moving through the water at the greater speed. She was astern of the other vessel, and somewhat to the windward, but was sailing on a line converging to the track of the other vessel; and both vessels were close-hauled on the wind.

Terry, the mate of the libelants' vessel, says when he first saw the other schooner, she was half a mile distant on the weather quarter. At that time both vessels were on the wind and standing the same way—to the northward and eastward. According to his account, the vessel of the respondents sailed faster than the vessel of the libelants, and ran down until she got abreast of her to the windward, when she was about fifty rods distant. He also states, that when they first saw that she was coming down on them, they put the helm of their vessel up, and tried in every way to keep clear of her, but could not, as she had fallen off from her course, and was then before the wind.

Another witness (a seaman) was also examined by the libelants. His testimony substantially confirms the mate, and clearly shows that the vessel of the libelants was ahead, and that the other vessel was to the windward, and moving through the water much faster than the vessel of the libelants.

Both witnesses testify, in effect, that the approaching vessel, when she was nearly abreast of their vessel, fell off and struck the vessel of the libelants on the larboard quarter, as alleged in the answer. They both affirm that they had a sufficient and competent lookout and proper lights.

Several witnesses were also examined on the part of the respondents. Their account of the circumstances attending the disaster differs in several particulars from that given by the witnesses examined by the libelants. They all agree, however, that the vessel of the libelants was not seen by anyone on board their vessel until she was so near that all efforts on their part, to prevent a collision, were unavailing.

In effect, they also admit that their vessel, at the time of the collision, had no lookout engaged in the performance of that duty. On this latter point, the master says that he had directed the steward, a colored man, to keep a lookout, and adds, that he was somewhere about the main deck. But all hands had been called to haul in the mainsail, and the second mate states that he first saw the vessel of the libelants while he was engaged with the other hands in endeavoring to accomplish that object. When he saw the vessel, he says she was only about three times the length of his vessel off. At that time, all the hands, except the steward, were aft the mainsail, where they could not see the other vessel without changing their position. She was first descried by the second mate as he stepped up on to the "lazy board," so called, in order to haul up the damaged sail. He then cried out to the master to put the helm down, but the mate at the same time sung out to put the helm up. In this confusion the master adopted the suggestion of the mate; and he admits that the steward, when the alarm was given, came running aft, and assisted him in changing the helm.

Two other witnesses state that the steward assisted the master in putting up the helm; and one of them says that no particular person was keeping watch, and attempts to justify the neglect upon the ground that it is not customary to have a man forward when all hands are called to take in the sails.

Suffice it to say, without entering more into detail, that the testimony of the respondents shows, conclusively, that their vessel had no sufficient lookout at the time of the collision; and the second mate, who first discerned the vessel of the libelants, testifies, without qualification, that if they had seen her three or four minutes sooner, they could have cleared her and prevented a collision.

From these facts, which are proved beyond doubt, it necessarily follows that the vessel of the respondents was in fault. She had no lookout; and the neglect of that precaution contributed to the disaster, and in all probability was the sole cause that produced it.

2. Assuming that the vessel of the respondents was not sufficiently to the windward to have passed the other vessel in safety, then she was also in fault, because she did not seasonably give way, and pass to the right. Where a vessel astern, in an open sea and in good weather, is sailing faster than the one ahead, and pursuing the same general direction, if both vessels are close-hauled on the wind, the vessel astern, as a general rule, is bound to give way, or to adopt the nesessary precautions to avoid a collision. That rule rests upon the principle that the vessel ahead, on that state of facts, has the seaway before her, and is entitled to hold her position; and consequently, the vessel coming up must keep out of the way.

Speaking of steamers, Judge Betts said, in the case of The Governor, Abb's. Adm., 110, that the fact that they were running in the same direction, the one astern of the other, imposed upon the rear boat an obligation to precaution and care, which was not chargeable, to the same extent, upon the other. He accordingly held, that a vessel in advance is not bound to give way, or to give facilities to a vessel in her rear, to enable such vessel to pass; but that the vessel ahead is bound to refrain from any maneuvers calculated to embarrass the latter vessel while attempting to accomplish that object. Similar views had previously been announced by the same learned judge, in the case of The Steamboat Rhode Island, decided in 1847. In that case, it is said the approaching vessel, when she has command of her movements, takes upon herself the peril of determining whether a safe passage remains for her beside the vessel preceding her, and must bear the consequences of misjudgment in that respect. No immunity is extended by the law to the one possessing the greater speed; and so far from encouraging the exercise of the power to its utmost, the law cautiously warns and checks vessels propelled by steam against an improvident employment of speed, so as to involve danger to others, being stationary or moving with less velocity. Olcott, Adm., 515.

That case was appealed to the circuit court, where it was affirmed. The Rhode Island, 1 Blatchf., 363.

Emerigon says, a ship going out of a port last is to take care to avoid the vessel that has gone out before her, and he mentions the case of a small vessel which went out of the port of Marseilles, and in tacking struck a boat that went out before her, which was also tacking. Claim for damages was made by the boat, and the judges were of opinion that the vessel going out last is to take care to avoid the one before it. Emerigon, chap. 12, sec. 14, p, 330. Other continental authorities may be cited to the same effect. Whether it be by night or day, says Valin, b. 2, p. 578, the ship that leaves after another, and follows her, should take care to avoid a collision, without which she will have to answer in damages. Sibille de Abord age, sec. 249.

We are not aware that the precise question presented in this case has been ruled by any of the federal courts. Remarks are certainly to be found in the opinion of the court in the case of The Clement, 17 Law Rep., 444, which are inconsistent with the proposition here laid down. That case was appealed to the circuit court, and was there affirmed. But the remarks to which we refer were not necessary to the decision of the cause, and we think they must be received with some qualification. The Clement, 2 Curt. C. C., 368, sec. 1; Pars. Mar. Law, p. 197, note 2.

Without further discussion of the general principle at the present time, it will be sufficient to say, that we are satisfied that the rule assumed in this case is one well calculated to prevent collisions, and that it is one which ought to be constantly observed and enforced in all cases where it is applicable. That exceptionable cases may arise, is not at all improbable; but it will be the proper time to consider them when they are presented for decision. For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the vessel of the respondents was wholly in fault. Objection was made to the damages as excessive, on the ground that the vessel might have been raised from where she was sunk. After a careful examination of the testimony, we think the objection cannot be sustained.

The decree of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

v.

WILLIAM WILSON.

(See S. C., 23 How., 457–464.)

Treaty with Pottawatomie Indians—reservations to individuals of the tribe—grant by one, of his lands—when grantee's title perfected.

By the Treaty of October 27, 1832, the Pottawatomie Indians ceded to the United States their title and interest in and to their lands in the States of Indiana and Illinois, and the Michigan Territory, south of Grand River, and reservations were made in favor of individual Pottawatomies, and to complete their title to the reserved lands, the United States agreed that they would issue patents to the respective owners.

The reservees took by the Treaty, directly from the Nation, the Indian title, and this was the right to occupy, use, and enjoy the lands, in common with the United States, until partition was made. The Treaty itself converted the reserved sections into individual property.

Although the government alone can purchase lands from an Indian Nation, yet when the rights of the Nation are extinguished, an individual of the Nation who takes as private owner can sell his reserved interest.

When the United States selected the lands reserved to him, and made partition (of which the patent is conclusive evidence) his grantees took the interest he would have taken if living.

Argued May 1, 1860. Decided May 4, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the court below, by the plaintiffs in error, to recover the possession of two sections of land, in Laporte County, Indiana.

The trial below having resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiffs sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. S. S. Baxter, O. H. Smith and J. A. Liston, for plaintiffs in error:

I. The third article of the Treaty of the 27th Oct., 1832, was a mere executory promise of the United States to grant in future and by patent to Pet-chi-co, two sections of land, to be thereafter selected by the President. This promise was to be performed by the Political Department, and before its performance, could create no inchoate title or estate in Pet-chi-co to any lands

And this being a mere executory promise to be executed by the Political Department, was not assignable, and the effort was against public policy, and could convey no estate to the assignee, or give him any right to the land.

The deed from Pet-chi-co is inoperative.

First. Because no estate in the lands then existed.

Second. Because it conveys no specific land.

The description, whether we look to the subject conveyed or the title, is too vague to convey any property.

Third. It is void as to subsequent purchasers, because not recorded until February 27, 1856.

It was not filed in any department of the government, and has never received the sanction of any officer of the government.

The Act of May 20, 1836 (5 Stat. at L., p. 31), vesting the estate of persons who died before patent issued in the heirs or assignees of such person, will not vest the title in Colerick.

Coquillard or Wilson, because they are not such assignees as were contemplated by that Act.

See Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 348; Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How., 316; Bissell v. Penrose, 8 How., 317; French v. Spencer, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 228.

It was not intended to grant the estate of a dead man to an assignee by an instrument not recognized by law, never recorded, never produced to the Land Office, and on which, if produced, the office could take no action.

II. The patent of Jan. 7, 1837, was the first act severing this land from the public domain, and vesting an estate in it in any individual, and subjecting it to the state laws.

Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet., 498.

The heirs of Pet-chi-co took this newly granted estate directly from the United States.

The supposed deed of Pet-chi-co cannot work an estoppel.

First. Because it was void.

Second. Because the heirs, taking nothing by descent from Pet-chi-co, have no privity with him as to this title.

4 Kent, 248 (221); Co. Litt., 352; Blight v. Rochester, 7 Wheat., 548.

Messrs. John B. Niles, R. Breckenridge and J. U. Petit, for defendant in error:

The plaintiffs objected that the purchase from Pet-chi-co before the location of the land or issuing of the patents, was void as against the Act of Congress and public policy.

We have been referred to no Act of Congress which forbids such a purchase, and the policy of the State of Indiana rather favors than opposes such sales; hence, the Legislature have afforded peculiar facilities for the alienation of lands held by certificates of purchasers before the issuing of the patent, by making such certificates assignable and evidence of the legal title in the original holder or assignee.

Rev. Law, Ind., 31, pp. 93, 94; Session Laws, 1833, p. 112.

A similar policy on the part of the General Government is indicated by the Act of Congress of May 20, 1836.

5 U. S. Stat. at L., p. 31; Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 373; Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet., 264.

The next objection, that the deed is void for want of sufficient description of the land, is equally untenable.

See Co. Litt., 43; French v. Spencer, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 228; 7 Stat. at L., 399; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 739.

But to the last objection to the deeds, that they could only convey an equity, we answer, that it is immaterial what title actually was conveyed at the moment of their execution. It is sufficient that by the subsequent events, and by virtue of the doctrine of relation or estoppel, or by the Act of Congress of May 20, 1836, they may have become operative so as to work upon the estate, or to estop parties and privies.

The deed under which the defendant claimed title, sets forth that the grantor was entitled to the land, and contained full covenants of warranty and seisin.

After the grantor's death, his right ripened into a perfect legal title by the issuing of the patent. His heirs and privies now claim that the legal title, so acquired, inures to their benefit. This would drive Wilson to his action on the covenant. On the contrary, the doctrine of estoppel applies, and saves the necessity for litigation, and at once secures the ends of justice.

See French v. Spencer, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 240; Doe v. Oliver, 2 Sm. Lead. Cas., 583; Bush v. Marshall, 6 How., 284; Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How., 297.

The fourth instruction given by the court was as follows:

"If Pet-chi-co, between the ratification of the treaty and the issuing the patents, sold and conveyed the land in controversy, by a sufficient deed of conveyance, with covenants of warranty to Coquillard and Colerick, and their assigns, then the patents, when issued, as to the assignees, related back to and took effect from the date of the ratification of the Treaty."

This instruction announces a well known principle, often affirmed by the Supreme Court, that all the several parts and ceremonies necessary to complete a conveyance shall be taken together as one act, and operate from the substantial part by relation.

5 Cruise, Dig., 510, 511; Jackson v. Ramsey, 8 Cow., 75; Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 348; Ross v. Barland, 1 Pet., 655; Lessee of French v. Spencer, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 228.

The doctrine of this instruction is strengthened in its application to this case by the Act of Congress of May 20, 1836, above referred to.

The fifth instruction given by the court only asserts the obvious effect of the Act of May 20, 1836:

"If, before the issuing of patents to Pet-chi-co, he had by a legal and valid instrument, assigned to Coquillard and Colerick his interest in the lands which were to be granted to him under the Treaty of Oct., 1832, and if Colerick in like manner assigned his interest to Coquillard, and if Coquillard had in like manner assigned to Wilson, then, by virtue of the Act of Congress of May 20, 1836, the patents, when issued, inured to the benefit of Wilson, and vested a legal title to the land in him, although Pet-chi-co may have died before its date."

That in case of such a legal and valid assignment as is referred to in this instruction, the patent, when subsequently issued, would, under this Act of Congress, have inured to and vest a legal title to the land in the assignee, rather than in the heirs of the patentee, is sufficiently established by the interpretation put upon the act by the Supreme Court in the cases above referred to, in which the Act has received a judicial interpretation.

Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet., 264; Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 348.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

By the Treaty of October 27, 1832, made by the United States, through commissioners, with the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians of the State of Indiana and Michigan Territory, said Nation ceded to the United States their title and interest in and to their lands in the States of Indiana and Illinois, and the Michigan Territory, south of Grand River.

Many reservations were made in favor of Indian villagers jointly, and to individual Pottawatomies. The reservations are by sections, amounting probably to a hundred, lying in various parts of the ceded country. As to these, the Indian title remained as it stood before the Treaty was made; and to complete the title to the reserved lands, the United States agreed that they would issue patents to the respective owners. One of these reservees was the chief, Pet-chi-co, to whom was reserved two sections. The treaty also provides, that "the foregoing reservations shall be selected under the direction of the President of the United States, after the land shall have been surveyed, and the boundaries shall correspond with the public surveys."

In February, 1833, by a deed in fee simple, Pet-chi-co conveyed to Alexis Coquillard and David H. Colerick, of the State of Indiana, "all those two sections of land lying in the state aforesaid, in the region of country or territory ceded by the Treaty of 27th October, 1832." The grantor covenants that he is lawful owner of the lands; hath good right and lawful authority to sell and convey the same. And he furthermore warrants the title against himself and his heirs. Under this deed, the defendant holds possession.

The lessors of the plaintiff took a deed from Pet-chi-co's heirs, dated in 1855, on the assumption that their ancestor's deed was void, he having died in 1833, before the lands were surveyed, or the reserved sections selected. And on the trial below, the court was asked to instruct the jury, "that Pet-chi-co held no interest under the Treaty in the lands in question, up to the time of his death, that was assignable, he having died before the location of the land, and before the patents issued."

This instruction the court refused to give; but, on the contrary, charged the jury, that "the description of the land in the deeds from Pet chi-co to Coquillard and Colerick, from Colerick to Coquillard, and from Coquillard to Wilson, are sufficient to identify the land thereby intended to be conveyed as the same two sections of land which are in controversy in this suit, and which are described in the patents which have been read in evidence."

It is assumed that the lands embraced by the patents to Pet-chi-co, made in 1837, do not lie within the section of country ceded by the Treaty of 27th Oct., 1832; and, therefore, the court was asked to instruct the jury that the defendants cannot claim nor hold the land as assignees of Pet-chi-co, by virtue of the Treaty. The demand for such instruction was also refused.

There is no evidence in the record showing where the land granted by the patents lies, except that which is furnished by the patents themselves. They recite the stipulation in the Treaty in Pet-chi-co's behalf; that the selections for him, of sections nine and ten, had been made, "as being the sections to which the said Pet-chi-co is entitled" under the Treaty. The recitals in the patents conclude all controversy on this point.

The only question presented by the record that we feel ourselves called on to decide is, whether Pet-chi-co's deed of February, 1833, vested his title in Coquillard and Colerick.

The Pottawatomie Nation was the owner of the possessory right of the country ceded, and all the subjects of the nation were joint owners of it. The reservees took by the Treaty, directly from the Nation, the Indian title; and this was the right to occupy, use, and enjoy the lands, in common with the United States, until partition was made, in the manner prescribed. The Treaty itself converted the reserved sections into individual property. The Indians, as a nation, reserved no interest in the territory ceded; but as a part of the consideration for the cession, certain individuals of the Nation had conferred on them portions of the land, to which the United States title was either added or promised to be added; and it matters not which, for the purposes of this controversy, for possession.

The United States held the ultimate title, charged with the right of undisturbed occupancy and perpetual possession, in the Indian Nation, with the exclusive power in the government of acquiring the right. Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat., 603; Cornet v. Winton, 2 Yerg., 147.

Although the government alone can purchase lands from an Indian Nation, it does not follow, that when the rights of the Nation are extinguished, an individual of the Nation who takes as private owner cannot sell his interest. The Indian title is property, and alienable, unless the Treaty had prohibited its sale. Cornet v. Winton, 2 Yerg., 148; Blair and Johnson v. Pathkiller, 2 Yerg., 414. So far from this being the case in the instance before us, it is manifest that sales of the reserved sections were contemplated, as the lands ceded were forthwith to be surveyed, sold, and inhabited by a white population, among whom the Indians could not remain.

We hold that Pet-chi-co was a tenant in common with the United States, and could sell his reserved interest; and that when the United States selected the lands reserved to him, and made partition (of which the patent is conclusive evidence), his grantees took the interest he would have taken if living.

We order the judgment to be affirmed.

APPENDIX.

Copy of Affidavit referred to in the closing paragraph of the Opinion of the Court in U. S. v. Gomez, ante, p. 556.

IN the United States District Court for the Southern District of California (Vincente P. Gomez ad. The United States):

Pacificus Ord, late attorney of the United States for the Southern District of California, being duly sworn, says: That at the June Term, 1857, of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, held at Monterey, Isaac Hartman represented that he was a member of the law firm of Sloan & Hartman, authorized and retained as counsel for Vincente P. Gomez, in the above titled cause. That he had, as counsel for the said claimant, obtained an order from the district court of the Northern District, removing the case to the Southern District; and that he was ready and willing to present the same to the court, as soon as the same could be heard. Affiant further says, that shortly thereafter, the court being then in session, the said Hartman, acting as counsel for said claimant, presented the said case to the court by reading the petition for review, and the other papers and transcript in the case to the court, for the appellant. That after so doing, this affiant, acting for the United States, admitted, in open court, that in his opinion the claim was a valid one, and that in accordance with the ruling of the court in previous cases, the case should be confirmed. That thereupon the court ordered that the decision of the Land Commissioners should be reversed, and a decree of confirmation entered therein for claimant. Affiant further says, that at the next term of the said district court, held in Los Angeles, in December, the said Hartman, as counsel in said case, presented to affiant a draft of the decree of confirmation of said claim. That upon reading the same, affiant objected to the said draft, on the ground that the same would cover all the land embraced within the limits of the named boundaries, to the extent of eleven leagues. Whereupon the said Hartman made another draft of a decree, restricting the quantity of land to not more than four leagues; which said draft, after being approved by affiant as United States Attorney, was signed by the court. That thereafter affiant drafted an order of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in said case, on the part of the United States; and on the last day of the term of said court, Col. Kewen, acting for the United States, at the request of affiant, district attorney as aforesaid, asked for and obtained, as affiant was afterwards informed, the said order in said case. Affiant further says, that at or about the time the said Hartman informed him that he had been retained by the said claimant in said case, affiant informed said Hartman that he had been the attorney for said Gomez before the United States Land Commissioners; and that, for his services therein, the said Gomez had conveyed to him the one undivided half of the tract of land claimed therein. That he had endeavored for a long time to get the Attorney-General to appoint some attorney to represent the United States in cases in which he was interested, but without success. That this case had been unacted upon for a long time; and that as the Commissioners had, upon the evidence before them, passed favorably upon the validity of the claim, and though they rejected it, it was only on the ground of want of occupation by the grantee; and as that ground had been overruled by the Supreme Court, there could be no injury to the United States, and no impropriety on his part, as United States Attorney, in appearing and consenting to its confirmation; in all of which views of this affiant, the said Hartman then concurred. Affiant further says, that he wrote to the Attorney-General of the United States shortly after assuming the duties of the office of district attorney, about December, 1854, stating that he had been employed as counsel, and was interested in several claims then pending on appeal in his district from the Land Commissioners, and requested that he would cause some attorney to be specially named to represent the United States in such cases. But the Attorney-General never made or named any person to act in the matter, as requested. That affiant, being thus left to act in the matter as best he might, did act with the most scrupulous good faith, and to the best of his ability, for the United States, in all such cases. Affiant further says, that he has been informed and believes that the parties who are now and have been endeavoring to impede and defeat this claim, since the confirmation by the United States District Court, are private persons in possession of a valuable quicksilver mine, believed to be within the limits of said grant, lately opened and worked by them, of which one Daniel Gibb, of San Francisco, is believed to be the principal person interested. Affiant further says, that the substantial allegations in certain depositions of said Isaac Hartman and E. W. F. Sloan, dated December, 1859, in said case, are wholly untrue, except as herein admitted.

And further affiant sayeth not.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT

DECEMBER TERM, 1860.

RUSSELL STURGIS, Claimant of the Steam Tug HECTOR, her Tackle, &c., impleaded with the Ship WISCONSIN, her Tackle, &c., Appt.,

v.

HERMAN BOYER, ALBERT WOODRUFF AND JEREMIAH R. ROBINSON, owners of the Lighter REPUBLIC, Libts.,

(See S. C., 24 How., 110-125.)

Collision—tug, when liable for damages done by ship in tow—vessel and owners, when liable.

Where a lighter was capsized by a ship in tow of and lashed to a tug, the tug held liable for the damages.

Whenever a tug, under the charge of her own master and crew, undertakes to transport another vessel, which, for the time being, has neither her master nor crew on board, from one point to another, she must be held reponsible for the proper navigation of both vessels.

Third persons suffering damage, through the fault of those in charge of the vessels must, under such circumstances, look to the tug, her masters or owners, for recompense.

Whenever a culpable fault is committed, whereby a collision ensues, that fault is imputed to the owners, and the vessel is liable for the consequences.

No such consequences follow, however, when the person committing the fault does not, in fact, or by implication of law, stand in the relation of agent, to the owners.

By employing a tug to transport their vessel from one point to another, the owners of the tow do not necessarily constitute the master and crew of the tug their agents, in performing the service.

The master of the tug, notwithstanding the contract was negotiated with him, continues to be the agent of the owners of his own vessel, and they are responsible for his acts in her navigation.

Where it clearly appears that those in charge of the steam tug had the exclusive control, direction and management of both vessels, and there is no proof that the tug was not a suitable vessel to perform the service for which she was employed, or that anyone belonging to the ship in tow participated in the navigation, or was guilty of any negligence, the tug is responsible for damages caused by the ship in tow.

Argued Dec. 19, 1860. Decided Dec. 31, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, by Boyer and others, owners of the lighter Republic, against the ship Wisconsin and the steam tug Hector, to recover damages resulting from a collision.

The district court entered a decree in favor of the libelants, against the ship and tug. The circuit court, on appeals by the claimants of the vessels, affirmed the decree of the district court against the tug for damages and costs, and dismissed the libel, with costs as against the ship; whereupon the libelants took an appeal to this court, from the decree of the circuit court, so far as it relates to the ship. And the claimant of the tug took an appeal from the whole of said decree.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. C. Benedict, for libelants:

The ship is clearly responsible to the libelants for this collision—they should not be deprived of her responsibility, and compelled to resort to the tug alone.

The enterprise was the enterprise of the ship. She had on board "the mate, helmsman and a full complement of mariners." There was no wind and an adverse tide. She needed a propelling power, and procured a tug to assist her, not to command her, or her officers, or men. All was the proper business of the ship.

"Third parties receiving an injury by collision can rarely be required to lay the reponsibility to any other agency than that which was the proximate cause of it. If a vessel is run upon by another under way, the latter must be answerable for the wrong, unless she can prove the occurrence to have been the result of inevitable accident, or without fault on her side, and no reason is perceived why she is exonerated by having permitted herself to be moved by a steam vessel unskillfully or incautiously managed, more than if the cause of the injury was want of attention or prudence in the appliance or use of her own means of navigation."

The Express, Olcott, 268.

The captain of the tug was on board the ship, and if he was master of the ship pro hac vice, he was appointed by the owners. For the purpose of getting under way and moving and mooring at the end, and steering her and keeping a look out, Captain Ostrom had charge, and the mate had charge as master. The ship must be steered by her own helm, except that, in cases of difficulty, the helm of the tug must be used to assist—it is too small to control. The lookout must be on board the ship, because the ship was ahead. The tug was small, and did not reach the ship's bows within one third of the ship's length. The tug was behind, at one side and below, so that she could not look out.

The tug was on board the ship. She was firmly fastened to her, alongside, and was, for the time being, a part of her, as much as the machinery and side paddle-wheels of the tug were on board, or a part of the tug. They were all fastened on the outside of the hull, to act as motive power.

The ship was the actual cause of the injury.

The tug did not touch or injure the lighter—the ship alone struck her. The actual collision was out of sight and out of reach of the tug.

The negligence of the ship and those on board and in charge of her, caused the collision; they did not see the lighter, because they had no lookout who was careful or efficient.

At the time of the accident the tug was still. She was shut off at Catharine ferry; her function had ceased. The ship was going on her own momentum. While the tug was propelling her, she went four or five knots an hour; at the time of the collision much less.

When a ship is sent through a public crowded harbor, her owners are bound to provide her with all the necessary means, implements, and agencies of the most skillful, reliable and trustworthy character, for the safety of other vessels, and if any of them fail, and thereby another is injured, the ship herself is responsible.

The question, which of those subordinate agents was the guilty cause of the accident, is wholly immaterial in this suit. They cannot interplead here. They are not here, plaintiff and defendant, with proper pleadings. Their rights, as against each other, are not in issue, and they can be settled only in another action, to which the lighter cannot be a party. She is not interested in the question whether the tug, for her petty compensation, is an insurer of the ship against her own negligence.

The lighter had no proper course except to proceed against the whole thing, which caused the injury.

Mr. I. T. Williams, for claimants of the ship Wisconsin.

In no view of the case can the ship be made responsible, or her owners liable, for the damages sustained by the lighter.

Sproul v. Hemingway, 14 Pick., 1; The Express, 1 Blatchf., 365.

She was lashed firmly to the side of the tug, and under the exclusive command and direction of the captain and officers of the tug.

To make the owners liable for such a collision, would be to establish an entirely new principle of law.

It would not be an application of the principle respondeas superior, for in no sense can the captain and crew of the tug be said to have been the agents or servants of the owners of the ship.

They were in no sense under the control of, or subject to the orders of the owners of the ship.

But on the other hand, they were the servants and agents—strictly the employés of the owners of the tug, and owed obedience, and were amenable to no one else in the discharge of their duties.

If the owners of the ship could be liable for the misfeasance or malfeasance of the captain or crew of the tug, it would follow that the owners of the ship could have the right to appoint and remove the captain and crew of the tug, and that they were appointed by, and held their respective offices from the owners of the ship.

It is not easy to see why the owners of the ship could be any more liable than the owners of the cargo. The cargo, if heavy, contributes to the force of the blow given by the colliding vessel—which additional force may have occasioned the one vessel to be cut down and sunk, rather than the other.

Take the case of a cargo of timber, a part of which projects over the sides of the vessel, and is the very thing which gives the blow that gives the injury. How could the liability of the owner of such timber be distinguished in principle on the one hand, from the liability of the owners of flour stowed in the hold; or on the other, from the liability of the owner of a ship lashed fast to the side of the colliding vessel?

Sproul v. Hemmingway, 14 Pick., 1; Fletcher v. Braddick, 5 Bos. & P., 182.

Mr. C. A. Seward, for claimant of the steam tug Hector.

There is no sufficient evidence to charge the tug.

The lighter might have avoided the collision. She saw the ship long before the collision—long enough to avoid her, and should have done so. But if not, then the ship alone and not the tug, was responsible for the collision.

The ship was under the direction of her owners at the time. Next under them was their regular mate, who was on board and had the general charge of moving the ship. To aid him, they sent on board Captain Ostrom to take charge of the ship, and ten or fifteen men, of whom he had charge, to man the ship to do the labor, to unmoor the ship and make her fast to the tug, steer her, and then to pull and haul, to make her fast at her berth at Dover Street. The owners sent the tug to do the labor of pulling and hauling in the river, there being a strong flood tide and no wind. The captain of the tug had charge of the ship, so far as transporting her in the river. These were the three classes of servants of the owner coöperating in moving the ship—all of them in charge for certain purposes. Of all of them only one, the tug, is free from blame for negligence; against her there is not an allegation of blame from any quarter.

Actually on board the Wisconsin were the mate, Sinclair, Captains Ostrom, Phillips and Brower, and ten or fifteen men. None of them belonged to the tug except Brower. He was there, aft, that he might easily communicate with the ship and tug. The mate gave no proper attention; he was forward getting lines out. The most of the men were busy with him. Captain Ostrom was on the quarter deck, giving no proper attention to his duty, though giving orders. The ship's man was at the wheel, but he is not produced as a witness. No one saw the lighter—coming as she was, with sails up, in full sight at high noon, till it was too late.

The engine of the tug was slowed and stopped at the proper place. The wheel had been ported at the proper place to get ship in. The ship's hands had a small boat alongside of the ship, and lines and a man already to send the boat and lines ashore, and the ship was sagged in to aid in that movement.

The Wisconsin could not be steered except by her own helm; the helm of the tug could only be used to assist, and it was used to the utmost. Both helms were hard aport. The lookout must be on board the ship, because the ship was ahead. The tug was small, and was back of the ship's bows one third of the ship's length. The tug was on one side toward the stern and far below, so that she could not so well lookout. It was not her duty to keep the lookout of the ship, which had on board, by the admission of the owners in their answer, "her own competent crew and officers."

The tug was not in fault; no negligence or mismanagement is alleged against her by any party or witness in the pleadings or proofs, and there should be no recovery against her for the collision, and her little fee for hauling the ship, does not make her an insurer for the benefit of third parties. If, by reason of her being lashed to the ship, a decree must go against both, then, as they have answered and stipulated separately, the decree should be against the ship and her stipulators, first, and contingently only against the tug and her stipulators.

If there can be a decree against one alone, then the decree of the circuit court should be wholly reversed—The Wisconsin condemned and The Hector discharged.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal in admiralty from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, in a cause of collision, civil and maratime. It was a proceeding in rem against the ship Wisconsin and the steam tug Hector, and was instituted in the district court on the 26th day of October, 1855, by the owners of the lighter Republic. They allege in the libel, that the lighter, on the 15th day of October, 1855, started from pier six in East River in the port of New York, laden with flour, which was in their possession as common carriers, to proceed up the river to the foot of Dover Street, in the same port; that she had a competent crew on board, but that the wind being light, she was propelled exclusively by oars, and was moving through the water only at the rate of a mile an hour; that when she arrived at a point nearly opposite the place of her destination, she was headed towards the pier or wharf for which she started, and while in that position, that the ship Wisconsin, in tow of the steamboat Hector, and lashed to the starboard side of the tug, came down the river, and was so negligently managed that the flying jib-boom of the ship struck the lighter and capsized her, causing her cargo to roll into the water, and damaging the flour and the lighter to the amount of $2,100. Negligence, want of care and skill on the part of those in charge of the tow, are alleged to have been the cause of the collision; and the libelants also allege that the ship and steam tug were incompetently manned; that they had no proper look out, and that those in charge of them disregarded the warnings of the lighter, and did not in due time stop and back the engine of the tug, or shear the tow so as to avoid the lighter, as they were bound to have done. Process was issued against the ship and the tug, and the claimants of the respective vessels subsequently appeared, and filed separate answers to the several allegations of the libel. Both answers affirm that the collision was occasioned through the fault of those in charge of the lighter, but in most other respects they are essentially variant. On the part of the steam tug, it is alleged that she was employed by the owners of the ship to tow her from the foot of Water Street to the pier at the foot of Dover Street; and that the tug was merely the motive power to move the ship to the pier, and that the tug and her crew were subject to, and obeyed the orders of, the master and other officers in charge of the ship. Wherefore, the claimant prays that, in case the libelants recover any sum against the ship and tug, he may have a decree against the ship and her owners for such proportions of the same as he may be made liable to pay. But the claimants of the ship allege that she was in the charge and under the control and management of the master and crew of the steam tug. They admit in the answer that her mate, helmsman, and a full complement of mariners, were on board, but aver that they were all under the direction and control of the master and officers of the steam tug to which she was lashed. Testimony was taken on both sides, and after a full hearing in the district court, a decree was entered in favor of the libelants against the ship and the steam tug. From that decree the claimants of each of those vessels appealed to the circuit court, and the cause was there again heard upon the same testimony. After the hearing, the circuit court affirmed the decree of the district court against the tug, but dismissed the libel with costs as against the ship Whereupon the claimants of the tug appealed to this court, and the libelants also appealed from so much of the decree as pronounced the ship not liable.

At the argument in this court, it was conceded that the flying jib-boom of the ship struck the peak halyards of the lighter, and capsized her, causing the cargo, which consisted of flour in barrels, to roll into the water, and no question was made that the damages had not been correctly estimated. According to the testimony in the case, the lighter was bound up the river, and she was propelled exclusively by oars or sweeps. Her course was on the northern side of the stream, some two hundred yards from the shore. She was moving about a mile an hour, and the collision occurred at midday, and in fair weather. As alleged in the pleadings, the ship was bound down the river, and she was securely lashed, in the usual manner, to the starboard side of the steam tug. Neither the ship nor tug had any proper lookout, and it clearly appears that those in charge of them did not see the lighter until it was too late to adopt the necessary precautions to prevent a collision. Their course down the river was about the same distance from the northern shore as that of the lighter, and both vessels were propelled by the steam-power of the tug. They were bound to a point, alongside of another ship, lying at the end of pier twenty-seven, and the lighter was bound to pier twenty-eight, a short distance up the river. None of these facts are disputed, and the testimony clearly shows that the lighter first changed her course, and headed towards the pier to which she was bound. When the lighter changed her course and headed for the pier, the ship was so far distant that if she had kept her course, the lighter would have passed to the pier in safety. Nothing appearing in the river to obstruct the view, those in charge of the lighter had a right to assume that she was seen by those navigating the approaching vessels, and that they would hold their course or keep out of the way. Propelled as they were by steam power, those in charge of them could readily govern their course and control their movement. More difficulty, however, would have attended any such effort on the part of the lighter. It was then about slack high water, the current still running up a little out in the stream; but the tide had commenced to ebb close in shore, so that the flour, after it rolled into the water, floated down the river. Until the lighter turned towards the pier, she had been aided in her course by the current; but, when she changed her course, and headed towards the pier, she was rather impeded than benefited by the tide. Those in charge of her saw the ship and tug approaching, and hailed those on board, apprising them of the danger of a collision. There were three men belonging to the lighter; two were forward at the oars, and one was aft, and it does not appear that they omitted anything in their power to do to avoid the disaster. On the other hand, it does appear that the descending vessels were without any lookout, and that those in charge of them did not see the lighter in season to adopt the necessary precautions to prevent the collision. Beyondquestion, it was the mate of the ship who first saw the lighter, and he admits that she was then heading square into the slip, and was using two oars. He had no charge of the ship, and it does not appear that he, in any manner, interfered with her navigation from the time she left her mooring until she reached her place of destination. When the hail was given from the lighter, he was employed in getting the lines ready to send ashore, as soon as the ship should arrive at the proper place. All of the orders were given by the master of the tug, which had been employed by the owners of the ship to transport her from her moorings to pier twenty-seven, for the purpose of discharging what merchandise she had on board, and taking in another cargo. They had also employed a head stevedore to discharge her cargo, and reload her; and in point of fact, all the men on board, except the mate, were the hands in the employment of the principal stevedore, not one of whom belonged to the crew of the ship. Her master was not on board, and, contrary to the allegation of the answer, the testimony shows that she was without a crew. One of the stevedores was at the wheel of the ship, but both vessels were exclusively under the command and direction of the master of the tug. Prior to the collision, and when the pilot of the tug gave the signal to slow, the master of the tug left his own vessel and went on to the ship, and all the subsequent orders were given by him, while standing on the quarter deck of the latter vessel. "My attention," says the mate of the ship, "was first called to the lighter by a hail from one of her men." He was the first person on the descending vessels who saw the lighter, and he at once gave notice to the master of the tug. They were then so near, that the mate says he anticipated a collision, and, considering the headway of the ship, he was unable to see how it could be avoided. True it is, the master of the tug testifies that the ship had no headway at the time of the collision, but the weight of the testimony is greatly otherwise. No doubt is entertained that he gave the orders to stop and back before the collision occurred, but the circumstances clearly show that those orders were too late to have the desired effect.

Looking at all the facts and circumstances in the case, we think the libelants are clearly entitled to a decree in their favor; and the only remaining question of any importance is, whether the ship and the steam tug are both liable for the consequences of the collision; or if not, which of the two ought to be held responsible for the damage sustained by the libelants. Cases arise, undoubtedly, when both the tow and the tug are jointly liable for the consequences of a collision; as when those in charge of the respective vessels jointly participate in their control and management, and the master or crew of both vessels are either deficient in skill, omit to take due care, or are guilty of negligence in their navigation. Other cases may well be imagined when the tow alone would be responsible; as when the tug is employed by the master or owners of the tow as the mere motive power to propel their vessels from one point to another, and both vessels are exclusively under the control, direction and management of the master and crew of the tow. Fault in that state of the case cannot be imputed to the tug, provided she was properly equipped and seaworthy for the business in which she was engaged; and if she was the property of third persons, her owners cannot be held responsible for the want of skill, negligence or mismanagement of the master and crew of the other ves sel, for the reason that they are not the agents of the owners of the tug, and her owners in the case supposed do not sustain towards those intrusted with the navigation of the vessel the relation of the principal. But whenever the tug, under the charge of her own master and crew, and in the usual and ordinary course of such an employment, undertakes to transport another vessel, which, for the time being, has neither her master nor crew on board, from one point to another, over waters where such accessory motive power is necessary or usually employed, she must be held responsible for the proper navigation of both vessels; and third persons suffering damage through the fault of those in charge of the vessels must, under such circumstances, look to the tug, her master or owners, for the recompense which they are entitled to claim for any injuries that vessels or cargo may receive by such means. Assuming that the tug is a suitable vessel, properly manned and equipped for the undertaking, so that no degree of negligence can attach to the owners of the tow, on the ground that the motive power employed by them was in an unseaworthy condition, and the tow, under the circumstances supposed, is no more responsible for the consequences of a collision than so much freight; and it is not perceived that it can make any difference in that behalf, that a part, or even the whole of the officers and crew of the tow are on board, provided it clearly appears that the tug was a seaworthy vessel, properly manned and equipped for the enterprise, and from the nature of the undertaking, and the usual course of conducting it, the master and crew of the tow were not expected to participate in the navigation of the vessel, and were not guilty of any negligence or omission of duty by refraining from such participation. Vessels engaged in commerce are held liable for damage occasioned by collision, on account of the complicity, direct or indirect, of their owners, or the negligence, want of care, or skill, on the part of those em ployed in their navigation. Owners appoint the master and employ the crew, and consequently are held responsible for their conduct in the management of the vessel. Whenever, therefore, a culpable fault is committed, whereby a collision ensues, that fault is imputed to the owners, and the vessel is just as much liable for the consequences as if it had been committed by the owner himself. No such consequences follow, however, when the person committing the fault does not, in fact, or by implication of law, stand in the relation of agent to the owners. Unless the owner and the person or persons in charge of the vessel in some way sustain towards each other the relation of principal and agent, the injured party cannot have his remedy against the colliding vessel. By employing a tug to transport their vessel from one point to another, the owners of the tow do not necessarily constitute the master and crew of the tug their agents in performing the service. They neither appoint the master of the tug, or ship the crew; nor can they displace either the one or the other. Their contract for the service, even though it was negotiated with the master, is, in legal contemplation, made with the owners of the vessel, and the master of the tug, notwithstanding the contract was negotiated with him, continues to be the agent of the owners of his own vessel, and they are responsible for his acts in her navigation. Sproul v. Hemmingway, 14 Pick., 1; 1 Pars. Mar. L., 208; The Brig James Gray v. The John Frazer, 21 How., 184.

Very nice questions may, and often do arise, says Judge Story, as to the person who, in the sense of the rule, is to be deemed the principal or employer in particular cases. Story, Ag., sec. 448 a, p. 557. Where the owner of a carriage hired of a stable-keeper a pair of horses for a day, furnishing his own carriage, and the stable-keeper provided the driver, through whose negligent driving an injury was done to the horses of a third person, the judges of the King's Bench were equally divided upon the question, whether the owner of the carriage or the owner of the horses was liable for the injury. Laugher v. Pointer, 5 Barn. & C., 547. But the better opinion maintained by the more recent authorities is, that the driver should be regarded as the servant of the stable-keeper, and inasmuch as he could not at the same time be properly deemed the servant of both parties that the stable-keeper and not the temporary hirer, was responsible for his negligence. Upon the like ground, says the same commentator, the hirer of a wherry, to go from one place to another, would not be responsible for the waterman; nor the owner of a ship, chartered for a voyage on the ocean, for the misconduct of the crew employed by the charterer, provided the terms of the charter-party were such as constituted the charterer the owner for the voyage. Quarman v. Burnett, 6 Mees. & W., 499; Randleson v. Murray, 8 Ad. & El., 109; Milligan v. Wedge, 12 Ad. & El., 737; The Express, 1 Blatchf. C. C. 365. Whether the party charged ought to be help liable, is made to depend, in all cases of this description, upon his relation to the wrong-doer. If the wrongful act was done by himself, or was occasioned by his negligence, of course he is liable; and he is equally so, if it was done by one towards whom he bore the relation of principal; but liability ceases where the relation itself entirely ceases to exist, unless the wrongful act was performed or occasioned by the party charged. It was upon this principle that the ship was held not liable in the case of James Gray v. The John Frazer, 21 How., 194. In that case, this court said, the mere fact that one vessel strikes and damages another does not, of itself, make her liable for the injury, but the collision must, in some degree, be occasioned by her fault. A vessel properly secured may, by the violence of a storm, be driven from her moorings and forced against another vessel, in spite of her efforts to avoid it, and yet she certainly would not be liable for damages which it was not in her power to prevent. So, also, ships at sea, from storms or darkness of the weather, may come in collision with one another without fault on either side, and in that case must each bear its own loss, although one is much more damaged than the other. Stainback v. Rae, 14 How., 532. Applying these principles to the present case, it is obvious what the result must be. Without repeating the testimony, it will be sufficient to say, that it clearly appears in this case that those in charge of the steam tug had the exclusive control, direction and management of both vessels, and there is not a word of proof in the record, either that the tug was not a suitable vessel to perform the service for which she was employed, or that any one belonging to the ship either participated in the navigation, or was guilty of any degree of negligence whatever in the premises.

Counsel on both sides stated, at the argument, that they were prepared to discuss a question of jurisdiction supposed to be involved in the record; but upon its being suggested by the court that the question was not raised either by the evidence, or in the pleadings, the point was abandoned.

In view of the whole case, we think the decision of the circuit court was correct, and the decree is accordingly affirmed, with costs.

JOHN FITCH, Appt.,

v.

EDWARD CREIGHTON.

(See S. C., 24 How., 159–164.)

Jurisdiction of Circuit Courts—equity jurisdiction of U. S. Courts—state laws, as rules of decision—unnecessary party—multifariousness.

The circuit court has jurisdiction of bill to collect assessments on city property levied under a state law.

The equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States depends upon the principles of general equity, and cannot be affected by any local remedy, unless that remedy has been adopted by the courts of the United States.

The 34th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, declaring that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply, constitues a rule of property on which the courts are bound to act.

There was no necessity to make a party in this case, one who made the contract jointly, but before the work was commenced relinquished his right.

Bill to collect assessments on several lots is not multifarious; where the assessments were assessed on the lots by the foot front, and all against the same defendant.

Submitted Dec. 17, 1860. Decided Dec. 31, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellee, to recover certain assessments against lots owned by Fitch.

The defendant demurred to the bill. The court overruled the demurrer, and entered a decree in favor of the complainant; whereupon the defendant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. D. F. Cooke, for appellant:

On the part of the appellant it is claimed that upon the facts appearing in the bill, the circuit court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, and this is the question presented by the demurrer.

1. The right of the complainant to proceed in his own name to enforce the collection of the assessments, is derived entirely from the remedial provisions of the statute. But the equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States depends upon the principles of general equity jurisprudence. It cannot be affected by any local statute or any local remedy, unless that remedy has been adopted by the courts of the United States.

1 Curt. Com., 25; Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat., 212; The Orleans v. Phœbus, 11 Pet., 184.

The inquiry then is, whether the complainant by his bill shows himself possessed of a right which can be enforced in his name against this defendant in a court of equity, by any of the known usages and principles which govern that court.

We admit that when the State Legislature creates a new right, and at the same time prescribes the remedy to enforce it, if the remedy prescribed is substantially consistent with the ordinary modes of proceeding on the chancery side of the federal courts, relief may be had in those courts.

Clark v. Smith, 13 Pet., 203.

We also admit that if the State Legislature creates a right which cannot be enforced at law, and which properly belongs to a chancery jurisdiction, relief will be granted by the federal courts.

Lorman v. Clarke, 2 McLean, 573.

It will be conceded that the statute does not give to the complainant, directly, any right of action, either at law or in equity, against the defendant. It simply authorizes the city to order and contract for this class of improvements, to assess the expense upon the property

Generally, towns or town officers are by state statute bound to repair highways. Stanton v. Springfield, 12 Allen, 566; Providence v. Clapp, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 161; Peck v. Ellsworth, 36 Me., 393; Kitredge v. Milwaukee, 26 Wis., 46; Draper v. Town of Ironton, 42 Wis., 666.

Towns, counties, and other quasi corporations are not liable to private actions for the neglect of their officers in respect to highways, unless such liability be expressly declared by statute and the right of action given. This is the case even where they have power to levy taxes for repair of them. Bartlett v. Crozier, 17 Johns., 439; Eastman v. Meredith, 36 N. H., 284; Chidsey v. Canton, 17 Conn., 475; Mower v. abutting thereon, and prescribes the mode and manner of the collection of such assessment.

There is no promise, express or implied, by the defendant, to pay to the complainant or the city the assessment charged upon his property. His obligation is imposed by the statute, and does not exist at common law. It is a tax—an involuntary contribution—the payment of which is to be enforced by the public authorities. But no suit can be maintained at law or in chancery, to enforce the collection of a tax, unless authorized by statute. No such right of action exists at common law, or according to the principles of general equity jurisprudence.

Andover & Med. Turnpike Co. v. Gould, 6 Mass., 44.

Taxes only exists by virtue of the statute authorizing them, and only such remedies can be resorted to for their collection as the statute provides.

Bangor House Prop. v. Hinckley, 12 Me., 338.

From these considerations it is claimed—

First. That the complainant does not show himself possessed of any right which he can enforce directly against this defendant or his property; and,

Second. That the liability of the defendant is not such an one as can be enforced against him in a court of equity, without the aid of the statute, which cannot confer jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States.

2. The bill is bad from multifariousness. There is a misjoinder of causes in the suit.

A bill is multifarious if it unites several matters, perfectly distinct and unconnected against, one defendant.

Dan. Ch. Pr., 383; Story, Eq. Pl., sec. 27; Bugbee v. Sargent, 23 Me., 271; Adams, Eq., 570, note; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr., 363; Atty-Gen. v. Goldsmith's Co., 5 Sim., 675.

Jurisdiction cannot be conferred upon the courts of the United States by a joinder, in the same suit, of several causes of action, each distinct in itself.

Each cause of action is to be considered by itself, and if the amount of any one is not sufficient to confer jurisdiction, the whole must be dismissed.

Oliver v. Alexander, 6 Pet., 147.

Mr. N. H. Swayne, for appellee:

The points made by the counsel for the appellant may be reduced to two, viz.:

1. The circuit court had no jurisdiction.
2. The bill was multifarious.

I propose to state briefly the points relied upon to give the circuit court jurisdiction; and incidentally to answer the points made by the appellant.

It seems to be conceded that when the local statutes of a State give rights to an individual, the courts of the United States will enforce those rights, in cases where they have jurisdiction of the parties.

It is not pretended that the States can direct the remedy, by which rights are to be enforced, which the federal courts are bound to pursue.

But it is claimed, that where the statute of a State creates a right which may be enforced by remedies already existing and resorted to in the latter courts, these courts will enforce the rights by their own known remedies and usages, in cases where they have jurisdiction, although the local statute may direct a special mode of proceeding.

The General Smith, 4 Wheat., 438.

By the statute and the contract with the city, the complainant acquired, by operation of law, rights which courts of equity, by their long established rules and usages, will enforce.

The claims which by this action are sought to be enforced as liens on the lots of the appellant, are not taxes. The Supreme Court of Ohio has often so decided.

Hill v. Higdon, 5 Ohio St., 243; Ernst v. Kunkle, 5 Ohio St., 520; Reeves v. The Treas. of Wood Co., 8 Ohio St., 333; and The Northern Ind. R. R. Co. v. Connelly, 10 Ohio St., 159, decided at the present term and not yet reported.

This lien upon real estate is such an one as courts of equity, by their long established and well known usages, will enforce; and the complainant being a citizen of Iowa and the defendant a citizen of the State of Ohio, the circuit court, having jurisdiction of the parties, has ample equity powers to take cognizance of the case. It is, in fact, an equitable and not a legal lien—it is a charge on a thing without the right of possession. Such liens are only cognizable in courts of equity.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio. The bill was filed by Edward Creighton, a citizen of the State of Iowa, against John Fitch, a citizen of the State of Ohio.

By the Act of March 11th, 1853, Swan's Statutes Ohio, it is provided, "that the city council shall have power to lay off, open, widen, straighten, extend, and establish, to improve, keep in order, and repair, and to light streets, alleys, public grounds, wharves, landing places, and market spaces; to open and construct, and put in order and repair, sewers and drains; to enter upon or take, for such of the above purposes as may require it, land and material; and to assess and collect and charge on the owners of any lots or lands, through or by which a street, alley, or public highway shall pass, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of constructing, improving, and repairing said street, alley, or public highway, to be in proportion either to the foot front of the lot or land abuting on such street, alley, or highway, or the value of said lot or land as assessed for taxation under the general law of the State, as such municipal corporation may in each case determine."

Each municipal corporation may, either by a general or special law or ordinance, prescribe the mode in which the charge on the respective owners of lots or lands shall be assessed and charged to the owner, which shall be enforced by a proceeding at law or in equity, either in the name of the corporation or of any person to whom it shall be directed to be paid, but the judgment or decree was required to be entered severally; and a charge was required to be enforced for the value of the work or material on such lot or land; and where payment shall have been neglected or refused, when required, the corporation shall be entitled to recover the amount assessed, and five per cent. from the time of the assessment. Swan's Stat., 963.

On the 7th of April, 1855, the City of Toledo entered into a contract with Creighton and one Edward Connelly, who bound themselves to do certain work on the streets, for the sums named in the contract; and that so soon as the work was completed, the street commissioner should give them a certificate to the effect, and on the presentation of the same to the council, it would assess the cost and expenses of the improvement on the lots or lands made liable by law to pay the same, and make out and deliver to the contractors a certified copy of said assessments and authorize them or assigns to collect the several amounts due and payable for the work and improvement.

Creighton purchased from Connelly his interest in the contract, and went on and performed the work under it, to the acceptance of the city. On the 14th July, 1856, the council made an assessment on the lots abutting on the improvement in Monroe Street, to pay the expenses of that work and directed that the owners of the lots make payment of the assessments to Creighton. Among the rest, lot 640, belonging to John Fitch, was assessed for this work $84.56.

On the 20th May, 1856, the council made an assessment upon the lots abutting on said improvement in Michigan Street, to pay for the same, and also directed the owners of these lots to make payments of such assessments to Creighton. Among the lots so assessed were the following, owned by defendant, numbered 547, 538, 539, 544, 1,461; the assessments of the respective lots amounted to the sum of $1,791.76; and subsequently a further assessment was made on the contract of three lots, numbered 686, 751 and 855, which amounted to the sum of $266.47. The above sums were ordered to be paid to the complainant, with five per centum allowed by law.

To this bill the defendant demurred, which, on argument, was overruled. And the court ordered the above sums to be paid in ten days, or in default thereof that the lots be sold, &c.

From this decree an appeal was taken. On the part of the appellant it is claimed, that upon the facts of the case, the circuit court had no jurisdiction; that the equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States depends upon the principles of general equity, and cannot, therefore, be affected by any local remedy, unless that remedy has been adopted by the courts of the United States.

By the 34th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, it is declared, "that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States shall require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply." This section does not relate to the practice of our courts, but it constitutes a rule of property on which the courts are bound to act.

The courts of the United States have jurisdiction at common law and in chancery, and wherever such jurisdiction may be appropriately exercised, there being no objection to the citizenship of the parties, the courts of the United States have jurisdiction. This is not derived from the power of the State, but from the laws of the United States.

In Clark v. Smith, 13 Pet., 203, the court say "the State Legislatures certainly have no authority to prescribe the forms and modes of proceeding in the courts in the United States; but having created a right, and at the same time prescribed the remedy to enforce it, if the remedy prescribed is substantially consistent with the ordinary modes of proceeding on the chancery side of the federal courts, no reason exists why it should not be pursued in the same form as it is in the state courts."

In the case above cited, the Legislature of Kentucky authorized a person who was in possession of land claimed by him, and some one else had a claim on the same land; the possessor was authorized to file a bill against the claimant to litigate his title and remove the cloud from it.

The statute authorizes a suit at law or in equity, but from the nature of the case it would seem that chancery was the appropriate mode.

There was no necessity to make Connelly a party in this case. He made the contract jointly with Creighton. But before the work was commenced Connelly relinquished his right to Creighton, who performed the whole work, and to whom the city council promised payment. The assessments, too, were made to Creighton, and he was considered the only contractor with the city. No right was held under Connelly. By the statute the city makes an assessment which is to be paid by the owner personally, and it is also made a lien on the property charged. The charge may be collected and the lien enforced by a proceeding at law or in equity, either in the name of the city or its appointee. The complainant is the appointee for this purpose, and his right is too clear to admit of controversy.

This bill is not multifarious; the assessments were assessed on the lots by the foot front, and all against the same defendant.

Lord Cottenham, in Campbell v. Mackay, 7 Sim., 564, and in Myl. & C., 603, says, to lay down any rule, applicable universally, or to say what constitutes multifariousness, as an abstract proposition, is, upon the authorities, utterly impossible. Every case must be governed by its circumstances; and as these are as diversified as the names of the parties, the court must exercise a sound discretion on the subject. Whilst parties should not be subjected to expense and inconvenience in litigating matters in which they have no interest, multiplicity of suits should be avoided by uniting in one bill all who have an interest in the principal matter in controversy, though the interests may have arisen under distinct contracts.

We think the statute of the State, and the municipal corporation of Toledo, authorise the assessment of the sums on the lots in question, and that the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

HENRY T. BULKLEY, Claimant of the Bark EDWIN, Appt.,

v.

THE NAUMKEAG STEAM COTTON COMPANY.

(See S. C., 24 How., 386-394.)

Carrier—delivery to lighterman, when is delivery to master of vessel—vessel liable for loss of goods on lighter.

Where the master of a vessel agreed to carry 707 bales of cotton from Mobile to Boston, for certain freight mentioned in the bills of lading; held, that the vessel was bound for the safe shipment of the whole of the 707 bales, from the time of their delivery by the shipper at the City of Mobile, and acceptance by the master.

Further held, that the delivery of a hundred bales to a lighterman to deliver on board the vessel was a delivery to the master, and the transportation by the lighter to the vessel was the commencement of the voyage, the same as if the hundred bales had been placed on board of the vessel at the city, instead of the lighter.

Both parties understood that the cotton was to be delivered to the carrier for shipment at the wharf in the city, and to be transported thence to the port of discharge, and after the delivery and acceptance at the place of shipment, the shipper had no longer any control over the property.

The ship is liable for the loss on the lighter of the hundred bales, the same as any other portion of the cargo.

No well founded distinction can be made, as to the liability of the owner and vessel, between the case of the delivery of the goods into the hands of the master at the wharf, for transportation on board of a particular ship, in pursuance of the contract of affreightment, and the case of the lading of the goods upon the deck of the vessel.

Submitted Dec. 17, 1860. Decided Dec. 31, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, by the appellee, to recover damages for the non delivery of a portion of a shipment of cotton from Mobile to Boston.

The district court entered a decree in favor of the libelants, for $7,000, with costs. The circuit court, on appeal, having affirmed this decree, the claimant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. F. C. Loring and Charles G. Loring, for appellant:

1. The libelant cannot hold either the vessel or the owners under the bills of lading, because the goods in question were not on board; and having insisted upon the master's signing such bills, they are prevented thereby from resorting to the original contract of shipment.

It is well settled that neither the vessel nor its owners are made liable for the master's signature to a bill of lading for goods which are never placed on board; that his authority to bind them does not commence till the goods are actually on board.

It is immaterial whether the master is guilty of fraud or mistake, or is imposed upon.

The authorities to this point are conclusive.

2. The owners of the vessel were not common carriers.

Judge Story remarks, that it is not everyone who undertakes to carry the goods for hire that is to be deemed a common carrier; that a private person may contract for the carriage of goods, and incur no responsibility beyond that of an ordinary bailee for hire, that is for the exercise of ordinary diligence; that to constitute one a common carrier, he must exercise it as a public employment; must undertake to carry for persons generally; must hold himself out as ready to engage in the transportation of goods for hire as a business, not as a casual occupation pro hac vice, and must be ready to carry for all who offer goods, so that he is liable to an action if he refuse to carry goods on being offered a reasonable compensation.

Story, Bail., secs. 457, 495, 508; 1 Pars. Maritime Law, ch. 7, sec. 5; Dale v. Hall, 1 Wils., 281.

3. The vessel is not liable in rem.

In the case of The Druid, 1 W. Rob., 399, Doctor Lushington says: "No suit could ever be maintained against the ship where the owners were not themselves personally liable, or where the personal liability had not been given up as in bottomry bonds;" and the rule as stated by him to this extent is expressly recognized by this court in the case of The Freeman, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 189.

If the court should be satisfied that a personal liability does exist on the part of the owners, it does not follow, as of course, that the vessel is liable.

There is not even a presumption that the vessel is liable because the owners are. The liabilities depend upon different grounds, and are not at all reciprocal. In this court, of late years, the tendency has been very strong to limit maritime privileges, and to deny their existence in cases where they had been before recognized. In the case of The Yankee Blade, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 82, they are said to be stricti juris and are not encouraged. In Thomas v. Osborn, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 22, and Pratt v. Reed, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 359, the liens of material-men are confined to cases of necessity. A recent rule of the court prohibits the enforcement of domestic liens by the district court. The privilege of the ship owner upon goods for freight, is apt to be treated as a mere common law lien depending upon possession; and in People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 401, it is said that "liens on vessels incumber commerce and are discouraged."

As in all of these cases there would exist a personal liability on the part of the owners, it is very plain that that does not necessarily establish a privilege against the ship.

In respect to the lien on goods for freight, it is well settled that it does not arise upon any part until after that part is actually on board; i. e., only, and so far as the contract in respect to them is executed, and it would seem to follow necessarily that the reciprocal lien of the ship on the goods cannot arise except upon the same state of facts.

Valin, Com., Lib. 1, tit. 14, sec. 16; 2 Boulay Paty, de Droit Com., 281; Bailey v. Damon, 8 Gray, 91.

In the recent case of Morewood v. Pollok, 18 Eng. L. & E., it was held, under facts like the present, that the goods on a lighter were not on board and, therefore, the owners were personally responsible on their contract to carry, "perils of the sea only excepted," when they would not have been liable if the goods had been on board.

In the case of The Steamer Pocahontas in the Supreme Court of Ohio, it was adjudged that, neither by the statute nor the maritime law, was the steamer liable in rem, unless the goods were actually on board.

The same principle has been distinctly affirmed by this court in two cases:

The Freeman v. Buckingham, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 188; Vandewater v. Mills, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 90.

Finally, various other grounds of defense might be suggested. But it seems enough to have shown, if that has been done, that, by the principles and rules of the maritime law, the freighter is not entitled to a preference over other creditors, if he is indeed recognized as a creditor at all, when the loss is purely accidental, when the goods have not been on board, and the loss is not occasioned by the fault of the vessel proceeded against, its owners, master or crew.

Mr. Milton Andros, for appellee:

I. Between the libelant and the master of the vessel, against which a lien is sought to be enforced in the present case, there was a valid contract of affreightment, which is binding on the claimant and owners thereof.

II. The owners of said vessel are liable as common carriers, and such liability commenced immediately, the master received the libelant's merchandise for transportation.

1. Because their ship was a general ship.

2. Because it appears from the pleadings that they are charged with and assumed responsibilities as such.

Laws on Charter-parties, 1; Mau. & Pol., 142; Sm. Merc. L., 298; Fland. Ship., 449; 1 Bell's Com., b. 3, p. 1, ch. 5, sec. 2; 2 Holt on Ship., 57; Chit. & T. Carr., 224; 3 Kent, 202.

In this country, it seems to be well settled, that a person who undertakes, though it be only pro hac vice, to act as a common carrier, incurs the responsibility of one.

Gordon v. Hutchinson, 1 Watts & S., 285; Powers v. Davenport, 7 Blackf., 497; Turney v. Wilson, 7 Yerg., 340; Craig v. Childress, Peck., 270; McClures v. Hammond, 1 Bay, 99; Moses v. Norris, 4 N. H., 304.

3. The owners being liable in damages for the non-delivery of the libelant's merchandise which had been by his agent delivered to and received by the master of the said vessel for transportation, the ship in specie is also liable, and this liability arises from the contract of affreightment which has been executed on the part of the libelant.

The contract was an entire one; it was to carry from the cotton press to Boston, and the lighter was employed merely as auxiliary to the purposes of the voyage; this, so far as the libelant's goods were affected, commenced when the lighter left for the ship, and in questions of insurance, boats so employed have been considered a part of the vessel.

Parsons v. Mass. F. & M. Ins. Co., 6 Mass., 197, 208; Snow v. Caruth, 1 Sprague, 325.

Again; as the lien is reciprocal, where the merchandise is bound to the ship, in such case the ship is bound to the merchandise. Now, in the present case the merchandise was bound to the ship. "The lawful possession of the goods being once acquired for the purpose of carriage, the carrier is not obliged to restore them to the owner, even if the carriage be dispensed with, unless upon being paid his due remuneration; for by the delivery he has already incurred certain risk.

Ang. on Carr., 363, sec. 368.

The owners and masters of general ships and vessels, both on the high seas and on the navigable rivers and canals, are entitled to the same particular lien for the price of the carriage of the goods delivered to them for transportation. And it is so, both by common law and the written maritime code of Europe.

4. The reception and lading of the libelant's merchandise on board of the lighter by the master of the vessel, for the purpose of transporting it to the same, was a sufficient performance of the libelant's part of the contract of affreightment, to enable him to hold the ship in specie as security for the due performance of the master's part of the agreement.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States, sitting in admiralty, for the District of Massachusetts.

The libel in the court below was against the barque Edwin, to recover damages for the non-delivery of a portion of a shipment of cotton from the port of Mobile to Boston. The facts upon which the question in this case depends are found in the record as agreed upon by the proctors, both in the district and circuit courts, and upon which both courts decreed for the libelant.

From this agreed state of facts, it appears that the master of the vessel, which was then lying at the port of Mobile, agreed to carry for the libelant 707 bales of cotton from that port to Boston, for certain freight mentioned in the bills of lading.

The condition of the Bay of Mobile, which is somewhat peculiar, becomes material to a proper understanding of the question in this case.

Vessels of a large size, and drawing over a given depth of water, cannot pass the bar in the bay, which is situate a considerable distance below the city. Their cargo is brought to them in lighters, from the city over the bar, and then laden on board the vessels. Vessels which, from their light draft, can pass the bar in ballast, go up to the city and take on board as much of their cargoes as is practicable, and, at the same time, allow them to repass it on their return, and are then towed below the bar, and the residue of their load is brought down by lighters and put on board.

In either case, when the vessel is ready to receive cargo below the bar, the master gives notice of the fact to the consignor or broker, through whom the freight is engaged, and provides, at the expense of the ship, a lighter for the conveyance of the goods. The lighterman applies to the consignor or broker, and takes an order for the cargo to be delivered, receives it, and gives his own receipt for the same. On delivering the cargo on board the vessel below the bar, he takes a receipt from the mate or proper officer in charge.

The usual bills of lading are subsequently signed by the master and delivered.

In the present case the barque Edwin received the principal part of her cargo at the city, and was then towed down below the bar to receive the residue. The master employed the steamer M. Streck for this purpose, and 100 bales were laden on board of her at the city, to be taken down to complete her load, and for which the master of the lighter gave a receipt; after she had passed the bar and had arrived at the side of the barque, but before any part of the 100 bales was taken out, her boiler exploded, in consequence of which the 100 bales were thrown into the water and the lighter sunk. Fourteen of the bales were picked up by the crew of the vessel, and brought to Boston with the 607 bales on board. Eighty bales were also picked up by other persons, wet and damaged, and were surveyed and sold; four remain in the hands of the ship broker, at Mobile, for account of whom it may concern; two were lost.

The master of the barque signed bills of lading, including the 100 bales, being advised that he was bound to do so, and that if he refused, his vessel would be arrested and detained. On her arrival at Boston, the master delivered the 607 bales to the consignees, and tendered the fourteen which were refused.

A question has been made on the argument, whether or not the libelant could recover upon the undertaking in the bills of lading, they having been signed under the circumstances stated, or must resort to the orignal contract of affreightment between the master and the shipper. The articles in the libel place the right to damages upon both grounds. The view the court has taken of the case supersedes the necessity of noticing this distinction.

The court is of opinion that the vessel was bound for the safe shipment of the whole of the 707 bales of cotton, the quantity contracted to be carried, from the time of their delivery by the shipper at the City of Mobile, and acceptance by the master, and that the delivery of the hundred bales to the lighterman was a delivery to the master; and the transportation by the lighter to the vessel the commencement of the voyage in execution of the contract, the same, in judgment of law, as if the hundred bales had been placed on board of the vessel at the city, instead of the lighter. The lighter was simply a substitute for the barque for this portion of the service. The contract of affreightment of the cotton was a contract for its transportation from the City of Mobile to Boston, covering a voyage between these termini, and when delivered by the shipper, and accepted by the master at the place of shipment, the rights and obligations of both parties became fixed—the one entitled to all the privileges secured to the owner of cargo for its safe transportation and delivery; the other, the right to his freight on the completion of the voyage, as recognized by principles and usages of the maritime law.

The true meaning of the contract before us cannot be mistaken, and is in perfect harmony with the acts of the master in furtherance of its execution.

Both parties understood that the cotton was to be delivered to the carrier for shipment at the wharf in the city, and to be transported thence to the port of discharge. After the delivery and acceptance at the place of shipment, the shipper had no longer any control over the property, except as subject to the stipulated freight.

The contract, as thus explained, being made by the master in the course of the usual employment of the vessel, and in respect to which he is the general agent of the owner, it would seem to follow, upon the settled principles of admiralty law, which binds the vessel to the cargo, and the cargo to the vessel, for the performance of the undertaking, that the ship in the present case is liable for the loss of the hundred bales, the same as any other portion of the cargo.

It is insisted, however, that the vessel is exempt from responsibility, upon the ground that the one hundred bales were never laden on board of her, and we referred to several cases in this court and in England in support of the position. 18 How., 189; 19 How., 90; Grant v. Norway, 2 Eng L. & E., 337; 18 Eng. L. & E., 551; 29 Eng. L. & E., 328. But it will be seen, on reference to these cases, the doctrine was applied, or asserted, upon a state of facts wholly different from those in the present case. In the cases where the point was ruled, the goods were not only not laden on board the vessel, but they never had been delivered to the master. There was no contract of affreightment binding between the parties, as there had been no fulfillment on the part of the shipper, namely: the delivery of the cargo.

It was conceded no suit could have been maintained upon the original contract, either against the owner or the vessel; but as the bill of lading had been signed by the master, in which he admitted that the goods were on board, the question presented was, whether or not the admission was not conclusive against the owner and the vessel, the bill of lading having passed into the hands of a bona fide holder for value.

The court, on looking into the nature and character of the authority of the master, and the limitations annexed to it by the usages and principles of law, and the general practice of shipmasters, held, that the master not only had no general authority to sign the bill of lading, and admit the goods on board when contrary to the fact, but that a third party taking the bill was chargeable with notice of the limitation, and took it subject to any infirmity in the contract growing out of it.

The first time the question arose in England, and was determined, was in the case of Grant v. Norway, 2 Eng. L. & E., 337, in the common pleas (1851), and was in reference to the state of facts existing in this and like cases, and in connection with the principles involved in its determination, that the court say the master had no authority to sign the bill of lading unless the goods had been shipped, cases in which there had been no delivery of the goods to the master, no contract binding upon the owner or the ship, no freight to be carried and, in truth, where the whole transaction rested upon simulated bills of lading, signed by the master in fraud of his owners.

In the present case the cargo was delivered in pursuance of the contract, the goods in the custody of the master, and subject to his lien for freight, as effectually as if they had been upon the deck of the ship, the contract confessedly binding both the owner and the shipper; and unless it be held that the latter is entitled to his lien upon the vessel also, he is deprived of one of the privileges of the contract, when, at the same time, the owner is in the full enjoyment of all those belonging to his side of it.

The argument urged against this lien of the shipper seems to go the length of maintaining, that in order to uphold it there must be a physical connection between the cargo and the vessel, and that the form of expression in the cases referred to is not to be taken in the connection and with reference to the facts of the particular case, but in a general sense, and as applicable to every case involving the liability of the ship for the safe transportation and delivery of the cargo. But this is obviously too narrow and limited a view of the liability of the vessel. There is no necessary physical connection between the cargo and the ship, as a foundation upon which to rest this liability. The unlading of the vessel at the port of discharge, upon the wharf, or even the deposit of the goods in the warehouse, does not discharge the lien, unless the delivery is to the consignee of the cargo, within the meaning of the bill of lading; and we do not see why the lien may not attach, when the cargo is delivered to the master for shipment before it reaches the hold of the vessel, as consistently and with as much reason as the continuance of it after separation from the vessel, and placed upon the wharf, or within the warehouse. In both instances the cargo is in the custody of the master, and in the act of conveyance in the execution of the contract of affreightment. We must look to the substance and good sense of the transaction; to the contract, as understood and intended by the parties, and as explained by its terms, and the attending circumstances out of which it arose, and to the grounds and reasons of the rules of law upon the application of which their duties and obligations are to be ascertained, in order to determine the scope and extent of them; and, in this view, we think no well founded distinction can be made, as to the liability of the owner and vessel, between the case of the delivery of the goods into the hands of the master at the wharf, for transportation on board of a particular ship, in pursuance of the contract of affreightment, and the case as made, after the lading of the goods upon the deck of the vessel; the one a constructive, the other an actual possession; the former, the same as if the goods had been carried to the vessel by her boats, instead of the vessel going herself to the wharf.

The decree of the court below, affirmed.

THE RECTOR, CHURCH-WARDENS AND VESTRYMEN OF CHRIST CHURCH, in the CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, in trust for CHRIST CHURCH HOSPITAL, Pl'ffs. in Er.,

v.

THE COUNTY OF PHILADELPHIA.

Exemption from taxation not a vested right—repeal of it is not in contravention of U. S. Constitution.

Where an exemption of the property of a corporation from taxes, conceded by an Act of a State Legislature, was spontaneous, and no service or duty, or other remunerative condition, was imposed on the corporation, it belongs to the class of laws denominated privilegia favorabilia.

It is not a necessary implication that the concession is perpetual, or was designed to continue during the corporate existence.

Such an interpretation is not to be favored, as the power of taxation is necessary to the existence of the State, and must be exerted according to the varying conditions of the commonwealth.

NOTE.—Power of States to tax. See note to Providence B'k v. Billings, 29 U. S. (4 Pet.), 514; and note to Dobbins v. Erie Co., 41 U. S. (16 Pet.), 435.

It is the nature of such a privilege as the Act confers, that it exists bene placitum, and may be revoked at the pleasure of the sovereign.

An Act of the same Legislature partially repealing such exemption is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States as tending to impair a legislative contract.

Argued Dec. 18, 1860. Decided Jan. 2, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania for the Eastern District.

This case arose in the court below, upon a case stated in the nature of a special verdict, for the opinion of that court. The court rendered a judgment in favor of the defendant, the County of Philadelphia; whereupon the plaintiffs sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. P. McCall and R. Johnson, for plaintiffs in error:

The question whether the Legislature of a State may irrevocably relinquish the power of taxing, is one not open to discussion in this court.

Gordon v. Appeal Tax, 3 How., 133; State Bank v. Knoop, 16 How., 369; Dodge v. Woolsey, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 331.

The only question, then, is, whether the Act of 1833 (see opinion of the court) is a contract with the hospital, in the sense of the word "contract" as used in the first article of the Constitution of the United States. The view taken of the Act by the court below in 12 Harris, 282, is as follows: "but no duty is imposed upon the institution as the consideration of the grant. It is required to do nothing. It is left to pursue its own course as freely as before. There is therefore nothing in the Statute of Exemption which savors of contract."

It is submitted that this view is erroneous. If we take the elementary definition of a contract, an agreement on sufficient consideration to do or not to do a particular thing, this statutory exemption has all the features of a contract. It is an agreement by the State, on a sufficient consideration if that were necessary, to wit: the relief by the hospital of persons who would otherwise be chargeable on the public, that the property of the hospital shall not be taxed. Just as a grant, which is a contract executed, amounts to an extinguishment of the right of the grantor, and implies a contract not to reassert that right.

Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 137.

It is not less a contract because it does not in terms stipulate for any mutual return of service on the part of the Corporation, as the consideration of the grant. No one doubts, after Fletcher v. Peck, Terret v. Taylor, and Dartmouth College v. Woodward, that a grant by the Legislature is a contract executed, which cannot be repealed by a subsequent Legislature. A legislative grant always imports a consideration from the deliberate character of the Act, and a valuable consideration is not essential.

Mayor v. B. & O. R R. Co., 6 Gill., 288; Derby Turnpike Co. v. Parks, 10 Conn., 522.

There is a distinction between legislative Acts which are of a public nature, adopted for the benefit of the whole community, to be varied or discontinued as the public good may require, and statutes which confer private rights of property. The former class is illustrated by Butler v. Pennsylvania, 10 How., 402; East Hartford v. Hartford Bridge Co., 10 How., 511.

The latter class is illustrated by the cases of Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 89; Terrett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch, 43; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat., 518.

We submit that the Act exempting the property of Christ Church Hospital from taxation falls within the latter class. The party on whom the immunity from taxation is conferred, is a private eleemosynary Corporation. The statute is not a public and general law. It does not affect the whole community, but confers on the hospital a special private right of property.

See New Jersey v. Wilson, 7 Cranch, 164; Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How., 133; Dodge v. Woolsey, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 330; State Bank of Ohio v. Knoop, 16 How., 369; Hardy v. Walton, 7 Pick., 108; Mathene v. Golden, 5 Ohio St., 361; Atwater v. Woodbridge, 6 Conn., 223; Osborne v. Humphreys, 7 Conn., 335; Landon v. Litchfield, 11 Conn., 251.

It seems to be well established by authority of decided cases, that an exemption from taxation annexed by the Legislature to a grant of land, or contained in an Act of incorporation, or in a general law under which an incorporation is created, is a contract which cannot be impaired by subsequent legislation.

The question then is, does it make any real difference in point of principle, that the immunity from taxation is not contained in the Act of incorporation, but in a subsequent legislative act? Is it the less a contract in the latter case than in the former? Why is not a surrender to existing corporations of the right to tax, as much a contract as a gift of land or other property to such a corporation? No one can doubt that a legislative grant of money to a hospital or university already in existence, is a contract which could not be revoked by a subsequent Act of the Legislature. It is a principle perfectly well settled, that the Legislature can no more revoke its grants than a donor his gifts when delivered. A surrender of the right to tax seems to stand on the same footing as a grant of money or other property. So far as the question of legislative contract is concerned, the material inquiry seems to be, not whether the grant was cotemporaneous with the charter, but whether it confers private rights upon a private corporation. If it does, it is a contract within the protection of the Constitution.

See The Derby Turnpike Co. v. Parks, 10 Conn., 522.

Mr. Henry T. King, for the defendant in error:

The powers of the co-ordinate branches of the Government of Pennsylvania, are designated by the constitution of that State. That is the paramount law, and in the judgment of the Supreme Court of that State in 1858, the Legislature had no power to alienate any of the rights of sovereignty, such as that of taxation, so as to bind future Legislatures, and any contract to that effect is void.

Mott v. Railroad, 30 Pa., 27.

It is assumed to be settled doctrine here, that that decision is conclusive upon this court, and will be implicitly followed.

See Green v. Neal, 6 Pet., 291.

The decisions which show that the passage of a state law impairing the obligation of contracts is in violation of the 10th section of Article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, appear to be unnecessary. The law on that point has been so often and so authoritatively announced, that there is little danger of its ever being shaken. See the decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Hospital v. Phil. Co., 24 Pa. St., 232.

It is not pretended that if the Act of 1833 is in its nature a contract within the power of the Legislature, a subsequent Act could impair it; but it is submitted that no case can be found where a law has been held against the Federal Constitution, which did not operate to defeat vested rights. What rights have been vested, or been created, by reason of the Act of 1833? The cases cited by the other side prevented a devestiture of rights, but where no right has vested against the State or the public, the law has been held constitutional.

Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet., 420.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause comes before this court upon a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, under the 25th section of the Act of Congress of the 24th September, 1789 (1 Stat. at L., 73). In the year 1833 the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed an Act which recited "that Christ Church Hospital, in the City of Philadelphia, had for many years afforded an asylum to numerous poor and distressed widows, who would probably else have become a public charge; and it being represented that, in consequence of the decay of the buildings of the hospital estate, and the increasing burden of taxes, its means are curtailed, and its usefulness limited," they enacted, "that the real property, including ground rents, now belonging and payable to Christ Church Hospital, in the City of Philadelphia, so long as the same shall continue to belong to the said hospital, shall be and remain free from taxes."

In the year 1851 the same authority enacted "that all property, real and personal, belonging to any association or incorporated company which is now by law exempt from taxation, other than that which is in the actual use and occupation of such association or incorporated company, and from which an income or revenue is derived by the owners thereof, shall hereafter be subject to taxation in the same manner and for the same purposes as other property is now by law taxable, and so much of any law as is hereby altered and supplied be, and the same is hereby repealed." It was decided in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, that the exemption conferred upon these plaintiffs by the Act of 1833 was partially repealed by the Act of 1851, and that an assessment of a portion of their real property under the Act of 1851 was not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, as tending to impair a legislative contract they alleged to be contained in the Act of Assembly of 1833 aforesaid.

The plaintiffs claim that the exemption conceded by the Act of 1833 is perpetual, and that the Act itself is in effect a contract. This concession of the Legislature was spontaneous, and no service or duty, or other remunerative condition, was imposed on the Corporation. It belongs to the class of laws denominated privilegia favorabilia. It attached only to such real property as belonged to the Corporation, and while it remained as its property; but it is not a necessary implication from these facts that the concession is perpetual, or was designed to continue during the corporate existence.

Such an interpretation is not to be favored, as the power of taxation is necessary to the existence of the State, and must be exerted according to the varying conditions of the commonwealth. The Act of 1833 belongs to a class of statutes in which the narrowest meaning is to be taken which will fairly carry out the intent of the Legislature. All laws, all political institutions, are dispositions for the future, and their professed object is to afford a steady and permanent security to the interests of society. Bentham says, "that all laws may be said to be framed with a view to perpetuity; but perpetual is not synonymous to irrevocable; and the principle on which all laws ought to be, and the greater part of them have been established, is that of defeasible perpetuity—a perpetuity defeasible by an alteration of the circumstances and reasons on which the law is founded." The inducements that moved the Legislature to concede the favor contained in the Act of 1833 are special, and were probably temporary in their operation. The usefulness of the Corporation had been curtailed in consequence of the decay of their buildings and the burden of taxes.

It may be supposed that in 18 years the buildings would be renovated, and that the Corporation would be able afterwards to sustain some share of the taxation of the State. The Act of 1851 embodies the sense of the Legislature to this effect.

It is in the nature of such a privilege as the Act of 1833 confers, that it exists bene placitum and may be revoked at the pleasure of the sovereign.

Such was the conclusion of the courts in Commonwealth v. Bird, 12 Mass., 443; Dale v. Governor, 3 Stew. (Ala.), 387; Alexander v. Duke of Wellington, 2 Russ. & M., 35; 24 Pa. St. (12 Har.), 233; Lindley, Jurisp., sec. 42.

It is the opinion of the court that there is no error in the judgment of the Supreme Court, within the scope of the writ to that court, and its judgment is affirmed.

BRADDOCK JONES, Plff. in Er.,

v.

JAMES G SOULARD.

(See S. C., 24 How., 41-65.)

When riparian owner owns to center of fresh-water river—size of river does not alter the rule—City of St. Louis—school land.

All grants of land bounded by fresh-water rivers, where the expressions designating the water line are general, confer the proprietorship on the grantee to the middle thread of the stream, and entitle him to the accretions.

The doctrine, that on rivers where the tide ebbs and flows, grants of land are bounded by ordinary high water mark, has no application in such case; nor does the size of the river alter the rule.

The City Charter of St. Louis of 1809 extends to the eastern boundary of the State of Missouri, in the middle of the River Mississippi.

The entry set up in defense in the court below is void, as held in Kissell v. The St. Louis Schools. 59 U. S.(18 How.)

The school corporation held the land in dispute, with power to sell and convey the same in fee to the defendant in error, in execution of their trust.

Submitted Dec. 12, 1860. Decided Jan. 7, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the court below, by the defendant in error, Soulard, to recover possession of a part of S. 404 of the series of St. Louis school lands.

The title of Soulard was deduced from the Corporation of the St. Louis public schools. It was admitted that all the title of this Corporation was vested in the said Soulard. The defendant held under the City of St. Louis, whose claim was derived through a statute of the State of Missouri.

The trial below resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. M. Blair and P. B. Garesche, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff in error submits:

1st. That the Town of St. Louis, as the same stood incorporated on the 18th June, 1812, did not extend to the middle of the main channel of the Mississippi River as its eastern boundary, but only to high water mark on its right bank.

2d. Even if it did so extend, yet at most the land in controversy was but reserved for the support of schools, not actually granted for that purpose, and upon the admission of the State of Missouri, in 1820, it became the property of the State.

3d. That the first direct grant of this land by the State was made by the Act of 8d March, 1851, under which plaintiff in error claims.

The general proposition first laid down depends on the correctness of the following argument, viz.: the limit of private ownership in water-courses when these are navigable in law, or arms of the sea, is high water mark; and such rivers as the Ohio and Mississippi are of the same nature and dignity at law above tide water, as ordinary rivers below the flow of the tide. It will not be denied that when land is bounded by a tide water river, the limit of private property is the mark to which high tide ascends.

The second branch of this first general proposition is more debatable. Above the ebb and flow of the tide, no river of England is navigable at all. In inquiring into the definition of navigable streams in that country, therefore, it was found that they were correctly described to be those in which the tide ebbed and flowed. But navigability is the principal thing: the flowing of the tide is a mere incident. When, therefore, we find that there are navigable waters in America or elsewhere not flowed by the tide, we seek other definitions of navigable water, the flowing of the tide being no longer a test. Whatever be the new definition, we attach to navigable waters here the same consequences, properties and incidents that the jurists of England attach to navigable waters in that country. In other words, we treat our western inland rivers in the same manner, and claim for them, and the land bordering on them the same legal consequences that are predicable of arms of the sea, properly so called in England.

That no rivers in England are navigable above tide water is well settled.

Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 454.

In the same decision it was declared in the most solemn and emphatic manner, that such a definition was inapplicable to the rivers and lakes of America, and that these were public navigable waters (p. 454).

This being settled, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that they have all the properties of public navigable waters, such as the sea and its arms which are flowed by the sea; which last is declared to be an immaterial circumstance, and by no means an essential feature of navigability.

If this be conceded, the case of the defendant in error is at an end; for one of the properties of arms of the sea is not to be the subject of private ownership below high water mark.

Naglee v. Ingersoll, 7 Pa.: 1 Penn., 105; Carson v. Blazer, 2 Binn., 475; 14 Serg. & R., 71–74; 8 Watts, 434; 9 Watts, 228; 2 Devereaux, 30–36; Elder v. Burrus, 6 Humph., 358; McManus v. Carmichael, 3 Ia., 1; Haight v. City of Keokuk, 4 Ia., 199; 1 Walker, Ch., 155; Bullock v. Wilson, 2 Port., 436.

But the plaintiff in error is free to confess that in some of the other States of the Union, perhaps in a majority of them, a contrary doctrine has been laid down, and that the decisions of the State of Missouri and of the Supreme Court of the United States may be cited in opposition to the views which it is the duty of the plaintiff in error to enforce.

It is imagined that peculiar stress will be laid upon those cases to be found in the Missouri Reports, which conflict with the doctrine contended for by the plaintiff in error. But it is believed that but little weight is due to these Missouri decisions; for in all of them, the matter seems to have passed without serious dispute or discussion. There is no evidence that the matter was argued at the hearing, and it is almost certain that the points now made were not presented to the court on those occasions. If they were, they received no attention. Under these circumstances, it is submitted that this court should consider itself free to consider the case as of the first impression, so far as the decisions of the Supreme Court of Missouri are concerned.

As to the decision of this court in the case of Howard v. Ingersoll, 13 How., 416 to 422, the point covered by this dictum was not necessarily decided, and so what fell from the court on that occasion was obiter dictum.

On the second point plaintiff in error submits, that up to the Act of Jan. 27, 1831, the United States did not grant, absolutely, to the schools or to the state for the use of schools, any of the land reserved for the support of schools by the 2d sec. of the Act of 13th June, 1812. Up to the passage of this Act there was only a reservation of certain lands, but no grant of them. This was decided expressly in the case of Hammond v. The Schools, 8 Mo., 65.

It follows that there was no final disposition of the land in controversy by the United States prior to the admission of Missouri as a State, which occurred in 1820; and the point taken by the plaintiff in error is, that this land being covered by the waters of the Mississippi River at that time, was a part of the bed of the stream, and that according to the doctrine of Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 3 How., 212, it passed by the admission of Missouri to the state. The subsequent grant of it, therefore, by the United States was of no validity.

Navigability is the test of sovereignty. If the water be navigable, the bed of the stream over which it flows belongs, as an incident of sovereignty, to the State in which it is found; and whether it is flowed by the tide or not can make no difference, as was declared by the court in the case of The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh.

The land in controversy never was included within the Town of St. Louis as it stood incorporated in 1812, and so was not reserved for the support of schools. Further, that not being so reserved, but being an incident of sovereignty, Missouri had the entire ownership of it on her admission into the Union; and as in 1833 the State of Missouri only granted to the school corporation so much of the lands as had been reserved for school purposes, the land in controversy was not within the description of the 9th section of that Act.

The first Act which embraces this land in terms, was passed in 1851, and by it this land was given to the City of St. Louis, under whom the plaintiff in error claims.

If these views be correct, the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

Messrs. Thomas T. Gantt and Thomas C. Reynolds, for defendant in error:

The defendant in error submits the following propositions:

1. The documents read in evidence by the plaintiff below are conclusive in favor of plaintiff against anyone not having a better title under the United States to the premises in controversy.

2. The land, within the assignment and survey 404 is, as a proposition of fact, admitted to be in T. 45 R. 7 E. in St. Louis County, and to be within the reservation for the schools by the 2d section of the Act of 18th June, 1812; provided that the eastern boundary of the Town St. Louis, as then incorporated, was the middle of the main channel of the Mississippi River. But the middle of this channel is that eastern boundary as a proposition of law.

3. If it was within this reservation, the title passed to the school corporation by the several acts and documents read in evidence by plaintiff, whether, upon the admission of Missouri as a State, the proprietary right to the premises in controversy was continued in the United States, or tranferred to the State of Missouri.

Upon the first proposition, it is not intended to do more than to refer to the case of Kissell v. The Schools, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 19, where this matter was carefully considered, and where the very pre-emption of Duncan, which is set up as one of the defenses in this action, was pronounced to be a nullity. The examination of the second proposition brings up the inquiry whether the eastern boundary of the Town of St. Louis, as it stood incorporated at the date of the Act of 18th June, 1812, was the middle of the main channel of the Mississippi River, and whether the out boundary run by the surveyor-general in 1840 had for its eastern boundary the middle of the main channel of the Mississippi River.

The words used in each case are substantially the same.

Coming to the description of the town as it stood incorporated in 1812, we find that the calls are: "Thence due east to the Mississippi; from thence by the Mississippi to the place first mentioned."

This is the description of an incorporated town, which is bounded on the east by the Mississippi River. That this description is, in every legal sense, equivalent to a call for the middle of the main channel of the stream, is one of those propositions which, to use the language of Judge Cowen in his learned note to Ex parte Jennings, 6 Cow., 518–543, "No lawyer will hazard his reputation by controverting." In the same note he remarks, that "the only question which can generally arise between the citizen and the state as to the ownership of rivers above the tide, is whether the former be the owner of the soil adjacent, within the meaning of Hale (p. 543).

In the case at bar, there can be no question of this kind; for [see 59 U. S. (18 How.), p. 19] the schools are the owners of all the unappropriated land within the survey of which—whether we adopt the description of the Town of St. Louis as it stood incorporated in June, 1812, or of the out-boundary of the town "run so as to include the out lots, common lots and commons"—we find the Mississippi River designated as the eastern boundary. The only inquiry is: does this boundary carry us to the middle of the stream?

The propositions urged by the plaintiff in error assert, that in the United States a public river navigable in fact though above the tide, was ipso facto subject to all the legal incidents of what are properly called "arms of the sea," or creeks and rivers flowed by the tide.

The defendant in error maintains that the doctrine of Sir Matthew Hale, on this subject, has been adopted in all its integrity by the judicial mind of America.

As the land in question lies in Missouri, we naturally look, in the first instance, to the decisions in that State, to ascertain the rule by which controversies respecting land titles are to be determined.

The first decision bearing on this point occurs in O'Fallon v. Dagget, 4 Mo., 343. It was followed by the case of Shelton v. Maupin, 16 Mo., 124. Then came the case of Smith v. City of St. Louis, 21 Mo., 36; and the case of Smith v. Kelly, not yet reported, decided at the March Term, 1860.

In all these cases, the common law rule laid down by Hale and referred to by Cowen, was quietly adopted by the court and, indeed, does not seem to have been gravely questioned by the bar. When this question has come up incidentally or directly before this court, it has been treated as a settled matter.

See 13 How., in the case of Howard v. Inger- soil, p. 416, Judge Wayne's opinion, and p. 422, Judge Nelson's opinion; see, also, Jones v. Johnson, 59 U. S. (18 How.), p. 150.

These are the latest opinions in which a reference to this principle is to be found. It has been repeatedly spoken of, in like manner, in earlier cases.

After referring to the decisions of the courts of Missouri and of the United States, it would seem unnecessary, in respect of the title to land in Missouri, to speak of the decisions of other States. Nevertheless, a brief citation of cases decided in the different states, all agreeing with the doctrine of Sir Matthew Hale, may not be inappropriate.

H., 369; Greenleaf v. Kilton, 11 N. More than a dozen cases were decided afterwards in New York, in which this principle was recognized; but all refer to this case and to Judge Cowen's valuable note.

See 5 Paige, 137, 547, 5 Wend., 447; 13 Wend., 358; 17 Wend., 571; 20 Wend., 111; 22 Wend., 425; 26 Wend., 404; &c.: Arnold v Mundy, 1 Halst., 1; 8 Zab., 624; Brown v. Kennedy, 5 Har. & J., 195; Haye's Ex'rs v. Bowman, 1 Rand., 417; Harramond v. McGlaughon, Taylor, 84, 186; Hagan v. Campbell, 8 Port., 9; Harrison v. Young, 9 Ga., 359; Jones v. Water Lot Co., 18 Ga., 539; Morgan v. Reading, 3 Sm. & M., 366; Morgan v. Livingston, 6 Mart., 216; Muncipality No. 2 v. Orleans Cotton Press Co., 18 La., 122; 18 La., 278; Stuart v. Clark's Lessee, 2 Swan., 9, overruling Elder v. Burruss, 6 Humph., 358; Middleton v. Pritchard, 3 Scam., 510; Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich., 18; Jones v. Pettibone, 2 Wis., 308; Young v. McEntire, 3 Ohio, 495; 11 Ohio, 138; 16 Ohio, 540.

All these authorities establish, without any variation, that the bed of a fresh water stream or of a river above high water belongs to the owner of the adjacent soil, and that this holds good whether the portion of the bed which is in question be navigable in fact or not; the only consequence of the stream admitting of navigation above tide water being that the proprietary right of the owner of the adjacent soil is subject to the public easement or servitude, as it is called, by Sir Matthew Hale. At the trial in the circuit court, the defendant (now plaintiff in error), cited, among other authorities to support his views, cases from the Supreme Courts of Tennessee, Alabama, and Michigan, being 6 Humph., 358; 2 Port., 486; and 1 Walk. Ch., 155, respectively.

The case in 6 Humph. is overruled by that in 2 Swan., 9; and although the cases cited from Alabama and Michigan cannot be so distinctly said to have been overruled by the later cases of 8 Porter, and Lorman v. Benson (which will be found in 8 Michigan, 18), it is only because the previous decisions of those states were not as supposed by plaintiff in error; no previous decision needed to be overruled in those States.

It is far from being true that all the waters of England are unfit for navigation above tide water, and are not public rivers above that point. On the contrary, the citations presently to be made from Hale's Treatise, "de jure maris et brachiorum ejusdem," show that the distinction between rivers navigable in fact above tide water, and rivers navigable in the proper legal sense as being arms of the sea, was just as familiar to Hale as to the American jurists. And that it was in full view of the truth that rivers might be and were used by the public as common highways above tide water, that the doctrines which, as Judge Cowen says, in his note to 6 Cowen., 543, "at this day no lawyer will hazard his reputation by controverting," were laid down in the first instance by English courts, and have since then been adopted with so much uniformity by the bench and bar of America. In the second place, it is a complete missing, not only of the spirit, but of the letter of the two decisions quoted from 8 How. and 12 How., respectively, to suppose that they give any countenance to the conclusions announced and contended for by plaintiff in error.

By reference to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States since Pollard v. Hagan, it will be seen that while the doctrine of that case has been repeatedly reaffirmed, scrupulous care has been used to restate that doctrine as it was in the first place laid down, and to limit the decision by the circumstances under which it was made, viz.: that land flowed by the sea at ordinary high tide, if not previously disposed of by the United States, became the property of the State on its admission to the Union. This careful reference to tide water [9 How., 471; 59 U. S. (18 How.), 71-74], and the distinction taken as lately as 13 How., 416, 422, between fresh-water streams and the arms of the sea, properly so called, are abundantly sufficient to show, if illustration were needed, the accuracy with which the doctrine declared in Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, was adapted to the particular facts of that case, and how little it was the purpose of this court to leave any one at liberty, first to misconstrue and then misapply the decision in that cause.

The same policy which forbids the acquisition of exclusive individual rights over the shore of the sea, forbids the establishment of such rights over such places as are flowed by its tide; for in truth, as far as the tide flows in any river bed, that bed would be filled by the sea, if the fresh river water were entirely to fail. Let us suppose all sources supplying fresh water throughout the world to fail, the beds of rivers remaining as now. In this case, twice in twenty four hours, for most of these, they would be filled with water from the ocean. This would be the true limit of the dominion of the sea. No one would be at any loss then to recognize the extent of "the sea and its arms." Upon these, then, there is to be no encroachment by any private individual. This limit is fixed by nature and adopted by the law. If by the supply of the necessary water the river beds above these limits become navigable, they become subject to the "servitude of public interest." But while the rights of the public or the interests of the public have been so far consulted in respect of rivers which are thus navigable as to secure to the community the free use of such streams as common highways, yet subject to this easement, which is from its nature merely accidental and temporary, the bed of the stream, usque ad filum aquæ, belongs to the owner of the adjacent land. These principles were as clearly recognized and these distinctions as clearly taken in England as in America.

See Matthew Hale's Treatise, to be found at large in the volume entitled "Hargrave's Law Tracts," and the first four chapters of which are reproduced in the notes to 6 Cow., 540, already cited.

Public navigable rivers above tide water have been familiar to the English jurists from the time of Sir Matthew Hale to the present day, though then as now, and in England as well as in America, the physical and legal distinction between "arms of the sea," or waters flowed by the tide, and consequently navigable uniformly and constantly, and those rivers above tide water, which were, by the customary supply of rain, kept at such a height as to be generally navigable, was clearly recognized, and that while in respect of all lands adjacent to the first class of waters the rights of the proprietor extended only to high water mark, in respect of lands adjacent to public rivers above the tide, the proprietary right extended usque ad filum aquæ.

The decision of this court that the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States extends to inland waters navigable in fact, has no effect upon the title of proprietors of land adjacent to such waters.

5 How., 441.

Improvements in the structure of boats and in the mode of propelling them may render streams, now wholly incapable of serving any commercial purpose, available for the carrying on of a most valuable trade by water. Let this marine commerce spring up, and the protection which the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States can give must accompany it. But shall the title to land adjacent to our streams which may thus become navigable, in fact, be affected by the discovery of improved methods of navigation? The consequences which the plaintiff in error attempts to deduce from the two decisions in 3 How., 212, and 12 How., 454, are completely negatived by the more recent decision of the same court in 13 How., 381.

The defendant in error denies that any such change in the ownership of the land in question occurred upon the admission of Missouri in 1820, as is claimed by the plaintiff in error. But if by that Act the premises in controversy became the property of the State, the school corporation have the elder title thereto under the state, namely: by virtue of the Act of Feb. 13, 1833. If, therefore, the premises in controversy were within the reservation for the use of schools made by Congress on June 13, 1812, though this reservation did not prevent the subsequent disposition of the land by Congress (8 Mo., 65), and though it may have passed to the State of Missouri in 1820, yet the State took it subject to a trust which it recognized and fulfilled by the Act of Feb. 13, 1833, and so the titles, both of the State and the United States, unite in the school corporation.

But it is conceived that the title to the land in controversy did not become vested in the State by the admission of Missouri.

In the case of a territory just about to become a state, the United States, as proprietor of the land on the sea or its arms, owns everything down to high water mark. As to what is beyond high water mark, the right is either in the United States as sovereign, or in the Territory, or in abeyance. As to land bounded by a fresh water stream or a river above tide water, the United States as proprietor owns everything to the middle of the main channel. The change of sovereignty to the State, or the acquisition of sovereignty by the State, will have no effect upon any proprietary rights.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

Soulard sued Jones to recover the northern part of a United States survey of land laid off for the St. Louis schools. The part sued for fronts the Mississippi, and includes a sand bar, formerly covered with water when the channel of the river was filled to a navigable stage. The land in included in the survey approved June 15th, 1843, designating the school lands; and the controversy would be governed beyond dispute by the principles declared in the case of Kissell v. St. Louis Public Schools, 18 How., 19, had this been fast land in 1812, when the grant to the schools was made. But it is insisted that the title to this accretion within the Mississippi River did not pass by the Act of 1812 (2 Stat. at L., 748), and remained in the United States till the State of Missouri became one of the States of the Union, in 1820, when the title vested in the state as a sovereign right to land lying below ordinary high water mark. And furthermore, that if the State did not take by force of her sovereign right, she acquired a good title to the land known as Duncan's island by the Act of Congress to reclaim swamp lands. These claims the State conveyed by a statute to the City of St. Louis, and that corporation conveyed them to Jones, the plaintiff in error.

Soulard claims under the Corporation of the St. Louis schools. The school survey No. 404 contains 78,96-100ths acres, including the land in controversy.

The Town of St. Louis was incorporated in 1809 by the Common Pleas Court of St. Louis County, in conformity to an Act of the Territorial Legislature passed in 1808, and the only contested question in the cause is, whether the eastern line of the corporation extends to the middle thread of the Mississippi River, or is limited to the bank of the channel. The calls for boundary in the charter are, "beginning at Antoine Roy's mill on the bank of the Mississippi; thence running sixty arpents west; thence south on said line of sixty arpents in the rear, until the same comes to the Barrieu Donoyer; thence due south until it comes to the Sugarloaf; thence due east to the Mississippi; from thence by the Mississippi, to place first mentioned."

The expression used in designating boundary on the closing line in the charter, is as apt to confer riparian rights on the proprietor of the tract of seventy-nine acres as the call could well be, unless the last call had been for the middle of the river.

Many authorities resting on adjudged cases have been adduced to us in the printed argument presented by the consel of the defendant in error, to show that from the days of Sir Matthew Hale to the present time all grants of land bounded by fresh water rivers, where the expressions designating the water line are general, confer the proprietorship on the grantee to the middle thread of the stream, and entitle him to the accretions.

We think this, as a general rule, too well settled, as part of the American and English law of real property, to be open to discussion; and the inquiry here is, whether the rule applies to so great and public a water-course as the Mississippi is, at the City of St. Louis. The land grant, to which the accretion attached, has nothing peculiar in it to form an exemption from he rule; it is an irregular piece of land, of seventy-nine acres, found vacant by the surveyor-general, and surveyed by him as a school lot, in conformity to the Act of 1812.

The doctrine, that on rivers where the tide ebbs and flows, grants of land are bounded by ordinary high water mark, has no application in this case; nor does the size of the river alter the rule. To hold that it did, would be a dangerous tampering with riparian rights, involving litigation concerning the size of rivers as a matter of fact, rather than proceeding on established principles of law.

1. We are of the opinion that the City Charter of St. Louis of 1809 extends to the eastern boundary of the State of Missouri, in the middle of the River Mississippi. Dovaston v. Payne, 2 Smith's Lead. Cas., 225.

2. That Duncan's entry set up in defense in the court below is void, as this court held in the case of Kissell v. the St. Louis Schools, 18 How., 19.

3. That the school Corporation held the land in dispute, with power to sell and convey the same in fee to the defendant in error, Soulard, in execution of their trust.

It is ordered that the judgment of the circuit court, be affirmed.

Mexican land case—fabricated claim.

In a Mexican land case where the only document found among public records, shows that the petitioner asked for land, that the Governor did not accede to the request, and it is evident that the grant was fabricated, the claim was rejected.

Argued Dec. 26, 1860. Decided Jan. 7, 1861.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case, and a statement of the facts, appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. P. Benjamin and E. L. Goold, for appellant:

The proof that the titles are genuine and authentic is overwhelming, and the circumstances relied on in support of the adverse pretensions of the government are trivial in the extreme. The proof of all the papers that preceded the final grant is found in the government's own records and archieves, and need not be enlarged on.

The signatures are proved by the men who wrote them, Pio Pico, and J. M. Moreno, and by the grantee, who was a public officer and familiar with them.

The cases of Cambuston and Fuentes, cited by the attorney-general, are in no sense authorities in the cause now before the court; they are totally inapplicable. In this case, unlike them, there is record evidence of all the preliminary proceedings, and proof of the loss of the book in which the concession is certified to have been recorded.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., for appellees:

The judge of the court below, who knew the witnesses, has declared upon record his opinion that they are not entitled to credit, and that conclusively establishes their status in this court. Where a court of original jurisdiction expressly bases its decision upon a fact within its knowledge and sufficient to justify its decision, an appellate tribunal cannot reverse it on the ground that the fact is otherwise, unless there be something else upon the record which shows very clearly that the inferior court was mistaken. This is peculiarly true of cases in which the decision turns upon the credibility of witnesses. For these reasons the opinions expressed upon the characters of the witnesses directly or indirectly, expressly or impliedly, by auditors, masters in chancery, or assessors of any class, are always regarded as conclusive upon the courts which review their decision—as conclusive as the verdict of a jury would be upon the same matter. There is certainly nothing in this case to create a doubt that the judge of the court below did entire justice to Diaz and Moreno.

We insist that all the evidence, introduced by the claimant for the purpose of showing that the grant existed before the contract, is illegal; and besides, when it comes to be examined, it will be found not to prove any such fact.

We insist, also, that this grant is void for uncertainty with which the land is described in the title papers. It is void beside, because there is no record of it, for the case comes precisely within the principle decided in the case of Cambuston, repeated in the case of Fuentes as well as in many other cases determined by this court within the last three years.

Even if this grant had been regularly made according to the form of the laws, customs and usage of Mexico, it would still have been void, for the reason that the lands claimed under it were not vacant lands within the meaning of the Colonization Laws. A part of it had been appropriated, and was at the time occupied and used, under a decree of the Supreme Congress, for military purposes. Another part was devoted by law to the use of the church and the payment of the debt contracted by the Mission

Dolores. The balance was within the limits of the pueblo, as claimed by the City of San Francisco, and conceded by the United States.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants claim the land in dispute as assignees of Benito Diaz. This claim was rejected by the Board of Land Commissioners, and also by the district court.

The documentary evidence, upon which the case rests, is as follows:

1. A petition of Benito Diaz, dated April 8, 1845, in which he asks for a grant of land which he calls "a vacant place within the jurisdiction of San Francisco, known by the name of 'Punta de Lobos,' bounded on the north by the sea, which flows to the port of San Francisco; on the south with the Cerro, in the rear of the mission known by the name of the 'Cerro de Laguna Honda;' on the east with the 'Loma Alta;' and on the west by 'la Punta de Lobos;' which will comprehend two leagues." The petition adds that the presidio and castle are within the tract, but the petitioner does not ask for them unless the government is willing; but if that be done, he promises to erect a house of certain dimensions in the port of San Francisco for the military command.

2. An order of reference, bearing date May 24, 1845, and signed Pico, ordering the petition to pass for information to the respective judge, and await the report of the military commander upon the matter.

3. A report from Jose de la Cruz Sanches, who seems to have been alcalde at the pueblo of San Francisco, dated August 16, 1845, in which he declares that the land is vacant, and the petitioner has the necessary requisites according to law, but declining to give any information about the military lands.

4. A report by Francisco Sanches, the military commander, dated at the military command of San Francisco, October 18, 1845, setting forth that the land the petitioner solicits is vacant and may be conceded to him, "not comprehending in the grant the two military points of the castle and presidio that are included in the petition."

These documents are all written on the same paper. The governor's order of reference is on the margin, and the reports indorsed. But there is no concession or order that a definitive title should issue to the petitioner, as is always found when the governor accedes to the prayer of the petition. See Arguello v. United States, 18 How., 543.

The petition is not accompanied by a diseño or map of the land, as required by the Regulations of 1828. This is all the document found among the archives or public records, and shows this fact only: that the petitioner asked for land; that the informé did not satisfy the governor, who did not accede to the request and, therefore, the petitioner took nothing by his application. That the governor had good reasons for refusing the prayer of this petition, is apparent from the fact, not only of the public fortifications of the harbor being erected thereon, but because on the 4th of November, 1834, Governor Figueroa, in his decree establishing the pueblo of San Francisco, had included a large portion of the land now claimed, and the remainder was claimed as the land of the Mission Dolores, which the Departmental Assembly afterwards (15th April, 1846) ordered to be sold at auction, and suspended the further alienation of the same as vacant.

This is all the record evidence, on which alone the court can rely as speaking the truth. It does not show even an inchoate equity in Benito Diaz; nor does the fact that he carried off some of the materials of the dilapidated fort to build him a house in San Francisco add to it.

The next fact which we can admit as sufficiently proved is, the sale by Benito Diaz of the land claimed to Thomas O. Larkin, in September, 1846, reciting a grant or patent to Diaz, dated 25th June, 1846. This instrument purports to be a patent or definitive title to Benito Diaz, for all the land included in the boundaries mentioned in the petition. The public fortifications which protect the harbor of San Francisco are not excepted. The value of such a grant might easily be anticipated, when the occupation of the country by the United States had taken place. Pio Pico, after his deposition from the government, could afford to be more liberal in 1846 than in 1845, when he very properly refused to make it. There is no trace of this grant to be found on record, or in the public archives. It purports to be signed by Pio Pico, and attested by his secretary, Moreno; and each of them has been called to attest the genuineness of the signatures. We have decided in the case of Luco v. United States, 23 How., 543, "that, owing to the weakness of memory with regard to the dates of grants signed by them, the testimony of the late officers of the Mexican Government in California cannot be received to supply or contradict the public records, or establish a title of which there is no trace to be found in the public archives." In compliance with this rule, we might dismiss this case without further argument; for if the testimony of the officers of the government cannot be relied on, much less can that of more obscure individuals, especially as we have seen in the Luco case, and some others, that it is easy to obtain any number of witnesses to depose to any fact necessary to establish a fraudulent grant.

The testimony brought in this case to support this private deed, and give it the force and effect of a public record, grant or patent, and to prove that it was executed as such before the 7th of July, 1846, when the official functions of the late officers ceased entirely, tends only to confirm the suspicions in which it is involved, and demonstrates the necessity of the rule of decision which we have adopted.

Pio Pico was called as a witness. He swears "that he believes the signatures to be genuine," and that is all. He does not state where it was signed, or when it was signed, whether before or after his expulsion from the government. If executed where it purports to be, viz.: at Los Angeles, where the public records were kept, he knew it could be proved he had left Los Angeles a week before its date (25th June), and was residing at Santa Barbara, where he remained till the approach of Frémont to Monterey. He knew it could be proved that his secretary, who attested the paper, was in Los Angeles, seventy miles distant. He could probably give no better reason for his willingness to sell the public forts, which he had refused to do a year before, than the fact that the Americans had taken possession of them. His silence on these points is expressive. There is no doubt that his testimony, so far as it goes, is true, and given with his habitual caution. He might excuse himself for not stating whether or not this grant was one of the large number said to have been executed by him on the 8th of August, on the eve of his departure to Mexico, for the reason that no question was asked him as to that fact.

Moreno, the secretary, is not so cautious and, therefore, has involved himself in more difficulties, which are unexplained, and perhaps inexplicable.

He testifies as follows:

"I recollect this document. I saw it on the 25th June, 1846, when I signed it. This is my signature as secretary ad interim, and also my signature to the certificate of registry; and I saw Pio Pico sign it as governor. This is his genuine signature. I think Benito Diaz wrote the body of the grant himself. After the grant was completed, I delivered it to the agent of Benito Diaz, on the road from Los Angeles to Santa Barbara. The agent to whom I delivered it, according to my recollection, was Eulogio Celiz."

Now, this document states that it was "given in the City of Los Angeles, on the 25th of June, 1846," and Moreno swears he saw Pio Pico sign it, who was on that day seventy miles distant in Santa Barbara. His certificate, that he has recorded it in the proper book, he does not prove to be true; or if he was at Santa Barbara, with Pico, on the 25th, how he could record it in Los Angeles, where alone the records were kept. If he executed and recorded it in Los Angeles, he does not explain why it is in the handwriting of Benito Diaz, and not drawn up by the clerks of the Department as other grants; and how it came to pass that the date of the paper, and his certificate, are in the handwriting of Benito Diaz, who was at San Francisco, some five hundred and twenty miles distant; nor how it came to pass, that when he had signed and recorded this important document, he put it in his pocket, and started for Santa Barbara, and met Celiz on the road; nor does he explain how Celiz, who left San Francisco on the 21st of June, with this paper drawn up by Diaz, for the purpose of taking it to Los Angeles to have it executed, could have taken it all the way to Los Angeles, five hundred and twenty miles, before it was executed; and then, that Moreno should meet him on the road between Santa Barbara and Los Angeles, after it was executed. There were no railroads in California at that time by which to account for such swift traveling.

Diaz testifies that the document is in his handwriting; "that he wrote it in San Francisco, on the 20th or 21st of June, in consequence of a letter which he received from Bandini, whom he calls secretary of the government," but who was not secretary. "That the country was in such a critical state, that it was necessary to send it immediately; which he did, by special courier. That from information of his courier, Celiz, he understood that the grant was signed on the road, either at Santa Buena Ventura, or Santa Barbara." The critical state of the country, as the Americans were in possession of the greater part of it, will no doubt account for the fast riding of the courier, and in some measure for the execution of the deed on the highway, and the false certificate of record of a document which, without such recording, was but a private deed.

If Celiz met Pico where he states, he required but five days to ride five hundred miles, while it required eight days for Pico to travel less than seventy miles.

There is no necessity to rely upon the testimony of witnesses Crane and Watson, that Diaz declared, "that after the American revolution, he made out the grant in his own handwriting; and that, in order to make it valid, he dated it back to the month of June."

The face of the paper, and the testimony brought to support it, sufficiently demonstrate this to be the fact.

It is evident, that when this grant was fabricated, it was not known that conclusive evidence could be produced of the absence of Governor Pico from Los Angeles on the day of its date. Hence the necessity of changing the venue to that of the highway, when it was too late to alter or erase the certificate of record to suit it. And hence the absurd contradictions exhibited in the testimony of Moreno, who appears to be emulating the example of his predecessor.

The judgment of the district court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

THE UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
CLAUDE CHANA, WM. MARTIN, THOS. P. TURNER AND ALBERT ROWE.

(See S. C., 24 How., 131, 132.)

Mexican land claim rejected.

Where the testimony to sustain a Mexican claim is similar to that offered in the cases of United States v. Nye, 62 U. S., and The United States v. Rose, 64 U. S., in which cases it was determined that the testimony was not sufficient to support the claims, the claim rejected.

Submitted Dec. 17, 1860. Decided Jan. 7, 1861.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the board of Land Commissioners, in California, by Claude Chana, and supplemental petitions filed by the other appellees, before said board for the confirmation to them of a claim to certain lands in California.

The Board of Land Commissioners entered a decree confirming the claim. The district court, on appeal, affirmed this decree; whereupon the United States took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. Black, Atty-Gen., for appellants:

This claim is based entirely upon Sutter's general title, and like all of its class it is, of course, worthless.

Mr. Crittenden, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees presented their claim, before the Board of Commissioners for the settlement of Land Claims in California, for a tract of land consisting of four leagues, on the south side of Bear Creek, in Yuba County, under a grant to Theodore Sicard by Micheltorena, Governor of the Department of California.

The testimony to sustain the claim is similar to that offered in the cases of United States v. Nye, 21 How., 408, and United States v. Rose, 23 How., 262. In these cases it was determined that the testimony was not sufficient to support the claims. This case must follow the same course that was assumed in those.

Judgment of the district court reversed, and petition dismissed.

v.

LEWIS MOORE AND CHARLES RAYBON.

(See S. C., 24 How., 147-158.)

Plea to jurisdiction, what sufficient—false averment of jurisdiction.

The district court may permit the withdrawal of pleas in bar for the purpose of pleading to the jurisdiction.

Where an attempt was made, according to the affidavit on which the motion was founded, to confer upon the district court, by a false and fradulent averment, a jurisdiction to which it was not entitled under the Constitution, this was a gross contempt of court.

A plea in abatement is not a nullity, if, although not precise or formal, it denies the averment of citizenship of plaintiffs, as they affirmed it to be.

Argued Dec. 17, 1860. Decided Jan. 7, 1861.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas.

The history of the case and a sufficient statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. G. Hale, for the plaintiffs in error:

1. The district court was not authorized to permit the defendants, Moore and Raybon, to withdraw their answers and to file pleas to the jurisdiction. It will be observed that suit was commenced Nov. 4, 1855; that service was made on these defendants, on Sept. 27 and Oct. 28, 1856; that on Nov. 25, 1856, and some days after pleas to the jurisdiction had been made by other defendants, Moore and Raybon voluntarily filed their answers containing the general issue and pleas in bar; that an order for a survey was made at the same term, and that it was not until June 8, 1857, at a new term, that they thought proper to swear that they had been deceived by a false allegation in the plaintiff's petition, and had since ascertained its incorrectness.

Ordinary questions of amendment are intrusted to the discretion of the inferior courts and are not revisable here; but in a case of this character, the courts of law have no discretion. The 32d section of the Act of 1789 (1 Stat. at L., 91), applies in its first clause to the correction of formal defects or errors by a reference to other parts of the record, and in its last and more general clause, to an amendment of "any defect in the process or pleadings." It is obvious that this statute grants only the power of correcting an error occurring in the body of a pleading, and is not to be understood as authorizing the cancellation or withdrawal of the pleading itself. In the latter case there would be "no defect" to be supplied, as there would be nothing left in which to supply it. The power, then, to allow the withdrawal of an entire plea and the substitution of another, must be derived, if at all, from the common law or the general and necessary authority of a court in ordinationem litis. But this general authority cannot extend to the case of amendments, because then there would have been no need of the enabling statutes. And at common law the courts had at first no power of admitting the amendments after the term.

Bac. Abr., Amendment, A; Blackmore's case, 6 Co., 157; Com. Dig., Prerogative, D. 85: Nelson v. Barker, 3 McLean, 379.

Afterwards their power was considered to continue as long as the cause was "in paper."

Tidd, Pr., 97; Bondfield v. Milner, 2 Burr., 1099.

The expression "in paper" appears to be expressly applied to the condition of a cause before the impaneling of a jury; but the decisions are conflicting as to the power of granting amendments in a material point, except to correct a variance, after issue is taken. It is clear that an omission cannot, in the English courts, be supplied after that time.

Bye v. Bower, Carr. & M., 262; John v. Currie, 6 Carr. & P., 618; Brashier v. Jackson, 6 Mees. & W., 549; Webb v. Hill, Moody & M., 253.

There is no precedent for the withdrawal of a plea in bar, to admit either a demurrer or a plea in abatement. On the contrary, it is well settled that a plea, introduced by amendment, must be to the merits of the case.

Law v. Law, Str., 960; Perkins v. Burbank, 2 Mass., 73; Eaton v. Whittaker, 6 Pick., 465; Beach v. Fulton Bank, 3 Wend., 573, 576; Waples v. McGee, 2 Harr., 444; see, also, D'Wolf v. Rabaud, 1 Pet., 476; Ripley v. Warren, 2 Pick., 592, 594-596; Palmer v. Evertson, 2 Cow., 417; Engle v. Nelson, 1 Pa., 442.

Judicial discretion can only be exercised where neither party has a legal right. When rights begin, discretion ends, and any decision becomes the subject of appellate revision. In the present case the defendants in error, by pleading in bar at a former term, had admitted the jurisdiction of the court and waived any objection to it.

Co. Litt., 303; Com. Dig., Abatement, D, 9, 5; Mostyn v. Fabrigas, Cowp., 161; Bailey v. Dozier, 6 How., 23, 30; Sheppard v. Graves, 14 How., 505, 509; Whyte v. Gibbes, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 541; Martin v. Commonw., 1 Mass., 347; Ripley v. Warren, 2 Pick., 592, 594; Coffin v. Jones, 5 Pick., 61; Ludlow v. Simond, 2 Cai. Ca., 1; Wood v. Mann, 1 Sumn., 578; Hinckley v. Smith.

NOTE.—Pleading to the merits, waives plea in abatement. See note to Sheppard v. Graves, 55 U. S. (14 How.), 505.

4 Watts, 433; Chamberlin v. Hite, 5 Watts, 378.

And it is so expressly decided in Texas.

Hart. Dig., 688, 691; Drake v. Brander, 8 Tex., 351; Cook v. Southwick, 9 Tex., 615; Ryan v. Jackson, 11 Tex., 391, 400; Wilson v. Adams, 15 Tex., 323.

This waiver on the part of the defendants inures to the plaintiffs, and when acted on by them in the further prosecution of the suit, gives them a right to insist on it as conclusive. Donegal, 6 Madd., 375; Smith v. Elder, 3 Johns., Iveson v. Harris, 7 Ves., 254; Chichester v. 113.

Cases are not wanting, also, in which the power of a court to permit a plea to the jurisdiction, after such a constructive admission, has been expressly denied.

Martin v. Commonw., 1 Mass., 353; Anonymous, 3 Cai., 102.

So permission to plead in abatement will be refused, after imparlance, though the prayer for imparlance was by mistake or through ignorance.

2 Rol., 244; Com. Dig., Abatement, D, 9, 2.

The subject is elaborately discussed in Wood v. Mann. 1 Sumn., 578. And the principle is substantially affirmed by the Supreme Court of Texas, in Coles v. Perry, 7 Tex., 109, 14.

II. The district court should have directed a judgment by default to have been entered against the defendants, Moore and Raybon, on the application of the plaintiffs. The answer having been voluntarily withdrawn, these defendants stood without a plea, for the plaintiffs had a right to regard the plea to the jurisdiction as a nullity; first, as being filed too late after an appearance; and second, on account of its intrinsic defects and irregularities.

1. As to the first cause there can be no question that, if a plea in abatement be filed too late, the plaintiff may sign judgment treating it as a nullity.

Tidd, Pr., 463; Brandon v. Payne, 1 T. R., 689; Doughty v. Lascelles, 4 T. R., 520; Lockhart v. Mackreth, 5 T. R., 661, 663; Blackmore v. Flemyng, note, 7 T. R., 447; and so in the Texas practice, Taylor v. Hall, 20 Tex., 215.

2. As to the second cause; if the plea in question was defective in some necessary formality, or incomplete in substance, the plaintiffs could equally consider it as a nullity. The general rules of construction are unfavorable to such pleas; they cannot be amended; the greatest precision is required and the least slip, fatal. Thus, if a plea to the jurisdiction is made by attorney (Com. Dig., Abatement, D, i, a, 2; 2 Saund., 309, b; Teasdale v. The Rambler, Bee, 9); if it is filed without an affidavit to its truth (2 Saund., 210, note; Richards v. Setres, 3 Price, 197; Lovell v. Walker, 9 Mees. & W., 299; Rapp v. Elliott, 2 Dall., 184; Richmond v. Tallmadge, 16 Johns., 307); or if it be no plea at all, but a mere pretense not applicable to the action, the plaintiff may take judgment.

Mr. W. P. Ballinger, for the defendants in error:

1. There is no final judgment to which a writ of error can be prosecuted, and this court has not jurisdiction of the case.

U. S. v. Girault, 11 How., 22.

2. The court below had the right to permit the answer to the merits to be withdrawn and abandoned, and a plea to the jurisdiction filed, and this court will not revise the discretion which was exercised.

The general rule requiring a plea to the jurisdiction to precede a plea to the merits, or otherwise waiving the former, is, of course, familiar.

2 Sumn., 585; 1 Phil., 393; 14 How., 509.

But the question is whether, if the party once pleads to the merits, he forever forfeits all right to ask, and the court itself lose all power to permit, upon any ground whatever, such plea to be withdrawn, and an issue presented to the jurisdiction of the court. If courts could not, in case of accident or necessity, with a view to reach the truth, give relief or indulgence on making the other party indemnity for the delay, our rules would be worse than any principles of law in common cases, which are often relieved against in equity, and sometimes at law, in the event of accident and mistake.

See Wallace v. Clark, 3 Wood. & M., 359, a case standing on very analogous ground.

The Constitution of the United States provides that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising," &c. By "cases in law" was meant suits in which legal rights are to be determined in contradistinction to rights cognizable in equity or admiralty.

Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet., 44; Bennett v. Butterworth, 11 How., 669.

There is no common law of the United States regulating principles of pleading and practice at law; or upon any other subject (Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet., 658); nor do the laws of a State have any effect proprio vigore.

9 Pet., 329; 2 Curt. C. C., 94.

The Supreme Court of the United States has the power to prescribe rules of pleading and practice in suits at common law for the district and circuit courts (Act Aug. 23, 1842, sec. 6; 5 Stat., 517); but it is a power which has never been exercised. The District Court in Texas has also the power to regulate its practice "as shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice," &c. (Act March 2, 1793, sec. 7, 1 Stat., 335), and in the entire want of all other rules, it adopted its own rules of pleading and practice, conforming them to the practice of the state courts so far as consistent with the laws of Congress and the distinctive organization of a court of law. One of the few provisions of Act of Congress, touching the pleadings in the courts of the United States, is that those courts may at any time permit either of the parties to amend any defect in the process or pleadings, upon such conditions as the said courts respectively shall, in their discretion and by their rule, prescribe.

32d sec. Judiciary Act, 1789, 1 Stats., 91.

By the law governing the state practice, "the pleadings in all suits may be amended under the direction of the court, upon such terms as it may prescribe, at any time before the parties announce themselves ready for trial, and not thereafter." O. & W. Dig., art. 434.

These express provisions of law intrust the amplest discretion to allow amendments of "the pleadings," and the largest measure of such discretion and control also results from the organization of the court. The exercise of that discretion cannot, upon well settled principles, be revised by this court. In Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson, 6 Cranch, 206, the defendant having filed six special pleas, was refused leave to file two others.

The allowance or disallowance of amendments is not matter for which a writ of error lies.

Chirac v. Reinicker, 11 Wheat. 280; and see Walden v. Craig, 9 Wheat. 578; Wright v. Hollingsworth, 1 Pet., 167; U. S. v. Buford, 3 Pet., 31; Clapp v. Balch, 3 Me., 219; Morgan v. Dyer, 10 Johns., 163; Northum v. Kellogg, 15 Conn., 574; Tobey v. Claflin, 3 Sumn., 380; Calloway v. Dobson, 1 Brock. 119.

The precise question of permitting a plea to the jurisdiction after general answer to the merits, was decided by Judge Story in Dodge v. Perkins, 4 Mason, 435.

"In this case, I should feel it my duty to give the defendant a right to withdraw his answer and put in a plea, if the posture hereafter should render that course desirable to me.

P. 437; and see 1 Sumn., 579; see, also, Riddle v. Stevens, 2 Serg. & R., 544.

Almost all pleas in abatement to courts of general jurisdiction are merely dilatory and technical; and therefore have been regarded with disfavor, and tried by the most stringent rules. But the jurisdiction of the federal courts being limited by the Constitution, dependent in this class of cases on the citizenship of the parties in the different States; involving, to say no more, greatly increased expense and inconvenience to the defendant—a jurisdiction created only to reserve rights to citizens of other States, more important than the admitted injury to defendants, it is a question of substance of the greatest importance to the individual defendant, and of delicacy and solicitude to the court.

Cook, 482.

There can be no fair ground on which the federal court should regard pleas to their jurisdiction, made in good faith, with disfavor. 3 Wood. & M., 360.

On the contrary, they should guard themselves, in a substantial and effective and even jealous manner, against fraudulent attempts to impose upon their jurisdiction; and to retain, or, more properly, to imply and assume jurisdiction upon harsh, illiberal, merely technical grounds, is not in accordance with the Constitution or spirit of the federal judiciary.

3 Sumn., 380; 2 Pet., 329; 60 U. S. (20 How.), 525.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs, as citizens of Kentucky, commenced a suit by petition against the defendants, as citizens of Texas, for the recovery of a parcel of land in their possession. At the return of the process the defendants pleaded to the petition the general issue, and the Statute of Limitations, in bar of the suit.

At the next succeeding term they moved the court, upon an affidavit charging that the allegation in the petition, "that the plaintiffs were citizens of Kentucky, was untrue, and fraudulently made to induce the court to take cognizance of the cause," and that they were citizens of Texas, for leave to withdraw their pleas, and to plead this matter in abatement of the suit. This motion was allowed, and pleas in abatement were filed. One of these avers that the allegation of citizenship in said plaintiffs' petition is not true; that said plaintiffs are not citizens of Kentucky, but are respectively citizens of Texas; wherefore he prays the dismissal of the cause for want of jurisdiction. The plaintiffs, thereupon, moved the court for judgment for the want of a plea. This motion was not allowed, and thereupon the plaintiffs refused to reply to the pleas in abatement, and the court then proceeded to impanel a jury, and directed them to ascertain whether, from the proof before them, the plaintiffs, or either of them, were citizens of the States of Kentucky or Texas at the date of the writ. The jury returned as their verdict, that the domicil or residence of the plaintiffs never had been changed from the State of Texas, and that their domicil or residence was in the State of Texas at the commencement of this suit. The court dismissed their petition.

The plaintiffs object to the authority of the district court to permit the withdrawal of pleas in bar, for the purpose of pleading to the jurisdiction; that a plea in bar admits the jurisdiction of the court, and the capacity of the plaintiffs to sue, and that they cannot be deprived of the benefit of that admission. The equitable jurisdiction of the courts of the United States as courts of law is chiefly exercised in the amendment of pleadings and proceedings in the court, and in the supervision of all the various steps in a cause, so that the rules and practice of the court shall be so administered and enforced as to prevent hardship and injustice, and that the merits of the cause may be fairly tried. Such a jurisdiction is essential to and is inherent in the organization of courts of justice. Bartholomew v. Carter, 8 M. & G., 125.

But this jurisdiction has been conferred upon the courts of the United States in a plenary form by Acts of Congress. 1 Stat. at L., p. 83, sec. 17; p. 335, sec. 7; p. 91, sec. 32.

It has been uniformly held in this court that a circuit court could not be controlled in the exercise of the discretion thus conceded to it. Spencer v. Lapsley, 20 How., 264. In the present instance the jurisdiction was properly exercised. An attempt was made, according to the affidavit on which the motion was founded, to confer upon the district court, by a false and fraudulent averment, a jurisdiction to which it was not entitled under the Constitution. If true, this was a gross contempt of the court, for which all persons connected with it might have been subject to its penal jurisdiction.

The plaintiffs contend that the plea is a nullity, and that they were entitled to sign judgment. It is not a precise, distinct, or a formal plea, but it denies the truth of the averment of the citizenship of the plaintiffs, as they had affirmed it to be in the petition. We may say as Lord Denman said, in Horner v. Keppel, 10 Ad. & E., 17: "Where a plea is clearly frivolous on the face of it, that is a good ground for setting it aside; but the plea here is not quite bad enough to warrant that remedy.

Judgment affirmed.

HENRY AMEY, Plff. in Er.,
v.
THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN AND CITIZENS OF ALLEGHENY CITY.

(See S. C., 24 How., 364-376.)

Certificates of indebtedness, or bonds, of city not null and void because in excess of charter limit of indebtedness—irregularities in issue of municipal securities, no defense against bona fide holders.

Certificates of loan, with certificates for interest attached, are called bonds, with coupons for interest; but neither the instrument or coupon has any of the legal characteristics of a bond, either with or without a penalty, though both are written acknowledgments for the payment of a debt.

Where an Act of the State Legislature authorized a city to subscribe to the capital stock of a Railroad Company to be paid for by the corporate credit of the city by the issue of "certificates of loan," and the Railroad Company took, from the city, certificates of loan in payment of the subscriptions, and sold them, and with the money built the road, such contemporaneous action by all the parties interested, proves that the authority given to the city to make the subscriptions to the Railroad Company, had been carried out just as it was meant to have been.

The several Acts of the Assembly of Pennsylvania stated in the case, conferred authority on the corporation of the City of Allegheny to issue certificates of loan, otherwise bonds with coupons, as was done, to pay for its subscriptions to the capital stock of the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

The bonds or certificates of loan which were issued are not null and void, because the debt of the city had reached a limit mentioned in its charter prior to the second subscription, nor because the ordinance of the city directing the issue for the payment of the second subscription had not been recorded within thirty days.

When they are in the hands of bona fide transferees, it would be inequitable, if the city could repudiate them at all, and more especially, if that were allowed to be done upon the ground of any fault in the Corporation in their issue.

They are not null and void for any irregularity connected with that issue, by the City of Allegheny.

Submitted Dec. 12, 1860. Decided Jan. 7, 1861.

ON A certificate of division in opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. Knox, for the plaintiff:

The Legislature itself had power, under the Constitution of Pennsylvania, to grant the power to issue these bonds to the City of Allegheny.

See Oebricke v. Pittsburgh, 7 Am. Law Reg., 726; Sharpless v. Mayor of Philadelphia, 21 Pa., 147; Commonwealth v. Commiss. of Allegheny Co., 32 Pa., 218; Commonwealth v. Pittsburgh, Pittsburgh Leg. Jour., No. 35, page, 277.

The Acts of the Assembly in question conferred authority on the Corporation of Allegheny to issue bonds with coupons, as has been done.

The Act of 5th of April, 1849, in its second section, authorizes the Cities of Pittsburgh and Allegheny to subscribe to the capital stock $200,000, or in other words to promise in writing to pay $200,000 at a future day for so much stock. The power to subscribe is a power to contract a debt. Such is the literal meaning of the term. It is a term different in its signification from to purchase or to buy. Such also is the legal signification of the term.

Commonwealth v. M'Williams, 11 Pa., 62.

The power to subscribe carries with it the power to contract a debt, and to perform the usual and necessary acts to provide money to pay the debt, or to give an evidence of debt. A bond is only an evidence of debt under seal, and is the usual mode of giving evidence of a debt by a corporation.

See Carr v. Le Fevre, 27 Pa., 414; McMasters v. Reeds, 1 Grant, Cas., 86; Hamilton v. Pittsburgh, Pittsburgh Leg. Jour., No. 35, p. 274, 276; March 12, 1860.

Allegheny City has solemnly asserted in the bonds that they were issued in pursuance of an Act of the Legislature, passed April 5, 1849. The rules of law and equity require that she shall be held to the interpretation placed upon this Act by herself. The 1st and 2d sections of the Act are to be construed together. The first speaks of "a certificate" alone; and while there is no affirmative delegation of power in this section, unless the 2d section contains this delegation of power, the 1st section is utterly meaningless. "Certificates" alone and bonds have the same signification. The evident purpose of this Act was to enable the City of Allegheny to contribute by the use of her credit to the making of this road, and the only way in which this purpose could be effected was, by enabling her to make a form of security that was usual for corporations to give in making the subscriptions, and which would pass in the market and bring the best price.

See Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet., 661; The Emily and Caroline, 9 Wheat., 388.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania by a subsequent Act, May 8, 1850, recognized the subscription as a debt.

See U. S. v. Freeman, 3 How., 556.

The remarks made in regard to the above Act apply also to the Act of 1852, under which the second issue of bonds was made.

There are two irregularities named by the counsel for the defendants.

1. The debt of the City of Allegheny had reached the limit of $500,000 prior to the second subscription.

2. That if otherwise valid, the ordinance authorizing the second subscription became null and void, by reason of not being recorded within 30 days.

The allegation that the Act limiting the debt of the city invalidates the second subscription and the bonds, authorized under an Act passed subsequently to the Act of limitation, is but a mode of asserting that a subsequent Legislature cannot repeal the Act of a former one.

The second objection can avail the defendant nothing.

1. She cannot take advantage of her own wrong.

2. She alleged in the bonds that they were issued in pursuance of the resolution of 19th June, 1852. Of course it was thereby implied that it was a valid resolution.

3. The charter was merely directory on this point.

See 7 Casey, 517.

4. The bonds were signed by the Mayor and Treasurer, and the seal was properly attached.

They were properly delivered to the Railroad

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of U. S. Supreme Court to declare state law void, as in conflict with state constitution; to revise decrees of state courts, as to construction of state laws; power of state courts to construe their own statutes. See note to Jackson v. Lamphire, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.), 280.

It is for state courts to construe their own statutes. Supreme Court will not review their decisions, except when specially authorized thereto by statute. See note to Commercial B'k v. Buckingham, 46 U. S. (5 How.), 317.

Company, and having been acknowledged by the City Corporation for 8 or 10 years, she cannot now repudiate them, because one of her officers neglected his duty.

Mr. A. W. Loomis, for the defendants:

The certificate of division of opinion in the present case limits and restricts discussion and decision to the propositions therein enumerated.

See 8 How., 611; 7 How., 694; 5 How., 208; 9 Pet., 267; 12 Pet., 239; 6 How., 41.

These propositions are:

First. Whether the several Acts of Assembly mentioned in the case stated, conferred any authority on the corporation of the City of Allegheny to give bonds with coupons, as stated in the cause.

Second. Whether such coupons are null and void by reason of such want of authority.

Third. Whether they are null and void for any other irregularity connected with their issue.

These propositions embrace the whole case open for discussion here.

The Act giving the Corporation authority to subscribe to the stock of the Railroad Company, did not empower the Corporation to issue bonds.

Wilcock, Corp., 36; Kirk v. Nowill, 1 T. R., 124; Ang. & Ames, Corp., secs. 336, 343; Beaty v. Knowler, 4 Pet., 168; People v. Utica Ins. Co., 15 Johns., 383; 2 Cow., 664, 675, 678; 3 Wend., 485, 574; 6 Pick., 32; 2 Cranch, 127; 4 Wheat., 636.

The fact that the debt of the City of Allegheny had reached the limit of $500,000 prior to the second subscription, rendered the subscription void.

If otherwise valid, the ordinance authorizing the issuance of the bonds for the second subscription became null and void, by reason of not being recorded within 30 days.

See Act of May 8, 1850, sec. 4; sec. 8 of Charter of the City.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

This case has been sent to this court on a certificate of division of opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

The plaintiff has sued the mayor and aldermen and citizens of Allegheny City, in actions of debt, upon several coupons of bonds which were issued by that Corporation, and made payable to the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company, in payment for two subscriptions, of $200,000 each, to the stock of the latter.

It was agreed by the parties upon the trial of the cause, to submit it for the opinion of the court upon a statement, in the nature of a special verdict, and that verdicts upon the coupons should be entered accordingly.

The judges, however, in their consideration of the case, differed in opinion on the following points: "Whether the several Acts of Assembly recited in the case stated conferred any authority on the Corporation of the City of Allegheny to issue bonds with coupons, as had been done, or whether the same are altogether null and void, by reason of such want of authority, or for any other irregularity connected with their issue."

It is admitted that the bonds were issued and delivered in payment for subscriptions of stock to the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company; that they were made payable to that Company or its order; that the Company had negotiated them to raise funds to construct the road, and that the road had been completed in conformity with the conditions of the subscriptions of the defendants.

The parties agree that the subscriptions had been made by the authority of Acts of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, in conformity with the charter of the Railroad Company, and were intended to be in pursuance of resolutions and ordinances of the select and common councils of the City of Allegheny.

The mayor was first instructed to subscribe for four thousand shares of the capital stock of the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company, to be paid for in bonds, with coupons attached for interest, payable semi-annually, the bonds having twenty-five years to run. The railroad agreed to pay the interest upon the bonds until the completion of the road, or so much of it as may be adequate to pay the interest, and that the proceeds of the bonds were to be applied to the construction of the road from the City of Allegheny to the mouth of the Big Beaver River, about twenty-five miles. And to secure the city and the bondholders, it was stipulated, in addition to the legal obligations incurred in making the subscription, that the stock, with the interest, earnings and dividends of the road, should be pledged to pay the interest, and finally to redeem the bonds. Accordingly two hundred bonds of $1,000 were prepared, and were delivered to the Railroad Company, on the 1st of January, 1850, and the city at the same time received a certificate of four thousand shares. The coupons now sued upon were a part of those which were attached to those bonds.

The second subscription was made in virtue of another Act of the Assembly of Pennsylvania, and in compliance with a resolution of the city, dated June 19th, 1852. That Act authorized the city to increase its subscription to the capital stock of the Railroad Company, to any amount not exceeding its first subscription, upon the laws and conditions which had been prescribed for the first; but it restrained the city from making an issue of bonds of a less denomination than $100. The Act also exempts the stock from the payment of any tax in consequence of the payment of any interest to stockholders, until the net earnings of the Company shall realize six per cent. per annum on the capital stock. The city authorities passed an ordinance for this additional subscription, but it was not published in compliance with the charter of the city, nor was it recorded in the manner which it is said the charter requires the city ordinances to be. For those neglects, it is said the ordinance was null and void, and that the city had not the power to make the second subscription under the Act of the Legislature. But the city bonds were issued, and the subscription was made. It is also objected that the ordinance was indorsed upon the bonds, without any proviso requiring the Railroad Company to pay the interest upon them according to its stipulation. But it is admitted that the road was built first from the city to the Big Beaver River, and afterwards completed to its termination on the western border of Ohio, and thence to Chicago.

The city continues to hold its stock in the Railroad Company. It has received five dividends from the Company—one of $14,000, another of $16,000, another of $12,000—which were retained by the Company by the consent of the city, and had been appropriated to the payment of the coupons for interest; and that $4,000 of those dividends had been paid in cash, and others in stock. Prior to the city's second subscription, it appears that the debt of the city had become $500,000, the limit prescribed by an Act of the Legislature. That Act is, "that it should not be lawful for the councils of the city, either directly or indirectly, by bonds or certificates of loan of indebtedness, or by virtue of any contract, or by any means or device whatsoever, to increase its indebtedness to a sum which, added to the existing debt, shall exceed $500,000, exclusive of the subscription of $200,000 to the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company."

It is admitted, also, that the stock of the city in the Railroad Company had been voted at all elections of it by order of the city, except in a single instance, when the city refused to vote. The city was incorporated on the 11th of April, 1840, with all the powers and authorities then vested by law in the select and common councils of the City of Philadelphia.

We have given the agreed case of the parties, in every particular, in any way bearing upon the points about which the judges in the court below were divided in opinion, and will now consider them.

The subscriptions of the defendants were made under the Acts of the 5th April, 1849, and that of the 14th April, 1859. The first permitted a subcription of $200,000, to be paid for by "certificates of loan." The second permitted the increase of it, to an amount not exceeding the first, without, however, having altered the manner in which the corporate credit of the city was to be used for the payment of the second subscription. We infer from the words of the Act, and do not see how it can be otherwise, that it was to be paid for by the same certificates of indebtedness which the Legislature had directed to be issued and used for the payment of the first subscription. The Act is, "that the City of Allegheny is hereby authorized to increase its subscription to the capital stock of the said Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company to any amount not exceeding the subscription heretofore made by the said city, upon the terms and conditions prescribed in regard to said previous subscription; provided no bond for the payment of the subscription shall be issued of a less denomination than one hundred dollars." This proviso is merely an inhibition upon the city to use for the payment of the subscription any certificate of indebtedness less than $100; and the words "no bond for the payment of the subscription shall be issued," when considered in connection with the act of authorizing the second subscription, that it should be made "upon the same terms and conditions of the first," cannot be interpreted into a permission or direction of the Legislature, that the city might use in payment for the stock any other legal or commercial instrument than "certificates of loan." Such certificates are well and distinctly known and recognized in the usages and business of lending and borrowing money, in the transactions of commerce, also, and for raising money upon the contract in them for industrial enterprises and internal improvements. They were formerly more generally known than otherwise as "certificates of loan," with certificates for interest attached, payable to the bearer at particular times within the year, at some particular place, being a part of the contract, from which they must be cut off to be presented for payment. But now, in their use, they are called bonds, with coupons for interest—a coupon bond—coupon being the interest payable separable from the certificate of loan, for the purpose of receiving it. But neither the instrument nor coupon has any of the legal characteristics of a bond, either with or without a penalty, though both are written acknowledgments for the payment of a debt.

Such certificates of loan have been resorted to for many years in the United States to raise money for internal improvements. They were as well known and used in Pennsylvania as elsewhere, and were permitted to be issued in that State, by just such enactments as those which authorized the City of Allegheny to subscribe to the capital stock of the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Such an issue was applicable to the subject-matter of legislation. The city solicited the State to be allowed to make the subscriptions. It was the policy of the State to grant the application. The subscriptions were made under the Act of the 5th April, 1849, and that of the 14th April, 1859. The first permits a subscription of $200,000, which was to be paid for by certificates of loan. The Act of the 14th April, 1859, allowed the increase of the subscription to an amount not exceeding the first, upon the same terms and conditions. It was the understanding of the Legislature, of the city, and of the Railroad Company, that the subscriptions were to be paid for by the corporate credit of the city by the issue of "certificates of loan." That appears from the Act of 1849, authorizing it, before the subscription was, in fact, made. That act provides, in anticipation of its being done, that the certificates of loan which shall hereafter be issued by the City of Allegheny in payment of any subscription to the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company, were to be exempt from all taxation, except for State purposes. The Railroad Company took from the city certificates of loan in payment of the subscriptions sold them as such, and with the money built the road. Such a concurrence of contemporaneous action by all the parties interested in the subject-matter of legislation, proves that it was the intention of the Legislature that the authority given to the city to make the subscriptions to the Railroad Company, had been carried out just as it was meant to have been.

We answer, therefore, that the several Acts of Assembly stated in the agreed case did confer authority on the Corporation of the City of Allegheny to issue certificates of loan, otherwise bonds with coupons, as was done, to pay for its first and second subscriptions to the capital stock of the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

We will now inquire whether the bonds or certificates of loan which were issued are null and void "for any irregularity connected with their issue."

It is said there were two irregularities which made them so. The first is, that the debt of the city had reached its limit of $500,000 prior to the second subscription. The second is, that the city ordinance, authorizing the issue for the payment of the subscriptions, was null and void, from not having been published in conformity with the charter of the city.

The first objection depends upon the proper construction of the Act of 8th May, 1850, section 4, in connection with the Act of the 14th April, 1852, which authorized the second subscription. The first declares that the indebtedness of the city should not be made to exceed $500,000, exclusive of the subscription of $200,000 to the Railroad Company; and it is urged, that the Act of 14th April, 1852, though it authorizes the city to make a second subscription of $200,000 does not permit the city to increase its debt to a larger sum than $700,000, to which it was limited by the first Act of 1850. The objection has arisen from a misconception of the 4th section of the Act of 1850. It provides that it shall not be lawful for the councils of the City of Allegheny, either directly or indirectly, or by bonds, certificates, or loans, or of indebtedness, or by virtue of any contract, or by any other means or device whatsoever, to increase the indebtedness of the said city, in a sum which added to the existing debt, shall, taken together, exceed $500,000, exclusive of the subscription of $200,000 to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company; meaning, obviously, that no increase of debt should be made by the councils beyond the sum of $500,000, but not intending that the Legislature might not authorize an increase of it beyond that amount, as it had previously done by authorizing the first subscription to the Railroad Company. The same political power which allowed the first subscription could, at a succeeding session of the Legislature, give authority to the city to make a second. Such authority was given by the Act of the 14th April, 1852. The city councils could not, under its charter, have made either the first or second subscription without authority from the Legislature, but by its charter it could contract debts for the purposes of its incorporation to a larger amount than $500,000. When, then, the Legislature was called upon to authorize the city to make the first subscription, increasing its indebtedness $200,000 beyond what the city might have owed then for other purposes, it was thought prudent, as well for the protection of the citizens of Allegheny as for those who might purchase these certificates of stock with coupons, to declare that the councils of the city should not thereafter, by virtue of their charter authority to contract debts, by any device whatever, increase its amount to more than $500,000. And as it has turned out, judging from the attitude of the mayor, aldermen and citizens of Allegheny in this suit, it must be admitted to have been upon the part of the Legislature of Pennsylvania a very commendable precautionary act of legislation.

Having thus disposed of the first irregularity imputed to the councils of Allegheny, in making their issue for the payment of the second subscription, we proceed to the second.

It is, that the ordinance of the city directing the issue for the payment of the second subscription had not been recorded within thirty days. It is admitted in the stated case that it had not been.

By the 8th section of the charter of the City of Allegheny, it is provided, that in order that a knowledge of the laws, ordinances, regulations and constitutions of the city, authorized by the 7th section of the charter, may at all times be had and obtained, and the publications thereof at all times be known and ascertained, such and so many of them as shall not be published in one or more of the public newspapers published in the city, or in such other way as the select and common councils may direct, within fifteen days after these laws severally passed, &c., &c., and also recorded in the office for the recording of deeds, &c., &c., &c., within thirty days after these laws passed, &c., &c., shall be null and void.

Now, it does not require a very careful examination of the section to determine that it can have no bearing upon the ordinance directing the issue for the payment of the second subscription of the city to the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company, for, in terms, it is only applicable to ordinances, &c., authorized by the 7th section of the charter, and that did not permit such a subscription to be made, and paid for by the city stock, as the ordinance for that purpose was intended. It could only be made by the authority of the Legislature. In other words, the Legislature enlarges the powers of the councils of Allegheny, to do what it could not do by charter. Besides, if the section was not limited to such ordinances, &c., &c., as are authorized by the 7th section of the charter, and those words were not in it, it could have no application to an ordidance of the city passed for a special purpose to carry out an act of the Legislature, outside of the charter as was the case here. We have determined that the Acts of the Legislature have been carried out by the city in the way they should have been done. Neither the ordinance, nor the stock issued by the city, are deficient in any substantial particular. The latter has every formality of the Corporation to give them currency. They were circulated for ten years, and were constantly acknowledged by the city, as its bonds, for the purposes for which they were issued. They are now in the hands of bona fide transferees, to whom they must be paid according to their terms. It would be inequitable, if the city could repudiate them at all, and more especially, if that were allowed to be done upon the ground of any fault in the Corporation in their issue. But we will not enlarge further upon the case. The points of objection of which we have treated have already been before this court in several cases, and they are worthy of perusal. See the cases of The Commissioners of Knox Co., Indiana, v. Wallace, 21 How., 546, Zabriskie v. Cleve., Col. and Cin. R. R. Co., 23 How., 381.

We have not, in our treatment of this certified division of opinion, discussed that position of the learned counsel who argued it for the defendant, that the Acts of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, authorizing the issue of the certificates of loan were unconstitutional.

Agreeing with him in the main, as to the foundations upon which the correctness of legislation should be tested, and the objects for which it ought to be approved, we cannot, with the respect which we have for the judiciary of his State, discuss the imputed unconstitutionality of the Acts upon which the subscriptions were made to the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company; it having been repeatedly decided by the judges of the courts of Pennsylvania, including its Supreme Court, that Acts for the same purposes, as those are which we have been considering, were constitutional.

We shall order it to be certified, that the issue of bonds with coupons, in the case stated, are not null and void, but that it was done under the authority of constitutional Acts of the State of Pennsylvania, in the case stated; and further, that they are not null and void for any irregularity connected with that issue by the City of Allegheny.

ORDER.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania, and on the point or question upon which the judges of the said circuit court were opposed in opinion, and which was certified to this court for its opinion, agreeably to the Act of Congress in such case made and provided, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is the opinion of this court, that the issue of bonds with coupons, in the case stated, are not null and void, but that it was done under the authority of constitutional Acts of the State of Pennsylvania, in the case stated; and further, that they are not null and void for any irregularity connected with that issue by the City of Allegheny.

Whereupon it is now here ordered and adjudged that it be so certified to the said circuit court.

v.

DAVID MUMFORD AND JESSE MUMFORD.

(See S. C., 24 How., 214-224.)

Texas Act of Limitations—constructive notice—commissioner's authority.

Construction of Act of Limitations of Texas which provides "that every suit to be instituted to recover real estate shall be instituted within three years next after the cause of action shall have accrued, and not afterwards."

That the elder title was on record, was not constructive or actual notice of the elder title.

Defense held complete under that statute of three years' limitation.

An objection that the commissioner had no authority to act; held, cured by the Act of the Republic of Texas in 1841.

Argued Dec. 19, 1860. Decided Jan. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas.

This case arose upon a petition filed in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, to recover the possession of eleven leagues of land in the State of Texas.

By agreement of parties, David and Jesse Mumford were permitted to sever from the other defendants in their defense and trial. The trial as to them resulted in a verdict and judgment in their favor; whereupon the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. G. Hale, for the plaintiffs in error:

In the present case, we are to seek for a construction of the terms, title or color of title, as used in the 15th section of the Act of Limitations of Feb. 5, 1841, and to define the extent to which such title or color of title is to be subject to the requirement of "intrinsic fairness and honesty." The Supreme Court of Texas has said that by "title or color of title" is meant a consecutive chain of transfer from the sovereignty by written conveyance.

Castro v. Wurtbach, 18 Tex., 181; Williamson v. Simpson, 16 Tex., 444.

But no case has arisen in which the manner of the expression "intrinsic fairness and honesty," has been called in question. We are left, therefore, on this point, to the literal signification of these words, or to the principles of those systems of law from which Texas derived the basis of her legislation. It is unnecessary to say that, in their literal sense, "intrinsic fairness and honesty" is not consistent with an adverse claim to land known to belong to another, while it is perfectly consistent with a possession held under an ignorance of the better title. The Roman law required good faith at the time of the acquisition of the colorable title, and also at the commencement of the possession.

Cod. VII., 33, Const. 1, 2, 5, 6, 10; Dig. XLI., 4, Fr. 7, sec. 4; XLI., 43, Fr. 15, sec. 2; Inst., II., 6, Fr.

And the good faith thus made necessary consisted in a reasonable belief that the true title was in the possessor, and in ignorance of the title of the sole owner.

D. XVIII., 1, Fr. 27; L. 16, Fr. 109; XLVIII., 15, Fr. 3.

No one, it is said, can prescribe, who, at any part of the time, has a knowledge that he is holding the property of another.

Dec. Greg., II., 26, cap. 5, 17, 20.

This more extended application of the rule was adopted by the Spanish jurisprudence, departing in that respect from the literal sense of the laws, which seem only to require good faith at the commencement of the possession.

Part. III., 29, 12; Nov. Rec., XI., 8, 2; Greg. Lopez, glos. ubi. cit. covarr. op. omn., 437, No. 4; Esriche, dicc. ver. Prescripcion; see, also, Cast. VII., cap. 26, No 3, No. 30.

The doctrine is succintly stated in the Treatise of Mago. Bellena, Inst. II., 89.

See, also, Troplong, Prescription, arts. 914, 931.

This was the state of the law when the Republic of Texas obtained its political existence, and it continued to be the rule of construction until the adoption of the Common Law as a system in 1840. The 39th section of the Act of Dec. 20, 1836 (Hart, Dig., 2375), was merely a partial innovation, and is to be construed in reference to the still existing rule.

Hart. Dig., 2396.

The introduction of the common law by the Act of Jan. 20, 1840, did not introduce the English statutes, and the former law, as to prescription, remained unchanged up to the passage of the Act of Feb. 5, 1841.

Gautier v. Franklin, 1 Tex., 746.

This Act, thus passed under the combined influence of the common and the civil law, as coexisting systems, derived its provisions in some measure from both; and while the 14th section is a rude attempt to adopt the doctrine of disseisin, the 15th and 16th sections follow distinctions known only to the Spanish jurisprudence, and to the legislation of our Western States. Title or color of title—the titulo justo and colorado of the Spanish jurists—are not required in the English law to work disseisin, nor do they confer a right to a shorter period of prescription. They only extend the effect of the actual disseisin to the boundaries claimed by the deed under which the entry is made, and no reference is had, therefore, to the derivation of the title or the mode of its acquisition. But in the peculiar land law of the Western States, which contributed most to the settlement of Texas, a possession held under a connected title was sometimes made to confer greater privileges, and to be sufficient for prescription in a shorter term.

So in Tennessee, Act of 1797, ch. 43; in Louisiana, Code Civ., arts. 3445, 3414, 3415; Illinois, Act of 1839, "to quiet possessions, etc."

Under this new rule of limitation, it was no longer indifferent to inquire into the character of the title of the possessor, or the mode by which he obtained it. For both the character and the mode qualified the possession. The courts of Tennessee, Louisiana and Illinois, while this rule continued in force, have therefore held that the occupant, claiming the benefit of the short period of limitation, must show that he had held with a just confidence in his title and an honest belief in its superiority.

Wilson v. Kilcannon, 4 Hayw., 185; Hampton v. McGinnis, 1 Tenn., 291; Patton's Lessee v. Easton, 1 Wheat., 476; see, also, Gregg v. Sayre, 8 Pet., 254, and Andrews v. Mulford, 1 Hayw., N. C., 320.

The Supreme Court of Louisiana has often said, in accordance indeed with the direct provisions of the Civil Code, that a title acquired in bad faith or with a knowledge of a better title, will not sustain prescription.

Reeves v. Towles, 10 La., 283-286; Devall v. Choppin, 15 La., 578; Sandos v. Gary, 11 Rob., 531; Hughey v. Barrow, 4 La. Ann., 252.

And upon this point a reference may be made to the nice distinctions of the French jurists.

Tropl., Prescription, arts. 918-938; 21 Duranton, No. 886; Merlin, Repertoire, tit. Prescription, 1, 5, 4; and compare Code Nap., art. 550.

In none of the Western States, however, except in Louisiana and Illinois, is there any expression in the Statutes of Limitation which seems to indicate that good faith is necessary in the shorter periods of possession, and the courts of the other States have, therefore, been compelled to decline to introduce by construction an exemption not contained in the law. The difference in this respect of the Act of Limitation of Texas, gives a greater weight to our position, since it shows an intention to require an additional requisite in the definition of "color of title," and to look for a rule rather to the principles of the civil than the common law.

This view is, if not confirmed, at least supported by the intimations derived from the course of judicial decision in Texas.

Charle v. Safford, 13 Tex., 94, 112; Marsh v. Weir, 21 Tex., 97; see, also, Wright v. Mattison, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 56; Smith v. Power, 23 Tex., 29.

It is useless, therefore, to advert to the decisions of the courts of the common law States which have given other attributes to a colorable title, or to the cases which have been decided in this court, upon the common law theories of adverse possession and disseisin. The Act of Limitations of Texas is based upon a different view, and requires the application of other analogies.

The evidence in this case justifies the instructions requested by the plaintiffs. The titles set up by the defendants were obtained in 1835, under the same government which granted the land to the plaintiff in 1833. The defendants, being bound to know the previous appropriation of the land by reference to the public archives, are charged with actual knowledge of it.

Byrne v. Fagan, 16 Tex., 398.

In addition to this, the defendants must have known that their own titles were defective.

The defense made under the 16th section of the Act of Limitations was necessarily based upon a possession held under deeds duly registered.

Hart Dig., 2392.

And the question arose on the trial, whether the testimonios given in evidence by the defendants as the original of their title, were duly registered. The district court overruled the objection of the plaintiffs to the registration, and refused to instruct the jury that these instruments were not duly registered.

Upon this branch of the case the counsel cited:

Hart Dig., arts. 2752, 2776, 2791; Deen v. Wills, 21 Tex., 645; Craddock v. Merrill, 2 Tex., 496; Edwards v. James, 7 Tex., 373; Butler v. Dunagan, 19 Tex., 559; Secrest v. Jones, 21 Tex., 122.

Mr. N. P. Ballinger, for defendants in error:

The general character of the limitation laws of Texas is readily apparent. The periods for suits are short for motives of policy, addressing themselves strongly to the law making power.

Horton v. Crawford, 10 Tex., 382.

The precise construction of the terms of the 15th section of the Act in question is not susceptible of doubt. It limits the time for bringing suit against those in possession under title or color of title, It defines title to mean "a regular chain of transfer from or under the sovereignty of the soil." That completes the definition. The remainder of the section is explanatory of color of title. The title, then, must be "regular." Does this mean that it shall be paramount and, therefore, perfect? That the best title from the government requires three years' possession to defend it? This is simply absurd. The limitation was intended solely to protect the junior title; but not the junior title without notice or the means of notice of the senior title, because such cases are very rare and exceptional, only happening from the irregularities attending some of the early colonial records; and it is well settled in Texas that the junior title, without notice of the senior title, actual or constructive, from its being found in the General Land Office, or recorded or mapped in the county, is the best title and entitled to recover in ejectment.

Guilbeau v. Mays, 15 Tex., 410; Byrne v. Fagan, 16 Tex., 391; Wilson v. Williams, 26 Tex., 54.

To ascertain what is meant by "color of title," Mr. Hale refers to the civil law; but the Act itself is its complete expositor. Our Supreme Court say, "the statute having defined the meaning of the terms employed, we are not at liberty in construing this section to resort to other sources for their definition and meaning."

21 Tex., 109.

It is a direct arraignment of title from the government, not strictly "regular," one which purports to transfer the right, but does not in a perfect and formal manner. A patent would be title. That did not need to be expressed. But the statute, in application to it, explains color of title as from the government. The location of a headright certificate, land warrant or scrip, is declared color of title. It leaves the fee in the government, but is a character of right to maintain ejectment (sec. 1, same Act Lim., Hart. Dig., 3230), and is a vested right of property.

Howard v. Perry, 7 Tex., 266; Hamilton v. Avery, 20 Tex., 635.

So if the mesne conveyances are not "regular," which is at once illustrated: "as if" not registered or only in writing, without a seal (18 Tex., 131), "or such like defect," &c. The plain intent being to embrace any instrument purporting and intended to be a conveyance, and equitably conveying the right of the grantor, although defective in strict law. A bond is not color of title, because it does not purport to be a transfer.

13 Tex., 128.

"Color of title" had its fixed signification in the statutes of Texas with reference to the character of the conveyance, ex facie, and not to its operation from extrinsic causes, or to any good faith in its holder. The 37th section (Act Organizing Inferior Courts, &c., Dec. 20, 1836) provides that any person who owns or claims land of any description by deed, lien or any other color of title, shall have the same recorded, &c. The 38th section specifies the proof to be made in order to record "all titles, liens, mortgages, or other color of titles.

Hart. D., 2754, 2755.

The 39 section is the first Limitation Law of Texas.

The only decision that I call to mind upon this Act of Limitation, is Jones v. Menard, 1 Tex., 171, in which a possession of five years after record of the junior grant was held a bar. It is true there is no discussion of the point whether the junior grant is color of title, for the simple reason that no one thought to doubt it. In Marsh v. Weir, 21 Tex., 97, the construction of the 15th section, Act 1841, is discussed. In Smith v. Power, 23 Tex., 33, the matter is settled with the utmost precision. The Chief Justice says: "To constitute such title or color of title, there must be a chain of transfer from or under the sovereignty of the soil." This necessarily presupposes a grant from the government, as the basis of such transfer. And the grant must be effectual to convey to the grantee whatever right or title the government had in the land at the time of making the grant. It need not necessarily carry with it the paramount title; but it must be title as against the government, valid in itself when tested by itself and not tried by the title of others. It must have intrinsic validity as between the parties to it, though it may be relatively void as respects the rights of third persons."

The case of Scott v. Rhea, 5 Tex., 258, again before the court, 21 Tex., 708, shows clearly that want of notice of the prior title is not an element of "title or color of title" under the statute.

And to same effect, see Wheeler v. Moody, 9 Tex., 372; Horton v. Crawford, 10 Tex., 382; Castro v. Wurzbach, 18 Tex., 128; Mason v. McLaughlin, 16 Tex., 24; Williamson v. Simpson, 16 Tex., 444.

The case of Christy v. Alford, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 601, shows that such a construction was unheard of then in the court below and in this court. There has never been a plea of three years' limitation in Texas, which did not involve this question. Should it not be considered settled that it has never even been mooted?

The grants being "title or color of title," to sustain the plea of three years' possession, the ruling of the court that they were also "deeds duly registered," to sustain a possession of five years under the 16th section of the Act of Limitations, is wholly immaterial. If an error, it was one committed against the defendants, the possible effect of which was that it might have misled the jury to their prejudice, but could not have injured the plaintiff.

See 5 Pet., 185; 5 How., 238; 13 How,, 233; 8 Watts & S., 391; 8 Sm. & M., 447; 16 Pet., 455; 8 Tex., 280.

The grants to the defendants were duly registered more than five years before suit brought.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas.

The suit was brought against the defendants and others to recover the possession of eleven square leagues of land, situate in what was formerly known as the County of Milam, on the right bank of the River San Andres, otherwise called Little River, where Buffalo Creek and Donaho's Creek enter said river, with specified boundaries.

The plaintiff gave in evidence a grant from the government of Coahuila and Texas, within the limits of the colony of the empresarios, Austin and Williams, dated 18th October, 1833, and rested.

The defendants gave in evidence grants from the same government of a league each, situate within the boundaries of the eleven leagues, the one to David Mumford, dated 20th March, 1835, the other to Jesse Mumford, dated 25th February, the same year; the former went into possession in the spring of 1844, and continued in the possession and cultivation of the tract down to the time of trial; the latter took possession in the year 1850, and continued the cultivation and improvement down to the trial.

The defense relied on is the Statute of Limitations.

The court charged that the plaintiff and defendants both claimed under titles emanating from the sovereignty of the soil; that the plaintiff's was the elder in point of date, and must be regarded as paramount, unless the defendants were protected by the Statute of Limitations set up in defense. That if the jury believed from the evidence the defendants had held actual adverse and peaceable possession, in their own right, for more than three years next before the commencement of the suit, under color of title, and that the plaintiff's cause of action accrued more than three years prior to the suit, the jury should find for the defendants.

The court further charged, that if the jury believed from the evidence that the defendants had held actual adverse and peaceable possession in their own right, cultivating, using, and enjoying the lands, and paying taxes thereon, and claiming under a deed or deeds duly recorded, for more than five years next before the commencement of the suit, they should find for the defendants.

The 15th section of the Act of Limitations of Texas, provides "that every suit to be instituted to recover real estate as against him, her, or them, in possession, under title or color of title, shall be instituted within three years next after the cause of action shall have accrued, and not afterwards;" and provides that, "by the term 'title,' as used in this section, is meant a regular chain of transfer from or under the sovereignty of the soil; and color of title is constituted by a consecutive chain of such transfers down to him, her, or them, in possession, without being regular, as if one or more of the memorials or muniments be not registered, or not duly registered, or be only in writing, or such like defect as may not extend to or include the want of intrinsic fairness and honesty."

The principal ground taken against the operation and effect of the three years' limitation in the present cause is, that the elder title being on record, the defendants had constructive notice of the same at the time of the grants to them, and hence that the title is subject to the charge of the "want of intrinsic fairness and honesty" within the meaning of the statute, which it is claimed removes the bar of three years' adverse possession.

It is admitted that this clause of the statute has not yet received a construction by the courts of Texas, and there is certainly some difficulty in ascertaining the precise meaning intended by the Legislature from the phraseology used. The better opinion, we think, is, that the want of intrinsic fairness and honesty, in the connection in which the words are found, relates to some infirmity in the muniments of title, or deduction of title, of the defendant, indicating a want of good faith in obtaining it.

The statute, in defining what is intended by possession, "under title, and color of title," in order to operate as a bar within the three years, declares, that by the term "title" "is meant a regular chain of transfer from or under the sovereignty of the soil," which, as is apparent, is the case before us, the title of the defendants being directly from the government; and "color of title" is declared to be "a consecutive chain of such transfer down to him, her, or them, in possession, without being regular, as if one or more of the memorials or muniments be not registered, or not duly registered, or be only in writing, or such like defect as may not extend to or include the want of intrinsic fairness and honesty;" clearly referring, as we think again, to the muniments of the title, and defects therein.

To refer these words to a constructive or actual notice of an elder title would, in the practical effect of the limitation, be a virtual repeal of the statute, especially in all cases in which the elder title is of record.

A Statute of Limitations is founded upon the idea of an elder and better title outstanding, and prescribes a period of possession and cultivation of the land, under the junior or inferior title, as a bar to the elder, for the repose of society; thereby settling the title by lapse of time, and preventing litigation.

As it respects the five years' limitation, the objection is, that the grants were not duly registered, and hence the possession not within the 16th section of the act. The grant to David Mumford was registered on the 21st July, 1838, and that to Jesse on the 4th October of the same year.

It is insisted, however, that the registries were a nullity, on the ground that the execution of the grants had not been properly proved or acknowleged, in order to be admitted of record.

In the case of the grant to David, the Recorder certifies that the deed was presented to him, proven, and duly recorded in his office the day above mentioned; and in that of Jesse, that the deed was proved for record by J. B. Chance, who made oath that he was familiar with the handwriting of the commissioner, W. H. Steele, and also of the assisting witnesses, and that he believed the several signatures to be genuine.

There is some difficulty in determining, from the various decisions of the courts of Texas upon the Registry Act of 1836, whether or not the certificates of proof of the grants in the present case were sufficient to admit them to registry at the time they were filed for record. It is claimed for the defendants that the recording of the grants was confirmed by the Act of 1839, which provides that "copies of all deeds, &c., when the originals remain in the public archives, and were executed in conformity with the laws existing at their dates, duly certified by the proper officers, shall be admitted to record in the county where such land lies." This Act relates to the colonists' titles delivered to the grantee, the originals remaining as public archives. The deeds in the present case are copies of the originals remaining in the archives, and are certified by Steele, the commissioner, that they agree with the original titles which exist in the archives, from which they are taken for the parties interested, the day of their date, in the form provided by the law. In addition to this certificate, the copies, which it seems are executed by the commissioner, and are second originals, were proved before the Recorder at the time they were admitted to registry. But be this as it may, we are not disposed to look very critically into the question of the registry, though we cannot say the court was in error in respect to it, inasmuch as the defense was complete under the Statute of three years' Limitation, as already explained.

An objection has been taken that the grants of the defendants are a nullity, upon the ground that Steele, the commissioner, had no authority to act in that capacity in the colony of Nashville, or Robertson, at their date. But this defect was cured by the act of the Republic of Texas in 1841, as has been repeatedly held by the courts of Texas. 2 Tex., 1, 87; 9 Tex., 348, 372; 23 Tex., 113, 234; 22 Tex., 161; 21 Tex., 722; 20 How., 270.

CHRISTOPHER G. PEARCE ET AL., Incorporated and Acting under the Name of THE NILES WORKS, Appts.,

v.

JESSE W. PAGE ET AL., Claimants of the Steamboat DOCTOR ROBERTSON.

(See S. C. 24 How., 228–233.)

Collision—rules applicable to.

Collision between a flat boat and a steamboat. The flat boat was heavily laden in a somewhat rapid current, and the only means of removing it out of the direction of the steamboat, was by working the end oars across the current.

When a floating boat follows the course of the current, a steamer must judge of its course, so as to avoid it. This may be done by a proper exercise of skill, which the steamer is bound to use. This is the established rule of navigation.

The steamer held in fault in not avoiding the flat boat.

Argued Dec. 20, 1860. Decided Jan. 15, 1861.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, by the appellants, to recover damages resulting from a collision.

The district court entered a decree dismissing the libel, with costs.

The circuit court, on appeal, having affirmed this decree, the libelants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. T. D. Lincoln, for appellants:

The very statement of the admitted facts of the case shows clearly that there is fault somewhere; gross fault. It was not in the night. The boats had not come into view of each other on a sudden, as though they were emerging from a fog, or were coming around a short point; nor was there any want of power in those on the steamer to avoid the collision. They had their steam on, and all the officers of the steamer were at their posts. It was a clear day, they had a clear view, and a river sufficiently wide and deep for all practical purposes of navigation. The presumption of carelessness, want of foresight, and skill somewhere, is, therefore, very strong.

The question whether there be such negligence or want of foresight, and where the same lies, under those principles and rules applicable to such cases, is a matter of proof to some extent, and to some extent a matter of law.

The first point which I desire to make is, that the presumption of negligence is too strong to be rebutted by any "uncertain evidence," such as is usual in cases of this kind.

The second point is, that this presumption, both in law and in fact, is against the steamer; and that it requires "clear proof" on her part to rebut such presumption and show that the collision was the result of accident merely, or the result of fault on the part of the flat boat alone. The following cases are in point and tend to establish this second position.

Frets v. Bull, 12 How., 471, 472; St. John v. Paine, 10 How., 582; The N. Y. & Liv. U. S. Mail Steamship Co. v. Rumball, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 385; The Oregon v. Rocca, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 572; Culbertson v. Shaw, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 587; The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 461; Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How., 586; Pars. Marit. L., 201–202 and n. 8.

The third point is, that there is no such evidence. On the contrary, the evidence clearly shows that the steamer was in fault, had ample means of avoiding this loss, and might have done it without the exercise of any unusual skill or foresight.

Those on the flat boat relied upon the well settled rule, and expected the steamer to stop. If they misjudged in this respect, the steamer was in greater fault in placing herself there, and in bringing about the emergency, and must bear the consequence.

N. Y. & Liv. U. S. Mail Steamship Co. v. Rumball, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 384; The Rhode Island, 1 Blatchf., 364.

But I insist that as Capt. Douglass pursued the usual course, it was not fault in a legal sense on his part, even if he did misjudge; that he relied upon the rule of the river, was not, under the circumstances, a fault which ought to prevent the libelants from recovering full damages.

Mere error in judgment is not always regarded as a fault. There are many cases where a plaintiff had committed an error in judgment, which entered somewhat into the disaster, but has still recovered his full damages.

Reeves v. The Constitution, Gilp., 587; Chaplin v. Hawes, 14 Eng. C. L., 446; Bridge v. The Grand Junc. Railw. Co., 3 Mees. & W., 244; Walters v. Pfeil, 22 Eng. C.L., 544; Ingalls v. Bills, 9 Met., 1.

In such cases, the whole blame is put upon the party committing the first fault, and whose duty it was to guard against any such emergency.

N. Y. & Liv. U. S. Mail Steamship Co. v. Rumball, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 385; Frets v. Bull, 12 How.), 471, 472.

Messrs. P. Phillips and A. O. P. Nicholson, for appellees:

The argument for the appellees was confined to the evidence.

Rules for avoiding—steamer meeting steamer. See note to Williamson v. Barrett, 54 U. S. (13 How.), 101.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a libel filed by Christopher G. Pearce et al., incorporated and acting under the name of "Niles Works," and by virtue of the Statute of the State of Ohio, passed May 1, 1852, entitled "An Act to provide for the creation and regulation of incorporated companies, in the State of Ohio," against the steamboat Doctor Robertson, her tackle, apparel, engine and furniture, and all persons intervening for their interest in the same, in a cause of collision, civil and maritime.

The libelants were the owners of a large amount of iron castings, made for and intended as sugar-mill machinery, which was at the time of the said collision in a flat boat, well manned and equipped, and which was being navigated on the Ohio River, and in the usual mode of navigating such craft, and near the Illinois shore, and along the side of the Cincinnati tow head, about twenty-five feet therefrom, and had crossed over from the Kentucky side, and was at the time in full view of the Doctor Robertson and her pilot.

The libel states that on the 8th day of August, 1856, at about 8 o'clock in the forenoon of that day, and while the said flat boat was being navigated as aforesaid, the said steamboat, Doctor Robertson, approached her, coming up the river, and having a lighter in tow, with full speed; and although the flat boat was in full view of her pilot, and there was ample room for the said steamboat to pass to the left of and between her and the Cincinnati bar, which lay between the flat boat and the Illinois shore, yet the said steamboat endeavored to run between the said flat boat and the said tow head, and ran herself and the said lighter, with great force, directly into and upon the said flat boat, and broke in the sides thereof, and caused the flat boat immediately to sink in about twenty feet of water, and so injured it as to render it entirely useless.

It happens in this case, as in all other cases of collision, that the witnesses on the respective boats are somewhat contradictory in their statements. It is admitted, that in ascending the Ohio River, some fifty or sixty miles below Cincinnati, the steamboat Doctor Robertson, a stern-wheel boat, of fifty tons burden, in passing up the river, near the place called the Cincinnati tow head, while running close to the Kentucky shore, being from one to two miles below, in full view of the defendants' flat boat, which was freighted with sugar-mills and other machinery, for the Western trade; and that the flat boat, being put in the course of the current, floated down the river, her stern and front oars not in use, but laid on the boat, without any effort by the hands of the flat boat, continued to float with the current, until it came into collision with the ascending steamboat. That this boat, to avoid a snag that projected some distance into the river, changed her course, by which means she came into collision with the flat boat, which was immediately sunk in water near fifteen feet deep.

There seems to have been little or no effort made to avoid this collision by those who had the command of the flat boat. There were two other flat boats lashed together, which followed the first boat at a distance of some two or three hundred yards; and they, perceiving that a collision was likely to occur, used their oars, so as to avoid the ascending steamboat. Under this state of facts, the question of fault arises.

The defendants' flat boat was ninety-six feet in length, and some———feet in breadth, with an oar or sweep in the front and rear parts of the boat, so that some direction might be given to it. But this movement cannot be relied on when the colliding boats are near to each other. The flat boat was heavily laden, and occupied near a hundred feet in a somewhat rapid current, and the only means of removing it out of the direction of the steamboat, was by working the end oars across the current. This could not be done successfully, unless the boats were so far apart, as by a diagonal movement to secure the aid of the current in escaping a collision.

But what is the law of the river on this subject, in regard to floating flat boats and steam vessels? The self-moving power must take the responsible action. This cannot always be done, even with a fair wind, by a sailing vessel, as it may suddenly change, or be subject to accident. But steam is, generally, under the control of the will of the engineer, and he is responsible for a proper use of it.

Schuyler C. Barnet says he was passenger on the Doctor Robertson, and that five or six miles below Shawneetown she came in collision with a flat boat, loaded with sugar-mill machinery, at about nine or ten o'clock of a clear morning; the flat boat had come over the reef, and had straightened down the river, and was about one hundred feet from the tow head, the witness sitting half an hour on the boiler deck of the steamer before the collision, the steamer running about fifty feet from the Kentucky shore, on the larboard side; she had a lighter in tow and when she approached very near the flat boat she turned out a little from the shore to avoid a snag just above her, but kept on until the lighter struck the flat boat; when the bow of the steamer was some fifty or sixty feet below the tow head, the lighter struck the flat boat and ran half way over it, which caused the flat boat to sink.

And the witness says, that on the part of the flat boat nothing could have been done, as she was lying in the best possible position. Since 1824, the witness states, he has been boating on the river, and that the general custom has been, and now is, "for steamboats to give the way for flat boats to pass."

Alexander Ford has been on the river ten or twelve years, and a pilot for three years. The flat boat was lying nearly straight with the tow head, about one hundred and fifty yards, more or less, above the foot of it, and about twenty-five or thirty yards from the Kentucky shore. The Doctor Robertson aimed to go on the starboard side of the flat boat, when the barge which the Robertson had in tow struck the flat boat, and sunk her. He thinks the Robertson had stopped her engine, which, if it had been done in time, the boats would not have come together. He says there was plenty of room to pass outside of the flat boat. The witness says, "that he supposed the Robertson could pass on either side of the flat boat. The flat boat was not easily turned out of line. The boats in approaching each other were in full view a mile and a half. It is customary for a steamboat to give way to a flat boat. The steamboat takes either side of the descending flat boat, so as to avoid it. Ford's boat was from seventy-five to one hundred and twenty-five yards above the machinery boat when he perceived that the steamboat would run into the flat boat."

The witnesses generally concurred in saying, that the steamboat could have run to the Kentucky shore until the flat boat had passed, or could have run on the Illinois side of the flat boat. In the language of John Walker, a witness, "the steamboat could have either gone to the shore or run closer to the shore, or she might have gone entirely outside of the flat boat; and he does not think those persons on the flat boat could have done anything to have prevented the collision." Witness thinks there was one hundred to one hundred and fifty yards of river on the Illinois side.

William P. Lameth, for the last fifteen years, has acted as steamboat captain, and he says, "it is the usual custom for steamboats to examine the position of the flat boats, and to take the best possible course to avoid them, on either side that seems best. If danger is apprehended, it is usual to ring a slow bell, and run easy. If danger be apparent, the boat should land or stop entirely, and let the flat boat pass."

John F. Farrell says, "it is the duty of a flat boat to straighten itself in the river, ease its oars, and pursue the course with the current, and the steamboat must avoid her." The snag in the river, Douglass says, was one hundred feet above the bow of the steamer when the boats struck. The two other flat boats were, when the steamer struck the flat boat, one hundred and fifty yards above the colliding boats, and the witness, Douglass, thinks the steamboat could have passed, if all the flat boats had kept their places. The stern of the flat boat was sixteen feet under water.

Several witnesses called by the steamer seem to think that the flat boat was bound to avoid the steamer; but such a rule would be unreasonable, and would increase the risk of navigation. When a floating boat follows the course of the current, the steamer must judge of its course. so as to avoid it. This may be done by a proper exercise of skill, which the steamer is bound to use. Any attempt to give a direction to the floating mass on the river would be likely to embarrass the steamer, and subject it to greater hazards. A few strokes of an engine will be sufficient to avoid any float upon the river which is moved only by the current; and this, I understand, is the established rule of navigation.

We think the steamer was in fault in not avoiding the flat boat; on which ground the judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

THOMAS RICHARDSON, Plff. in Er.,

v.

THE CITY OF BOSTON.

(See S. C., 24 How., 188–195.)

Indictment, when evidence—former verdict of little weight as evidence, if founded on erroneous instructions.

Lecraw v. Boston, 58 U. S., affirmed.

Bills of indictment, which constituted part of the history of the case, and were referred to in the testimony of the plaintiff, are admissible as testimony.

Former verdict and judgement, though admitted in evidence, should have little or no weight on the decision of the case, when it was founded on erroneous instructions on the law.

Former decision in this case 60 U. S., clearly stated and explained.

Argued Jan. 7, 1861. Decided Jan. 21, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island.

The history of the case and a sufficient statement of the facts, appear in the opinion of the court.

See, also, statement by the counsel for the defendant in error, and previous reports of the case there cited.

Messrs. B. R. Curtis, S. Bartlett, George E. Badger and J. M. Carlisle, for plaintiff in error:

1. The court below erred in allowing the defendant to give in evidence certain indictments which purport to have been found against the defendant in the years 1848 and 1849, for certain alleged nuisances described in the said indictments respectively.

2. The court erred in refusing the instructions prayed by the plaintiff, and in the instructions given.

(a) There was evidence "tending to show that the boundary of the highway now called Summer Street, next to the sea, was and is low water mark." But the court refused so to instruct the jury, and instructed them to the contrary.

This is the same evidence upon which this case was remanded (60 U. S., in b. 15, p. 689), and additional evidence of like tendency.

A portion of the documentary evidence offerred by the defendant, it is conceived, had a like tendency.

(b) The court erred in the instruction given with respect to the former verdict and judgment offered in evidence by the plaintiff, in this, that the said instruction was upon the weight and effect of the evidence, which was a question for the jury exclusively. And therefore, though the court might give its opinion to the jury, it should have been so guarded as to leave the jury free in the exercise of their own judgments." They should have been "made distinctly to understand that the instruction was not given as a point of law, by which they were to be governed, but as a mere opinion as to the facts, and to which they should give no more weight than it was entitled to.

Tracy v. Swartwout, 10 Pet., 96; see, also, Greenleaf v. Birth, 9 Pet., 299; Ches. & O. Canal Co. v. Knapp, 9 Pet., 567, and particularly Games v. Stiles, 14 Pet., 322.

Whereas the court instructed the jury upon this point in the same form and as absolutely as upon the mattere of law, omitting any discrimination or caution.

Messrs. C. Cushing and P. W. Chandler, for defendant in error:

This action is for the continuance of an alleged nuisance from Sept. 13, 1850, to April 15, 1852.

It was originally tried at the June Term, 1853, of the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island.

At that same term the plaintiff obtained the judgment alluded to in this case, for the original erection and continuance of the same alleged nuisance up to Sept. 13, 1850.

Both the declaration in the action on which that judgment was recovered, and the one in this case, contained six counts; one for each of plaintiff's wharves, alleging a right of way in the dock in question, for the plaintiff, his servants and vessels appertaining to his said wharves; one for each of said wharves) alleging a public dock, slip, or way between them, by which plaintiff was entitled to a passage from the channel to his wharves, and vice versa; one for the reversion of both wharves relying on the way appurtenant to them, and one (the 6th) for the reversion of both wharves, counting on the public easement; the injury in all cases being the same with averments of special injury to the plaintiff, in the counts where the public nuisance was counted on. The structure constituting the alleged nuisance was the same as in the case of City of Boston v. Lecraw, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 426.

In both cases verdicts were given for the plaintiff on his 6th count.

The judgement in the first case was satisfied, the amount being too small for a writ of error, but in the present case a motion was made for a new trial, pending which motion this court decided the case of Lecraw v. The City of Boston, in which the views of the law upon which the verdicts and judgment above mentioned had been obtained were pronounced erroneous.

58 U. S. (17 How.), 426.

The motion for a new trial in the present action was accordingly decided in the defendant's favor, and the case came on for trial at the June Term, 1855.

The plaintiff then filed the 7th count of his declaration, upon which alone he now relies. and to which alone the instructions of the court at the last trial apply.

The count alleges that the locus in quo was "a highway, town way, or public way, to the sea, sometimes known as the town dock, extending from the corner of Summer Street and Sea Street to the channel," and that the way aforesaid," was "a public highway or town way or public way to the sea or low water, duly laid out and established pursuant to law; and by reason thereof the plaintiff had, ought to have had, and still ought to have, free ingress and egress with boats and vessels of every description, upon, over and through said way, to and from the wharves, so by him possessed as aforesaid, from and to the channel of the sea.

At the trial in 1855, the court below, thinking itself bound by the judgment of this court in Lecraw's case, and seeing no substantial difference between the two, instructed the jury that there was not sufficient evidence in the case to authorize a verdict for the plaintiff.

Richardson v. Boston, 60 U. S. (19 How.),268.

The jury having found for the defendant, the plaintiff sued out a writ of error, which was heard in this court, and a new trial was ordered, on three grounds:

1. That the judgment in the former case, although rendered under an erroneous view of the law, was still evidence which should have been submitted to the jury with proper instructions from the court.

Richardson v. Boston, 60 U. S. (19 How.),268.

2. That the record disclosed some evidence proper for the consideration of a jury, that Summer Street was originally laid out to low water mark, in which case the court seem to imply that the right, to use it as a highway on land, would accrue to the abuttors, and the superficial drain which the plaintiff complains of might be a nuisance.

3. That there was some evidence of injury to the plaintiff by deposit of matter from the drain at the end of his wharves, for which he might recover, as his declaration then stood.

The case was tried again at the June Term, 1858, and resulted in a verdict for the defendants, under instructions from the court, which are excepted to on this record.

The position of the plaintiff is somewhat modified since the case was last before this court.

1. The claim for damages by accretions has been stricken out of his declaration, under an arrangement of counsel.

2. It is no longer controverted that the fee of the locus is in the defendants.

3. It is expressly admitted that it is not for any obstruction to a way for travel on land, but only to the access to the plaintiff's wharves by vessels, that damages are claimed.

4. The exceptions to the charge of the judge are only to his refusal to give the ruling requested by the plaintiffs, and to the instructions actually given respecting the said highway.

5. Every point upon which the plaintiff originally rested his right to recover, has been explicitly decided against him, and the same is true of all the points on which he now bases his claim, except that of a public way for boats and vessels, and this point, the defendants contend, has been substantially and by implication decided in their favor, leaving only the question of accretions at the end of the plaintiff's wharves as a ground of claim for damages; and this point is not before the court.

There was no evidence before the jury which would have authorized them to find that the supposed way or dock between the plaintiff's wharves, from high to low water mark for the passage of boats and vessels, as alleged in the 7th count of his declaration, was ever dedicated by the defendants to the public use, or was ever laid out according to law, by the Town of Boston, or the authorities thereof, as a highway for the passage of boats and vessels from high water mark to the channel.

They had no power to lay out ways below high water mark.

Kean v. Stetson, 5 Pick., 492.

And if they undertook to lay out ways to low water mark, the laying out would be valid as far as high water mark, and void below that point.

Commonwealth v. Wieher, 3 Met., 448; State v. Wilson, 42 Me., 9, 21.

This court has already decided that there is no evidence of a dedication to the public in Lecraw's case, in which the evidence was, substantially, the same as in this.

58 U. S. (17 How.), 426.

The powers of selectmen are conferred by statute, and are limited to those so conferred.

Rev. Stat., ch. 14, sec. 66, et seq.; Bethum v. Turner, 1 Me., 111.

The power of laying out ways involving the taking of private property for public uses, is especially to be strictly limited to that expressly granted. And the selectmen have no more authority to lay out ways over the town's land than over that of others.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the third time in which this claim to have damages from the City of Boston, for erecting drains and sewers on their own land for the preservation of the health of the City, has come before us.

The plaintiff is the owner of two wharves, called Bull's wharf and Price's wharf, running from high water to low water mark. The space between these two wharves belongs to the City of Boston, being situated at the foot of Summer Street; and as it was but thirty feet wide, it became, by the mere accident of its position, a very convenient dock, or slip, for plaintiff, so long as the City did not see fit to reclaim their land. Formerly, the drains and sewers which ran under Summer Street discharged at the end of that street at high water mark; but, as the City increased, this discharge of drainage became pestilential, and a nuisance to the neighborhood. To remedy this evil, the City was compelled to extend its drains out to low water mark, and this is the nuisance complained of in this and the other suits.

The case of Boston v. Lecraw, 17 How., 426, first introduced this controversy to this court. Lecraw was tenant of Richardson, and his title consequently the same. It was claimed that the City of Boston, by not wharfing out their land at the end of Summer Street, had dedicated it to the public, or rather to the private use of Richardson, to whose wharves it afforded a most convenient dock or slip. This claim was declared by this court to be wholly without foundation; and that "whether it was called 'town dock' or 'public dock,' it would furnish no ground to presume that the City had parted with their right to govern and use it in the manner most beneficial to the citizens."

It is not our purpose to again discuss this question, or again repeat the arguments and principles on which our judgment was founded. The correctness of that decision has not been impugned or denied, and it needs no interpretation.

During the pendency of this suit of Lecraw, the tenant, and before its decision in this court, Richardson had brought a suit for damage to his reversion by the same alleged nuisances, and the verdict and judgment being for less than $2,000, the City could not have a writ of error to reverse it, as in the other case. When the present case came on for trial, the decision of this court in the Lecraw case being known, in order, if possible, to avoid the effect of that decision, a new count was added to the declaration, drawn with great ingenuity and subtlety, charging that "there had been a highway, or town way, or public way, to the sea or low water, duly laid out and established pursuant to law;" and that the drains made by the City had "caused mud, earth, and other materials, to be thrown and deposited upon and near the said wharves."

The report of our decision on this case will be found in 19 How., 263.

We then decided that a former verdict and judgment in an action on the case for continuance of the same nuisance was not conclusive evidence, but is permitted to go to the jury as persuasive evidence. We stated in what cases it ought to have weight, and in what it could have little or none, as where the former verdict was the result of an erroneous instruction on the law by the court.

As the additional count, on which the plaintiff relied, was rather equivocal or ambiguous, as to what was meant by a "highway or town way" to the sea or low water mark, we decided that public officers of a town have no power to lay out a town way between high water and the channel of a navigable river. A board of pilots may mark by buoys the best channel for vessels in a bay; but this would hardly be called a "town way on the ocean." Indeed, it did not seem to be seriously contended on the argument that the selectmen in 1683 had assumed or intended to extend a street or town way by water over the great ocean highway. But as the City of Boston was owner of the soil between high and low water mark, it had equal right to reclaim the land as other owners; and having done so, a street or "town way" might be established thereon.

The court decided that, if the land was so reclaimed, and a highway laid out on it, the right to use it as a street or highway on land becomes appurtenant to the property of the adjoiners, who might well maintain an action for a nuisance on such street or highway.

The plaintiff had alleged in this count that he had received damage to his wharf by accretions of mud, &c., below low water mark, and there was some evidence to support the allegation. The court decided that this fact should have been submitted to the jury. It was a question entirely distinct and separate from a claim of right of highway in the dock.

With this history of the antecedents of this case, there can be no difficulty in disposing of the exceptions.

The first exception is to the admission of the bills of indictment against the City. They constituted part of the history of the case, and were referred to in the testimony of the plaintiff, and were, therefore, not wholly irrelevant. They tended to show "that the conduct of the City," as disclosed by the evidence, did not "tend to oppression," as has been charged in the argument in this court.

The next exception is to the charge of the court in their instruction, that the former verdict and judgment, though admitted in evidence, should have little or no weight on the decision of the case, because it was founded on erroneous instructions on the law. This instruction was in exact conformity with the ruling of this court. The verdict was on an agreed statement of facts, not now disputed, on which the court gave an opinion, since decided by this court to be a mistake. Like many other matters given in evidence to support a case, this verdict was received as not irrelevant, although the proof on the other side might show it to be worthless.

The last exception is to the charge of the court, "that there is not any evidence in the case which will authorize the jury to find that the supposed way or dock between the plaintiff's wharves, from high to low water mark, for the free egress and ingress of boats and vessels to and from the same, as alleged and described in the seventh count in his declaration, was ever dedicated by the Town or City of Boston to the public use, either as a public highway, town way, dock, or public way, for the access of boats and vessels between said wharves to high water mark, or the egress therefrom to the sea. That there is not any evidence in the case which will authorize the jury to find that the supposed way or dock between the plaintiff's wharves, from high to low water mark, for the egress and ingress of boats and vessels, to and from the same, as alleged and described in the seventh count in his declaration, was ever duly laid out and established by the Town of Boston, or the authorities thereof, pursuant to law, either as a public highway, town way, or public way, for the access of boats and vessels between said wharves to high water mark, or the egress therefrom to the sea."

This instruction is in entire conformity with the previous decisions of this court on this subject.

There was nothing, in the opinion of this court, which should subject it to the misconstruction of having decided that a "town way" for boats and vessels could be laid out on the high seas, or of imputing to the town officers such an obliquity of understanding as the assumption of such a power would argue; on the contrary, the court decided that the public officers had no such power; but that the City, after it reclaimed the land to high water mark, might continue Summer Street as a highway on land, for a nuisance, to which the plaintiff might sustain an action; and this case was remanded in order to give the plaintiff an opportunity to have the verdict of the jury on this subject; and also for any injury he might have sustained by the drains causing an accumulation of matter at the outer end of the plaintiff's wharves. The record shows that the plaintiff abandoned any claim for damages for either of these causes, and he was, of course, left without any case to be submitted to the jury.

Judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

JAMES NATIONS AND JOSEPH NATIONS, Plffs. in Er.,

v.

NANCY ANN JOHNSON AND JAMES JOHNSON.

(See S. C., 24 How., 195-207.)

Decision of a court having jurisdiction, is binding in other courts—jurisdiction of courts of general jurisdiction, presumed—notice to defendant necessary to jurisdiction—writ of error—when notice of, by publication, sufficient—exceptions.

Where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause; and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, as a general rule, is regarded as binding in every other court.

Whenever the parties to a suit, and the subject-matter in controversy, are within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, the decree of that court is to every intent as binding as would be the judgment of a court of law. Courts of general jurisdiction are presumed to act by right, and not by wrong, unless it clearly appears that they have transcended their powers.

Notice to the defendant, actual or constructive, however, is essential to the jurisdiction of all courts. Actual notice ought to be given in all cases where it is practicable, even in appellate tribunals.

A writ of error does not act upon the parties; it acts only on the record, by removing the record into the supervising tribunal.

A writ of error is a continuation of the original litigation, rather than the commencement of a new action.

Where the record shows that the defendant appeared in the subordinate court, and litigated the merits there to final judgment, he cannot defeat an appeal by removing from the jurisdiction, so as to render a personal service of the citation impossible.

In that state of facts, service by publication, according to the law of jurisdiction and the practice of the court, is free from objection, and is amply sufficient to support the judgment of the appellate court.

A bill of exceptions does not bring into this court any of the prior proceedings for revision.

Argued Jan. 7, 1861. Decided Jan. 21, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Tennessee.

This case arose upon a petition filed in the court below, by the defendants in error, on certain foreign judgments or decrees, for certain negroes and their hire.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs; whereupon the defendants sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. George W. Paschal, for plaintiffs in error:

It may be safely stated, as a general principle, that a judgment obtained by publication and without personal service, cannot be the foundation of an action in another State. All suits are either in personam or in rem. When in personam, there must be personal service to give jurisdiction. When in rem, the remedy is exhausted when the res is disposed of.

But as there is no pretext that there was personal service in this case, or that the party appeared to the writ of error, or that it was a proceeding in rem, then it follows that the Supreme Court in Mississippi had no jurisdiction over the defendants and the decree rendered therein, and the subsequent decrees of the Vice-Chancellor's court were nullities for want of jurisdiction.

This question of jurisdiction may be raised collaterally, or at any time whenever the judgment shall be offered.

But it is presumed that the court below went upon the ground that as the parties appeared and pleaded in the chancery court, they were bound by the subsequent proceedings in the court of errors and appeals. Had the complainants prosecuted their appeal as the law required, this would be true; but as they let the time elapse, and the defendants had left the State, and had no attorney of record upon whom to effect service, the proceeding upon the writ of error was as much a proceeding by a mere publication as though it had been a matter of original cognizance.

The Mississippi statute is not different from the statutes under which the decisions above quoted were made.

Hutch. Dig., 758, 759, secs. 84, 85; Hutch. Dig., p. 931.

The plaintiff did not perfect the appeal, the citation can only be served upon the party or his attorney of record, thus showing that the writ was, to all intent and purposes, one original proceeding.

A writ of error is an original writ.

A writ of error, like a scire facias, is considered a new action and, therefore, upon bringing it, the defendant in the original action may change his attorney without obtaining a judge's order therefor.

The court took the decree as conclusive as to the amount of hire due since the rendition of the judgment in Mississippi. This was clearly wrong. The judgment could not operate prospectively as to the rate of the hire.

No counsel appeared in this court for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon a writ of error to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas. It was a petitory suit, commenced by the present defendants, and was founded upon a certain final decree rendered at the April Term, 1854, by the district chancery court, held at Carrollton, in the State of Mississippi, for the northern district of that State. Among other things, the petitioners allege that Nancy A. Johnson, then Nancy A. Alvis, and a minor, by her next friend, brought a suit by bill of complaint in that court against the present plaintiffs to recover three slaves belonging to her, together with hire for the same for a specified time; that she subsequently intermarried with James Johnson, who was admitted with her to prosecute the suit; that the cause was afterwards submitted to the court for a final hearing, and a decree entered dismissing the bill of complaint at the cost of the petitioners. They also allege that they prosecuted a writ of error to the high court of errors and appeals in that State, and that the decree of the district court of chancery was there reversed, and a decree entered in their favor. That decree, as set forth in the petition, shows that the appellate court was of the opinion that the slaves in controversy were the property and separate estate of the first named complainant. Wherefore it was considered by the court that the decree of the Vice-Chancellor ought to be reversed, and it was so ordered, adjudged and decreed; and the court proceeding to pronounce such a decree as the subordinate court should have rendered, entered a decree that the complainants do have and recover of the respondents the slaves then in controversy, for the sole and separate use and right of the first named complainant, and requiring the respondents to restore the slaves and deliver the possession of the same to the said complainant, or her authorized agent. It is also recited in the decree that the court was of the opinion that the complainant was entitled to recover hire for the slaves from the time they were taken from her possession by the respondents. To carry out the directions of the court, it was further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the cause be remanded to the subordinate court, and that an account be taken of the hire of the slaves, and for such other and further proceedings as may be required in the premises. After the mandate went down, the cause was sent to a commissioner to carry into effect the directions of the appellate court. He made a report, showing that on the 4th day of February, 1854, the reasonable hire for the slaves amounted to the sum of $2,200; and he also reported that the hire of the slaves was reasonably worth $200 per annum. That report was confirmed by the court, and on the 14th day of April of the same year a decree was entered in favor of the complainants, that they do have and recover of the respondents the said sum of $2,200 with interest; and also, that they do have and recover of the respondents at the rate af $200 per year for the hire of the slaves, from the date of the report until they shall be surrendered up according to the decree in the cause. As a part of this decree, it was also ordered and directed that execution issue, as at law, for the amount awarded to the complainants, together with the costs of suit. Plaintiffs also allege in their petition or declaration, that those decrees or judgments were in full force, and that they have never in any manner been annulled, reversed, satisfied or discharged, either in whole or part. Process was duly served upon the defendants in this case, and on the 5th day of December, 1854, they appeared and made answer to the suit. From the minutes of the clerk it would seem that the suit was entered, in the first place, as a suit at law, and it was certainly so treated by the defendants in their first answer. Those proceedings, however, are of no importance in this investigation, because the record states, that on the 4th day of December, 1856, the cause was docketed on the chancery side of the court; and on the 2d day of June, 1857, the defendants again appeared and filed their answer to the petition, without objection to the transfer which had been made of the cause. To that answer the plaintiffs excepted on various grounds, and after a full hearing the exceptions were sustained, and the answer was stricken out by the order of the court. Both parties again appeared before the court, sitting in chancery, on the 11th day of June, 1857, when, as the record states, "upon motion, and merits examined by the court, it was ordered that the cause be transferred to the law docket." No objection was made to that order by either party, and for aught that appears to the contrary, the transfer was made by consent. Leave was subsequently granted to the plaintiffs to amend their petition, and on the 26th day of January, 1858, they filed an amendment to the same, alleging that they were citizens of the State of Tennessee, and that the defendants were citizens of the State of Texas. They also alleged in their amended petition, that the slaves in controversy were of the value of $3,200, and prayed judgment in their favor for the recovery of the slaves, and in default of the delivery of the possession of the same, they also prayed judgment for their value, and "for general relief."

Exceptions were filed by the defendants, to the amended petition, but the exceptions were overruled by the court. At the same time the defendants filed an additional answer to the petition, denying all the allegations and charges therein contained, and also pleaded the Statute of Limitations in two forms, as set forth in the transcript. Afterwards, on the 6th day of February, 1858, the defendants had leave to plead nul tiel record to the respective decrees set forth in the plaintiff's petition. On that issue the court found for the plaintiffs, and overruled the plea, and the parties went to trial upon the plea denying all the allegations and charges contained in the plaintiffs' petition, and upon the pleas setting up the Statute of Limitations. To support the issue on their part, the plaintiffs introduced duly certified copies of the two records and decrees set forth in their petition, and proved, by competent witnesses, the value of the slaves at the time of the trial. By that testimony it appeared that one of the slaves was of the value of $800, and that the other two were each of the value of $900. Defendants offered to prove that they removed from Mississippi on the 20th day of January, 1850; that they became citizens of Texas, and were domiciliated there on the 21st day of February of that year, and that they had ever since resided there as citizens of that State. That testimony was excluded by the court upon the objection of the plaintiffs, and the defendants excepted to the ruling. They offered no other evidence, and under the instructions of the court the jury returned their verdict for the plaintiffs. At the trial, the defendants requested the court to instruct the jury that—

1. The transcript from the record to the high court of errors and appeals, and the Chancery Court for the Northern District of the State of Mississippi, is not evidence sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to recover.

2. That that portion of the decree of the chancery court fixing the hire of the negroes at $200 a year, from and after the date of that decree, is no evidence of the value of the hire of said negroes; and unless the plaintiffs have introduced some evidence independent of that record, proving the value of the hire, the jury cannot allow hire from the date of the judgment rendered by the Vice-Chancellor.

But the court refused so to instruct the jury, and did instruct them that the record was conclusive proof that the title of the slaves was in the plaintiffs, and of the value of their hire up to the 4th day of February, 1854, as shown by the record; and the jury were also instructed to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the additional hire, at the rate of $200 per annum, from the date of the decree. Instructions were also given to the jury as to the other matters of claim set forth in the petition; but inasmuch as they are not now made the subject of complaint, we shall pass the exceptions over without remark, except to say that they are evidently without merit.

On this state of the case three questions are presented for decision:

1. It is insisted by the plaintiffs in error that the court erred in charging the jury that the record offered in evidence was conclusive proof as to the title of the slaves in controversy, and of the value of their hire to the date of the decree. That theory is based upon certain facts which are apparent in the record of that suit, and the question is raised both by the instructions given to the jury and by the refusal of the court to charge as requested. It appears from the record of the suit, that the bill of complaint was filed in the District Chancery Court for the Northern District of Mississippi on the 26th day of November, 1846, and that the respondents entered their appearance on the 23d day of November, 1847, and made answer to the suit. Testimony was taken on both sides, and the respondents continued to prosecute their defense to the suit until the 11th day of April, 1850, when, upon final hearing, the bill of complaint was dismissed at the cost of the complainants. Respondents' attorney then withdrew his appearance; but the record states that the complainants, on the same day, prayed an appeal, which was granted, upon their giving bond for costs in ninety days, "and by consent it is agreed" that the appeal be taken directly to the high court of errors and appeals. Complainants, however, failed to prosecute the appeal within the appointed time, and consequently were obliged to prosecute the appeal by writ of error. It is not now questioned that a writ of error, under the circumstances of the case, was the proper process, by the law of that State, for the removal of the cause into the appellate court; but it is insisted that the subsequent decrees are void, because the respondents were not legally notified of the pendency of the writ of error. Personal service was not made on either of the respondents, and they never appeared in the appellate court. On the contrary, it appears that the attorney of the complainants, on the 18th day of January, 1852, filed an affidavit in the cause, that the defendants in error were not residents of the state, and that they had no attorney of record on whom process could be served. Provision, however, is made by the law of that State for service by publication in cases of this description. By the Act of the 29th of January, 1829, it is provided, that "whenever a cause shall be removed to the Supreme Court by writ of error, and the court is satisfied that the defendant in error is a non-resident, and has no attorney of record within this State, it shall be the duty of said court to cause notice of the pendency of said cause to be published for three weeks in some public newspaper, the first of which shall be at least three months before the sitting of the next term of the court in which the case is pending, within this State; on proof of which publication, the court shall proceed to hear and determine said cause, in the same manner as if process had been actually served upon the said defendant." Hutchison's Dig., p. 931.

That regulation, by a subsequent Act passed on the 2d day of March, 1833, is made applicable to the high court of errors and appeals, and it was conceded at the argument that the publication was made under that provision. On the filing of the affidavit, showing that the defendants in that suit were non-residents of the State, it was ordered by the court, that unless they appeared on the third Monday of October, 1853, "the court will proceed to hear and determine the cause in the same manner as if process had been actually served; and it was further ordered that a copy of the order be published in a certain public newspaper published at the capital of the State, once a week, for three weeks." Publication was accordingly made, as appears by the decree in the cause, and on the 23d day of January, 1854, the decree was entered reversing the decree of the subordinate court; and the question is, whether the notice was sufficient to give the appellate court jurisdiction of the case and the parties. That the subordinate court had full jurisdiction is admitted. Both of the respondents appeared in that suit, and litigated the merits for the period of three years. From the evidence in the case, it appears that they got possession of the slaves in Tennessee, in violation of the rights of the first named complainant, and removed them to the State of Mississippi. Suit was brought against them in a subordinate court of the latter State, and after three years' litigation, and when they had succeeded in dismissing the bill of complaint, they removed to Texas, carrying the slaves with them, although they knew the complainants intended to seek a revision of the decree in the appellate court. All of the equities of the case are, therefore, with the present defendants. Where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause; and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, as a general rule, is regarded as binding in every other court. Whenever the parties to a suit, and the subject-matter in controversy between them, are within the regular jurisdiction of a court of equity, the decree of that court is, to every intent, as binding as would be the judgment of a court of law. Accordingly, it was held by this court, in Pennington v. Gibson, 16 How., 65, that in all cases where an action of debt can be maintained upon a judgment at law, to recover a sum of money awarded by such judgment, the like action may be maintained upon a decree in equity, provided it is for a specific amount, and that the records of the two courts are of equal dignity and binding obligation. Had the decree, therefore, been rendered in the subordinate court before the appeal, the right of the plaintiffs below to recover in this suit would have been beyond question, unless there is some other error in the record. Courts of general jurisdiction are presumed to act by right, and not by wrong, unless it clearly appears that they have transcended their powers. Grignon v. Astor, 2 How., 319; Voorhees v. Bank of U. S., 10 Pet., 449.

Notice to the defendant, actual or constructive, however, is essential to the jurisdiction of all courts, and it was held by this court, in Webster v. Reid, 11 How., 460, that when a judgment is brought collaterally before the court as evidence, it may be shown to be void on its face by want of notice to the person against whom it is entered. Numerous cases, also, are cited by the counsel of the present plaintiffs, applicable to the judgments or decrees of a court exercising original jurisdiction, which assert the general rule that no man shall be condemned in his person or property without notice, and an opportunity to make his defense. And some of them go much further, and lay down the rule as applicable to the inception of the suit, that notice by publication is insufficient to support the judgment in any jurisdiction, except in the courts of the state where it was rendered. Boswell v. Otis, 9 How., 350; Oakley v. Aspinwall, 4 N. Y., 513. None of these cases, however, precisely touch the question under consideration. Personal service was made upon the defendants in this case by due process of law in the court of original jurisdiction, and the question here is, whether a party duly served with notice in a subordinate court, after he has appeared and answered to the suit, and secured an erroneous judgment in his favor, may voluntarily absent himself from the jurisdiction of the appellate tribunal, so as to render it impossible to give him personal notice of an appeal, and still have a right to complain that notice was served by publication, pursuant to the law of the jurisdiction from which he has thus voluntarily withdrawn. We think not. To admit the proposition, would be to deprive the other party of all means of removing the cause to the appellate tribunal, and would enable a party, who knew he had wrongfully prevailed in the court below, to secure the fruits of an erroneous judgment, by defeating the jurisdiction of the appellate court. Actual notice ought to be given in all cases where it is practicable, even in appellate tribunals; but whenever personal service has been rendered impossible by the removal of the appellee or defendant in error from the jurisdiction, service by publication is sufficient to give the appellate tribunal jurisdiction of the subject and the person, provided it appears in the record that personal notice was given in the subordinate court, and that the party there appeared, and litigated the merits of the controversy. Contrary to the views of the counsel for the present plaintiffs, we think there is some distinction between the notice required to be given to an appellee or defendant in error and the service of process in the original suit. A writ of error is said to be an original writ, because, at common law, it was issued out of the court of chancery; but its operation is rather upon the record, than the person. Under the Judiciary Act, says Marshall, Ch. J., the effect of a writ of error is simply to bring the record into court, and submit the judgment of the inferior tribunal to re-examination. It does not in any manner act upon the parties; it acts only on the record, by removing the record into the supervising tribunal. Suits cannot, under the Judiciary Act, be commenced against the United States; and yet writs of error, accompanied by citations, have uniformly issued for the removal of judgments recovered in favor of the United States into this court for re-examination. Such cases are of daily occurrence, and the judgments are here reversed or affirmed as they are, with or without error; and it has never been supposed that the writ of error in such cases, though sometimes involving large amounts, was a suit against the United States. Plainly, therefore, there is a distinction between a writ of error had the original suit. According to the practice in this court, it is rather a continuation of the original litigation than the commencement of a new action; and such, it is believed, is the general understanding of the legal profession in the United States. Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 410; Clark v. Matthewson, 12 Pet., 170.

No rule can be a sound one which, by its legitimate operation, will deprive a party of his right to have his case submitted to the appellate court; and where, as in this case, personal service was impossible in the appellate court, through the act of the defendant in error, it must be held that publication, according to the law of the jurisdiction, is constructive notice to the party, provided the record shows that process was duly served in the subordinate court, and that the party appeared and litigated the merits. Constructive notice, says Mr. Justice Baldwin, in Hollingsworth v. Barbour 4 Pet., 475, can only exist in the cases coming fairly within the provisions of the statutes authorizing the courts to make orders for publication, and providing that the publication, when made, shall authorize the courts to decree. Regina v. Lightfoot, 26 Eng. L. & E., 177 (6 El. & B., 822).

As stated by this court in Harris v. Hardeman, 14 How., 339, a judgment upon a proceeding in personam can have no force as to one on whom there has been no service of process, actual or constructive, and who has had no day in court or notice of any proceeding against him. Judgment in that case had been rendered without any sufficient notice, either actual or constructive and, of course, it was held to be irregular; but the opinion of the court clearly recognizes the principle that constructive notice in certain cases may be sufficient to bind the party. Every person, as this court said in the case of The Mary, 9 Cranch, 144, may make himself a party to an admiralty proceeding, and appeal from the sentence; but notice of the controversy is necessary, in order to enable him to become a party. When the proceedings are against the person, notice is served personally, or by publication; but where they are in rem, notice is served upon the thing itself. Common justice requires that a party, in cases of this description, should have some mode of giving notice to his adversary; and where, as in this case, the record shows that the defendant appeared in the subordinate court, and litigated the merits there to final judgment, it cannot be admitted that he can defeat an appeal by removing from the jurisdiction, so as to render a personal service of the citation impossible. On that state of facts, service by publication, according to the law of the jurisdiction and the practice of the court, we think is free from objection, and is amply sufficient to support the judgment of the appellate court. Mandeville v. Riggs, 2 Pet., 489; Hunt v. Wickliffe, 2 Pet., 214.

2. It is insisted, in the second place, by the counsel of the plaintiffs, that the court erred in allowing the decree to go to the jury as evidence of the value of the hire of the slaves subsequently to the 4th day of February, 1854. That theory overlooks the fact that testimony had been introduced by the present defendants showing the value of the slaves at the time of the trial; and that the decree was to be taken in connection with the parol testimony, showing that the slaves were still living, and in the possession of the parties originally charged with their abduction. No evidence had been offered by the defendants, and, in view of the circumstances, we think the charge was correct, and that the prayer for instruction was properly refused.

3. While the cause was pending on the chancery side of the court, on motion of the plaintiffs, the court struck out the answer of the defendants, and it is now insisted that the action of the court in that behalf was erroneous. All we think it necessary to say, in reply to this objection, is to remark that the cause was subsequently transferred to the law docket without objection, and that a bill of exceptions does not bring into this court any of the prior proceedings for revision. Whatever may be the practice in the state courts, counsel must bear in mind that there is a broad distinction between a suit at law and a suit in equity, and must understand that this court cannot and will not overlook that distinction.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Pennsylvania.

The history of the case and a sufficient statement of the facts, appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. G. W. Wharton and R. P. Kane, for appellants.

Messrs. Fallon and Serrill, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is brought up by an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

A libel was filed in the district court for that district by S. & W. Welsh, the appellees, against the ship Sarah (of which Sampson & Tappan, the appellants, are the owners) to recover compensation for damages sustained by a cargo of coffee shipped on board The Sarah, at Rio, and consigned to the libelants; and also to recover compensation for sundry disbursements made by the libelants for the payment of wages and provisions for the ship.

The ship owners appeared and answered; but it is unnecessary to state more particularly the facts in controversy between the parties, because the final decree of the circuit court was for less than $2,000, and consequently no appeal from its decree will lie to this court.

At the hearing in the district court the libel was dismissed; but upon an appeal to the circuit court this decision was reversed, and a decree passed by the circuit court in favor of the libelants for the sum of $2,302.78, with leave to the respondents to set off the balance due them for freight, if they should elect to do so. Afterwards, the respondents appeared in court, and elected to set off this balance against the sum decreed against them, which reduced the amount to $1,071.27. But in making this election, the proctors for the respondents stated in writing, and filed in the court, that the election to set off was made without any waiver of their right to appeal from the decree. After this election was made, the court, on the 31st of August, 1858, passed its decree in favor of the libelants for the above mentioned sum of $1,071.27, with interest from July 20, 1858. This was the final decree of the court, and the one from which the appeal is taken; and as it is below $2,000, no appeal will lie, under the Act of Congress. And neither the reservation of the respondents in making their election, nor even the consent of both parties, if that had appeared, will give jurisdiction to this court where it is not given by law.

The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

v.

OTTO VON ROEDER, HAMILTON LEDBETTER AND CHARLES VON ROSENBURG.

(See S. C., 24 How., 224-228.)

Texas Act of Limitations—question for court and jury—it is error to submit question to jury where there is no evidence—evidence of fraud—where decision is favorable, party cannot except to the evidence.

Where there was not five years from the date of the deed to defendant to the commencement of the suit; held, that the pleas of the Texas Statute of Limitations were not proved.

Whether there be any evidence is a question for the judge; whether there be sufficient evidence is for the jury.

The court erred in submitting the decision of questions to the jury when there was no evidence to raise them.

The district court erred in refusing to receive evidence to impeach a deed for fraud.

Where it appears from the charge that the decision of the court was favorable to the plaintiff, he has no cause for complaint upon his exceptions to the competency of the evidence.

Argued Dec. 27, 1860. Decided Jan. 21, 1861.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas.

This case arose upon a petition filed in the court below by the plaintiff in error, to try title to a league of land. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendants; whereupon the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Badger & Carlisle and G. W. Paschal, for plaintiff in error:

The court should not charge upon an issue to which there is no evidence.

Austin v. Talk, 20 Tex., 164; Andrews v. Smithwick, 20 Tex., 118; Steagall v. McKellar, 20 Tex., 268; Chandler v. Fulton, 10 Tex., 21.

The court ought to have instructed the jury that there was no evidence to warrant a finding upon either Statute of Limitations.

Lea v. Hernandez, 10 Tex., 187; Parker v. Leman, 10 Tex., 116.

A charge in the abstract might be harmless, and yet ruinous if not warranted by the evidence.

There having been no written evidence whatever, to sustain the pleas of three or five years' limitation, it was error not to give the charge which said there was no such issue before them, because the refusal was calculated to leave the jury in doubt as to the fact.

Wintz v. Morrison, 17 Tex., 372.

The court must not assume that as doubtful which is clear and indisputable. The courts for the District of Texas having adopted the state practice in common law cases, this court will follow the state decisions, although Texas may not be embraced in the Act of Congress.

Messrs. W. G. Hale and C. Robinson, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff claimed in the district court a league of land in the County of Fayette, originally granted by the Mexican Government to William H. Jack, and which was in the possession of the defendants. His title consists of a record of a suit in one of the district courts of Texas, in favor of Bremond and Van Alstyne against a number of persons associated under the name of the German Emigration Company, founded upon notes and bills of the Company, dated in the years 1846 and 1847, and upon which judgment was recovered in 1852.

An execution was issued upon this judgment, and a levy, sale and conveyance of the property in controversy were made in 1853, according to the exigency of the writ. The plaintiff was the purchaser at the sale. There was testimony conducing to prove that Von Roeder entered upon the land as the agent of the Company. The defendants, in their answer denied the sufficiency of this title, and pleaded that they had had adverse and peaceable possession of the land for more than five years under deeds duly registered, and had paid taxes thereon ; and also that they had possessed the land peaceably for more than three years, under title or color of title, derived from the sovereign authority, thus claiming the benefit of the 15th and 16th secs. of the Act of Limitations. Hartley's Dig., arts. 2391, 2392.

The title exhibited on the trial by the defendants consisted of a deed purporting to be made by the German Emigration Company, through an attorney, Gustavus Dressell, in the year 1848, in favor of the defendant, Von Roeder, in which this and other property was conveyed to him, and deeds from Von Roeder to the co-defendants dated in 1850, and that the defendants had had adverse possession under them. There was not five years from the date of the deed to Von Roeder to the commencement of the suit, and there was no testimony to show in what manner the German Emigration Company had become entitled to the property. No conveyance from William H. Jack, the original grantee, was produced either to the Company or to the defendants. Thus, the pleas of the Statute of Limitations were not proved. The plaintiff's counsel requested the court to instruct the jury that there is no documentary evidence, title, or color of title, to support these pleas of the defendants. The court declined to advise the jury as requested, but after informing them of the nature of the title and possession that would support such pleas, directed the jury to inquire whether the defendants had adduced sufficient evidence to sustain them. The entire case, in so far as such pleas were concerned, was contained in written documents and undisputed facts. It is the duty of the court to determine the competency of evidence, and to decide all legal questions that arise in the progress of a trial and, consequently, when, assuming that all the testimony adduced by the one or the other party is true, it does or does not support his issue, its duty is to declare this clearly and directly. Whether there be any evidence is a question for the judge; whether there be sufficient evidence is for the jury.

Company of Carpenters v. Haywood, 1 Doug., 385; Jewell v. Parr, 18 C. B., 909.

The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury as requested, and in submitting the decision of questions when there was no evidence to raise them. The defendants having introduced their title, the plaintiff proposed to produce testimony of a variety of circumstances, to show that the possession of the property by Von Roeder was collusive and fraudulent, and that the deed was made to him with the intent to defraud and delay the creditors of the German Emigration Company, who were insolvent.

The court overruled this attempt of the plaintiff, and excluded all testimony to establish fraud or collusion. The Statute of the 13th Elizabeth concerning Fraudulent Conveyances has been adopted in Texas. The Supreme Court of that State have decided that when a deed is a mere pretense, collusively devised, and the parties do not intend other than an ostensible change of the property, the property does not pass as to creditors ; and even when the parties intend an irrevocable disposition of the property, but the conveyance has been made with the intent to defraud creditors, that the conveyance is void.

Baldwin v. Peet, 22 Tex., 708.

This decision conforms to the current doctrine relative to the just construction of this statute. The plaintiff proposed to prove that the deed to Von Roeder was fraudulent within the meaning of the Act. The bills and notes upon which the judgment was founded were filed as part of the record, and are certified with the judgment of the district court.

These show that the plaintiffs in the suit were creditors at the date of the conveyance to Von Roeder, and within the protection of the Statute of Frauds.

Without considering the particular testimony offered, it is our opinion that the district court erred in refusing to receive evidence to impeach the deed for fraud.

The plaintiff objected to the introduction of the deed to Von Roeder as testimony, because it was not shown that there was such a Corporation as the German Association, and because a letter of attorney to Dressell was not exhibited. The deed was admissible, because it appeared that the defendants held their possession under it. But whether it was sufficient evidence of title in the German Emigration Company, or of transfer to the defendants, were questions which it was competent to the court to determine in its instructions to the jury. It appears from the charge that the decision of the court was favorable to the plaintiff. He, consequently, has no cause for complaint upon his exceptions to the competency of the evidence.

For the errors we have noticed, the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

ROBERT GUE, Appt.,

v.

THE TIDE WATER CANAL COMPANY.

(See S. C., 24 How., 257–264.)

Franchise cannot be sold on execution—remedy of single creditor of corporation, to sell its property and franchises, is in chancery.

A franchise being an incorporeal hereditament, cannot, upon the settled principles of the common law, be seized under a fieri facias.

It would be against the principles of equity to allow a single creditor to destroy the value of the property of the stockholders, by dissevering from the franchise, property which was essential to its useful existence.

If the appellant has a right to enforce the sale of the whole property, including the franchise, his remedy is in a court of chancery, where the rights and priorities of all the creditors may be considered and protected, and the property of the Corporation disposed of to the best advantage, for the benefit of all concerned.

A court of common law, from the nature of its jurisdiction and modes of proceeding, is incapable of accomplishing this object.

The circuit court was right in granting an injunction against the sale.

Argued Jan. 9, 1861. Decided Jan. 21, 1861.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Maryland.

Gue, the appellant, having, on request, furnished work and materials for the construction of the tide water canal, recovered a judgment against the Company on the 12th of November, 1849. A scire facias to revive this judgment was sued out Nov. 1, 1855, and resulted in a fiat on the first Monday of April, 1856, and thereupon a fieri facias issued upon the judgment under which the Marshal of the District of Maryland levied upon and advertised for sale certain land lying around the canal basin and other property which, by agreement, is to be taken as the whole property of the Company in the State of Maryland.

To enjoin this sale, the Company filed its bill on the equity side of the court below, and an injunction was issued. Appellant put in his answer, and upon final hearing the injunction was made perpetual.

From this decree the present appeal is prosecuted.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. Mason Campbell and P. McLaughlin, for appellants.

After discussing certain questions not passed upon by the court, the counsel said: The last point is, whether the canal, from its peculiar character, with its appurtenances, can be taken in execution. It will be observed that the agreement admits that what has been levied on is not a part of the Company's property, but the whole of it, and the inquiry, therefore, is not as to any attempt to break up the work by detaching a fraction from the rest, but to sell it as a unit. It will be further observed that the Act of 1825, ch. 180, which defines the extent of the Company's powers and privileges in its 13th section, authorizing it to procure the necessary land for the canal and its works, either by agreement or condemnation, declares that the Company shall be seised of such land as of an absolute estate in perpetuity, or with such less quantity and duration of interest as may be required; and that by the deed of Dec. 28, 1841, the land levied on has been acquired and is held in fee, because the words of conveyance necessarily so import.

The question, then, is, whether land held in fee by a company for a canal and its appurtenances can be seized and sold, not by piecemeal, but so that the purchaser will take the land with the entire improvement as it stands.

See Tippets v. Walker, 4 Mass., 596; 13 Serg. & R., 212; Leedom v. Plymouth R. R. Co., 5 Watts & S., 265; Susquehannah Can. Co. v. Bonham, 9 Watts & S., 27; Macon R. R. Co. v. Parker, 9 Ga., 394; Seymour v. Milford and Chil. Turnpike Co., 10 Ohio, 476; 5 B. Mon., 1; Coe v. Hart, before Mr. Justice McLean, 6 Am. L. Reg., 42; State v. Rives, 5 Ire., 297; Arthur v. Comm. & R. R. Bank, 9 Sm. & M., 429.

The differing views in these cases make it difficult to say that there is any settled rule at common law, and throw us back on principle; and, so considered, it seems hard to escape the conclusion, that as, after all, a corporation is merely placed on a level with individuals, it cannot hold its property exempt from the payment of its debts. But, of course, a purchaser would take, not the corporate franchise, but the estate of the corporation in the land, and would take that estate of course as the corporation held it. Holding it in this case on the condition of allowing the public to use the canal on payment of certain fixed tolls, the same user on the terms would continue to exist after the sale as before.

Perhaps, however, the true view in which to regard this case is, to look at it as controlled by the law of Maryland and the analogies of that law. The element, which elsewhere seems to settle that a public improvement cannot be sold on execution, is its inalienability. If the Legislature will allow a voluntary assignment, the presumption of a prohibition against involuntary alienation falls to the ground. Act of Maryland of 1835, ch. 356, sec. 5, authorized the Company to raise money by a loan, and the court of appeals of that State in Susq. Bridge and Banking Co. v. Gen. Ins. Co., 3 Md., 311, decided it to be the law of Maryland, that the power in a corporation to borrow, carried with it the power to mortgage. But a power to mortgage necessarily involves a sale as a possible result; and if, therefore, in the present instance, the General Assembly of Maryland have authorized the Company to part with its land and canal, it cannot be said that any public policy forbids a sale on execution.

Mr. George W. Dobbin, for appellee:

The property levied upon is not properly the subject of a levy and sale under a fieri facias.

The levy was made on the locks of the canal, its toll-house or collector's office, and the lands surrounding the outlet locks, necessary to the uses and working of the canal. It must, therefore, be something other than the canal itself, and it is obviously intended to apply to that part of the thing levied upon which is not visibly a part of the canal; that is, the land which the marshal in his levy calls wharf property and building lots, &c., all of which are admitted to be necessary for the uses and workings of the Tide Water Canal.

The appellee will contend that it possesses only an easement acquired for the purposes of its incorporation, connected with the franchise of taking toll from the public for the use of that easement, and that the said easement and franchise are not subject to levy and sale under a fieri facias;

Ammant v. New Alexandria and Pittsburg Turnpike Co., 13 Serg. & R., 210; Leedom v. Plymouth R. R. Co., 5 Watts & S., 265; Susquehannah Can. Co. v. Bonham, 9 Watts & S., 27; Seymour v. Milford & Chil. T. R. Co., 10 Ohio, 476; Winchester and Lex. Turn. Co. v. Vimont, 5 B. Mon., 1; Coe v. Hart, 6 Am. L. That even if a portion of the property levied upon is liable to sale, the levy having blended it with that which is not liable, is void for the whole.

Ammant v. New Alexandria and Pittsburg Turnpike Co., 13 Serg. & R., 210.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the record in this case that a judgment was obtained by Robert Gue, the appellant, against the Tide Water Canal Company, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, upon which he issued a fieri facias, and the marshal seized and advertised for sale a house and lot, sundry canal locks, a wharf, and sundry other lots; all of which property, it is admitted, belonged to to the Canal Company in fee.

The Canal Company thereupon filed their bill in the circuit court, praying an injunction to prohibit the sale of this property under the fieri facias. The injunction was granted, and afterwards, on final hearing, made perpetual. And from this decree the present appeal was taken.

The Tide Water Canal is a public improvement situated in the State of Maryland, and constructed and owned by a joint stock Company chartered by the State of Maryland for that purpose. The canal extends from Havre de Grace, in Maryland, to the Pennsylvania line; and it is admitted that the property levied on is necessary for the uses and working of the canal.

Upon the matters alleged in the bill and answer, several questions of much interest and importance have been raised by the respective parties and discussed in the argument here. But we do not think it necessary to decide them, nor to refer to them particularly, because, if it should be held that this property is liable to be sold by a judicial proceeding for the payment of this debt, yet it would be against equity and unjust to the other creditors of the Corporation, and to the corporators who own the stock, to suffer the property levied on to be sold under this fi. fa. and, consequently, the circuit court was right in granting the injunction.

The Tide Water Canal is a great thoroughfare of trade, through which a large portion of the products of the vast region of country bordering on the Susquehanna River usually passes, in order to reach tide water and a market. The whole value of it to the stockholders consists in a franchise of taking toll on boats passing through it, according to the rates granted and prescribed in the Act of Assembly which created the Corporation. The property seized by the marshal is, of itself, of scarcely any value apart from the franchise of taking toll, with which it connected, in the hands of the Company, and if sold under this fieri facias without the franchise, would bring scarcely anything; but would yet, as it is essential to the working of the canal, render the property of the Company in the franchise, now so valuable and productive, utterly valueless.

Now, it is very clear that the franchise or right to take toll on boats going through the canal would not pass to the purchaser under this execution. The franchise being an incorporeal hereditament, cannot, upon the settled principles of the common law, be seized under a fieri facias. If it can be done in any of the States, it must be under a statutory provision of the State; and there is no statute of Maryland changing the common law in this respect. Indeed, the marshal's return and the agreement of the parties shows it was not seized, and consequently, if the sale had taken place, the result would have been to destroy utterly the value of the property owned by the Company, while the creditor himself would, most probably, realize scarcely anything from these useless canal locks, and lots adjoining them.

The record and proceedings before us show that there were other creditors of the Corporation to a large amount, some of whom loaned money to carry on the enterprise. And it would be against the principles of equity to allow a single creditor to destroy a fund to which other creditors had a right to look for payment, and equally against the principles of equity to permit him to destroy the value of the property of the stockholders, by dissevering from the franchise, property which was essential to its useful existence.

In this view of the subject, the court do not deem it proper to express any opinion as to the right to this creditor, in some other form of judicial proceeding, to compel the sale of the whole property of the Corporation, including the franchise, for the payment of his debt. Nor do we mean to express any opinion as to the validity or operation of the deeds of trust and Acts of Assembly of the State of Maryland, referred to in the proceedings. If the appellant has a right to enforce the sale of the whole property, including the franchise, his remedy is in a court of chancery, where the rights and priorities of all the creditors may be considered and protected, and the property of the Corporation disposed of to the best advantage, for the benefit of all concerned. A court of common law, from the nature of its jurisdiction and modes of proceeding, is incapable of accomplishing this object; and the circuit court was right in granting the injunction, and its decree is, therefore, affirmed.

Powers of corporation—person dealing with, cannot set up irregularities in organization.

The defendants were made a Corporation by the charter, the persons named in it constituting the corporate body, clothed with the powers and privileges conferred upon it, and were capable of taking and holding real estate.

If some irregularities occured in the organization of the Company, inasmuch as no act made a condition precedent to the existence of the Corporation has been omitted, or its non-performance shown, a party dealing with the Company is not permitted to set up the irregularity.

The courts are bound to regard it as a Corporation, so far as third persons are concerned, until it is dissolved by a judicial proceeding on behalf of the government that created it.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

This was an action of enjectment brought in the court below, by the plaintiffs in error, against the present defendant in error.

The trial resulted in a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff brought the case to this court by writ of error.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Benjamin Howard Shackelford, Henry Winter Davis, and J. R. Partridge, for plantiffs in error:

The plaintiffs in error will insist:

1. That the Act of Assembly of Feb. 24, 1845, did not create the Frostburg Coal Company a body corperate.

2. The proceeding of the parties named in that Act have not sufficed in law to constitute them a body corporate under the law of Maryland.

3. That there was, therefore, no corporate body in law competent to take by the name of the Frostburg Coal Company on the 13th March, 1845, nor at any time thereafter during the life of Isaiah Frost, the ancestor of plantiff, and therefore,

4. That the instrument in writing relied on by the defendants for their title, purporting to be a deed from said Isaiah Frost to the Frostburg Coal Company, dated 13th March, 1845, was never operative as a deed, but was void for want of a grantee competent to take.

5. That neither the said Isaiah Frost nor the plantiffs, are or can be estopped by said deed, or by any act mentioned in the record from claiming the lands in controversy.

The existence of the Company was not proved by the subscription and distribution of stock and organization in pursuance of the law. Several things are here required to be done.

1. The capital stock of 5,000 shares at $100 each must all be taken.

2. The lands and minerals of Messrs. Frost and McKaig were to be subscribed.

3. Other persons were to be associated with them by subscriptions of stock payable in money.

4. It requires more than five stockholders to organize.

5. The stock must not be subscribed for or distributed in illegal proportions.

It is a well settled principle of the law of corporations that organization must be in pursuance of the charter.

A charter is a voluntary grant from the Legislature, imposing no obligation unless accepted, and leaving it discretionary with the individuals interested to organize or not. As a condition precedent to the existence of a corporation, it must organize in pursuance of the terms of its charter.

An incorporated company is precisely such as the incorporation Act makes it, derives its power from that Act, is capable of exercising them only in the manner authorized by it.

Conditions precedent must be fairly complied with.

From the nature of things, the artificial person must be created before it can be capable of taking anything.

When the corporation is to be brought into existence by some future acts of the corporators, the franchises remain in abeyance until such acts are done.

4 Wheat., 518.

The counsel then reviewed the evidence, and endeavored to show that the corporators in this case had not perfected an organization in accordance with the charter and the general law.

Messrs. George A. Pearre and William Price, for defendant in error:

There was a corporate body, the Frostburg Coal Company in existence on the 13th of March, 1845, capable of taking this land by deed. This Corporation is complete as a corporate body by the terms of the charter itself, as soon as accepted by the corporators.

There is nothing in the charter which prevents the Corporation from having an existence until any given amount of stock is subscribed, either in land or money, and in the absence of such a restriction, may go into operation before the whole or any given quantity of the capital stock is subscribed.

Ang. & Ames, Corp., 111, 112, ch. 5, sec. 1; 1 Pet., 46.

Even if the Act of 1838, ch, 267, applies, and any of the causes of forfeiture declared by the 15th section of that Act have occurred, yet these are causes for which the State herself, through her judicial tribunals, may declare the charter forfeited. The Company was not notified by an action of ejectment at the suit of private persons, to be prepared to show it has not violated its charter. Until the state forfeits the charter, the franchise continues.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The action in the court below was an ejectment brought by the heirs of Isaiah Frost, to recover the possession of a tract of land situated in the County of Allegany, Maryland. The defense set up was a conveyance of the land by their ancestor to the defendants. The only question in the case is, whether or not the Frostburg Coal Company was capable of taking and holding real estate at the date of the deed, the 13th March, 1845.

The court charged the jury, if they found that Mechack Frost, Isaiah Frost, Thomas J. McKaig and William W. McKaig, the parties named in the Act of Incorporation of 1845, accepted the charter, and proceeded to act as a corporate body under it, by the name of the Frostburg Coal Company, opened their coal mines, transported the coal to market, borrowed money on the credit of the Company, and made large and costly improvements on the lands in controversy, during all which time Isaiah Frost, the ancestor, acted as one of the directors; and further found, that the said Frost executed and delivered to the Company the deed of the 13th March, 1845, given in evidence, they must find a verdict for the defendants.

The Act of Incorporation, which was passed February 24, 1845, provided that Mechack Frost. Isaiah Frost, Thomas J. McKaig, and William W. McKaig, and such other persons as may be associated with them in the manner afterwards provided, shall be, and they are hereby incorporated and made a body politic and corporate, by the name of the Frostburg Coal Company, and by that name shall have succession, &c., conferring the usual corporate power for the manufacture of iron, and mining of coal, and for transporting the same to market; and among others, the power to purchase and hold all such property, real, personal and mixed, as the Company may require for the purposes aforesaid.

The 2d section provided, that the capital stock of the Company should consist of five thousand shares of $100 each, for which the lands and mines of Mechack Frost, Isaiah Frost, Thomas J. McKaig and William W. McKaig, on one part, and those who may associate with them and constitute the aforesaid subscription for stock, payable in money, on the other part.

The 3d section provided, that the subscriptions to the capital stock should be made at such places, and in such manner, as should be designated by the four persons above named, and that the shareholders of one or more shares of stock should be members of the Corporation, and entitled to one vote for each share so held; and making the shares assignable and transferable, as may be provided in the by-laws of the Company.

The 4th section provided, that the affairs of the Company should be managed by a president and four directors, to be chosen by the stockholders, to serve one year, and till others shall be elected; and until the first election of directors shall be held, the said Mechack Frost, Isaiah Frost, Thomas J. McKaig, and William W. McKaig, shall have full power and authority to exercise all the corporate powers of the said Company, &c.

The 5th section provided, that a general meeting of the stockholders should be held as soon as the Company is organized, and annually thereafter, on the first Monday of June in each year, for the election of directors, and to consult upon the business of the Company.

On the 12th March, 1845, the associates met in pursuance of the authority given in the 3d section of the Act, at which meeting the whole number of shares, constituting the capital stock, were subscribed, and the Company proceeded to the election of the president and four directors, the number required by the charter for the ensuing year; and at the same time, directed that the secretary should procure deeds to the Company for the lands, which should constitute part of the capital stock. And on the 21st of the month, the Board met, and provided for the issuing of certificates of the capital stock to each stockholder.

It was in pursuance of the resolution of the 12th March, that the deed of Isaiah Frost, the ancestor of the lessors of the plaintiff, was executed. This deed contained some four hundred and sixty-four acres of land, which, together with several parcels conveyed by Mechack Frost, another of the stockholders, dated on the same day, and adjoining the former tract, embraced the coal mines of the Company for the working of which it was incorporated.

The Company immediately commenced preparations for opening the mines, and for transporting the coal to market, by constructing rail and tram roads leading into the mines, erecting buildings for the accommodation of the workmen, together with other necessary improvements, at an expense of some $15,000; also, a large amount of coal had been taken out of the mines, and sent to the market; all of which was done during the lifetime of Isaiah Frost, and while he was one of the most active and efficient directors, and all or nearly all of said fixtures and improvements had been made upon the parcel of land in question, and for which he had received stock. He was the largest stockholder but one in the Company, and had dealt in the stock, by pledging it for money borrowed.

As we have already said, the main ground relied upon, on behalf of the heirs, to avoid the deed to the defendants, is the failure to organize under the charter, so as to constitute them a corporation capable of taking and holding real estate. It is supposed that there are some conditions precedent to the existence of the corporation which have not been performed, and that the Act, of its own force, did not constitute them a corporate body. But a slight reference to the charter will show that the position is a mistaken one. The 1st section declares, that the four persons, and such others as may be associated with them, shall be, and are hereby incorporated and made a body politic and Corporate, by the name of the Frostburg Coal Company; and then confers upon it the usual powers belonging to a corporation, and among others, to purchase and hold real estate for the purposes of the Company; and in the 4th section declares, that until the first election of directors shall be held, the four persons named shall have full power and authority to exercise all the corporate powers of the Company. The charter took effect immediately on its acceptance by the persons named, and the subsequent steps, such as the subscription of the stock, procurement of the coal lands, elections of the directors, of the president and secretary, passing by-laws, &c., were steps taken in perfecting the organization, and enabling it to use the powers and privileges conferred for the purposes for which they were granted.

It was supposed, in the argument, that the words, "and such other persons as may be associated," &c., in connection with the four persons named in the 1st section, imported that other persons must be associated with the four before the charter could take effect; but, if any doubt could be raised upon the language of the 1st section, the 4th removes it, as there the power and authority to exercise all the corporate powers of the Company is expressly conferred upon the four persons, until the first election of directors. These corporate powers are not only conferred upon the four persons named, but are continued until their successors are appointed to take their places. The true meaning of the words referred to in the 1st section probably is, that a privilege was intended to be given to the Company of uniting other associates with the four in the enterprise, if they so elected.

The same observation is also applicable to the 2d section, which declares that the capital stock shall consist of 5,000 shares of $100 each, of which the lands of the four persons named in the 1st section may be one part, and those who may associate with them, and constitute the Corporation by subscription for stock, payable in money, the other. The charter does not provide that any given amount or portion of the stock shall be in land, or in money, and the true construction probably is, that the whole of it may have been payable in money.

The language of the section would seem to confer upon the four persons the privilege of paying their shares of stock by the conveyance of land, rather than imposing it upon them as an obligation. This is the construction of the charter under which the Company has acted, as the subscription for the shares is a moneyed subscription. The land was purchased from two of the principal subscribers, by the Company, at a valuation which was applicable to their subscriptions. They would be liable to the Company for the balance of their stock, as would the other subscribers for the whole amount of theirs.

The subscription of the stock was in form for a given number of shares; but as each share was fixed by the charter at $100, the amount each was liable for to the Company was readily ascertained, and it is well settled that a subscription in this form is as obligatory as if had been in money. 14 Wend., 20.

The 9th section of the charter provides, that the Corporation shall be subject to all the restrictions imposed by the General Act of 1838, regulating incorporations for manufacturing and mining companies. The 15th section of this Act provides that when over four fifths of the capital stock of the Company to which the Act applies shall become concentrated, by purchase or otherwise, in the hands of less than five persons, &c., all the corporate powers and privileges granted shall cease and determine. And it is insisted, that the stock of this Company, at the time of its organization, was held in violation of this section of the general Act. Although the 9th section of the charter subjected the Company of the general Act, yet the provision is to be construed as subject only, when not inconsistent with the express provisions of the charter: and in this view, the better opinion, we think, is, that this four fifths provision does not apply. But whether it does or not, it is unimportant to determine; for, conceding that it does, a private party cannot take advantage of the forfeiture. That is a question for the sovereign power, which may waive it, or enforce it, at its pleasure. 9 Wend., 382; 4 Den., 397.

Without pursuing the case further, the main ground upon which we intend to place the judgment of the court is, that the defendants were made a Corporation by the charter, the persons named in it constituting the corporate body, clothed with the powers and privileges conferred upon it, and were capable of taking and holding real estate; and second, even if it were otherwise, and some irregularities occurred in the organization of the Company, inasmuch as no act made a condition precedent to the existence of the Corporation has been omitted, or its non-performance shown, a party dealing with the Company is not permitted to set up the irregularity. The courts are bound to regard it as a Corporation, so far as third persons are concerned, until it is dissolved by a judicial proceeding on behalf of the government that created it. Angell & Ames, sec. 774, and cases referred to.

GEORGE PAGE.

Patents, when claim is not new—notice of witnesses.

Where there is a defect both in the specification and in the claim for a patent, and the former does not distinguish the new parts from the old, and the latter, instead of claiming the old parts, should have excluded them, and claimed the new, by which the old were adapted to the new use, producing the new result; held, there is nothing new in this combination.

In defendant's notice of witnesses, notice of the time when the person possessed the knowledge of use of the invention is not required; the name of the person, and his residence, and the place where it has been used, are sufficient.

Submitted Dec. 17, 1860. Argued Jan. 28, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York.

This was an action brought by George Page against William H. Phillips in the court below, for an alleged infringement of certain letters patent granted to said Page, July 16. 1841, for a new and useful improvement in the circular saw mill.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant brought the case to this court by writ of error.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Charles M. Keller, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Reverdy Johnson and John H. B. Latrobe, for the defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court for the Northern District of New York.

The suit was brought in the court below by Page, the defendant in error, to recover damages for the infringement of a patent for certain improvements in the construction of the portable circular saw-mill. After describing minutely the different parts, and manner of constructing the machine, with drawings annexed, and also the use and operation of the respective parts, the patentee sets forth the particular portion of the construction which he claims as his own, as follows:

"I claim the manner of affixing and guiding the circular saw, by allowing end play to its shaft, in combination with the means of guiding it (the saw) by friction rollers, embracing it near its periphery, so as to leave its center entirely unchecked laterally. I do not claim the use of friction rollers, embracing and guiding the edge of a circular saw, as these have been previously used for that purpose: but I limit my claim to their use, in combination with a saw having free lateral play at its center."

Evidence was given on the part of the defendant, in the course of the trial, tending to prove that, long before the time of granting the plaintiff's patent, and before the date of his invention, machines for sawing shingles from short blocks of timber, and sawing lath and blinds for windows, with circular saws, varying in size from ten to thirty inches in diameter, had been in public use; in which machines the circular saw was guided by means of guide pins, embracing it (the saw) near the periphery, and its shaft having end play, and being entirely unchecked laterally; but it did not appear that such machines had been used in a saw-mill for sawing timber, or in a mill, or a machine of a size or character adapted to the sawing of ordinary logs, or other large unsawed timbers.

When the evidence closed, the defendant's counsel prayed the court to charge the jury, that according to the true construction of the patent, the claim is for the manner of affixing and guiding the circular saw, by allowing end play to its shaft, in combination with the means of guiding it by friction rollers, embracing it near its periphery, so as to leave its center entirely unchecked laterally.

But the court refused so to charge, and instructed the jury that the claim was limited to the manner of affixing and guiding the circular saw, by allowing end play to its shaft, in combination with the means of guiding it by friction rollers, embracing it near its periphery, so as to leave its center unchecked laterally, in a saw mill capable of being applied to the sawing of ordinary logs.

And in refusing another prayer, the court charged, that in order to defeat the plaintiff's patent by the use of prior machines of this construction, they must have been machines for the purposes of sawing in mills of a size and character adapted to the sawing of ordinary logs.

There can be no doubt but that the improvements of the patentee in the manner of constructing the portable circular saw-mill described in his specification were designed to adapt it to the sawing of logs in a saw-mill, and which could be carried from place to place, and put into operation by the use of horse power; and it may very well be, if he had set up in his claim the improvements or particular changes in the construction of the old machine, so as to enable him to adapt it to the new use, and one to which the old had not and could not have been applied without these changes, the patent might have been sustained. The utility is not questioned, and, for aught there appears in the case, such improvements were before unknown, and the circular saw-mill for sawing logs, the first put in successful operation.

But no such claim is set up by the patentee: nor does he distinguish in the description of the parts of the machine, nor in any other way, the old from the new, or those parts which he has invented or added in its adaptation to the use of sawing logs, not before found in the old machine for sawing shingles, blinds for windows, and other light materials. On the contrary, his claim is for the precise organization of the old machine, namely: the manner of affixing and guiding the circular saw, by allowing end play to its shaft, in combination with the means of guiding it by friction rollers, embracing it near to its periphery, so as to leave its center entirely unchecked laterally. There is nothing new in this combination. It had long been known and used in the circular saw for sawing timbers of smaller dimensions than an ordinary saw-log. Nor does the enlargement of the organization of the machine compared with the old one (the same being five feet in diameter, and the other parts corresponding) afford any ground, in the sense of the patent law, for a patent. This is done every day by the ordinary mechanic in making a working machine from the patent model.

The patentee in the present case must carry his improvements farther, in order to reach invention; he must contrive the means of adapting the enlarged old organization to the new use, namely: the sawing of saw-logs, and claim, not the old parts, but the new device, by which he has produced the new results.

The learned judge, by interpolating the new purpose of the improvement, namely: the sawing of logs, not only inserted what was not specified in the claim; but, if it had been, it would not have helped out the difficulty, as it was in effect, upon the construction given, simply applying an old organization to a new use, which is not a patentable subject.

The defect here is both in the specification and in the claim. The former does not distinguish the new parts from the old, nor is there anything in the specification by which they can be distinguished; and the latter, instead of claiming the old parts, should have excluded them, and claimed the new by which the old were adapted to the new use, producing the new result.

We are also of opinion that the court below erred in rejecting the evidence of the witness as to the prior knowledge and use of the improvement of the patentee.

The 15th section of the Patent Law provides, that when the defendant relies in his defense on the fact of a previous invention, knowledge, or use of the thing patented, he shall give notice of the names and places of residence of those whom he intends to prove possessed the prior knowledge, and where the same was used.

In this case the notice stated that Hiram Davis, who resides at Fitchburg, Massachusetts, had knowledge of the said improvement, and of the use thereof at that place, during the years 1836, 1837, 1838, &c., and that he resided there.

The court, on objection, refused to allow a witness to prove the use of the improvement, by Davis prior to the year 1836 at Fitchburg, holding that the notice limited it within that time.

Notice of the time when the person possessed the knowledge or use of the invention is not required by the Act; the name of the person, and of his place of residence, and the place where it has been used, are sufficient.

The time, therefore, was not material; nor could it have misled the plaintiff, as he had the name and place of residence of the person, and also the place where the improvement had been used.

With this information of the nature and ground of the defense, the plaintiff was in possession of all the knowledge enabling him to make the necessary preparation to rebut, that the defendant possessed to sustain it.

Judgment reversed and venire.

WILLIAM A. HALL, Plff. in Er.,
v.
JOSEPH L. PAPIN.

(See S. C. 24 How., 132-147.)

Peoria lots—Act of March 3, 1823—Survey necessary to a title—only one claim could be made.

The Act of 3d March, 1823, in regard to the Village of Peoria, can only embrace lots in the new village or others appertaining to it.

The first section of the Act gave to the claimant an incipient or inchoate right to a lot, when, in conformity with the second section of the Act, a survey had been made of the several lots reported by the Register, with a designation or a plat of the lot confirmed and set apart to each claimant.

When that had been done, the claimant became a confirmee under the Act, and his right to the lot, as between himself and the United States, was complete.

The law was intended to grant the lot settled upon and improved, and no other land described as an equivalant.

No location of the lots could be made after a patent for them had been issued by the United States.

The inchoate right of the claimant under the Act was subject to a survey and designation before it could be matured into a title.

Under the Act the claimant was to have one confirmation of "a lot so settled and improved," which had been claimed and entered in the report of the register.

No claimant, though he made several claims, could, after having had one of them confirmed, transfer any right of property in the others to any persons whatever.

No one could be confirmed in more than ten acres of Peoria claims.

Argued Jan. 11, 1861. Decided Jan. 28, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

This was an action of ejectment commenced in the court below, by the present defendant in error.

The first trial resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff. A new trial was ordered, and judgment again entered for the plaintiff.

The defendant below brought the case to this court by writ of error.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. O. H. Browning, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Walter Merriman and M. Blair, for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for the recovery of ten acres of land, which is admitted by the parties to be a part of the northwest quarter of section three, in township eight, north; of range eight, east, of the fourth principal meridan, in the district of lands subject to sale, formerly at Springfield, Illinois, and afterwards at Quincy.

Upon the trial below, the plaintiff gave in evidence: 1st, the Act of Congress of May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. at L., 605), entitled, an Act for the relief of the inhabitants of the Village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois; 2d, the Act of 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786); 3d, the report of Edward Coles, in the 3d vol. State Papers, page 421; 4th, the special and general plat and field notes of the survey of the village, made May 11, 1837, approved September 1, 1841, and approved by the surveyor of public lands in Illinois and Missouri; 5th, the deed of lot 13 by Bartholomew Fortier and his wife, Angelica, to plaintiff, September 23, 1854; 6th, depositions showing that Angelica was the only representative of Francis Willette, and that, when she made her claim before J. W. Coles, she was the wife of Louis Pilette, and that she married Fortier in 1838.

The defendant below, here the plaintiff in error, introduced in evidence a patent from the United States to Seth and Josiah Fulton, dated March 18, 1837, a preemption certificate of the same, laid July 11, 1838, and a conveyance by the Fultons to him of the land covered by the patent dated the 11th July, 1838. The patentees, Seth and Josiah Fulton, had lived upon the quarter section for several years before their entry was made, and Hall, also, had occupied the quarter section for some years before the Fultons sold to him. Also, a patent from the United States to the representatives of Francis Willette, for a lot which had been claimed by them under the Act of the 3d March, 1823, and sundry depositions, which it is not necessary for us to notice in this opinion.

The defendant in error, Joseph L. Papin, claims the ten acres sued for in virtue of his purchase from Bartholomew Fortier, and Angelica, his wife, she being the sole representative of her father, and had claimed the land under the Act of Congress of the 15th May, 1820 (3 Stat. at Large, 605), and that of the 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at Large, 786).

The first of these Acts declares that "every person, or the legal representatives of any person, who claims a lot or lots in the Village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois, shall, on or before the first day of October next, deliver to the Register of the Land Office for the District of Edwardsville, a notice in writing of his or her claim, and it shall be the duty of the Register to make to the Secretary of the Treasury a report of all claims filed with him, with the substance of the evidence in support thereof; and also his opinion, and such remarks respecting the claim as he may think proper to make; which report, with a list of claims which, in the opinion of the Register, ought to be confirmed, shall be laid by the Secretary of the Treasury before Congress for their determination." Under this Act, claims were made by Louis Pilette in right of his wife, Angelica, the daughter of Francis Willette, and they appear in the Register's report, dated the 10th November, 1820, entered as Nos. 11, 12 and 13. That report, however, was not finally acted upon by Congress until the 3d March, 1823. (3 Stat. at L., 786). The 1st section of that Act declares, "there is hereby granted to each of the French and Canadian inhabitants, and other settlers of the Village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois, whose claims are contained in a report made by the Register of the Land Office at Edwardsville, in pursuance of the Act of Congress approved May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. at L., 605), and who had settled a lot in the village aforesaid prior to the 1st day of January, 1813, and who have not heretofore received a confirmatory claim or donation of any tract of land or village lot from the United States, the lot so settled upon and improved, where the same shall not exceed two acres; and where the same shall exceed two acres, every such claimant shall be confirmed in a quantity not exceeding ten acres: Provided, nothing in this Act contained shall be so construed as to affect the right, if any such there be, of any other person or persons to the said lots, or any part of them, derived from the United States, or any other source whatever, or be construed as a pledge on the part of the United States to make good any deficiency occasioned by any other interfering claim or claims." And it was made the duty of the Surveyor of the Public Lands of the United States for that district, to cause a survey to be made of the several lots, and to designate in a plat thereof the lots confirmed and set apart to each claimant, and forward the same to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause patents to be issued in favor of such claimants, as in other cases.

The land sued for is described in the declaration as an out-lot or field of ten acres, near the old Village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois, confirmed to Louis Pilette in right of his wife, Angelica, the daughter of the late Francis Willette, by the Act of Congress of the 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat at L., 786), entitled "An Act to confirm certain lots in the Village of Peoria, it being claim No. 13 of the report made by the Register of the Land Office at Edwardsville, in pursuance of an Act of Congress of the 15th May, 1820" (3 Stat. at L., 605). The lot is claimed in the report of the Register as an out-lot or field, containing fifteen or twenty arpents of land, situated three-fourths of a mile northeaswardly (northwestwardly) from the Village of Peoria. There can be no uncertainty whether the old or new village was meant, as the survey establishes it to have been near the old; and in our consideration of the Act of the 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), our conclusion is, that that Act can only embrace lots in the new village, or others appertaining to it.

The old Village of Peoria was situated on the northwest shore of Lake Peoria, about one mile and a half above the lower extremity or outlet of the lake. The village had been established by Frenchmen at an early date, previous to the recollection of any one. About the years 1778, 1779, the first house was built on what was then called La Ville de Maillet, afterwards the new Village of Peoria, and afterwards known by the name of Fort Clark. It was situated about one mile and a half below the old village, immediately at the lower front or outlet of the lake. This situation was preferred on account of the water being better and the place more healthy than at the old village. In consequence the inhabitants gradually deserted the old village, and before the years 1796, 1797, had entirely abandoned it, and removed to the new village.

The inhabitants were generally Indian traders, hunters, and voyagers. They formed a link of connection between the French residing on the waters of the great lakes and the Mississippi River. From that happy facility of adapting themselves to their situation and associates for which the French are so remarkable, the inhabitants of Peoria generally lived in harmony with their savage neighbors. But about the year 1781, an apprehension of Indian hostilities induced them to abandon the new village. They returned to it, however, after the peace of 1783, between England and the United States and the powers which had engaged in our revolutionary war, and continued there until the autumn of the year 1812. Then they were forcibly removed from it and their village destroyed by a Captain Craig of the Illinois Militia, on the ground, it was said, that himself and his company had been fired upon in the night by Indians, while at anchor in their boats before the village, with whom Craig suspected the villagers to be on too intimate and friendly terms. Craig and his company were in the service of the United States. The inhabitants of Peoria settled there without any grant or permission from any government. Each person took such a portion of unoccupied land as he wished to occupy and cultivate; but as soon as he abandoned it, his right to the land ceased with his possession, and it reverted to its natural state. It was then liable to be improved and cultivated by any who thought proper to take possession. Sometimes a settler sold out his improvements before abandoning. That and the itinerant character of the inhabitants, account for the number of persons who claimed the same lot. As was usual in French villages, the lots in the village were small. They were large enough for houses, outhouses, and gardens, and in some instances, those who were able to do so cultivated what were known as out-lots or fields near to, but outside or beyond, the village. Those out-fields were of different sizes, depending upon the industry and means of persons to till them. The village lots, as contradistinguished from out-lots, contained generally the half of an arpent. Neither the old nor new village had ever been surveyed or occupied upon any fixed plan. Seventy claims were made under the Act of the 15th May, 1820 (3 Stat. a L., p. 605). They were returned on the report of the Register to the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 10th of November, 1826. In a little less than three years the Act of 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786) was passed. Coles' Report, Am. State Papers, 3 Land.

The narrative just given has an important bearing upon the construction of the Acts of 1820 (3 Stat. at L., 605), and 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786). It serves to show the locality of the Village of Peoria, for which those Acts were passed, the purposes to be accomplished, and the extent and conditions upon which a lot may be confirmed to a claimant who had settled and improved a lot in the village before the 1st day of January, 1813, and who had not before received a confirmation of claims, or donation of any tract of land or village lot from the United States, when the lot settled upon and improved did not exceed two acres; and when it did, to confirm to the claimant ten acres, subject to the proviso in the Act.

It was a gratuity to such settlers of a single lot in the village. Such was the 1st section of the Act of 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786). It gave to the claimant an incipient or inchoate right to a lot, when, in conformity with the 2d section of the Act, a survey had been made of the several lots reported by the Register, with a designation or a plat thereof of the lot confirmed and set apart to each claimant. When that had been done, the claimant became a confirmee under the Act and his right to the lot, as between himself and the United States, was complete. Such was the view taken by this court of the Acts of 15th May, 1820 (3 Stat. at L., 605), and of the 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), in Bryan v. Forsyth, 19 How., 336. Its language then was, when the survey was made, and the plats returned and approved and recorded by the Surveyor-General of Illinois and Missouri, and recognized as valid at the General Land Office, it bound the parties to it, the confirmee and the United States.

The law was intended to grant the lot settled upon and improved, and no other land described as an equivalent. But, in this instance, no survey was made in conformity with the 2d section of the Act until the 11th April, 1837. It was not examined and approved by the Surveyor of the Public Lands in Illinois and Missouri until the 1st September, 1840, seven years after Seth and Josiah Fulton had made their entry upon the quarter section, and three years after they had received their patent for it from the United States. The land was unconditionally sold to them. Hall, the plaintiff in error, bought from the Fultons in July, 1838. Under the decision of this court, already cited, no location of the out-lots could be made upon this quarter section after the patent had been issued to the Fultons. It follows, then, that there was no confirmation of the land sued for to the representative of Francis Willette; and consequently, that the quitclaim conveyance by Angelica Fortier and her husband, of the 23d September, 1854, to Papin, the defendant in error, gave to her no title to the ten acres for which he has sued. We have shown that the inchoate right of the claimant under the Act—supposing that no out-lot was meant to be confirmed—was subject to a survey and designation before it could be matured into a title. The requirement of a survey before a claimant could be considered as having a legal title to land upon a concession, has frequently been passed upon by this court; and the case before us is within that of Menard v. Massey, in 8 How., 309.

It now remains for us to consider two of the instructions which were asked by the defendant in the court below, which the court refused to give to the jury.

They were: if the jury believed from the evidence that the original French settlement or improvement, upon which the plaintiff's claim in this suit is based, was not upon or within the northwest quarter of section 3, in township 8 north, in range 8 east of the 4th meridian, nor located upon that quarter section by the United States Surveyor until after that was sold to the Fultons by the United States, that the jury were to find for the defendant.

The court did not give the first branch of the instructions asked, and in our opinion, rightly so; for there was no proof in the case to show that the French settlement, which was the basis of the suit, was not a part of it. Indeed, no such instruction would have been asked; for it was admitted by the parties that the tract sued for was a part of the quarter section described in the patent to the Fultons. But the court refused, also, the second branch of the prayer, which, in our opinion, should have been given, and gave the jury an instruction as follows: he told the jury that the Acts of Congress of 1820 and 1823, taken in connection with the report of the Register of the Land Office and the survey under the authority of law, vested in the parties entitled, under the Acts of Congress, with an absolute right of property in the lot surveyed; and that Angelica, the person named in the evidence, was the daughter and sole heir of her father, Francis Willette, the settler; that she was within the meaning of the law; and her claim being in the report, was confirmed by the Act of 1823.

And the jury was further instructed, that the survey of the claimed lots, as reported by the Register, was duly made and approved, because the survey for the purposes of this action made the title of the claimants, under the Acts of Congress, complete; and that the court was of the opinion that the persons taking under the patent of March 18th, 1837, and under the entry of July 11th, 1833, must be considered as taking their grant subject to the contingency of the better title which might thereafter be perfected under the Acts of 1820 and 1823; and when a party brought himself within those Acts, his title was the paramount title, notwithstanding the patent to the Fultons.

The defendant, in our view, had asked for such an instruction as he had a right to have under the authorities cited in a previous part of this opinion. The instruction given to the jury was erroneous.

The defendant had also asked in his second prayer, that the court would instruct the jury, if they believed from the evidence that by the plaintiff's recovering in this case the legal representatives of Willette would be confirmed in more than ten acres of Peoria French claims, that they were to find for the defendant. The prayer is inartificially drawn; but when taken in connection with the evidence in the case and the Act of 1823, its purport could not have been misunderstood. The object of the defendant was to get an instruction from the court, upon the evidence he had given, in conformity with the limitation in the Act, as to the quantity of land which could be confirmed to a claimant under it. It declares when the lot shall not exceed two acres, that it shall be confirmed; and when the same shall exceed two acres, that every such claimant shall be confirmed in a quantity not exceeding ten acres.

Pilette, the husband of Angelica, had filed in her behalf, in the year 1820, before the Register, claims for lots eleven, twelve and thirteen. The first, being the land numbered as number eleven, contained about one half of an arpent of land; number twelve the same quantity, situated directly in the rear of eleven, and separated from it by a street; number thirteen was a claim for an out-lot or field, containing fifteen or twenty acres of land, and situated about three fourths of a mile northeastwardly (northwestwardly) from the Village of Peoria; number eleven was also claimed before the Register by Felix Fontain, his claim being in the report No. 41; but it turned out, according to the survey, that both were for the same land, and that they covered the southwest part of Etienne Barnard's claim number 1, the northeast part of it being also covered by another claim of Felix Fontain, numbered in the survey as 42. For land so described, containing fifty four thousand eight hundred and ninety and fourteen hundreths of a square foot, designated as covered by the claim one, eleven, forty-one, and forty-two, a patent was issued by the United States to the representatives of Francis Willette, on the 28th August, 1845. That patent was introduced in evidence by the defendant below, the plaintiff in error. The purpose was to show that the heirs of Willette having already had one confirmation of "a lot settled and improved," under the Act of 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), that they were not entitled to another, or to any confirmation of the title to the land in litigation. If that were allowed, they would get more than the ten acres, to which every claimant was limited by the Act. Our construction of the Act is, that a claimant was to have one confirmation of "a lot so settled and improved," which had been claimed and entered in the report of the Register of the Land Office at Edwardsville, in pursuance of the Act of the 15th May, 1820 (3 Stat. at L., 605); that no claimant, though he shall appear in the Register's report as having made several claims, could, after having one of them confirmed, transfer any right of property in the others to any persons whatever.

Papin, the plaintiff below, took from the representatives of Willette a quitclaim conveyance for the land for which he sues on the 23d September, 1854—more than thirty years after the passage of the Act of the 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786); more than twenty years after the Fultons had made their entry upon the quarter section—eighteen years after they received their patent for it from the United States—seventeen after Hall had the land in possession by purchase from the Fultons, and ten years after the patent of confirmation to the representatives of Willette had been recorded in the General Land Office. Under these circumstances, Papin took a conveyance, which gave him no right to the land. When the plaintiff in error, Hall, asked the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed from the evidence that, by the plaintiff's recovery in this case, the legal representatives of Francis Willette will have been confirmed in more than ten acres of Peoria French claims, they were to find for the defendant, the prayer ought to have been apprehended by the court, according to its relation to the subject-matter in controversy, and such an instruction should have been given, accordingly, to the jury. The refusal, then, was error.

For the reasons given, we shall direct the judgment of the court below to be reversed; that a venire facias de novo shall be issued; and that the court, in its further proceedings in the cause thereon, conform to the rulings of this opinion.

JOHN C. ALMY, JR., Plff. in Er.,

v.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

(See S. C., 24 How., 169-175.)

State law, imposing duty on export of gold and silver, is unconstitutional.

Law of California, imposing a stamp tax on bills of lading for the transportation from any place in that State to any place without the State, of gold or silver coin, gold dust, or gold or silver in bars, or other form, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws."

The state tax in question is a duty upon the export of gold and silver, and consequently repugnant to said clause in the Constitution.

Argued Jan. 17, 1861. Decided Jan. 28, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Court of Sessions for the City and County of San Francisco, in the State of California.

John C. Almy, the plaintiff in error, was indicted under a law of the State of California, and convicted of misdemeanor in the Court of Sessions of the City and County of San Francisco.

The court of sessions being the highest court of California in which a decision could be had in this case, the question on the constitutionality of the statute, decided by that court, is brought before this court by writ of error.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Montgomery Blair, for plaintiff in error:

A bill of lading (as found by the jury) being invariably required for every shipment, and being from its nature and object indispensable, the question presented by the case, as to the right of a State to tax such instruments when used in commerce among the States, resolved itself into the question of the right of the States to tax such commerce. Against such right the principles settled by this court in the cases of McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 431; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 186; Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet., 447; the Passenger Cases, 7 How., 283, and others, are conclusive.

The provision of the Constitution, giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States, is a part of the same sentence giving to Congress the power over foreign commerce. The power being conferred by the same language is equally extensive, and accordingly the court added, in ruling Brown's case, that "the principles laid down in this case apply equally to importations from a sister State."

See, also, 2 Story, sec. 1062.

It is not essential to the argument, that the power claimed is capable of being exercised so as to destroy this commerce. It is sufficient if power is exercised over a matter relating to exterior commerce, and which, from its nature, ought to be regulated exclusively by the general government.

The law in question is also in violation of the provisions of the Constitution prohibiting the States from taxing exports; and the reasoning of the court in Brown's case is equally applicable to this branch of the case.

There is even less room for controversy here, as to the application of the prohibition, than in that case. Every export is taxed by an impost on the paper which represents it, and which is indispensable.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for defendant in error:

That a State has the power to levy taxes on everything within its own jurisdiction, unless prohibited from so doing by the Constitution of the United States, must, of course, be conceded.

10th Amendment to Constitution.

1. Levying a stamp tax is not "regulating commerce."

If the State had forbidden merchandise to be exported except when accompanied by a bill of lading, this would be a regulation of commerce. But the State has assumed no such power, and has in no just sense undertaken to regulate commerce.

It is now the settled doctrine of the court, that this power of regulating commerce is not exclusive, but may be exercised by the State concurrently with the General Government, whenever their action does not conflict with that of Congress; and Congress has not acted on the subject under discussion.

License Cases, 5 How., 504; Passenger Cases, 7 How., 283; Cooley v. Wardens of Phil., 12 How., 299.

2. Is a stamp tax on a bill of lading a duty on exports?

It is said to be an indirect tax on exports, because the jury have found that it was the usual and invariable custom to make and issue such bills of lading, &c., and "no vessel or steamer could practically fill up with or obtain freight," unless the master executes one.

It is submitted that the argument proves quite too much and, if once admitted, would inaugurate a most dangerous system of construction, under which all right of taxation might be taken away from a State, thus leaving it shorn of powers which were never intended to be abandoned, and which are absolutely indispensable to its existence.

Drays and carts are necessary for loading merchandise on board ships. Cannot a State tax drays and carts?

In Mobile harbor and many others, large vessels cannot load at all without the aid of lighters. Is the State of Alabama without power to tax lighters?

No man is, by the law in question, forbidden to ship his gold dust. He may accompany it. He may send an agent to take care of it; he may make a valid parol contract for its delivery abroad, and take twenty witnesses in order to retain the evidence of his contract; but if he wishes to reduce it to writing within the State, he must put his writing on a paper on which the State of California has levied a stamp tax.

It is worthy of notice that in the draft of the Constitution offered in Convention by Mr. Patterson, of New Jersey, there was an express authority in Congress to raise revenue "by stamps on paper, vellum or parchment."

1 Elliott's Debates, 175.

Yet, notwithstanding the fact that the attention of the Convention was thus specially directed to this precise tax, no attempt was made to inhibit its exercise by the States.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this case is upon the constitutionality of a law of California, imposing a stamp tax upon bills of lading.

By an Act passed by the Legislature of that State to provide a revenue for the support of the government from a stamp tax on certain instruments of writing, among other instruments mentioned in the law, a stamp tax was imposed on bills of lading for the transportation from any point or place in that State, to any point or place without the State, of gold or silver coin, in whole or in part, gold dust, or gold or silver, in bars or other form; and the law requires that there shall be attached to the bill of lading, or stamped thereon, a stamp or stamps, expressing in value the amount of such tax or duty.

By a previous law upon the same subject, it was made a misdemeanor, punishable by fine, to use any paper without a stamp, where the law required stamped paper to be used.

After the passage of these Acts, Almy, the plaintiff in error, being the master of the ship Ratler, then lying in the port of San Francisco, and bound to New York, received a quantity of gold dust for transportation to New York, for which he signed a bill of lading upon unstamped paper, and without having any stamp attached to it. For this disobedience to the law of California he was indicted in the court of sessions for a misdemeanor, and at the trial the jury found a special verdict setting out particularly the facts, of which the above is a brief summary; and upon the return of the verdict the counsel for the defendant moved for a judgment of acquittal, upon the ground that the law of California was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. But the court decided that the state law was not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and adjudged that Almy should pay a fine of $100 for this offense. And the Court of Sessions being the highest court of the State which had jurisdiction of the matter in controversy, this writ of error is brought to revise that judgment.

We think this case cannot be distinguished from that of Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419. That case was decided in 1827, and the decision has always been regarded and followed as the true construction of the clause of the Constitution now in question.

The case was this: the State of Maryland, in order to raise a revenue for state purposes, among other things required all importers of certain foreign articles and commodities enumerated in the law, or other persons selling the same by wholesale before they were authorized to sell, to take out a license, for which they should pay $50; and in case of refusal or neglect, should forfeit the amount of the license tax, and pay a fine of $100, to be recovered by indictment.

Brown, who was an importing merchant, residing in Baltimore, refused to pay the tax, and was thereupon indicted in the state court, which sustained the validity of the state law, and imposed the penalty therein prescribed. This judgment was removed to this court by writ of error, and it will be seen by the report of the case that it was elaborately argued on both sides, and the opinion of the court, delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, shows that it was carefully and fully considered by the court. And the court decided that this state law was a tax on imports, and that the mode of imposing it, by giving it the form of a tax on the occupation of importer, merely varied the form in which the tax was imposed, without varying the substance.

So in the case before us. If the tax was laid on the gold or silver exported, everyone would see that it was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, which, in express terms, declares that "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws."

But a tax or duty on a bill of lading, although differing in form from a duty on the article shipped, is in substance the same thing; for a bill of lading, or some written instrument of the same import, is necessarily always associated with every shipment of articles of commerce from the ports of one country to those of another. The necessities of commerce require it. And it is hardly less necessary to the existence of such commerce than casks to cover tobacco, or bagging to cover cotton, when such articles are exported to a foreign country; for no one would put his property into the hands of a shipmaster without taking written evidence of its receipt on board the vessel, and the purposes for which it was placed in his hands. The merchant could not send an agent with every vessel, to inform the consignee of the cargo what articles he had shipped, and prove the contract of the master if he failed to deliver them in safety. A bill of lading, therefore, or some equivalent instrument of writing, is invariably associated with every cargo of merchandise exported to a foreign country, and consequently a duty upon that is, in substance and effect, a duty on the article exported. And if the law of California is constitutional, then every cargo of every description exported from the United States may be made to pay an export duty to the State, provided the tax is imposed in the form of a tax on the bill of lading, and this in direct opposition to the plain and express prohibition in the Constitution of the United States.

In the case now before the court, the intention to tax the export of gold and silver, in the form of a tax on the bill of lading, is too plain to be mistaken. The duty is imposed only upon bills of lading of gold and silver, and not upon articles of any other description. And we think it is impossible to assign a reason for imposing the duty upon the one and not upon the other, unless it was intended to lay a tax on the gold and silver exported, while all other articles were exempted from the charge. If it was intended merely as a stamp duty on a particular description of paper, the bill of lading of any other cargo is in the same form, and executed in the same manner and for the same purposes, as one for gold and silver, and so far as the instrument of writing was concerned, there could hardly be a reason for taxing one and not the other.

In the judgment of this court the state tax in question is a duty upon the export of gold and silver, and consequently repugnant to the clause in the Constitution hereinbefore referred to; and the judgment of the court of sessions must, therefore, be reversed.

SUSAN VIGEL, Plff. in Er.,

v.

HENRY NAYLOR, Administrator of GEORGE NAYLOR, Deceased,

(See S. C., 24 How., 208–214).

Verdicts and judgments—when evidence on question of freedom of slaves.

In a petition for freedom by a slave under a will by which all testator's slaves over thirty-five years of age were emancipated; and all those under that age were to be emancipated, the males at thirty-five, and the females at thirty years of age, records of verdicts and judgments establishing that petitioner's mother and sister were the slaves of testator at his death, and acquired their freedom under his will, are proper evidence.

A presumption could have been founded on this proof by the jury, that the infant child of the same family was the slave of testator also.

The records of the judgments were not inter alios acta and, therefore, incompetent.

The evidence offered had weight enough in it to be pertinent and ought, therefore, to have been submitted to the jury.

Argued Jan. 11, 1861. Decided Jan. 28, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

This was a petition for freedom filed in the court below by the present plaintiff in error. The jury found that the petitioner was not free, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The petitioner brought the case to this court by writ of error. The questions raised related to the rejection, by the court below, of evidence offered by the petitioner and are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. Blair, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. H. Bradley and Messrs. Badger & Carlisle, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

Susan Vigel sued Henry Naylor, administrator of George Naylor, by a petition for freedom in the circuit court of this district. He pleaded that she was his slave. On the trial of this issue, she offered in evidence the will of John B. Kirby, by which all his slaves over thirty-five years of age were emancipated; and all those under that age were to be emancipated —the males at thirty-five, and the females at thirty years of age. This was allowed by an Act of the Legislature of Maryland of 1796, ch. 67, sec. 13.

A witness testified on the petitioner's behalf, "that a few days after the death of Kirby, which took place in 1828, George Naylor brought to his house, where witness was then at work, the petitioner, her mother, and her sister; and said George Naylor stated to the witnesses at the time, that he had brought said negroes from the residence of said Kirby; and that the petitioner was then between six and eight years of age."

The petitioner then offered to prove that her brother Richard, and her mother Sarah, and her sister Eliza, had obtained their freedom under the will of Kirby; that Sarah, the mother, and Eliza, had recovered their freedom by suits brought against George Naylor, which were defended by him. In the one instituted by Sarah, judgment was rendered in 1838; and that brought by Eliza was decided in her favor in 1842. The petitioner also offered to prove that it is very unusual for children of the age of the petitioner at the time of Kirby's death to be separated from their parents; but the court excluded the testimony offered, from the jury; to which exception was taken.

The defendant then proved by two witnesses, that they had known the petitioner from her birth, and that she was born on the property of George Naylor; and that she never was out of his possession, or that of his successor and administrator. It is objected that no records of the verdicts and judgments were offered to prove the recoveries. The bill of exceptions states, generally, that she offered to prove the facts, but the court refused to hear the evidence.

Transcripts of the records being the best evidence, and their production necessary, it is manifest that the offer to prove the recoveries was not refused for the reason that the record evidence was absent, but because the recoveries were deemed irrelevant, or that they were inter alios acta and, therefore, incompetent as proof in the cause for any purpose. And the first question is, was the evidence offered relevant, when taken in connection with the parol evidence?

The girl was six or eight years old when George Naylor brought her home in 1828, with her mother and sister, from the late residence of Kirby, the testator. It was offered to be proved, and we must take it to be true, that it could have been proved that it was unusual to separate the mother from a slave child as young as the petitioner was at the time Kirby's will took effect.

If Sarah, the mother, Richard, the brother, and Eliza, the sister, were the slaves of Kirby at his death, and acquired their freedom under his will, does this circumstance furnish evidence from which a jury might infer, in connection with other evidence, that the petitioner was also the slave of Kirby when he died, and entitled to her freedom on arriving at thirty years of age? It is immaterial whether the evidence offered and rejected was weak or strong to prove the fact. The question is, was it competent to go to the jury? Castle v. Bullard, 23 How., 187. If so, it was for them to judge of its force and effect. If this child had been only one year old or under when Naylor got possession of her and of her mother, and other children in company with her, the presumption would be stronger, that her condition and that of her mother was the same, and both the slaves of Kirby, and were manumitted by his will.

By the rejection of the evidence the case was stripped of all proof that Susan, the petitioner, ever belonged to Kirby, the testator; whereas, had it been admitted, it would have proved that Susan's mother, and her other children, belonged to the estate of Kirby after his death, and were emancipated by his will; and having emancipated all his slaves, a presumption could have been founded on this proof by the jury, that an infant child of the same family was the slave of Kirby also, especially as Naylor brought the slaves as a family from Kirby's late residence.

2. Was the record of the judgment inter alios acta and, therefore, incompetent?

In the case of Davis v. Wood, 1 Wheat., 6, it was held by this court that a judgment in favor of the mother establishing her freedom against Swan, a third person, could not be given in evidence in a suit by the child of that mother as tending to prove his freedom. On the trial below, the petitioner offered to prove by witnesses that they had heard old persons, now dead, declare that a certain Mary Davis, now also dead, was a white woman, born in England, and such was the general report in the neighborhood where she lived; and further offered to prove by the same kind of testimony, that Susan Davis, the mother of the petitioner, was lineally descended in the female line from the said Mary; which evidence, by hearsay and general reputation, the court refused to admit, except so far as it was applicable to the fact of the petitioner's pedigree. And the ruling below, this court affirmed.

There is no question arising in the cause before us involving the consideration to what extent hearsay evidence to prove the status of freedom is admissible and, therefore, we refrain from discussing the first point decided in Davis v. Wood, 1 Wheat., 6. In that case, Susan, the mother of John, was sold by Wood, the defendant, to Caleb Swan; and she and her daughter Ary, who had likewise been sold, sued Swan for their freedom, and recovered it. This record of recovery was offered in evidence on behalf of John, but was rejected on the trial.

This court held, that "as to the second exception, the record was not between the same parties. The rule is, that verdicts are evidence between parties and privies. The court does not feel inclined to enlarge the exceptions to this general rule and, therefore, the judgment of the court below is affirmed."

This is the judgment with which we have to deal. The difference in the case under consideration and the one found in 1 Wheat., is, that here Susan's mother and sister recovered their freedom from Naylor, he being the defendant in both actions. There the mother and daughter recovered their freedom from Swan, who had purchased them of Wood.

This court having cut off all evidence by hearsay and general reputation—1st, that the female ancestor of the petitioners was a white English woman, and free; and 2d, that the record of the recovery of freedom by John's mother and sister from Swan was incompetent—of course the petitioner had to go out of court, having proved no case.

There the verdict was not between the same parties. Here the suit was between George Naylor and the mother of Susan; as between the mother and Naylor, the verdict was conclusive of her right to freedom; and Susan, the child, was a privy in blood to the mother, (being her heir, if free,) and as such heir, comes within the rule laid down in Davis v. Wood, and could avail herself of that verdict as equally conclusive, if she could further prove that she was born after the impetration of the mother's writ. Alexander v. Stokely, 7 Serg. & R., 300; Pegram v. Isabell, 2 Hen. & M., 198; Chancellor v. Milton, 1 B. Mon., 25. Or, if she could prove that she was born after Kirby's death, and that her mother recovered her freedom under his will—and which facts might have been established by further proof—these circumstances could be let in as additional evidence. 2 Hen. & M., 211.

Owing to the lapse of time since Mr. Kirby died, the petitioner sought to establish her case by circumstaintial evidence. It was rejected; for what particular reason, does not appear.

As already stated, we think the evidence offered had weight enough in it to be pertinent, and ought, therefore, to have been submitted to the jury. 23 How., 187.

How it was proposed to be proved that Richard was a free man, and acquired his freedom under the will, does not appear; but as to Eliza, the sister, a record of recovery by her of her freedom against Naylor was offered as evidence and rejected. The record could have proved the existence of the verdict and judgment as a fact, and the legal consequences flowing from the fact, namely: that the petitioner, Eliza, was a free person. As to George Naylor and his representative, her status of freedom is a conclusive fact. And what is the effect of the record as respects other persons? Eliza sued George Naylor, declaring that she was free. He replied that she was his slave. She had a verdict that she was free. By the verdict and judgment she took to herself all Naylor's title; it was vested in her as Naylor had it. Harris v. Clarissa, 6 Yerg., 248. He had had her in possession twelve years, and had title by the Act of Limitations of six years, as to other contestants who might set up claim to her as a slave. She can rely on his title as if he had manumitted her; the record has this effect. It stands on the footing that a recorded deed of manumission to her from Naylor would stand, or that a recorded bill of sale from him to a purchaser would stand. In either case, the title paper could be given in evidence to prove the title; and the title thus acquired must be deemed valid until some one else legally establishes a better. This record evidence may be used in any suit by a third person, where the evidence is pertinent, of which the court must judge from facts and circumstances appearing on the trial: and to this effect are the adjudications of the state courts generally. Pegram v. Isabell, in Virginia, 2 Hen. & M., 210; Alexander v. Stokeley, 7 Serg. & R., 290, in Pennsylvania; Vaughan v. Phebe, Mart. & Y., 6, in Tennessee; Chancellor v. Milton, 1 B. Mon., 25, in Kentucky. In Maryland, no decision is found on the subject.

In the next place, the record operates on the status of the person; it sets him free or pronounces him a slave, and binds him by the verdict either way. Shelton v. Barbour, 2 Wash. (Va.), 82.

In some of the States, the suit may be in equity, and the status of freedom be established by a decree. Fisher's Negroes v. Dabbs, 6 Yerg., 119; Reuben v. Parrish, 6 Humph., 122.

It is ordered that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial.

Res judicata—where parties were not same in both suits—favorable error, no ground of reversal—formal parties.

The judgment of a court of law, or a decree of a court of equity, directly upon the same point, and between the same parties, is good as a plea in bar, and conclusive when given in evidence in a subsequent suit.

An error, one favorable to the plaintiffs in error, is not ground of reversal.

An objection that the parties were not the same in both suits cannot be sustained, where both the parties were parties in the former suit; and the subject-matter was the same, and the defense here set up was the same, which the pleadings and the evidence show to have been adjudicated in the former suit.

A question as between the parties is res judicata, and none the less binding because others are concluded also, where the first issue was in chancery, and other parties collaterally interested were made parties, that it might be final, and not because they were legal parties to the original contract on which the litigation is founded.

Argued Jan. 17, 1861. Decided Jan. 28, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The action was based upon two promissory notes made by the plaintiffs in error in favor of William H. Smith, and indorsed by him to the defendants in error, under the circumstances stated in the opinion of the court.

The present action was commenced in the court below in Nov. 1858, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the complainants, the present defendants in error. The defendants below tendered their bill of exceptions and brought the case to this court.

Messrs. Charles F. Mayer and Washington Yellott, for plaintiffs in error:

As to the instruction given to the jury by the court below, the plaintiffs in error maintain:

It submits to the jury the whole question of the identity of the defenses taken in this suit and in the equity case in the United States court, which question, on the contrary, is one of law and fact, in regard to which the court should at least have specified the particular point of defense to which they referred.

It was for the court to compare the respective defenses; and on such comparison it will appear that they do not coincide; and the court should, therefore, have refused to leave to the jury the inquiry as to the identity of defenses.

2 Gall., 229, 230; 17 Pick., 7, 14; 1 Greenl. Ev., secs. 528–534.

The instruction was erroneous because, even assuming that the defense of fraud was taken in the equity suit, the decree there is not to be understood as determining or at all considering that defense. In that suit in rem, it was not an appropriate defense and could not have availed, since, whether there were fraud or not, the land, inferior in coal value as it might be, ought to have been charged with the purchase money debt under the mortgage. The personal liability on the notes is a distinct question. The sale upon the mortgage was inevitable; and for any amount, reclaimable for the misrepresentation, of the purchase money paid, the remedy was against the proceeds of sales under the mortgage decree.

Identity of defenses does not bear on the defendants in this suit, and preclude the bar now set up, because they were not necessary nor proper parties to the equity suit.

Calvert, Part., 181; 17 Law Libr.

The defense and testimony in the equity case were not between the same parties as the parties to this suit; and cannot operate against the defendants here, as res judicata, by virtue of the equity decree.

Mr. Thomas S. Alexander, for defendants in error:

The verdict for the plaintiffs below, establishes the identity of the defenses in the two causes; so that it is presumed the only subject for inquiry is, whether the decree of the court of equity on the matter of a defense taken in a proceeding in rem, to enforce payment of a debt by sale of the pledge, is conclusive on the same matter, offered as a defense in an action in personam, for recovery of the same debt. The defendants in error maintain the affirmative on this question.

To render the decree conclusive, it is sufficient that there exists identity of matter in issue, and of parties.

The identity of the matter in issue is established by the verdict. As to parties there can be no question.

Duchess of Kingston's case, 2 Sm. Lead. Cas., 573; Outram v. Morewood, 3 East, 346; Beall v. Pearre, 12 Md., 564; Hopkins v. Lee, 6 Wheat., 109; Bank of U. S. v. Beverly, 1 How., 134; Smith v. Kernochen, 7 How., 198.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants in error were plaintiffs below, and brought this suit as indorsees of two notes given by the plaintiffs in error to William H. Smith. These notes were given in part payment of some tracts of coal land sold and conveyed to Thompson and Pickell by Smith, and the defense endeavored to be established on the trial was a want of consideration, in that Smith had falsely represented the lands to contain 300 acres of "big vein" coal, when in fact they contained but 150 acres. A mortgage had been given to secure these notes; a bill had been filed in chancery to foreclose this mortgage, in which Smith, the assignor, and Roberts and others, the equitable assignees of the mortgage, and indorsees of these notes, were complainants, and Thompson and Pickell, together with their assignees, the Pickell Mining Company, were respondents. They put in a joint and several answer admitting the execution of the notes and mortgage, and alleging as a defense the representations made by Smith, by which Thompson and Pickell were induced to purchase the lands, supposing them to contain 300 acres of the "big vein" coal, when, in fact, as they afterwards discovered, the lands contained but 150 acres of the same. For this reason, and "because they did not receive a valuable consideration for said notes or mortgage, respondents aver that plaintiffs are not entitled to demand payment of them, or any part of them, but the same are to be regarded as absolutely void."

This case was fully heard by the Chancellor on the pleadings and evidence, who overruled the defense set up, and decreed a sale of the mortgaged premises. The record of that case was put in evidence on the trial of this case by the defendants below, for the purpose, as they alleged, "of showing that the plaintiffs were not holders for value."

They offered, for that purpose, a part only of the record. Whereupon the plaintiffs gave in evidence the entire record, and insisted that the decree is conclusive, and estops the defendants from again alleging the same matter as a defense to the suit at law on the notes. The evidence was, however, again presented to the jury, without a waiver of plaintiffs' right to treat the decree as an estoppel.

The court rejected a number of prayers offered by each party, and gave the following instruction to the jury, which is the subject of exception:

"If the jury shall find from the evidence that the promissory notes offered in evidence in this case were duly executed and delivered by the said defendants to William H. Smith, and by him indorsed over to the said plaintiffs for value; and that, in the cause on the equity side of this court, in which the said plaintiffs, with the said Smith, were complainants, and the said Thompson and Pickell, with the Pickell Mining Company, were defendants (the record of which has been offered in evidence), the same defense was made and set up in said cause to prevent the passage of a decree for the sale of the said lands to pay the said notes as is now made to prevent a recovery in this case, then the decree passed in that case is conclusive upon the point of this defense, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this action."

The plaintiffs in error have not called in question the correctness of the general principle of law assumed by the court below, viz.: "that the judgment of a court of law, or a decree of a court of equity, directly upon the same point, and between the same parties, is good as a plea in bar, and conclusive when given in evidence in a subsequent suit"

But it is objected to this instruction, that it submits as a question of fact to the jury what ought to have been decided by the court as matter of law from the face of the record produced. This, if an error, was one favorable to the plaintiffs in error, as it gave them the chance of a verdict on a point which, if decided by the court, must have been decided against them; for the record shows conclusively, that the very same defense against these notes was the only point in dispute in the court of equity, to wit: whether plaintiffs in error were "deceived by" the alleged misrepresentations of Smith, fraudulent or otherwise, and whether the notes were, therefore, "without consideration," and "absolutely void."

The objection, that the parties were not the same in both suits, cannot be sustained.

Both parties to this litigation were parties in that suit; the subject-matter was the same; the defense now set up was the same which the pleadings and the evidence show to have been adjudicated in the court of chancery.

It is true, Smith, who indorsed the notes to the plaintiffs below, and who was interested in the question, was joined as complainant, and the Pickell Mining Company, who had purchased the mortgaged property, were made respondents, according to the practice in courts of chancery, where all parties having an interest in the question to be tried are made parties, that the decree may be final as to all the matters in litigation. No good reason can be given why the parties in this case, who litigated the same question, should not be concluded by the decree, because others having an interest in the question or subject-matter were admitted by the practice of a court of chancery to assist on both sides.

The question as between the present parties is res judicata, and none the less binding because others, are concluded also. A contrary doctrine would sacrifice a wholesome principle of law to a mere technical rule having no foundation in reason; making a distinction where there is no difference.

Such was the ruling of the court in the case of Lawrence v. Hunt, 10 Wend., 82, where it was objected that in the former suit there was another plaintiff joined. Where the former suit was at law, this objection might have some weight, for it could not well be said that a contract of A and B with D and C was the same as that in another suit where A was sole plaintiff and D sole defendant. But this objection cannot apply where the first issue is in chancery, and parties collaterally interested are made parties to the litigation, that it may be final, and not because they were legal parties to the original contract on which the litigation is founded. In such a case the pleadings may show the contract or subject-matter of the litigation to be the very same, and directly in issue; in the other, it could not be well so. As we are of opinion that there was no error in this instruction, it will not be necessary to notice the other points alluded to in the argument, this one being conclusive of the whole case.

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

Docket of courts of District of Columbia—when prior judgment is a bar or an estoppel—same matter in controversy—extrinsic evidence, to prove what facts and issues were tried and decided—judgment, conclusive of what facts.

In the courts of the District of Columbia, the docket stands in the place of, or, perhaps, is the record, and is entitled here to all the consideration that is yielded to the formal record in other States; and to the same faith and credit.

In order that the judgment or decree may be set up as a bar by plea or relied on as evidence by way of estoppel, it must have been made by a court of competent jurisdiction upon the same subject-matter, between the same parties for the same purpose.

It is not necessary, as between parties and privies, that the record should show the question upon which the right of the plaintiff to recover, or the validity of the defense, depended, but only that the same matter in controversy might have been litigated.

Extrinsic evidence will be admitted to prove that the particular question was material, and was in fact contested, and that it was referred to the decision of the jury.

NOTE.—Estoppel by judgment. See note to Aspden v. Nixon, 45 U. S. (4 How.), 467.

The judgment rendered, while it remains in force, is conclusive of all the facts properly pleaded by the plaintiffs.

But when it is presented as testimony in another suit, the inquiry is competent whether the same issue has been tried and settled by it.

Where a number of issues are presented, the finding on any one of which will warrant the verdict and judgment, it is competent to show that the finding was upon one rather than on another of these different issues.

The subsequent application of the verdict, to a single count by the court, does not preclude this inquiry.

ERRORS to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

The two above cases are alike in all material points. They were actions of assumpsit, brought in the court below by Sickles and Cook, the present defendants in error, against the plaintiffs in error. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs below. The defendants brought the cases to this court by writs of error. The questions involved are stated by the court.

Messrs. George E. Badger and J. M. Carlisle, for the plaintiffs in error:

The court below held that the proceedings offered were not only evidence, proper and admissible, but conclusive against the plaintiffs in error as an estoppel. We submit that the court below erred in holding that these proceedings were proper evidence, for there was no judgment nor verdict shown. The docket entries, admitted by the court on this point, are in these words: "22d November, jury found verdict for the plaintiffs; damages $1,695.75, with interest from 16 March, 1846. Verdict rendered 7th December. 14th December, judgment for plaintiffs on the first count in the declaration."

We submit there was no evidence of a verdict or a judgment. This was merely a memorandum or minute from which a verdict might afterwards be drawn up. If there had been a verdict in full, properly entered up, it could not be offered as evidence without showing the judgment; but a judgment can only be shown by the production of an examined copy, or an exemplification of the judgment entered of record, or in the same court by the production of the judgment itself.

Tuthill v. Davis, 20 Johns., 285; Phil. Ev., 384.

It cannot be proved by the judgment book, although the judgment roll may not have been made up, and though the person interested in showing the judgment be no party to the record.

Ayrey v. Davenport, 2 B. & P. N. R., 474.

Nor by the minutes kept, from which a judgment is to be made up.

Wade v. Odeneal, 3 Dev., 423; Leveringe v. Dayton, 4 Wash. C. C., 698; Furguson v. Harwood, 7 Cranch, 408; Lowry v. Cady, 4 Vt., 504; Seaton v. Cordray, 1 Wright (O.), 102; Vaughan v. Phebe, 1 Mart. & Y., 24; Sheldon v. Frink, 12 Pick., 568.

But if there was no judgment shown, then there was no evidence of a verdict, for a verdict is of no force until followed and consummated by a judgment. The rule is the same in the courts of England as in this country, viz.: that a judgment only exists, and can only be shown by the record thereof, when finally reduced to its ultimate form according to the course of the court, whether that be enrollment, insertion in a book kept for that purpose, or otherwise, and whilst there is something to be done in order to make the judgment hereafter assume that form, there is no judgment in law.

See 2 Lill., 103; Latch., 216; 1 Danv., 722; Palmer, 281; Pitton v. Walter, 1 Str., 162; Rex v. Page, 2 Esp., 649, note; Fisher v. Kitchingman, Willes, 363; Goodbread v. Wells, 4 Dev. & B., 271.

We, therefore, submit that the court below erred in receiving the proceeding in evidence at all; but if they were admissible, then we contend that there was error, in holding them to amount to an estoppel.

There are two questions which have been presented on the briefs in this case, which seem to be confounded by the counsel for defendants, but which are distinct and different. The first is as to the effect of a previous judgment on the merits upon a subsequent suit for the same thing, the same cause of action; as, for example, where the same debt or demand is the subject of each of the suits.

The second is, where one brings a suit for a certain demand or cause of action, which has never before been the subject of a suit; but he has, in a former suit, sought to recover another demand; both demands growing out of one title or interest in the plaintiff. What, in such case, is the effect of the former proceedings upon the second action? This is the question now before the court.

Now, the rule we take to be this:

If in the former proceeding the title of the party has been directly alleged, and an issue taken upon it which involves no other matter, or if any fact being part of that title has been thus separated from all other matters and made the point of an issue, the finding upon it may, in such subsequent suit, be relied on in pleading as a technical estoppel, but not otherwise. And that where, in the former suit, there has not been such separation of the title from all other matters, but the same has been involved in a general issue with other matters, whether this arise from the mode of pleading adopted by the parties, or required by the nature of the action, no finding thereon can either establish or disaffirm the title so as to estop either of the parties in a subsequent suit; and that if it cannot operate as an estoppel by pleading, neither can it have the effect of an estoppel when given in evidence to the jury.

Outram v. Morewood, 3 East, 346; Hooper v. Hoopor, McC. & Y., 509; Miles v. Rose, 5 Taunt., 704; Carter v. James, 13 Mees. & W., 137; and there is no English case to the contrary.

But further, the declaration contained and the trial was had on two counts. In law these are supposed to be on different contracts. In the second there was no averment of a suit having been brought on that contract. Yet the court applied the estoppel to both counts, and refused to hear evidence to disprove the contract alleged in either. This is a fatal objection to holding the proceedings an estoppel, which we are now considering, and not their admission as evidence.

We insist, then, that the judgment was not conclusive, but only evidence to be left to the jury, persuasive, or perhaps prima facie, but still not to preclude the plaintiffs in error from going into their case and rebutting the evidence by other proofs. And surely if it throws the burden of the proof on the defendant in the action, and is to be deemed conclusive, unless disproved, weight enough for every fair and reasonable purpose is given to the record. To make it conclusive of the contract, which is the title or right of the plaintiffs in successive actions for new damages, during 14 years—to give a defendant no opportunity to correct a slip or oversight, or to have the benefit of evidence subsequently discovered, such as, that the witness, by whose testimony the former verdict was obtained, has been discovered to have been largely interested in the recovery—is, it seems to us, to shut out truth where authority does not compel, justice does not demand, and expediency does not warrant.

Messrs. William J. Stone, Jr., and Joseph H. Bradley, for the defendants in error.

I. Did the verdict and judgment in the case tried in 1855 conclusively establish the said contract between the plaintiffs and defendant, and the rate of compensation under it?

In Hopkins v. Lee, 6 Wheat., 113, this court decided that a verdict and judgment in a court of record, or a decree in chancery, put an end to all further controversy concerning the points thus decided between the parties to the suit.

See, also, Bank U. S. v. Beverly, 1 How., 134; Shafer v. Stonebreaker, 4 Gill & J., 345.

In the first count of the declaration in the cause tried in 1855, the contract is specifically set out, and as a part of it, the experiment and its result which fixed the plaintiff's compensation. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiffs, thereby finding all questions of fact stated in the plaintiff's declaration to be true as stated, and the court gave judgment thereon. The contract and experiment as a part of it were questions of fact directly in issue, were necessarily passed upon by the court and jury, and the defendant, on the principle settled in the before mentioned cases, is estopped to deny it.

II. The estoppel is conclusive when given in evidence, even if not pleaded.

See Phila., W. & Balt. R. R. Co. v. Howard, 13 How., 335; Trevivan v. Lawrence, 1 Salk., 276.

A verdict and judgment, of a court of competent jurisdiction, puts an end to all further controversy between the same parties concerning the points thereby decided. Parol evidence is admissible, if necessary to show what questions or points were in issue in the first suit.

Young v. Black, 7 Cranch, 565; Rogers v. Libby, 35 Me., 202; Doty v. Brown, 4 N. Y., 71; Beirckhead v. Brown, 5 Sand., 140; Grant v. Ramsey, 7 Ohio St., 162; Henley v. Foley, 18 B. Mon., 522; Fischli v. Fischli, 1 Blackf., 361; Chamberlain v. Gaillard, 26 Ala., 509; Bebee v. Elliott, 4 Barb., 459; Hunter v. Davis, 19 Ga., 415; Stevens v. Hughes, 31 Pa., 381; Perkins v. Walker, 19 Vt., 149; 2 Zab. (N. J.), 699; 7 Ga., 434; 2 Mich., 276; 15 Ill., 458; 5 Smith, (N. Y.), 108; 12 Md., 550; 10 Wend., 83.

III. Are the plaintiffs to be deprived of the benefit of the estoppel for the reason that when the verdict was rendered, the declaration, in addition to the special count in the contract, contained also common counts?

The jury, by their verdict, necessarily found the statements of fact in all the counts of the declaration to be true. The theory of several counts is, that they represent distinct and independent transaction, otherwise the declaration would be subject to the charge of duplicity. When the verdict was rendered, the plaintiff might have had it entered on the first count, and the judgment following the verdict there could have been no question as to the estoppel in this case (if there can be an estoppel in any case); for that count sets forth the contract and experiment with the result of it.

Although the plaintiffs did not, when the verdict was rendered, have it entered on the first count alone, yet they subsequently had the verdict amended and applied to the count by the court, who were satisfied that the evidence given applied to it and not to the other counts. That the court had power to do this is well settled.

Stockton v. Bishop, 4 How., 167; Matheson's Admin. v. Grant's Admin., 2 How., 281, 282; Bank of the U. S. v. Moss, 6 How., 39; Parks v. Turner, 12 How., 45.

IV. The defendant's first bill of exceptions related to the docket entries and original papers. This suit was pending in the same court in which the former suit had been tried, and the docket entries and original papers offered were under the control of the court. If the reason given, that the clerk had not made out the record, is not sufficient, then there may be a failure of justice, as the record is to be made up by an officer of the court, over whom suitors have no control. The original declarations and pleadings should certainly be deemed of as high credit and as satisfactory evidence as copies could be, and a court and jury as fully capable of examining them as the clerk.

Boteler v. State, 8 Gill & J., 381–383.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants in error, as plaintiffs, sued the plaintiffs in error, in assumpsit, in the circuit court, upon a special parol contract, purporting to have been made in 1844, to the effect that they having a patent for Sickle's cut-off, for saving fuel in the working of steam engines, and the defendants being the owners of a certain steamboat, it was agreed between them that the said patentees should attach to the engine of the defendants one of their machines; and that the defendants should pay for the use thereof three fourths of the saving of fuel produced thereby, the payments to be made from time to time, when demanded. That, to ascertain the saving of fuel, an experiment should be made in the manner described in the declaration, and that the result should be taken as the rate of saving during the continuance of the contract, which was to be as long as the patent and the steamboat should last. The plaintiffs aver that the experiment had been made, and the rate of saving had been duly ascertained; and that the machine had been used in connection with the engine on the said boat until the commencement of the suit.

In the first count of the declaration, the plaintiffs further stated, that they brought, in March, 1846, a suit on this contract in the circuit court for the sum then due, and had obtained a verdict and judgment therefor in the circuit court in 1856, and had thus established conclusively the contract between the parties. These last allegations are not contained in the second count. The defendants pleaded the general issue.

The plaintiffs produced upon the trial, as the only testimony of the contract, the proceedings of the suit mentioned in the declaration, and insisted that these proceedings operated as an estoppel upon the defendants. These proceedings consisted of a writ, a declaration, containing two counts upon the contract, and the common counts, and the plea of the general issue; also a docket entry of a general verdict, in favor of the plaintiffs, on the entire declaration, and a docket entry of judgment, subsequently rendered on the first count—a count similar to the counts in the declaration in the present suit. The defendants objected to these docket entries as evidence of a verdict and judgment, but insisted they were simply memoranda or minutes, from which a record of a verdict and judgment were to be made. It appears that in the courts of this district, as in Maryland, the docket stands in the place of, or, perhaps, is the record, and receives here all the consideration that is yielded to the formal record in other States. These memorials of their proceedings must be intelligible to the court that preserves them, as their only evidence, and we cannot, therefore, refuse to them faith and credit. Boteler v. State, 8 Gill & J., 381; Ruggles v. Alexander, 2 Rawle, 282. Besides this testimony of the contract, the plaintiffs proved the quantity of the fuel that had been used in the running of the boat, and relied upon the rate as settled to determine their demand, and insisted that the defendants were estopped to prove there was no such contract; or to disprove any one of the averments in the first count of the declaration in the former suit; or to show that no saving of the wood had been effected; or to show that the so-called experiment was not made pursuant to the contract, or was fraudulently made, and was not a true and genuine exponent of the capacity of the said cut-off; or to prove that the said verdict was in fact rendered upon all the testimony and allegations that were submitted to the jury, and was in point of fact rendered, as by the docket entry it purports to have been, upon the issues generally, and not upon the first count specially.

The circuit court adopted these conclusions of the plaintiffs, and excluded the testimony offered by the defendants, to prove those facts.

The authority of the res judicata, with the limitations under which it is admitted, is derived by us from the Roman law and the Canonists. Whether a judgment is to have authority as such in another proceeding, depends, an idem corpus sit; quantitas eadem, idem jus; et an eadem causa petendi et eadem conditio personarum; quæ nisi omnia concurrent alia res est; or, as stated by another jurist, exceptionem rei judicatæ, obstare quotiens eadem quæstio inter easdem personas revocatur. The essential conditions under which the exception of the res judicata becomes applicable are the identity of the thing demanded, the identity of the cause of the demand, and of the parties in the character in which they are litigants. This court described the rule in Aspden v. Nixon, 4 How., 467, in such cases to be, that a judgment or decree set up as a bar by plea, or relied on as evidence by way of estoppel, must have been made by a court of competent jurisdiction upon the same subject-matter, between the same parties for the same purpose. The thing demanded in the present suit is a sum of money, being a part of the consideration or price for the use of a valuable machine for which the plaintiffs had a patent, and is the complement of a whole, of which the sum demanded in the first count of the declaration in the former suit is the other part. The special counts in the declaration of each suit are similar, being framed upon this contract; and a decision in the one suit on those counts in favor of the plaintiffs necessarily included and virtually determined its sufficiency to sustain the title of the plaintiffs on it. It was, therefore, admissible as testimony. This conclusion is supported by adjudged cases, and the authority of writers on the law of evidence. Gardner v. Buckbee, 3 Cow., 120; Dutton v. Woodman, 9 Cush., 255; Bonnier des Preuves, sec. 766; 8 Dalloz, Jur. Generale, 256, 257, 258. Buller, in his work on Nisi Prius, says: "If a verdict be had on the same point, and between the same parties, it may be given in evidence, though the trial were not had for the same lands, for the verdict in such a case is very persuading evidence, because what twelve men have already thought of the fact may be supposed fit to direct the determination of the jury. * * * It is not necessary that the verdict should be in relation to the same land; for the verdict is only set up to prove the point in question, and every matter is evidence that amounts to a proof of the point in question." Bull. N. P., 232. The plaintiffs in error contend that, conceding the record to be admissible as evidence, to render the verdict and judgment in the first suit an estoppel, it must be shown by the record that the very point which it is sought to estop the party from contesting was distinctly presented by an issue, and expressly found by the jury, and that no estoppel by verdict and judgment can arise in an action on the case, or an action of assumpsit, tried upon the general issue, because in no such action can any precise point be made and presented for trial by a jury, and the cases of Outram v. Morewood, 3 East, 346, and Vooght v. Winch, 2 Barn. & Ald., 662, are cited in support of this proposition. And the conclusion would seem to be proper for the attainment of the end, for which authority was allowed to the res judicata as testimony. Experience has disclosed, that for the security of rights, and the preservation of the repose of society, a limit must be imposed upon the facilities for litigation. For this purpose, the presumption has been adopted, that the thing adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction, under definite conditions, shall be received in evidence as irrefragable truth.

This presumption is a guaranty of the future efficacy and binding operation of the judgment. It presupposes that all the constituents of the judgment shall be preserved by the court, which renders it in an authentic and unmistakable form. In the courts upon the continent of Europe, and in the courts of chancery and admiralty in the United States and Great Britain, where the function of adjudication is performed entire by a tribunal composed of one or more judges, this has been done without much difficulty. The separate functions of the judge and jury, in common law courts, created a necessity for separating issues of law from issues of fact; and with the increase of commerce and civilization, transactions have become more complicated and numerous, and law and fact have become more closely interwoven, so as to render their separation more embarrassing. The ancient system of pleading, which was conducive to the end of ascertaining the material issue between the parties, and the preservation in a permanent form of the evidence of the adjudication, has been condemned as requiring unnecessary precision, and subjecting parties to over-technical rules, prolixity and expense. A system of general pleading has been extensively adopted in this country, which rendered the application of the principle contended for by the plaintiffs impracticable, unless we were prepared to restrict within narrow bounds the authority of the res judicata. It was, consequently, decided that it was not necessary as between parties and privies that the record should show that the question upon which the right of the plaintiff to recover, or the validity of the defense, depended for it to operate conclusively; but only that the same matter in controversy might have been litigated, and that extrinsic evidence would be admitted to prove that the particular question was material and was, in fact, contested and that it was referred to the decision of the jury.

In Young v. Black, 7 Cranch, 565, this court admitted in evidence a record of a former suit between the parties, in which judgment was rendered for the defendant, supported by parol proof that the cause of action in the two suits was the same. The court say: "The controversy had passed in rem judicatem; and the identity of the causes of action being once established, the law would not suffer them again to be drawn into question." The current of American authority runs in the same direction.

Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend., 9; Eastman v. Cooper, 15 Pick., 276; Marsh v. Pier, 4 Rawle, 288; Green. Ev., sec. 531.

In the case before the court, the verdict was rendered upon two special counts, and the general counts in assumpsit, but the verdict in the subsequent stage of the proceedings was applied by the court only to the first count. The record, produced by the plaintiffs, showed that the first suit was brought apparently upon the same contract as the second, and that the existence and validity of that contract might have been litigated. But the verdict might have been rendered upon the entire declaration, and without special reference to the first count. It was competent to the defendants to show the state of facts that existed at the trial, with a view to ascertain what was the matter decided upon by the verdict of the jury. It may have been that there was no contest in reference to the fairness of the experiment, or to its sufficiency to ascertain the premium to be paid for the use of the machine at the first trial, or it may have been that the plaintiffs abandoned their special counts and recovered their verdict upon the general counts. The judgment rendered in that suit, while it remains in force, and for the purpose of maintaining its validity, is conclusive of all the facts properly pleaded by the plaintiffs. But when it is presented as testimony in another suit, the inquiry is competent whether the same issue has been tried and settled by it. Merriam v. Whittemore, 5 Gray, 316; Hughes v. Alexander, 5 Duer, 488. The defendants in error contend, the jury, by their verdict, necessarily found the statements of fact in all the counts of the declaration to be true; and the effect of a verdict and judgment on the whole declaration and a verdict and judgment on the first count is precisely the same, in producing an estoppel, as respects the matters contained in that special count. But this is not true. If the verdict had been rendered on the special count in exclusion of the others, the record itself would have shown that the existence and validity of the contract were in question. There would have been no ground for the inquiry whether any other issue was presented to the jury. But where a number of issues are presented, the finding of any one on which will warrant the verdict and judgment, it is competent to show that the finding was upon one rather than on another of these different issues. Henderson v. Kenner, 1 Rich., 474; Sawyer v. Woodbury, 7 Gray, 499. Nor do we think that the subsequent application of the verdict to a single count by the court precludes this inquiry. The authority of the courts to make the application, and the circumstances under which it is allowable, was considered by this court in Matheson v. Grant, 2 How., 263. It is done for the purpose of preventing the consequences of a misjoinder of counts in a declaration, or of the union of insufficient counts with others, so as to allow a valid judgment on the verdict. It had no reference to the use that might be made of the proceedings as testimony in another proceeding. In Maryland, the power to amend the record in this form was conferred by the Act of 1809. 3 Maxey, Laws, 484. The case is not embraced in the earlier Act of 1785 upon this subject. 3 Har. & J., 9; 3 Har. & J., 91. It is the opinion of the court, that the circuit court erred in holding that the plaintiffs in error were estopped by the proceedings in the former suit, for any inquiry in respect to the matters in issue and actually tried in that cause; and its judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings, in conformity with this opinion.

HENRY M. KELLOGG, ET AL., Heirs at law of WILLIAM KELLOGG,

v.

ROBERT FORSYTH.

(See S. C., 24 How., 186-188.)

Landlord may use name of tenant, or those of his heirs, in writ of error.

When a landlord has undertaken the defense of a suit in the name of the tenant, with his consent, the tenant cannot interfere with the cause, to his prejudice.

It is competent to the landlord to use the names of the heirs of his deceased tenant to prosecute his writ of error upon his engagement to bear all the costs and expenses of the suit.

Should the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings, he may apply in that court for leave to become defendant, instead of the heirs of the tenant.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

Motion to dismiss under the circumstances, stated in the opinion.

Mr. Williams, for defendant in error.

Mr. Ballance, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error recovered a judgment in ejectment, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, against William Kellogg, deceased, as tenant in possession of a parcel of land in that district. After the judgment, the defendant died. The attorney of the decedent, who was also his landlord, and who had conducted the suit on behalf and in the name of the tenant, with his consent, sued out a writ of error to this court in the name of the heirs of said Kellogg. The bond for the prosecution of the writ, and the stipulation for costs in this court, have been supplied by the said attorney. One of the heirs of Kellogg objects to the prosecution of the writ of error, and alleges, on behalf of himself and his co-heirs, that it is prosecuted without authority, and that they have no desire that it should be maintained, and authorize the attorney of the defendant in error to move for its dismissal. It appears to the court that the attorney of the deceased defendant is a bona fide claimant of the land, and that he is prosecuting the writ of error in good faith. That he is responsible for the costs and damages that may arise from the use of the names of the plaintiffs in error. The Statutes of Illinois require that the declaration in ejectment shall be served upon the actual occupant, and the practice of the courts of that State authorizes the appearance of the landlord, and his defense of the suit, either in his own name or that of the tenant, with his consent. Williams v. Brunton, 3 Gilm., 600.

And when a landlord has undertaken the defense of a suit in the name of the tenant, with his consent, the tenant cannot interfere with the cause to his prejudice. Doe v. Franklin, 7 Taunt., 9. We think it was competent to the landlord to use the names of the plaintiffs to prosecute his writ of error, upon his engagement to bear all the costs and expenses of the suit. Should the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings, he may apply in that court for leave to become defendant, instead of the heirs of the tenant.

Motion to dismiss, overruled.

Mexican grant—state decisions are rules of property.

The consent of the federal Executive of Mexico was essential to the validity of a grant of lands within the border and coast leagues.

A grant wanting such consent, was void.

Decisions of the court of last resort of the State in which property is situated, and in which the transactions that form the subject of this litigation took place, are conclusive testimony of the rule of action prescribed by the authorities of the State, as applicable to their interpretation and adjustment.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas.

Thomas M. League, the present plaintiff in error, commenced this action in the court below against the defendants in error, by petition, to try title to a certain tract of land in the County of Refugio, in Texas, lying on Aransas Bay.

On the trial, numerous instructions were asked in behalf of each of the parties, some of which were given and some refused. Among other things, the court instructed the jury that "the grant in question, if made within the littoral leagues without the approbation of the National Government of Mexico, was void, though on a sale grant given by virtue of concessions in sale to the empresarios in the Colony of Power and Hewetson, to be located in that Colony, and though, by a law or decree of Congress of the State of Coahuila and Texas, the same was ratified and confirmed, and though the Republic of Texas received the dues on said grant, and though colonization was authorized within the Colony by the approbation of the national Executive." Verdict and judgment were for the defendants. The plaintiff brought the case to this court on a writ of error.

Mr. Rob. Hughes, for the plaintiff in error.

Mr. Joseph F. Smith, for himself and agent for the others.

Messrs. P. Phillips and John Hemphill, for the defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued in the district court for a parcel of land containing two and one half leagues in the County of Refugio, in the State of Texas. The answer and amended answer of the defendants contain some twenty pleas, and a number of questions are presented by the record; but as the decision of the cause will be complete by the opinion the court have formed of the original grant from the State of Coahuila and Texas, from which the claim of the plaintiff is derived, and on which it depends, a statement of that grant will be sufficient. In the year 1826, Power and Hewetson proposed to the Government of Mexico to establish a colony on the seacoast of Texas, within what is termed in their Law of Colonization the littoral leagues. This proposal was accepted, and the partners entered upon the fulfillment of that enterprise. In December, 1829, they respectively applied to the Governor of the State of Coahuila and Texas for the purchase of eleven leagues of land each, within the limits of the Colony. This offer was accepted; the petitioners were authorized to locate their grant upon any lands in the Colony that were vacant, or elsewhere, if there was not a sufficiency of vacant land for that purpose; and the general commissioner of the Colony was directed to deliver possession of the land selected, and to perfect the corresponding titles. In November, 1834, Power represented to this general commissioner that the partners had selected only seventeen and one quarter leagues, and requested him to issue grants for two tracts, one containing two and a half leagues, and the other two and one quarter leagues, to complete this contract, at a place designated. This request of the petitioner was complied with, and one of these grants is that which was introduced to support the plaintiff's title, and with which he connected himself by mesne conveyances.

The location is within the littoral or coast leagues described in the 4th section of the Colonization Laws of Mexico, of 1824 and 1828.

The litigation between the grantees and their assigns and the defendants for this land has been protracted in the courts of Texas, and the opinion of the Supreme Court of that State has been very definitely expressed upon the validity of their titles on two several occasions.

Smith v. Power, 14 Tex., 146; Smith v. Power, 23 Tex., 29.

In the latter case the supreme court said: "No question is more authoritatively settled by the repeated decisions of this court, than that the consent of the federal Executive of Mexico was essential to the validity of a grant of lands of the character of the present within the border and coast leagues. Edwards v. Davis, 3 Tex., 321; 10 Tex., 316; Republic v. Thorn, 8 Tex., 499; 5 Tex., 410; 9 Tex., 410, 556. In the case of Smith v. Power, 14 Tex., 146, the parties to this appeal, it was held, that the grant here in question, under which the defendant claims, could not be distinguished from those which had been passed upon in former cases; and upon the authority of those cases, it was decided, that the grant wanting such consent was void. That question, therefore, cannot be considered as now an open one. A series of decisions, continued almost from the organization of this court down to the present time, thus settling the construction of the old local law, upon which the titles to real property in the oldest and most densely peopled portions of the State so largely depend, must be regarded as emphatically the law of the State." In accordance with well established principles in this court, we accept this uniform and stable body of judicial decision from the court of last resort of the State in which the property is situated, and in which the transactions that form the subject of this litigation took place, as conclusive testimony of the rule of action prescribed by the authorities of the State, as applicable to their interpretation and adjustment. We do not inquire whether a more suitable rule might not have been adopted, nor whether the arguments which led to its adoption were forcible or just. We receive the decisions, having the character that is mentioned in the extract we have made from the opinion of the Supreme Court of Texas, as having a binding force almost equivalent to positive law. Such being our conclusion in respect to this grant, we must sanction the judgment of the district court that denies to it validity.

Judgment affirmed.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas.

The case is substantially the same as the preceding case.

Mr. Robert Hughes, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Joseph F. Smith, for himself.

Messrs. P. Phillips and John Hemphill, for the defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff claimed, in the district court, two leagues and one half of land in the County of Refugio, in the State of Texas, which were in the possession of the defendants. The defendant answered the claim by asserting title under grants from the State of Texas, and by the operation of the Statute of Limitation.

The plaintiff maintained his claim by producing a grant to James Power and James Hewetson, issued under the authority of the State of Coahuila and Texas, in the year of 1834, upon a contract of sale of a certain quantity of lands in the Colony of Power and Hewetson, situate within the littoral or coast leagues. In deriving his title under these grantees, the plaintiff produced a deed, or an agreement for a conveyance, from Hewetson to Power and Walker; this paper was rejected as testimony by the court. Walker, this vendee, died in 1836, being a citizen of, and resident in, the United States. His brother, also a citizen of the United States, succeeded to his estate, and in the year 1837 conveyed his interest to a person under whom the plaintiff claims.

Three questions were made upon the trial in reference to the validity of the plaintiff's title: 1st. Whether the State of Coahuila and Texas, in the year 1829, or in the year 1834, could sell and convey land to a colonist within the littoral or coast leagues, without the consent or approbation of the Central Government of Mexico. 2d. Whether the paper executed by Hewetson to Power and Walker was a conveyance of the land, or merely an agreement to convey. 3d. Whether in 1836, Walker, a citizen of the United States, could inherit land in Texas, from one who was also a citizen of, and a resident in, the United States. The decision of either of these questions in favor of the defendants is fatal to the plaintiff's right to recover.

The first of these questions has been determined by this court in the case of League v. Egery (24 How., 264), and others in the negative.

This decision is in accordance with the decision of the district court, whose judgment is, consequently, affirmed.

CHARLES F. MAYER, Surviving Permanent Trustee of JOHN GOODING, Appt.,

v.

WM. PINKNEY WHYTE, Administrator de bonis non of JOHN GOODING, and ROBT. M. GIBBES AND CHARLES OLIVER, Surviving Executors of ROBT. OLIVER, Deceased.

(See S. C., 24 How., 317-322.)

Award to Baltimore Company—right of trustee of insolvent is prior to that of personal representative of a claimant to an interest in such award.

The history of the litigation among the several claimants to the money, awarded to the Baltimore Company by the commissioners, under the convention with Mexico (amounting to the sum of $354,436.42, of which the fund in controversy is a part,) will be found in the 52 U. S., 11 How., 529; 53 U. S. 12 How., 111; 55 U. S., 14 How., 610; 58 U. S., 17 How., 234, and 61 U. S., 20 How., 535.

In the case of Gooding v. Oliver, 17 How., 274, the court held that the administrator was entitled to the fund as assets of the estate, upon the ground that the courts of Maryland had decided that the contract of the Baltimore Company, which had been made in violation of our neutrality laws, was so illegal and void, that no claim to it passed under their insolvent laws to the trustee.

The present case is between the trustee in subsequent insolvent proceeding in 1829, under the assignment for the benefit of creditors and the present personal representative of the estate of Gooding, and the question is whether or not this trustee took the interest of the insolvent in the Baltimore Company in 1829 by virtue of these proceedings.

Mexico, after she had gained her independence in 1824, assumed the debt due to the Baltimore Company, and after the recognition and adoption of this claim by the Mexican authorities, the Government of the United States made it the subject of negotiation which resulted in its satisfaction, under the Convention of 1839.

Therefore held: that the demand in 1829 constituted a right of property or interest in Gooding, the insolvent, that passed to plaintiff as trustee, by virtue of the assignment under the insolvent proceeding.

The plaintiff is not concluded by the decision of this court in the case of The Administrator of Gooding v. The Executors of Oliver, reported in 58 U. S.

Argued Jan. 24, 1861. Decided Feb. 4, 1861.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

This was a bill in equity filed in the Circuit Court for Baltimore County, Md., by Charles F. Mayer, trustee, &c., the present plaintiff in error.

It states that, under an application of John Gooding, on October 3d, 1829, for the benefit of the insolvent laws of Maryland, the plaintiff in error, and his original co-complainant, John Barney (now dead), were appointed permanent trustees of all Gooding's estate for the benefit of his creditors; and that part of that estate was a claim against the Republic of Mexico, which, by that government's assumption of it in the year 1824, accrued to the insolvent; that the whole of that claim had been vested in John Glenn and David M. Perrine as trustees, to prosecute it for those entitled to share in it before the commissioners under the Convention of April 11, 1839, and that on June 9, 1841, the commissioners awarded payment to Glenn and Perrine of $354,436.42, one ninth of which belonged to Gooding, and that this one ninth was paid over to the executors of Robert Oliver, who claimed it under an invalid assignment from a trustee of Gooding, appointed under an application of Gooding, in 1819, for the benefit of the insolvent laws of Maryland. The bill further states that Gooding died in 1840, and that another John Gooding became the administrator and by bill in equity, filed in the United States Circuit Court of Maryland against the executors of Oliver, is seeking to recover the one ninth share thus paid over to them, and is so claiming it in violation of the rights of the complainants in this cause.

The present bill made Gooding, the administrator, and the executors of Oliver, defendants; and Gooding, as a citizen of Virginia, removed the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

During the suit, the administrator, Gooding, died, and was suceeeded by the present appellee, William P. Whyte; and the trustee, Barney, also died during the suit.

The circuit court rendered a decree dismissing the bill, and the complainant took this appeal.

The facts of the case further appear in the opinion of the court and in the following cases, which have been heretofore determined, relating to the same general subject, to wit:

Gill v. Oliver, 11 How., 529; Williams v. Oliver, 12 How., 111, 125; Deacon v. Oliver, 14 How., 610; McBlair v. Oliver, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 232; Williams v. Gibbes, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 239; Gooding v. Oliver, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 274.

There was an agreement in this case signed by the appellant and the solicitor for Oliver's executors, to the effect that since the stocks and money in question had, in pursuance of orders of the circuit court, come into the possession of Whyte, the claim of the appellant herein, in case of the establishment of his title to said stock and money, is exclusively against said Whyte as administrator.

Messrs. Charles F. Mayer and R. Johnson, for appellant.

Mr. J. Mason Campbell, for Oliver's Executors.

Messrs. G. L. Dulany and W. P. Whyte, for Whyte.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The bill was filed in the court below by Charles F. Mayer, the surviving trustee of John Gooding, appointed under certain proceedings instituted by Gooding before the commissioners of insolvent debtors for the City and County of Baltimore, for the benefit of the insolvent laws of Maryland, in October, 1829. Gooding was an original owner of a share in what is known as the Baltimore Mexican Company, which, in 1816, furnished General Mina with the means to fit out a warlike expedition against Mexico, then a province of Spain. The expedition failed, and Mina perished with it soon after he landed. Mexico having subsequently achieved her independence, the Company made application to the new government to assume the debt, which it did, by a decree of the 28th June, 1824; but payment was delayed, from time to time, until this, with other claims against the government, were adjusted and discharged, under the Convention between this government and Mexico, of April, 1839. The share of Gooding, which was one ninth of the interest in the contract with Mina, amounted, at the time of its allowance by the commissioners under this Convention, to the sum of $39,381,82. The complainant claims this amount, with interest, under the insolvent assignment made by Gooding for the benefit of all his creditors, as already stated, under the insolvent laws of Maryland, in 1829.

The defendant, Whyte, the administrator de bonis non of Gooding, sets up a title to the fund as the personal representative of the estate, and claims it as part of the assets which belong to the heirs and distributees.

The history of the litigation among the several claimants to the money, awarded to the Baltimore Company by the commissioners, under the Convention with Mexico (amounting to the sum of $354,436.42), of which the fund in controversy is a part, will be found in 11 How., 529; 12 How., 111; 14 How., 610; 17 How., 234; and 20 How., 535.

In the case of Gooding v. Oliver, 17 How., 274, the present fund was in controversy between the administrator of the estate, claiming it as assets, and the representatives of Robert Oliver, claiming it by virtue of a purchase from an insolvent trustee, under proceedings instituted by Gooding for the benefit of the Insolvent Act of Maryland in 1819. As between these parties, the court held that the administrator was entitled to the fund as assets of the estate. The reasons for this decree will be found in the report of the case referred to.

Gooding, as has been already stated, again took the benefit of the Insolvent Act in 1829, and the question now is between the trustee appointed under these insolvent proceedings, as assignee of his estate for the benefit of creditors, and the present administrator de bonis non, the personal representative.

The executors of Oliver, who claimed under the trustee in the first insolvent proceedings in 1819, failed to hold the fund against the personal representative in the case referred to, upon the ground the courts of Maryland had decided that the contract of the Baltimore Company with General Mina, which had been made in violation of our neutrality laws, was so fraught with illegality and turpitude, and so utterly null and void, that no claim to, or interest in it, passed under their insolvent laws to the trustee; and such being the construction of a statute of Maryland by her own courts, this court, according to the established course of decision, felt bound by it, and consequently the insolvent trustee took no interest in the Mina contract, nor Robert Oliver, or his personal representatives who claimed under him.

The case now comes before us between the trustee in the insolvent proceedings of 1829, under the assignment for the benefit of creditors, and the present personal representative of the estate of Gooding, the former in the meantime having died; and the principal question is, whether or not this trustee took the interest of the insolvent in the Baltimore Company in 1829, by virtue of these proceedings. If the interest is to be regarded in the same condition as it stood, according to the judgment of the Maryland courts, at the time of the former insolvent proceedings, our conclusion must be the same as in the case of Gooding v. Oliver. The personal representative would be entitled to the fund.

It is insisted, however, by the learned counsel, on behalf of the trustee, that the state and condition of this interest had in the meantime changed, and had become an admitted legitimate demand or debt against the Mexican Government, wholly exempt from any taint of illegality or turpitude, and hence to be regarded as property of the insolvent, to be devoted to the benefit of his creditors.

This interest or demand, as it stood in 1819, at the time of the first insolvent assignment, as we have seen, arose out of a contract between the Baltimore Company and General Mina, which, as admitted, was illegal, being in violation of our neutrality laws. Whether that constituted a valid objection to the assignment under the insolvent laws of Maryland, for the benefit of creditors, is not a question now before us. The affirmative was held by a court having jurisdiction to decide it. If an original question, we should not have had much difficulty in disposing of it. This contract, then, stood simply upon the personal obligation of Mina, and as between the parties it was void and of no effect, if Mina or his legal representatives chose to avail themselves of its illegality. But Mexico, after she had gained her independence in 1824, assumed the debt due to the Baltimore Company as one of national obligation, which had been contracted for the service and benefit of the nation by a general declared benemeritos de la patria. The assumption was the free act of a sovereign power, and wholly independent of the question as to the legal qualities or character of the debt, as viewed under the statute or common law of the country in which it originated. It was assumed by the Congress of Mexico, upon public political considerations, in favor of persons who had contributed their means in support of the struggle which resulted in the achievement of her independence, and the obligation rests, not upon the contract of General Mina, or municipal regulations, but upon the decree of the sovereign power and public law of the nation.

We may add, that after the recognition and adoption of this claim by the Mexican authorities, the Government of the United States, through its minister to that country, made it the subject of negotiation on behalf of the parties in interest, who were citizens, for the purpose of procuring indemnity for the same, and which resulted, as has been already stated, in its satisfaction under the Convention of 1839.

We have no difficulty, therefore, in holding that the demand in 1829 constituted a right of property or interest in Gooding, the insolvent, that passed to the plaintiff as trustee, by virtue of the assignment under the insolvent proceedings of 1829. The case of Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet., 193-220, is a full authority upon this point.

As to the objection that the plaintiff is concluded by the decision of this court in the case of the former, Gooding v. Oliver, 16 How., 274: one of the questions decided in that case furnishes a conclusive answer to it. We need not repeat the reasons or authority which led this court to its conclusion, which are there stated at large.

The decree of the court below reversed and remanded, with directions to enter a decree for the plaintiff against the administrators of Gooding, deceased, in pursuance of above opinion and stipulations of parties.

THE UNITED STATES, Appt.,

v.

JOSE CASTRO ET AL.

(See S. C., 24 How., 346-352.)

Mexican grant, when invalid—record evidence of, is the highest—evidence of loss or destruction of records—what necessary to show, to maintain title by secondary evidence—survey and possession—parol evidence is open to doubt—not sufficient alone—authenticity of, to be first established.

A paper wanting in all the written proceedings which the Mexican law required before a grant could be issued, which had never been seen by any one of the witnesses until produced two years after the cession of the territory, with no evidence of the time or place of its execution, with no trace of it in the Mexican archives, and the witnesses produced to prove the possession contradicting each other, is not entitled to confirmation as a valid grant.

But apart from these circumstances the grant is invalid, and not supported by legal proof, even if all the testimony adduced by the claimants was credible, and the witnesses above suspicion.

Whenever a party claims title to lands in California under a Mexican grant, the general rule is that the grant must be found in the proper office among the public archives; this is the highest and best evidence.

But as the loss or destruction of public documents may in some instances have occurred, upon proof of that fact, secondary evidence to a certain extent will be received.

But in order to maintain a title by secondary evidence, the claimant must show, 1st, that the grant was made in the manner the law required, and recorded in the proper public office; 2d, that the papers in that office, or some of them, have been lost or destroyed; and 3d, that within a reasonable time after the grant was made, there was a judicial survey of land, and actual possession by him, by acts of ownership exercised over it.

The survey and possession are open and public acts, and would support the parol evidence of the former existence and destruction or loss of the grant, and would show the knowledge of the officers of the government of the title claimed and their acquiescence in the justice and legality of the claim.

But without a survey and possession, the authenticity of the grant would have nothing to support it but parol testimony resting only in the knowledge of individual witnesses.

If what purports to be a grant is produced by the party from some private receptacle, and the handwriting of the official signatures proved by witnesses, and even proved to have been executed when it bears date, it is but parol testimony, open to doubt.

There is nothing in the history of Mexican jurisprudence or Mexican grants which would justify this court in supporting a Mexican title made out by such testimony only, or by secondary evidence of any kind short of that above stated.

Written documentary evidence, produced by a claimant from a private receptacle, and proved by oral testimony, is not of equal authenticity and entitled to equal respect with the public and recorded documents found in the public archives.

The authenticity of the grant must first be established before any question can arise upon the conditions annexed by law to such grants, or concerning the certainty or uncertainty of the boundaries specified in it.

Argued Jan. 24, 1861. Decided Feb. 4, 1861.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

Castro, the claimant and present appellee, filed his claim with the Board of Land Commissioners in the State of California, for eleven leagues of land in San Joaquin Valley.

The commission adjudged the claim to be valid.

The United States appealed to the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

That court confirmed the decision of the Commissioners, and the United States appealed to this court.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Edwin M. Stanton, Atty-Gen., for appellants.

Mr. Edw. Swann, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees claim title to eleven leagues of land in California under a Mexican grant.

In March, 1853, they filed a petition before the Board of Land Commissioners, stating that the land in question was, on the 4th of April, 1846, granted by Pio Pico, then Governor of California, to Jose Castro, one of the appellees, under whom the others claim as purchasers. The petition states that the land was occupied and improved by the grantee soon after the date of the grant.

It appears that the paper purporting to be the original grant was deposited in the government archives of the United States, on the 8th of June, 1849, more than three years after its date, and two years after the cession of the territory. It was deposited not by Castro, but by Bernard McKenzie, whose representatives claim a portion of the land under a conveyance from Castro; and the deed to him bears date on the same day—that is, June 8, 1849. The following is the translation of the grant as it appears in the record:

Pio Pico, Constitutional Governor of the Department of the Californias.

[SEAL.]

Whereas the Lieutenant-Colonel of cavalry, Don Jose Castro, Mexican citizen, has petitioned, for the benefit of himself and his family, for a tract of land, for pasturing cattle, on the bank of the River San Joaquin, consisting of eleven leagues, whose measurement is to be commenced from the edge of the Snowy Mountains, following down stream—having previously made the necessary investigations, I have, by a decree of this day, granted to the said Señor the eleven sitios he prays for, declaring to him the ownership thereof, by these present letters, in conformity with the Law of August 18, 1824, and the Regulations of 21st November, 1828, in conformity with the powers with which I find myself invested by the Supreme Government, in the name of the Mexican nation, under reservation of the approval of the Departmental Assembly, and under the following conditions:

1st. He may fence it, without injury to the cross roads, highways and rights of way. He may enjoy it freely and exclusively, directing it to the best cultivation or use which may be to his convenience.

2d. He shall request the judge of that district to give him the juridical possession, by virtue of these patents, who shall mark out the boundaries with the respective landmarks, placing, in addition to them, some fruit trees, or others of known utility.

3d. The land, of which donation is made, consists expressly of eleven (sitios) ranges of large cattle, upon the banks of the San Joaquin. Measurement shall commence from the edge of the Sierra Nevada. The judge who may give the possession shall have it measured with entire observance of the ordinances, and in view of the sketch or topographical plan which the grantee shall present.

In consequence whereof, I order that the present title, being held as firm and valid, be recorded in the corresponding book, and delivered to the party in interest for his protection, and other purposes.

Given in the Governor's house, at the City of Los Angeles, upon common paper, there being none stamped, on the fourth day of the month of April, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six. PIO PICO.

JOSE MATIAS MORENO,

Sec'y pro tem.

Record has been taken of this superior patent in the respective book. MORENO.

The handwriting of Pio Pico and Jose Matias Moreno were proved by a single witness. But no testimony was offered to show when or where this paper was executed, nor any testimony to show who had the custody of it, until it was deposited in the public archives, as above mentioned; nor is any reason given for keeping it out of the public office for so long a time, nor how McKenzie obtained possession of it, except by the deed from Castro, which he produced at the same time. And nothing was then produced to support the grant but this paper; no petition from Castro; no informe, or decree, as required by the laws of Mexico. And notwithstanding Moreno's certificate that a record had been taken of it in the respective book, no trace of anything in relation to it is to be found in the archives of the Mexican authorities; nor was any attempt made to take possession until 1849, for although the appellees state in their petition that Castro took possession soon after the grant was made—that is, in 1846, and some of his witnesses swear to the same fact, and some even carry back his possession to 1844, under a promise of Micheltoreno to make him a grant in that place; yet all of this testimony is contradicted by Vinsenhaler, who appears to have been an active agent in this matter, and directed the surveyor who made the survey in 1853, where he should begin, and where he should run the lines. He says that he was at the place in October, 1849; that Castro took possession in August or September of that year, and built a corral, and had cattle there in the early part of 1850; and that it would have been unsafe, in consequence of the hostility of wild Indians, to have attempted to occupy it earlier. A paper thus wanting in all the written proceedings which the Mexican law required before a grant could be issued, which had never been seen by any one of the witnesses until produced by McKenzie, with no evidence of the time or place of its execution, with no trace of it in the Mexican archives, and the witnesses produced to prove the possession contradicting each other, can hardly be entitled to confirmation as a valid grant. And even if the witness who proves the handwriting of Pio Pico and of Moreno is entitled to belief, yet the conclusion would seem to be irresistible that the paper was fraudulently antedated.

But, apart from these circumstances, the grant is invalid, and not supported by legal proof, even if all the testimony adduced by the claimants was credible, and the witnesses above suspicion.

The grants of portions of the public domain of Mexico, the mode of obtaining them, and the officers by whom they were to be issued, and the conditions to be annexed to them, were, with great precision, regulated by law. This law has so often been referred to and commented on in former opinions of this court, that it is unnecessary to report here its particular provisions. It is sufficient to say that it was required to be in writing, the officers and tribunals before which it was to pass designated, and every step in the process, from the petition of the party to the final consummation of the title, was not only required to be in writing, but also to be deposited and recorded in the proper public office among the public archives of the Republic.

Whenever, therefore, a party claims title to lands in California under a Mexican grant, the general rule is that the grant must be found in the proper office among the public archives; this is the highest and best evidence.

But as the loss or destruction of public documents may in some instances have occurred, it would be unjust that a party should be deprived of his property by reason of an accident which he had not the power to prevent; and upon proof of that fact; secondary evidence to a certain extent will be received.

But in order to maintain a title by secondary evidence, the claimant must show to the satisfaction of the court: 1st, that the grant was obtained and made in the manner the law required, at some former time, and recorded in the proper public office; 2d, that the papers in that office, or some of them, have been lost or destroyed; and 3d, he must support this proof by showing, that within a reasonable time after the grant was made, there was a judicial survey of the land, and actual possession by him, by acts of ownership exercised over it.

The survey and possession are open and public acts, and would support the parol evidence of its former existence and destruction or loss. It would show the knowledge of the officers of the government of the title claimed, and their acquiesence in the justice and legality of the claim.

But without a survey and possession the authenticity of the grant would have nothing to support it but parol testimony, resting only in the knowledge of individual witnesses; for if what purports to be a grant is produced by the party from some private receptacle, and the handwriting of the official signatures proved by witnesses, and even proved to have been executed when it bears date, it is but parol testimony, open to doubt, since its authenticity depends upon the truth or falsehood of the witnesses, instead of resting upon the certainty of the public records of the nation.

We find nothing in the history of Mexican jurisprudence or Mexican grants which would justify this court in supporting a Mexican title made out by such testimony only, or by secondary evidence of any kind short of that above stated.

It will be found, upon referring to the various cases which have come before us from California, that none have been confirmed, unless the grant was established according to the rules of evidence above stated. And they are recognized in the cases of Fuentes v. The United States, 22 How., 445; U. S. v. Bolton, 23 How., 341; Luco v. U. S., 23 How., 615; and Palmer v. U. S., 24 How., 125, decided at the present term. We repeat again these rules of evidence, because it would seem from the case before us that the Board of Land Commissioners and the circuit court regard written documentary evidence, produced by a claimant from a private receptacle, and proved by oral testimony, as of equal authenticity and entitled to equal respect with the public and recorded documents found in the public archives. But such a rule of evidence is altogether inadmissible. It would make the title to lands depend upon oral testimony and, consequently, render them insecure and unstable, and expose the public to constant imposition and fraud. Independently, therefore, of the strong presumptions against the authenticity of the paper produced as a grant, it cannot, upon principles of law, be maintained, even if the testimony produced by the claimant was worthy of belief.

The case of Frémont v. The United States, 17 How., 542, is referred to, both in the opinion of the Board of Land Commissioners and the circuit court, and relied on to support their respective opinions. But that case has no analogy to this. There the title papers, from the petition down to the grant, were found in regular form in the Mexican archives. Their authenticity was, therefore, attested by the record; and the reasons for the delay in making the survey and taking possession were made known at the time to the governor, and approved and allowed by him. All of this appeared in the regular official documents; and the difficulty that arose in his case arose upon the conditions annexed by law to an undoubted and admitted grant. Here the difficulty is, whether there is legal evidence to prove that this alleged grant was ever made by the Mexican authorities. And the fact that it was so made must be established by competent evidence, before any of the questions which arose and were decided in Frémont's case can arise in this.

The authenticity of the grant must first be established before any question can arise upon the conditions annexed by law to such grants, or concerning the certainty or uncertainty of the boundaries specified in it. And in the case before us, the grant itself not being maintained by competent testimony, we need not inquire whether the conditions were complied with, or the description of place and boundaries sufficiently certain.

And for the reasons above stated the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and the case remanded to the district court, with directions to dismiss the petition.

v.

S. M. MEZES, MARIA DE LA SOLIDAD, ORTEGA DE ARGUELLO AND JOSE RAMON ARGUELLO.

(See S. C., 24 How., 268-278.)

Ejectment not defendable, on mere equitable title—what defendants may be joined in—effect of joinder—when separate trial may be had—effect of general verdict.

Defendants claiming under a merely equitable title, are not in a condition to dispute in a court of law the correctness of the survey made by the public officer or resist the plaintiffs' perfect legal title.

Although the circuit court has adopted the mode of instituting the action of ejectment by petition and summons, it is still governed by the principles of pleading and practice which have been established by courts of common law.

In an action of ejectment, a plaintiff will not be allowed to join in one suit several and distinct parcels, tenements, or tracts of land, in possession of several defendants, each claiming for himself.

But he is not bound to bring a separate action against several trespassers on his single, separate and distinct tenement or parcel of land.

Each defendant has a right to defend, especially for such portion of the land as he claims; and if on the trial he succeeds in establishing his title to it, and in showing that he was not in possession of any of the remainder disclaimed, he will be entitled to a verdict.

He may also demand a separate trial, and that his case be not complicated or impeded by the issues made with others, or himself made liable for costs unconnected with his separate litigation.

If he pleads nothing but the general issue, and is found in possession of any part of the land demanded, he is considered as taking defense for the whole.

If a general verdict leaves each one liable for all the costs, it is a necessary consequence of their own conduct, and no one has a right to complain.

Argued Jan. 25, 1861. Decided Feb. 11, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This was an action of ejectment commenced by Mezes and others, the present defendants in error, in the court below, against the present plaintiffs in error; who had intruded upon various portions of a tract of land claimed by the complainants. The verdict having been rendered in favor of the complainants, the defendants brought the case to this court on exceptions taken to the ruling of the court below, excluding certain testimony offered by them and giving certain instructions, the reverse of those requested by them.

The nature of these exceptions appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. B. Crockett and M. Blair, for plaintiffs in error:

1. The Coppinger grant is by metes and bounds and not by quantity, and is without the usual provision as to the surplus. No survey was necessary to locate and segregate the land. A grant or confirmation of a specific parcel of land conveys the title proprio vigore without a survey.

Guitard v. Stoddard, 16 How., 494; Bissell v. Penrose, 8 How., 317; Stanford v. Taylor, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 409; U. S. v. Sutherland, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 363.

2. The grant to Coppinger conveyed the legal, and not a mere equitable title. The fact that it is made subject to the approval of the Departmental Assembly, does not impair its effect as a legal title.

Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal., 589.

3. If the title was before only equitable, the final confirmation by metes and bounds has converted it into a complete legal title, conclusive as against the United States; and after such confirmation there was no title, either legal or equitable, in the United States which it could convey by a patent to a third person.

Layfayette's Heirs v. Kenton, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 197; Guitard v. Stoddard, 16 How., 494; Stanford v. Taylor, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 409; Ledoux v. Black, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 473; La Roche v. Jones, 9 How., 155; Grignon v. Astor, 2 How., 319; Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 How., 344; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet., 410; 3 Dall., 456; Harrold v. Simonds, 9 Mo., 323.

4. If the foregoing positions are not maintainable, nevertheless it cannot be doubted that, by virtue of the grant and confirmation, Coppinger acquired a clear, definite and fixed equity to all the land covered by the grant and included within the boundaries confirmed to him. It is not a general floating equity to a given quantity of land to be afterwards located by a survey, and attaching to no particular land until thus located, but a present and certain equity attaching to this particular tract and to the whole of it. Even where it is not a grant by metes and bounds, but by quantity to be taken within certain exterior limits, as in the case of Frémont, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 542, and Reading, 59 U. S. (18 How.). 1. The Supreme Court decides that the grant conveys a present and immediate interest, subject, however, to be defeated by a subsequent grant of the land to another; but in a grant by metes and bounds, the grantee acquires a direct and immediate interest in the whole, which cannot be defeated by a subsequent grant.

Garland v. Wynn, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 6; Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 How., 62.

5. If the confirmation of the Coppinger grant conveyed or operated by law as a legal title, it is equivalent to a patent, and in an action of ejectment, those holding under it may assail an adverse patent and survey, and dispute their correctness, even without the aid of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1851, establishing the land commission.

Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 How., 462; Doe v. Elava, 9 How., 421.

6. But even though the confirmation is not a legal, but only an equitable title, still it is a definite and fixed equity to the whole land conveyed by the confirmation, and the defendants being in possession under this equity, the plaintiffs' patent and survey cannot "affect" their interest.

See the Act of March 3, 1851; Cousin v. Blanc, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 202.

7. Adverse claimants, holding either a valid legal or equitable title, may contest the correctness of the patent and survey under a conflicting grant, so far as relates to boundaries and location.

Menard v. Massey, 8 How., 293; Boyce v. Papin, 11 Mo., 16; Archer v. Bacon, 12 Mo., 149.

8. The court erred in directing a general verdict against all the defendants when they pleaded separately, and there was no proof of a joint occupancy of any part of the disputed premises. The verdict should have found of what part each defendant was severally in possession, and the court should so have instructed the jury.

Mr. Louis Janin, for defendant in error:

I. By the the uniform legislation of Congress, the title passed out of the government only by the patent. In respect to California land claims, this is especially provided for.

9 Stat. at L., 632; see, also, Hooper v. Scheimer, 64 U. S. (23 How.), 249; Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 450.

II. The title of the plaintiff in error is an equitable and not a legal title. It was a grant by the governor, subject to the approbation of the Departmental Assembly, which it never received. It was unaccompanied by judicial possession and never surveyed, so far as the record enables us to judge.

See Carey Jones' Report of March 9, 1850, pp. 4 and 8; U. S. v. Reading, 58 U. S. (18 How.), 7; Hancock v. McKinney, 7 Tex., 384; U. S. v. Pacheco, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 261; Yontz v. U. S., 64 U. S. (23 How.), 498; Hanson's case, 16 Pet., 196.

III. The title of the plaintiffs in error, being only equitable, cannot be set up in an action of ejectment, as a defense against the legal title of the defendants in error, and any error which may have been committed in the survey of the legal title, cannot be investigated or corrected in this form of action.

Baird v. Wolfe, 4 McL., 552; Fenn v. Holme, 21 How., 483; Hickey v. Stewart, 3 How., 750; Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 436; Minter v. Crommelin, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 88; Boardman v. Reed, 6 Pet., 328; Spencer v. Lapsley, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 272; Field v. Seabury, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 323, Waterman v. Smith, 13 Cal., 373; Bissell v. Penrose, 8 How., 317; Ledoux v. Black, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 475; Willot v. Sandford, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 81; West v. Cochran, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 413; Cooper v. Roberts, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 192; Bryan v. Forsyth, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 334; Ballance v. Papin, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 343; U. S. v. Fossat, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 426; Moore v. Wilkinson, 13 Cal., 478; Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal., 279, and Yount v. Howell, 14 Cal., 465, decided by the Supreme Court of California in 1859, pamphlet edition, pp. 50 and 78.

Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal., 589.

IV. But it will be said that it has been held by the Supreme Court of California, that an action of ejectment will lie directly upon a Mexican grant and that, accordingly, the plaintiffs in error should have been permitted to give their Mexican title in evidence, and to connect themselves with it. By the practice of California, these parties would not be permitted to give that grant in evidence, because it was not set up in the answer.

Piercy v. Sabin, 10 Cal., 22.

But whatever be the rule of proceeding in the state courts of California, the federal courts established in that State are bound to maintain the distinction between cases at law and in equity.

See Bennett v. Butterworth, 11 How., 669: Fenn v. Holme, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 481; Hooper v. Scheimer, 23 How., 249.

V. Another point suggested by the bill of exceptions of the plaintiffs in error is, that inasmuch as they had severed in their answers, they were each entitled to a separate verdict. There might be some reason in this, if in their answers and their proof they had shown their separate holding, and the original plaintiff had obtained against them a verdict for damages in compensation for rents and profits. But to require it in a case like this, would be a vexatious and impracticable technicality. We proved that they were all within the limits of our patent, whatever might be the extent of their respective claims.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants in error are the owners of the tract of land called Las Pulgas, the title to which was confirmed to the heirs of Arguello by this court (18 How., 539). This action of ejectment was brought by them against Greer and a number of others, now plaintiffs in error. The defendants pleaded severally the general issue, but no one of them took defense specially for any definite part of the land claimed in the writ, or made a disclaimer as to any portion of it. The plaintiffs gave in evidence the survey and patent of the Las Pulgas tract, and proved the defendants to be in possession within its boundaries.

Their Mexican title was dated in 1835, and had the approbation of the Departmental Assembly, preceded and followed by possession.

Their grant, as confirmed by this court, is bounded on the north by the Arroyo of San Francisquito, on the south by that of St. Mateo, on the east by the estuary, and on the west by the cañada or valley of Raymundo, "being four leagues in length and one in breadth." The plaintiffs having shown a complete legal title to the land in dispute, were entitled to a verdict, unless the defendants could show a better.

They claimed under a grant to Juan Coppinger, dated in 1840, for the valley of Raymundo, specifying nothing as to quantity, but describing it as bounded on the east by the rancho of Las Pulgas, and on the west by the Sierra Morena, south by rancho of Martinez, and north by the lagune. The espedients provides, that "the judge who shall deliver possession of the land shall have it measured according to the ordinance, specifying the amount of sitios it contains."

This grant had never received the sanction of the Departmental Assembly, nor had possession ever been delivered, or any precise boundaries ascertained by survey; and although confirmed as a valid, equitable claim by the District Court of California, it has never been surveyed, nor had a patent been issued for it under the decree of confirmation. The claim of defendants to the land is, therefore, not yet completed into a legal title. Its boundaries and quantity still remain uncertain and undefined.

The Sierra Morena may be sufficiently definite as the boundary of a State or kingdom, or of a valley, but is certainly a very vague and uncertain line for a survey of land. The eastern boundary called also for the rancho of Las Pulgas; this was also uncertain till the western line of Las Pulgas was correctly surveyed. Coppinger's grant calling for land outside of the Pulgas grant, and to be bounded by it, could have no possible interference or claim to land within it. Hence, the defendants could resort to no other defense than to offer proof that the survey and patent of Las Pulgas were erroneous as regarded the location of the western line, because it embraces a portion of the level land in the cañada or valley Raymundo, which is the call of its western boundary.

It is the refusal of the court to admit testimony for that purpose which is now alleged as error.

The testimony offered might well have been rejected as irrelevant, for it does not follow, that if the western line of Las Pulgas, as run by the Surveyor-General, included level land in the valley, that it was at all incorrect. The western boundary line of Las Pulgas, as adjudged by the decree of this court, had two several points of description to fix its location; one uncertain and vague, the other admitting of mathematical certainty. The call of the Cañada Raymundo on the west is as vague as that for the Sierra Morena, a chain of mountains. But the breadth of one league from the estuary or bay was a certain and definite boundary on the east, and showed conclusively the precise location of the line. Las Pulgas could claim to extend but a league west, whether that reached to the hills on the east of the valley or not, and was entitled to have the league in breadth, whether it carried the western line over the hills or not. Coppinger's grant can claim only what is left after satisfying Las Pulgas, which calls for a certain quantity and a certain boundary. There was no offer to prove that the survey of Las Pulgas was extended beyond such limit.

The court below refused to admit the testimony, not for its irrelevancy, but its incompetency; because the defendants, claiming under a merely equitable title, having neither survey nor patent, were not in a condition to dispute in a court of law the correctness of the survey made by the public officer or resist the plaintiff's perfect legal title.

The fact and the conclusion of the court from it are undoubtedly correct. It is well settled that both plaintiff and defendant must produce a strictly legal title, whether it be in fee or as lessee for years.

The plaintiff had shown a complete legal title; the defendant had not, for the reasons already stated.

The Act of 3d March, 1851, ch. 41, sec. 18 (9 Stat. at L., 681), makes it the duty of the Surveyor-General to cause all private claims which shall be confirmed, to be surveyed, and "to decide between the parties with regard to all such confirmed claims as may conflict or in any manner interfere." It is true this may not preclude a legal investigation of the subject by the proper judicial tribunal. In this case there can be no conflict of title as between Las Pulgas and the later grant to Coppinger, which calls for it as a boundary. The survey is conclusive evidence as to the precise location of the western line of Pulgas, as between these parties in this suit. If Coppinger and those claiming under him charge that this line has not been properly established, either by mistake or fraud, they might have had a remedy under the 13th section of the Act, and may possibly yet have it by filing a bill in chancery. But in this action of ejectment, the defendants cannot call upon a jury at their discretion to alter a boundary line which has been legally established by the public officer specially intrusted with this duty.

The only other exception is, to the following instruction of the court as to the form of the verdict: "That they should find a separate verdict against such of the defendants as were proved to have been in possession, at the commencement of the suit, of separate distinct parcels of the said land held in severalty, and that the jury might find a general verdict against all the other defendants who were proved or admitted to have been, at the commencement of the suit, in possession of some portion or portions of the premises in controversy, the limits or boundaries of whose possessions were not defined by the proof; and this, whether such possessions and occupation were joint or several."

We can perceive no error in this instruction. Although the circuit court may have adopted the mode of instituting the action of ejectment by petition and summons, instead of the old fiction of lease, entry and ouster, it is still governed by the principles of pleading and practice which have been established by courts of common law. The hybrid mixture of civil and common law pleadings and practice introduced by state codes cannot be transplanted into the courts of the United States.

In the action of ejectment, a plaintiff will not be allowed to join in one suit several and distinct parcels, tenements, or tracts of land, in possession of several defendants, each claiming for himself. But he is not bound to bring a separate action against several trespassers on his single, separate and distinct tenement or parcel of land. As to him they are all trespassers, and he cannot know how they claim, whether jointly or severally; or if severally, how much each one claims; nor is it necessary to make such proof in order to support his action. Each defendant has a right to take defense specially for such portion of the land as he claims, and by doing so he necessarily disclaims any title to the residue of the land described in the declaration; and if on the trial he succeeds in establishing his title to so much of it as he has taken defense for, and in showing that he was not in possession of any of the remainder disclaimed, he will be entitled to a verdict. He may also demand a separate trial, and that his case be not complicated or impeded by the issues made with others, or himself made liable for costs unconnected with his separate litigation.

If he pleads nothing but the general issue, and is found in possession of any part of the land demanded, he is considered as taking defense for the whole. How can he call on the plaintiffs to prove how much he claims, or the jury to find a separate verdict as to his separate holding, when he will neither by his pleading nor evidence signify how much he claims? This was a fact known only to himself, and one with which the plaintiff had no concern and the jury no knowledge. If a general verdict leaves each one liable for all the costs, it is a necessary consequence of their own conduct, and no one has a right to complain.

In the case of McGarvey v. Little, 15 Cal., 27, when the same objection was made to the charge of the court, the Supreme Court of California overruled it, and held "that the defendants being in possession, and there being no proof of the particular portions which they severally occupied or claimed, there was no error in refusing to direct the jury to bring in a separate verdict as to each."

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed.

GEORGE B. BISSELL, DAVID T. ROBINSON AND CALVIN DAY, Plffs. in Err.

v.

THE CITY OF JFFFERSONVILLE.

(See S. C., 24 How., 287-300.)

City bonds—laws to obviate irregularities in their issue, are within legislative authority—recitals in bonds, evidence of facts authorising their issue—innocent holders may assume their verity—corporations must adhere to truth in dealings with other parties.

The common council of a city subscribed to the stock of a railroad company, and issued bonds in the name of the City, and delivered the same to the railroad company, in payment for the stock.

Plaintiffs became the holders for value of some of these bonds, in the usual course of their business, and brought suit on coupons for the interest.

Laws, to obviate mistakes and irregularities in the proceedings of municipal corporations when they do not impair any contract, or injuriously affect the rights of third persons, are within the competency of the legislative authority.

Authority on the part of the common council to subscribe for the stock, and to issue the bonds on the petition of three fourths of the legal voters of the City, is shown to have existed.

By the terms of an explanatory Act they were authorized to ratify and affirm the subscription, if the obligation or liability incurred had been contracted on the petition of three fourths of the legal voters of the City.

The Board unanimously resolved to ratify and confirm the contract with the railroad company, and subsequently issued the bonds, reciting in each that it was issued by authority of the common council of the City, "three fourths of the legal voters of the City having petitioned for the same as required by the charter."

The record of the resolution ratifying and confirming the contract, and the recital in the bonds, furnish conclusive evidence in this case that the common council did readjudicate the question, whether the requisite number of the legal voters of the City had signed the petition.

When the contract had been ratified and affirmed, and the bonds issued and delivered to the railroad company in exchange for the stock, it was then too late to call in question the fact determined by the common council, and a fortiori it is too late to raise that question in a case like the present, where it is shown that the plaintiffs are innocent holders for value.

Where, in the bonds or the recorded proceedings, there is nothing to indicate any irregularity, or even to create a suspicion that the bonds had not been issued pursuant to a lawful authority, the railroad company and their assigns, under the circumstances of this case, had a right to assume that they imported verity.

The rule, that a corporation, quite as much as an individual, is held to a careful adherence to truth in their dealings with other parties, and cannot, by their representations or silence, involve others in onerous engagements, and then defeat the claims which their own conduct has superinduced, again stated.

Zabriskie v. The Cleveland Railroad Co., 64 U. S., affirmed.

Argued Jan. 31, 1861. Decided Feb. 11, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This was an action of assumpsit brought by Bissell and others, the present appellants, citizens of the State of Kentucky, in the court below, against the City of Jeffersonville, a municipal Corporation of the State of Indiana, upon coupons of bonds made and issued by the City of Jeffersonville to the Fort Wayne and Southern Railroad Company of the same state, and by that company negotiated to the plaintiffs below. The defendants pleaded the general issue. There was a trial by jury which resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants. From this judgment the present writ of error was prosecuted.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. D. McDonald, Taft & Perry, J. Smith and A. G. Porter, for the plaintiffs in error:

The principal question of the case is: Was it competent for the City of Jeffersonville to go behind her own records, and give evidence to disprove them and show that they were not true? We unhesitatingly say that it was not competent. Whether or not three fourths of the legal voters of the City of Jeffersonville petitioned the common council to subscribe the stock to the Railroad Company and issue the bonds, was a question of fact. This question was evidently to be determined by the council at the time the petitions were presented, or as soon thereafter as it could conveniently be done. This was the understanding of the council as is shown by their action. They appointed a committee to ascertain the fact, and on the report of this committee, by a unanimous vote, solemnly determined that "more than three fourths of the legal voters of the City" had signed the petitions, and placed that determination of the fact upon their records.

Nearly two years afterward the council "confirmed and ratified" the subscription. Neither the council nor any citizen ever controverted the fact so determined, until it was done in this suit.

The bonds were issued by the council under the seal of the City, stating on their face that they were "issued by authority of the Common Council of the City of Jeffersonville, three fourths of the legal voters of said City having petitioned for the same as required by the charter." They are negotiable paper. They were delivered by authority of the council to the Railroad Company on the 8th of May, 1855, to be negotiated. The City, by its proper officers under its seal, certified that the City did subscribe the stock "upon the written petition of three fourths of the legal voters thereof (and largely exceeding this)." These were exhibited to the plaintiffs in error in Hartford, Connecticut, in the latter part of August, 1855, at the time the bonds were negotiated to them, and they took them on the faith of the facts so found, recited, and certified to them by the City under its seal, no citizen of the City objecting or disputing the truth of them. These facts forever estop the City and all its citizens from averring, as against these appellants, that three fourths of the legal voters of the City did not petition the city council to make the subscription, and issue the bonds. They must be held to have told the truth when they say in so many different ways, and in manner so solemn, that three fourths of the legal voters of the City did petition the council to make the subscription and issue the bonds.

1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 22.

1. Because the City was the proper party to examine that question and determine that fact for itself and its citizens, and it did, at the proper time, examine and determine it, and declare upon its records that more than three fourths of the legal voters did petition.

2. Because, over its own seal in the bonds sued on, it averred that three fourths of the legal voters of the City had petitioned.

3. Because it averred to the appellants, over its seal and the signature of its clerk, that the subscription to the Railroad Company was made upon the petition of three fourths of the legal voters of the City and largely exceeding that number.

4. Because, by those acts and words of its, it willfully caused the appellants to believe that three fourths had petitioned and thereby induced them to part with their money on the security of these bonds.

5. Because it and its citizens have acquiesced in the decision on that question made by its council in August, 1853, from that time until the commencement of this suit, in 1856, and its citizens are still acquiescing, and it cannot volunteer a defense in their behalf.

Smead v. Indianap., Pitts. and Cleve. R. R. Co., 11 Ind., 104.

6. Because the appellants are bona fide holders of the bonds and coupons sued on, and were not parties to the fraud, if there was fraud in making the subscription and issuing the bonds.

It will be seen, therefore, that the defendants below were estopped by all of the three kinds of estoppel known to the law.

By record: for the proceedings of the council are made records by the charter of the City.

By deed: for the bonds, being under the seal of the City, are specialties.

The City of Jeffersonville was a Corporation and bound to do what its charter required. It was, therefore, bound to ascertain and decide as to sufficiency of petitions before issuing bonds. An omission to ascertain, or a negligent performance of the duty, would make the City liable to individuals for any loss or injury caused by such omissions or negligence. The principle is thought by some judges to be better settled, which holds a city liable for an attempted performance of duty which misleads and injures, than for a total omission. In this case it was not omission, but the present defense is grounded on the idea that the City, by mistake or fraud, represented that it had performed the duty when it had not, and represented facts to have been ascertained which had not been ascertained. Powers conferred upon those who represent the corporate body are deemed to be conferred upon the corporation itself.

Weet v. Brockport, 16 N. Y., 170, note.

Municipal corporations are liable for injuries occasioned by negligence of officers as well as for mere misfeasance—mere omissions as well as wrong doing.

Conrad v. Ithaca, 16 N. Y., 158; 5 Bing., 91; 3 Barn. & Ad., 77; 1 Bing. N. C., 222; 3 Hill, 612; 3 N. Y., 464; 9 N. Y., 163; 17 N. Y., 104; 62 U. S. (21 How.), 210; 35 Pa. State, 298; 23 Ill., 335.

The defense in this case pressed the point that the act of the city council in question was the act of a tribunal of limited and special jurisdiction. But to make this defense available, they must necessarily ignore and exclude from it the leading feature of the case. They must deny what was the undeniable intent of the Legislature, viz.: that this city council should itself inquire into and find the jurisdictional fact. The record shows that a bona fide petition was filed, numerously signed. In this class of cases, where facts are preliminarily to be proved as basis of the right to employ the process, if the proof has a legal tendency to make out the case required by the statute in a collateral action, the process will be deemed valid.

The decision may be erroneous, but it is not void.

Even in opposition to the record, when, &c." But "not in opposition to express adjudication on jurisdictional facts." Where the judicial tribunal has not general jurisdiction of the subject-matter, but may exercise it under a particular state of facts, those facts must be specially averred and established, and when so established on a hearing of all proper parties, cannot be impeached in any collateral proceeding.

Messrs. R. Crawford and R. Johnson, for the defendants in error:

The fallacy of confounding the common council and the City as if they were the same, runs through much of the plaintiff's argument; whereas, the council was merely the agent of the City.

Mech. Bank v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co., 13 N. Y., 640.

And like any other principal, the City would be bound by the authorized, but not by the unauthorized, acts of its agent.

I. Was it error to permit the defendant to prove that three fourths had not petitioned? As the plaintiffs insisted that it was, and that the recital on the minutes was conclusive on that point, we submit they cannot escape from the inference that it was not the petition of three fourths of the voters, but the false statement on their minutes, that gave the common council the power to issue the bonds. They must also admit this practical consequence to follow, that if the common council should make the requisite recital on their minutes and issue bonds pursuant to it, the City would be utterly powerless to defend against any amount of debt they might choose to incur, no matter how few the petitioners might be, no matter if there was no petition at all, no matter how false in every particular the recital might be provided only the holder was not privy to its falsehold. The defendant, on the other hand, contends that this is a case of entire want of power in the common council to issue bonds, that the requisite petition for their issue was a condition precedent not merely to the exercise, but to the very existence of the power, and that in the absence of such petition, they could not bind the City by recital or in any other way—in short, that they had no jurisdiction of the matter. The distinction is most material between the acts of one who had no power at all in the premises, and the acts of one who had an admitted power to do them, but exercised it irregularly or abusively; the former being absolutely void, the latter either voidable only or absolutely valid. This distinction will help to reconcile many decisions which otherwise seem inconsistent.

The plaintiffs quote and rely on cases of the latter class.

1. It is always competent to show that a court has acted beyond its jurisdiction.

Williamson v. Berry, 8 How., 495; Harrington v. People, 6 Barb., 607; Sharp v. Johnson, 4 Hill, 92; Denning v. Corwin, 11 Wend., 647; Suydam v. Keys, 13 Johns., 144.

And a fortiori may be same be shown of a special tribunal like the common council, which has limited specific powers only; which is no court, and proceeds ex parte.

1 Sm. Lead. Cas., 816.

2. A coroporation, when sued on a alleged contract, is never estopped to prove in defense her want of power to make the contract; much less is it estopped to prove its agent had no power to make it.

Halstead v. New York, 5 Barb., 218; 3 N. Y., 430; Abbott v. Packet Company, 1 Md., ch. 542; Albert v. Bank, 1 Md., ch. 407; 8 Gill & J., 248; Pearce v. M. & I. R. R. Co., 62 U. S. (21 How.), 442; Bridgeport v. Housatonic R. R. Co., 15 Conn., 493.

3. The recital by the council on its minutes that three fourths had petitioned, is at most but prima facie evidence of the fact. No court or officers can acquire jurisdiction by falsely alleging the existence of facts on which jurisdiction depends.

See Harrington v. People, 6 Barb., 610; Noyes v. Butler, 6 Barb., 616; Rex v. Sutton, 4 Maule & S., 532; Bunbury v. Fuller, 24 Eng. L. & E., 493.

To hold otherwise would be to make the jurisdiction depend, not on the facts, but on the naked assertion of those facts.

See Welch v. Nash, 8 East, 394; People v. Cassels, 5 Hill, 164; Barbour v. Winslow, 12 Wend., 104; Doughty v. Hope, 3 Den., 600; Prettyman v. Supervisors, 19 Ill., 414.

4. If such is the rule as to the records of the courts, much less conclusive should be the minutes of such tribunals as the common council, whose proceedings are ex parte and from which no appeal lies. Cases as to tax titles show how completely findings of such Boards are open to inquiry collaterally, as to facts which confer jurisdiction.

See 4 Wheat., 77; 14 Pet., 322; 7 Cow., 88; 3 Den., 595; 4 Blackf., 70; Sharp v. Speir, 4 Hill, 87; Graves v Otis, 2 Hill, 466.

The plaintiffs have argued that the doctrine of estoppel precludes our defense, and have quoted divers cases to support their argument. Now, it will not be pretended that the defendant can be estopped by the unauthorized acts of its agents. Then, with all due respect, we submit it is begging the question to say it is estopped by the acts of its agents, until it is first proved they were authorized to do the acts. When the plaintiffs have fairly established the authority to do the acts, their case is already made out, and they need not trouble themselves about the estoppel.

II. Was it error for the charge the jury that if three fourths of the voters had not petitioned for the subscription to be made and the bonds to be issued, the bonds were void in the hands of the plaintiffs? In other words, if the bonds would be void in the hands of the Railroad Company, are they such negotiable paper, and the plaintiffs such holders of them, that they become valid in the plaintiffs' hands?

1. The bonds were transferable, but were not negotiable in the sense in which bills of exchange are negotiable.

Their negotiability depends entirely upon statute law, and it is perhaps immaterial whether that of Indiana or of New York governs them.

1 Ind. R. S., 1852, p. 378, secs. 1, 3, 6; 2 N. Y. R. S., 1828, p. 284, sec. 58, part 8.

These statutes expressly save to the maker of such paper, defenses against it in the hands of an assignee, which, before notice of the assignment, he had against it in the hands of the payee. No usage can grow up to take away that right.

Lewis v. Wilson, 5 Blackf., 370; Clark v. Farmers' Man. Co., 15 Wend., 256.

2. If these bonds were void in their origin, they could not be made valid by assignments.

"Negotiability can impart no vitality to an instrument executed under a power where the agent has exceeded his actual or presumptive authority. Whoever proposes to deal with a security of any kind appearing on its face to be given by one man for another, is bound to inquire whether it has been given by due authority, and if he omits that inquiry, he deals at his peril."

Mech. Bank v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co., 13 N. Y., 631; see, also, Stark v. Highgate Archway Co., 1 Eng. C. L., 792; Halstead v. New York, 5 Barb., 218; Smead v. I., P. & C. R. R. Co., 11 Ind., 104; Root v. Goddard, 3 McL., 102.

A bill of lading is negotiable;

And the master of a ship has authority to give one for goods shipped on board, and thus bind the owner. But if he gives one for goods not on board, the owner is not responsible to the parties taking it.

So of warehouse receipts, &c.

Bank v. Colt, 15 Barb., 506; Coleman v. Riches, 29 Eng. L. & E., 323.

3. But it was proved that when these bonds were negotiated to plaintiffs, the certificate of the city clerk under the seal of the City was shown to them, which stated the subscription was on the written petition of more than three fourths of the voters, also the certificate of the mayor and clerk that the city bonds had been exchanged for certificates of railroad stock, and even the certificate of the secretary of the Railroad Company that the president was authorized to sell the city bonds. And it is supposed these subsequent acts should in some way estop the City from making this defense. But the plaintiffs have omitted to show that any of those officers had the least authority to bind the City by such certificates.

The powers and duties of mayor and clerk are prescribed by the city charter, but making such certificates is not among them.

4. It is argued lastly, that the City or citizens might have had some remedy against the action of the common council if they had sought it promptly, but they have lost it by lying by till other rights have been acquired in opposition to them. But we emphatically ask, what remedy they ever had, except to defend against the bonds when sued. There was no appeal from the action of the common council. There was no one who could apply for injunction against the issue of the bonds. The City could not do it, for her officers, who alone could bring the action for her, were the very persons who committed the wrong. A citizen could not do it. No one of them was likely to be specially and peculiarly injured by the action, and in such case no private action can be maintained.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana. It was an action of assumpsit, and was instituted by the present plaintiffs against the Corporation defendants, to recover two installments of interest which had accrued upon certain bonds, purporting to have been duly issued in the name of the defendants for stock subscribed in their behalf by the common council of the City, to the Fort Wayne and Southern Railroad Company. Assuming to act in behalf of the City, the common council subscribed $200,000 to the stock of the Railroad Company, and on the 24th day of April, 1855, issued two hundred bonds, of $1,000 each, in the name of the City, and subsequently delivered the same to the Railroad Company, in payment for the stock previously subscribed. Interest on the whole amount of the loan was to be paid semi-annually in the City of New York, at the rate of six per cent., and coupons or warrants for the same, payable to bearer, were annexed to each separate bond. Plaintiffs became the holders, for value, and in the usual course of their business, of thirty-seven of these bonds; and the suit in this case was founded on thirty-seven of the coupons for the first installment of interest, and thirty-six coupons for the second installment. As amended, the declaration contained a count for money had and received, and a special count upon each of the seventy-three coupons. Defendants pleaded the general issue, and also filed a special plea, in bar of the cause of action set forth in the several special counts. More particular reference to the special plea is unnecessary, as it was subsequently held bad on general demurrer, and at the same time the parties went to trial on the general issue.

To maintain the issue, on their part, the plaintiffs, in the first place, introduced one of the original bonds, which is set forth at large in the record. Among other things, it recites, in effect, that it was issued by authority of the common council of the City, and that three fourths of the legal voters thereof "petitioned for the same, as required by the charter." They also gave in evidence, without objection, the several coupons described in the declaration. All of the coupons, as well as the bonds given in evidence, were signed by the mayor of the City, and were countersigned by the city clerk, and the defendants admitted their execution.

Presentment and protest of the coupons for non-payment were also duly proved by the plaintiffs; and to show that the bonds were duly and legally issued, they introduced the records of the common council of the City, and the minutes of their proceedings upon that subject. From that record it appeared that on the 23d day of August, 1853, a petition of certain legal voters of the City was presented to the common council, representing that the construction of the before mentioned railroad would be of great benefit to the public generally, and especially to the commercial interests of the City, and praying that the Board to which it was addressed would subscribe stock in the railroad to the amount of $200,000, and contract a loan for an equal amount, through the issue of city bonds, for the payment of the subscription. That petition purports on its face to have been signed by four hundred and sixty-seven persons, and it recites that they constituted at that time three fourths of the legal voters of the City. On the day of its presentation it was referred by vote of the common council to three members of the Board, who reported, in effect, that they found, upon examination of the petition, and of the poll book of the last charter election, that the names of more than three fourths of the legal voters of the City were appended to the petition, and they also reported a preamble and resolution to carry into effect the prayer of the petitioners. Evidently the report of the committee was entirely satisfactory, as the record shows that the resolution was immediately adopted, without alteration or amendment, by the unanimous vote of the Board.

Without reproducing the document, it will be sufficient to say, that the common council thereby resolved, in case the road came into the City, to subscribe $200,000 to the stock of the railroad Company, and the preamble, which was adopted as a part of the resolution, expressly affirmed the fact reported by the committee, that more than three fourths of the legal voters of the City had petitioned for that object. Pursuant to that determination, the parties having met and arranged the terms and conditions of the proposed agreement, a contract was made with the Railroad Company, that the common council should make the subscription thus authorized, and execute and deliver the bonds of the City to the Company for an equal amount in payment for the stock. Throughout the period when these proceedings took place, the parties to them, it seems, had acted upon the supposition that the 56th section of the general law of the State, for the incorporation of cities, fully authorized the defendants, through their common council, to make the subscription and issue the bonds. Before the bonds were issued, however, the Supreme Court of the State decided, in an analogus case, that no such authority was conferred upon cities by that section. 1 Rev. Stat., 215; The City of Lafayette v. Cox, 5 Ind., 38.

Some delay ensued in issuing the bonds, apparently in consequence of that decision; but on the 21st day of February, 1855, the Legislature of the State passed an additional Act to enable cities which had subscribed for stock in companies incorporated to construct works of public utility to ratify such subscriptions. By the 1st section of that Act, the common council of any city which had contracted such obligations or liabilities upon the supposition that they were authorized so to do under the provisions of the former Act might, "at any time after the passage of this Act, ratify and affirm such subscription;" and upon such ratification it was expressly enacted, that "such subscription, and the obligation and liabilities, and the corporate bonds or obligations issued or to be issued therefor by such city, shall be valid." Sess. Acts 1855, p. 132. To prove such ratification, the plaintiffs introduced the record of the subsequent proceedings of the common council of the City, showing that at their meeting held on the 6th day of April, 1855, it was resolved by the Board, then in session, that the former contract between the City and the before mentioned Railroad Company, "for $200,000, be and the same is hereby confirmed and ratified."

In this connection, the plaintiffs also proved by the same record, that the common council, on the 13th day of April of the same year, authorized and directed the mayor of the City and the city clerk to procure and sign two hundred bonds, of $1,000 each, in the name of the City, and deliver the same to the Railroad Company, reciting in the resolution upon the subject that the proceeding was in accordance with the statute of the State, and the contract and arrangement previously made with the Railroad Company. Prior to the trial, the court, by the consent of parties, appointed a commissioner to take such evidence as either party might direct to have taken, and to report both the evidence and his finding of the facts proved by it, subject to all exception as to the competency of the testimony, and the correctness of his finding. He reported that three fourths of the legal voters of the City had not signed the petition to the common council, which constituted the foundation of their action in making the subscription to the stock and issuing the bonds. This report was accompanied by the several depositions on which it was founded, and the transcript shows that certain portions of the testimony of the deponents tended to prove the fact reported by the commissioner. Defendants offered the report, with the several depositions, in evidence, to prove, among other things, that the petition in question was not signed by three fourths of the legal voters of the City. They also offered oral evidence to prove the same fact. To all such testimony the plaintiffs objected, and also moved the court to suppress all such portions of the depositions taken by the commissioner as tended to prove that a less number than three fourths of the legal voters had petitioned for the subscription to the stock and for the issuing of the bonds. But all of these objections of the plaintiffs were overruled by the court, and the report of the commissioner, with the depositions as taken by him, and the parol testimony, were admitted to the jury, and the plaintiffs excepted to the several rulings in that behalf. Further testimony was then given by the plaintiffs, showing that the bonds in question were negotiated to them for value by the agent of the railroad company; and that the agent, at the time they were received, exhibited to them the certificate of the city clerk, under the seal of the City, giving a condensed statement of the proceedings of the common council from the presentation of the petition to the delivery of the bonds, and affirming, in effect, that all those proceedings appeared of record in the office of the city clerk; and they further proved, that he also exhibited to them at the same time another certificate, signed by the mayor of the City and city clerk, showing that the bonds had been exchanged with the Railroad Company for an equal amount of their capital stock, and affirming that the exchange was authorized by the contract between the parties and the resolutions of the common council of the City. After the testimony was closed, the court instructed the jury to the effect that, if they found from the evidence that three fourths of the legal voters of the City had petitioned for the subscription to the stock, and for the issuing of the bonds, their verdict should be for the plaintiffs; but if they found that three fourths of the legal voters had not so petitioned, then their verdict should be for the defendants. Under the rulings and instructions of the court, the jury returned their verdict in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs excepted to the instructions.

1. On that state of the case the main question presented for decision is, whether it was competent for the defendants to introduce parol testimony to prove that three fourths of the legal voters of the City did not petition for the subscription to the stock and the issuing of the bonds. That question is raised, as well by the exceptions to the rulings of the court in admitting such testimony as by those taken to the instructions given to the jury.

Some further reference, however, to the law under which the common council acted, in making the subscription and in issuing the bonds, becomes necessary before we proceed to the examination of that question. It is conceded on both sides that the defendants had adopted the general law of the State, entitled "An Act for the Incorporation of Cities," before any of these proceedings were commenced. Prior to the adoption of that law by the Corporation, the charter of the City authorized the common council to subscribe, in the name of the City, for any amount of stock in railroad or turnpike companies formed, or to be formed, for the purpose of constructing any railroad or turnpike from the City to any other point, provided the stock so held by the City did not, at any time, exceed $100,000; and with that view, they were authorized to borrow money or issue bonds to pay for such stock. But it is admitted by the plaintiffs that the Corporation, at the date of the proceedings in question, was duly organized under the subsequent general law for the incorporation of cities, which provides, in effect, that the acceptance of that Act by any incorporated city shall be deemed a surrender by such city of its prior charter. By the 56th section of the last named Act it is also provided, that no incorporated city, under this Act, shall have power to borrow money, or incur any debt or liability, unless three fourths of the legal voters shall petition the common council to contract such debt or loan. All of the proceedings in question which led to the contract for the subscription to the stock took place under that provision of the charter; and we have already adverted to the fact that the Supreme Court of the State decided, before the bonds were issued, that, by its true construction, it did not authorize a subscription to the stock of a railroad company. At the argument, the construction adopted by the state court was controverted by the counsel of the plaintiffs. But suppose it to be correct; still the limitation or restriction was one created by the Legislature which granted the charter, and certainly it was competent for the same authority to repeal it altogether, or to substitute some other in its place.

Municipal corporations are created by the authority of the Legislature, and Chancellor Kent says they are invested with subordinate legislative powers, to be exercised for local purposes connected with the public good, and such powers are subject to the control of the Legislature of the State. 2 Kent's Com., p. 275.

Whatever may be the true construction of that section of the charter, it is nevertheless certain that it was under that provision that the petition for the subscription was presented to the common council, and it is equally certain that it was under the same provision that they heard and determined the question whether the petition actually contained the signatures of three fourths of the legal voters of the City. Bad faith is not imputed to the Board, nor is it denied that they acted "upon the supposition" that they were authorized by that provision, on "the written petition of three fourths of the legal voters of the City," to subscribe for the stock and contract to issue the bonds. Having ascertained and determined that three fourths of the legal voters had petitioned, they adopted the resolution reported by the committee, and entered into the contract with the Railroad Company. Clearly, therefore, the common council had contracted the obligation to take the stock; and in case of refusal, would have been liable in damages for a breach of the contract. Other cities in the State had contracted like obligations under similar circumstances; and to remedy the anticipated difficulty, and to remove the doubt first suggested by the decision of the Supreme Court of the State, the Legislature passed the explanatory Act of the 21st of February, 1855, to which reference has been made.

Sufficient has already been remarked to show that the circumstances of the case exhibited in the record bring it within the very terms of the Act; and if so, then the common council might lawfully ratify and affirm the subscription; and upon such ratification it is expressly declared that the bonds issued or to be issued shall be valid.

Mistakes and irregularities in the proceedings of municipal corporations are of frequent occurrence, and the State Legislatures have often had occaion to pass laws to obviate such difficulties. Such laws, when they do not impair any contract, or injuriously affect the rights of third persons, are generally regarded as unobjectionable, and certainly are within the competency of the legislative authority. Unlike what is sometimes exhibited in laws of this description, the Legislature did not attempt to ratify the subscription, but left the matter entirely optional with the common council, as the representatives of the City, to accept or reject the proffered remedy. They elected to ratify and affirm the subscription; and by so doing, gave the same effect to the contract to subscribe for the stock, and to all the proceedings that led to it, as if the authority to make it had been coeval with the presentation of the petition on which those proceedings were founded. No injustice will result from this conclusion, as it is obvious that the contract had been made in good faith, under the full belief that they were duly authorized to subscribe for the stock, and issue the bonds in the name of the City, so that the only operation of the confirmatory resolution was to give the very effect to the proceedings which they had intended, but which, from the defect in their authority, had not been accomplished. Watson v. Mercer, 8 Pet., 111; Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet., 661.

Authority on the part of the common council to subscribe for the stock, and to issue the bonds on the petition of three fourths of the legal voters of the City is, therefore, shown to have existed, and must be assumed in the further consideration of the case. With this explanation as to the authority of the common council, we will proceed to the examination of the main question discussed at the bar.

2. It is insisted by the plaintiffs that the defendants had no right to disprove the verity of their own records, certificates and representations, concerning the facts necessary to give validity to the bonds. On the other hand, the defendants controvert that proposition and insist that it was competent for them, under the circumstances, to prove by parol testimony, that the records given in evidence did not speak the truth, and that, in point of fact, three fourths of the legal voters had not petitioned, as required by the charter. Unless three fourths of the legal voters had petitioned, it is clear that the bonds were issued without authority, as by the terms of the explanatory Act it could only apply to a case where the common council of a city had contracted the obligation or liabilities therein specified upon the petition of three fourths of the legal voters of such city; and if no such petition had been presented, or if it was not signed by the requisite number of the legal voters, the law did not authorize the common council to ratify and affirm the subscription. That fact, however, had been previously ascertained and determined by the Board to which the petition was originally addressed.

After the explanatory Act was passed, the common council were fully authorized to revise the finding of the former Board; and if it did not appear, upon inquiry and proper investigation, that it was correct, it was their duty, as the representatives of the City, to have refused to ratify and affirm the contract for the subscription. Such an inquiry might have been made through the medium of a committee, as it had been when the petition was presented, or in any other mode, satisfactory to the Board, which would enable them to ascertain the true state of the case. By the terms of the explanatory Act, they were authorized to ratify and affirm the subscription, if the obligation or liability incurred had been contracted on the petition of three fourths of the legal voters of the City; and of course, the necessary implication is, that they must be satisfied that the requisite number had petitioned. In making that investigation, however, it was not required that there should be a new petition, and the law is entirely silent as to the manner in which it was to be conducted If the common council was composed of the same persons who had already passed upon the question, further investigation was unnecessary, provided they were satisfied with their former determination. Such of the members as knew the record of the fact to be correct might safely act upon their own personal knowledge, without further inquiry; and if there were any who had not been members of the Board when the prior determination was made, they might ascertain the fact in any mode which was satisfactory to themselves and their associates. Nothing appears in the record to show whether further information upon the subject was necessary or desirable, or, if so, what means were adopted to obtain it; but it does appear that the Board unanimously resolved to ratify and confirm the contract with the Railroad Company, and subsequently issued the bonds, reciting in each that it was issued by authority of the common council of the City, "three fourths of the legal voters of the City having petitioned for the same as required by the charter." Taken together, we think the record of the resolution ratifying and confirming the contract, and the recital in the bonds, furnish conclusive evidence in this case that the common council did readjudicate the question, whether the requisite number of the legal voters of the City had signed the petition. Fraud is not imputed in this case, and it does not appear that it was even suggested at the trial in the court below that the Board neglected that duty at the time the contract was confirmed; but the defense was, that the finding was erroneous, because the petition, as matter of fact, did not contain three fourths of the legal voters of the City.

3. It only remains to consider the effect of that determination as between the defendants and the holders for value of the bonds, without notice of the supposed defect in the proceedings under which they were issued, and put into the market. Two hundred bonds, with twelve hundred interest warrants, or coupons, were issued in the name of the City, and the coupons, as well as the bonds, were payable to bearer. Interest was payable semi-annually, but the redemption of the principal was postponed for a period exceeding twenty-five years. Capitalists could not be expected to accept such paper, and advance money for it, unless the authority to issue it was put beyond dispute. They certainly would not pay value for such securities, with knowledge that the question under consideration would be open to litigation whenever payment, either of principal or interest, was demanded. Purchasers of such paper look at the form of the paper, the law which authorized it to be issued, and the recorded proceedings on which it is based. When the law was passed authorizing the common council to ratify and affirm the contract with the Railroad Company, it must have been understood by the Legislature that the bonds were to be received by the Company in payment for the stock, and used as a means for borrowing money for the construction of the road, and it could hardly have been expected that the object could be accomplished, if, by the true construction of the Act, it contemplated that the bonds should be issued before it was conclusively determined that the requisite number of the legal voters of the City had petitioned the common council. But a much stronger reason why that construction cannot be adopted is, that it would involve an absurdity, as it would render the law altogether inoperative, or else it would admit that the bonds might be issued without authority.

Whether three fourths of the legal voters had petitioned or not, was a question of fact; and if not ascertained and conclusively settled before the bonds were issued, it would remain open to future inquiry, and might be determined in the negative; and clearly the common council could not lawfully ratify and affirm the subscription, unless that proportion of the legal voters had petitioned; and without such ratification, the bonds would be invalid. Beyond question, therefore, that construction must be rejected.

Jurisdiction of the subject-matter on the part of the common council was made to depend upon the petition, as described in the explanatory Act, and of necessity there must be some tribunal to determine whether the petitioners, whose names were appended, constituted three fourths of the legal voters of the City, else the Board could not act at all. None other than the common council, to whom the petition was required to be addressed, is suggested, either in the charter or the explanatory Act, and it would be difficult to point out any other sustaining a similar relation to the City so fit to be charged with the inquiry, or one so fully possessed of the necessary means of information to discharge the duty. Adopting the language of this court in the case of The Comrs. of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How., 544, we are of the opinion that "this Board was one, from its organization and general duties, fit and competent to be the depositary of the trust confided to it." Perfect acquiescence in the decision and action of the Board seems to have been manifested by the defendants until the demand was made for the payment of interest on the loan. So far as appears, they never attempted to enjoin the proceedings, but suffered the authority to be executed, the bonds to be issued, and to be delivered to the Railroad Company, without interference or complaint.

When the contract had been ratified and affirmed, and the bonds issued and delivered to the Railroad Company in exchange for the stock, it was then too late to call in question the fact determined by the common council, and a fortiori it is too late to raise that question in a case like the present, where it is shown that the plaintiffs are innocent holders for value.

Duly certified copies of the record of the proceedings were exhibited to the plaintiffs at the time they received the bonds, showing to a demonstration that further examination upon the subject would have been useless; for, whether we look to the bonds or the recorded proceedings, there is nothing to indicate any irregularity, or even to create a suspicion that the bonds had not been issued pursuant to a lawful authority; and we hold that the Company and their assigns, under the circumstances of this case, had a right to assume that they imported verity.

Citation of authorities to this point is unnecessary, as the whole subject has recently been examined by this court, and the rule clearly laid down that a corporation, quite as much as an individual, is held to a careful adherence to truth in their dealings with other parties, and cannot, by their representations or silence, involve others in onerous engagements, and then defeat the calculations and claims their own conduct has superinduced. Zabriskie v. Cleveland, &c., Railroad Co., 23 How., 400.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the parol testimony was improperly admitted, and that the instructions given to the jury were erroneous.

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions to issue a new venire.

v.

JOHN DEN, Lessee of CHARLES BULKLEY and STUART BROWN.

(See S. C., 24 How., 242-247.)

Tennessee law as to deeds—acknowledgment in another State—where deed not duly acknowledged, copy of record is not evidence—custom cannot change description.

By the laws of Tennessee, the fee in land does not pass unless the conveyance is proved, or duly acknowledged and registered.

In 1839, a deed for land lying in Tennessee could not be acknowledged or proven in another State before the clerk of a court.

The Tenessee Statute of 1856, which it is claimed validated this probate, is prospective.

The Act of 1856 was an amendment of the Act of 1839, and does not carry with it the provisions of the former law.

Where the deed offered in evidence was recorded without legal proof of its execution, a copy of the record cannot be evidence.

The lines of a grant must be governed by a legal rule, which a local custom cannot change.

Argued Jan. 23, 1861. Decided Feb. 13, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee.

This was an action of ejectment, commenced by the present defendant in error in the court below.

On the trial, the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff below, and the case was brought to this court by writ of error.

The case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Joseph B. Heiskell and Horace Maynard, for the plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. John Baxter and Thomas A. R. Nelson, for the defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

Bulkley sued McEwen and Wiley, in an action of ejectment, for 5,000 acres of land. At the trial, the plaintiff introduced a patent issued to Thomas B. Eastland, dated December 21st, 1838, No. 22,261. The plaintiff next offered to read the copy of a deed from Eastland to Bulkley for the tract granted (with other lands); to the reading of which objection was made, but court admitted the copy to be read; to the admission of which the defendants excepted.

By the laws of Tennessee, the fee in land does not pass unless the conveyance is proved, or duly acknowledged and registered. This deed purports to have been acknowledged by the grantor, Eastland, before the Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York, and is certified under his seal of office. And this was accompanied by a certificate of the judge of said court, that Joseph Hoxie, before whom the deed was acknowledged, was clerk, and that the court of which he was clerk was a court of record. On this evidence of its execution, the deed was registered in the county where the land lies; but at what time it was registered does not appear. The acknowledgment was taken October 25th, 1839. At that time a deed for lands lying in Tennessee could not be acknowledged or proven in another State before the clerk of a court.

In 1856, an Act was passed (ch. 115), which it is insisted validates this probate. It provides, that deeds proved or acknowledged before the clerk of any court of record in any of the States of this Union, and certified by the clerk under his seal of office, and the chief magistrate of the court shall certify to the official character of the clerk, the probate or acknowledgement shall be valid. And the 2d section, declares, that all deeds proved or acknowledged and certified in manner aforesaid, may be registered in this State, and shall be good to pass title, &c.

It is insisted, that the Act is retrospective as well as prospective in its operation, and covers the acknowledgment made in 1839, in New York.

We think the Statute of 1856 is prospective, and that to hold otherwise would be a strained construction, and violate a general rule of jurisprudence, to wit: that it is of the very essence of a new law that it shall apply to future cases, and such must be its construction, unless the contrary clearly appears.

It is next insisted that the Act of 1856, being an amendment of the Act of 1839, carries with it the provisions of this law. The Act of 1856 declares that the Act of 1839 "be so amended" that all deeds, powers of attorney, &c., proved or acknowledged before a foreign clerk, may be registered, and have full effect. An additional mode of probate is provided; nor does the Act go any further.

The deed offered in evidence was recorded without legal proof of its execution; and, therefore, a copy of the record could not be evidence. The court erred in admitting the copy to go to the jury.

The plaintiff below described the land sued for in his declaration, which is required to be done by the laws of Tennessee. The declaration calls for the boundaries of grant No. 22,261, made to Thomas B. Eastland, December 21st, 1838. The defendants then gave in evidence two other grants, for 5,000 acres each; one to Thomas B. Eastland, No. 22,267, being one of the tracts contained in the deed from Eastland to Bulkley; and another to Henry H. Wiley, one of the defendants, No. 26,086. The two junior patents covered the principal possession of the defendants, at a place known as Evans' coal bank. This fact was admitted; and it furthermore appeared, that the defendants had held seven years' adverse possession at the coal bank, Under Wiley's grant. And it was insisted below, and is again here, that as Bulkley had shown himself to be the owner of both the tracts granted, and as the operation of the Act of Limitations drew to Wiley's younger patent the title of Eastland's junior grant, and vested this title in the defendants, they were protected by the statute, because Bulkley had the right to sue at all times during the seven years, by virtue of grant No. 22,267. But the court instructed the jury to the reverse of this assumption, and, we think, correctly. From the facts stated, it is true that the right of action founded on the younger grant to East land was barred, to the extent that Wiley's grant interfered with No. 22,267; and assuming it to be true, that the defendants could avail themselves in defense, or affirmatively, of this title, still it could avail them nothing, as both No. 22,267 and No. 26,086 were inferior to grant No. 22,261.

The main question in the cause turns on the fact, whether the possession at Evans' coal bank was within the boundary of the grant No. 22,261, described in the declaration, and alone relied on at the trial by the plaintiff. It calls to begin on the south bank of Coal Creek, four poles below Bowling's mill; thence running south with the foot of Walden's ridge, 894 poles, to a stake at letter H, in Henderson & Co.'s Clinch River survey; then west, crossing Walden's ridge, 894 poles to a stake; then north north 894 poles to a stake, then a direct line to the beginning.

It was proved at the trial, and is admitted here, that no line was originally run and marked but the first one; and that at H there is a marked poplar corner tree, which is a line mark of the grant. It being admitted that the first line is established, and that it is regarded as a north and south line, and that the other lines of the tract were not run or marked, it follows they must be ascertained by course and measurement. How they are to run is a matter of law; and on this assumption, the circuit court instructed the jury as follows: "To identify the land appropriated, the jury must look to the calls, locative and directory, the foot of the mountain, the creek, the coal bank, the marked trees, courses and distance, number of acres demanded and paid for, &c.; and they will look to the survey, full or partial; that assuming the correct mode of survey to have been by horizontal measurement, and that the surveyor based his identification of the land entered on surface measure, in accordance with his custom and the custom of the mountain range of country in which he resided, this would not, of itself, defeat the location of the land, and the boundaries of the grant as indicated by the survey, calls, and other evidence, to all of which they would look in adjusting the boundaries of the plaintiff's grant." To this charge exception was taken. We think the instructions given were too vague and general to afford the jury any material aid in ascertaining the true boundaries of the land granted. The first line calls for two corners admitted to exist; this line must govern the three others. 1 Meig's Digest, 154. It falls short of the distance called for, being only about 800 poles long. Its course being found, the next line running west must be run at right angles to the first one. In ascertaining the southwest corner of the tract at 894 poles from the poplar corner, the mode of measuring will be to level the chain, as is usual with chain carriers when measuring up and down mountain sides, or over other steep acclivities or depressions, so as to approximate, to a reasonable extent, horizontal measurement, this being the general practice of surveying wild lands in Tennessee. The reasonable certainty of distance, and approximation to a horizontal line, is matter of fact for the jury to determine.

The third line running north, from the ascertained western termination of the second, must run parallel with the first line, and be continued to the distance of 894 poles, the chain being levelled as above stated. The fourth line will be run from the northern terminus of the third line to the beginning near Bowling's mill.

The surveyor who made the survey on which grant No. 22,261 is founded, deposed at the trial, "that no actual survey was made in 1838 of said land, except the first line from A to H. That the other three lines of the grant were not run, but merely platted. That the proper mode of making surveys was by horizontal measurement, but that he had not been in the habit of making them in that way; that in making the line from A to H., in this survey he had measured the surface; that the custom of the country was to adopt surface measure; and that he had made the survey in accordance with such custom."

The grantee was bound to abide by the marked line from A to H; but the other lines must be governed by a legal rule, which a local custom cannot change. Should this custom be recognized as law, governing surveys, it must prevail in private surveys, in cases of sales of land, when the purchaser who bought a certain number of acres might, by surface measure across a mountain, lose a large portion of the land he had paid for. And such would be the case of this grantee, were he restricted to surface measure; whereas, by the terms of his patent, the government granted to the extent of lines approximating to horizontal measurement. How far the Act of Limitations will affect the plaintiff's title, will depend on the fact whether Evans's coal bank falls within the boundary of the patent sued on, as it is not claimed that the other possession at a different place on grant No. 22,261, and for which trespass the recovery was had, was seven years old when the suit was brought.

It is ordered that the judgment below be reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial to be had therein.

FRANKLIN MOORE, GEORGE FOOT AND GEORGE F. BAGLEY, Plffs. in Er., v. THE AMERICAN TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

(See S. C., 24 How., 1–41.)

Construction of Act of Congress of March 3, 1851—applies only to commerce between the States, and foreign commerce—commerce on the great lakes, between States, is on same footing as commerce on the ocean—commerce on lakes wholly within a State, not within the regulation of Congress.

In the words "any vessel of any description whatsoever, used in rivers or inland navigation," in the Act of March 3, 1851, the word "used" means "employed," and was intended to refer to vessels solely employed in rivers or inland navigation.

But the business upon the great lakes lying upon our northern frontiers, carried on between the States, and with the foreign nation with which they are connected, deserves to be placed on the footing of commerce on the ocean; and Congress could not have classed it with the business upon rivers, or inland navigation.

If Congress intended to have excluded these lakes from the limitation of the liabilities of owners, it would have referred to them by a more specific designation.

The policy and justice of the limitation of the liability of the owners, under this Act of 1851, are as applicable to the navigation of these lakes as to that of the ocean.

Commerce upon lakes lying within the State, such as the Cayuga, Seneca, and all others similarly situated, is not within the regulation of Congress.

The Act applies to vessels only which are engaged in foreign commerce, and commerce between the States. The purely internal commerce and navigation of a State is exclusively under state regulation.

Argued Jan. 28, 1861. Decided Feb. 18, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan.

This was an action of assumpsit, originally commenced by the present plaintiffs in error in the Circuit Court for Wayne County, in the State of Michigan, against the defendants, a Corporation created by the State of New York. At the first trial, in accordance with the direction of the court, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs. The judgment entered on that verdict was reversed by the Supreme Court of Michigan and a new trial ordered.

See American Transportation Co. v. Moore, 5 Mich., 368.

The case was again tried, and the jury, under the direction of the court, rendered a verdict in favor of the Transportation Company, in accordance with the decision above referred to. The judgment entered upon this verdict was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Michigan, and the case was brought to this court by writ of error.

Several questions not passed upon by the court were discussed by counsel. The main question in the case arose under the 7th section of the Act of March 3d, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 635). The substance of this Act, the facts of the case, and the questions involved, are stated by the court.

Messrs. C. I. Walker and Alfred Russell, for the plaintiffs in error:

The question in this case is, what construction is to be given to the phrase, "inland navigation?" Shall it be held to embrace navigation upon Lake Erie and our great lakes? That this is the obvious natural and popular meaning of the phrase, we think there can be no doubt. This is admitted by Judge Conkling, who suggests, however, different constructions. Conkl. Adm., 109.

It is now clearly settled, that in the construction of statutes the courts will give to the language used, its ordinary and obvious meaning, unless from the statute itself it is clearly apparent that some other meaning was intended. Sedg. Stat. L., 243, 260, 310, 382; Tindell v. Combe, 7 Adol. & E., 788.

Lakes are from their very nature, inland, and must be so, and the navigation upon them must, therefore, be inland navigation.

NOTE.—Liability of carrier by water, for loss or damage of goods.

The common law charges the common carrier, whether by land or water, against all events but acts of God and of the King's enemies, so that a common carrier is an insurer against all perils or losses not within the exception. This rule is part of the common law of this country, and it is not a defense to the claim of an owner that carrier has done the best he could, or that the accident causing the loss was unavoidable. He must bring himself clearly within one of the two exceptions. Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Raym., 909; Trent Nav. Co. v. Wood, 3 Esp., 127; Riley v. Horne, 5 Bing., 217; The Maria, 4 Rob. The expression "act of God" denotes natural accidents, such as lightning, earthquake and tempest, and not accidents resulting from the negligence of man. Carriers by water are liable in all the strictness and extent of the common law rule, unless the loss happens by one of the excepted perils. Story, Bailments, secs. 497, 510, and notes; Spencer v. This common law liability is usually limited by the contract contained in the bill of lading. "Perils of the sea," "dangers of the seas," or "dangers of the rivers or of the lakes, or of water, or of navigation," which are held the same in effect, are usually excepted. Thus, the Caspian, though sometimes called a sea is strictly a lake, being a large collection of water in an inland space.

The word "inland," as applied to navigation or bodies of water, is used as the correlative of ocean or tide-water.

Webster's Dict., "Inland."

We refer to a few only of the many instances in which the terms "inland seas," "inland waters," and "inland navigation," have been used by jurists and other writers in relation to, or so as necessarily to include, the great lakes.

"Inland Seas," Woodbury, J., 5 How., 495; Interior "Lakes," Webster, Arguendo, 6 How., 378; "Inland Seas," Taney, Ch. J., 12 How., 453; "Interior Waters," Daniel, J., 20 How., 314; "Inland Waters," Catron, J., 20 How., 401; "Inland Waters," Clifford, J., 21 How., 22; "Inland Navigation," Shaw, *Ch. S., p. 111.

Indeed, it may well be said that the great lakes are but expansions of the rivers connecting them, and this is the position taken by eminent geographers, some of whom give the length of the St. Lawrence as commencing at the head of Lake Superior.

4 Nat. Cyc., art. "Canada"; 5 Ed. Encyc., art. "Canada"; 9 Am. Encyc., art. "Lake."

The term, "inland navigation" therefore, obviously and naturally includes lake navigation. It is too clearly apparent that the great lakes were to be included within the exception from the fact that all rivers—as well those connecting the great lakes as others—are expressly within it, and there could be no reason why the navigation upon the St. Clair, the Detroit and the St. Lawrence should be governed by a different rule from that of the connecting lakes; the commerce is intimately, nay, indissolubly connected together, carried on by the same vessels in the same voyages, subject to similar perils and similar competition.

Nor can it be said that these rivers are but straits connecting lakes and, therefore, not embraced under the title "rivers."

Straits only connect ocean waters.

Maunder's Scientific Treas., art. "Straits"; Webster's Dict., art. "Straits"; 17 Am. Encyc., art. "Straits"; Rees's Encyc., art. "Straits."

While these connecting waters are strictly rivers, answering in every respect the description of rivers as given by lexicographers and geographers: "A river is a large stream of water flowing in a channel on land toward the ocean, a lake, or another river."

Webster's Dict., "River;" Maunder's Scientific Treas., "River"; 16 Amer. Encyc., "River"; 15 Ed. Encyc., "Phys. Geog.," 599; 4 Nat. Cyc., "Canada"; The Constitution v. The Young America, 1 Newb. Ad., 106.

Nor will it do to say that navigation upon Lake Erie is not inland navigation because it is a great lake. The size cannot alter the question whether it is an inland body of water or not. No such distinction is anywhere recognized, and if any such distinction be attempted, where is the dividing line between a lake that is inland and one that is not? To which class does Lake Champlain, Lake St. Clair or the Lake of The Woods belong? Inland in this connection means remote from the sea.

Neither does the immense importance of its commerce furnish any reason why lake navigation is not included in the term "inland navigation." The very same commerce traverses the St. Clair, the Detroit and the St. Lawrence,

"Perils of the sea" includes such losses only to goods on board, as are of an extraordinary nature, or arise from some irresistible force, or from some overwhelming power, which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of skill and prudence. 3 Kent's Com., 299; Story, Bailments, sec. 512 a; The Reeside, 2 Sumn., 567; Potter v. while the magnitude of lake commerce is rivaled by that of the Mississippi and the Hudson, and their commerce is expressly within the exception.

Nor does the fact that the commerce of the lakes is within admiralty jurisdiction furnish any reason why it should not be included within the term "inland navigation." The commerce of all the great rivers of the continent is equally within this jurisdiction, and it is expressly within the exception, and it is inland as well as river navigation.

The lakes and rivers, and the commerce and navigation of the lakes and rivers of the west are usually mentioned together, and it is hardly conceivable that different rules should be applied to each.

The fact that Lake Erie is a border lake, and that through it runs the national boundary line, furnishes no reason why its navigation is not inland. The term "inland" can have no such meaning as "interior," within the country within the national boundary line. This rule will bring within the exception lakes Michigan and Champlain, and exclude from it lakes no larger, Erie and St. Clair. Rivers, too, form boundary lines, and upon any such construction are they within or without the exception?

We submit, then, that the locality of the water, whether within or without our territorial limits, does not determine the character of the navigation, whether inland or not; that it cannot be that Lake Champlain is "inland," and Sorel River "outland," Lake Michigan inland and Lake St. Clair not, the Mississippi inland and Pigeon River not.

It has been suggested that these great lakes are no more "inland" than the close and narrow seas, like the Baltic and the Mediterranean, and that the navigation of those seas is never termed "inland navigation."

But the analogy does not hold. The very term "inland" implies remote from the sea or tide-water, and while the lakes are great like close seas, they are still remote from tide-water and, therefore, inland; while the seas are a part of the great ocean, on its level or nearly so, swept by its tides, governed by its laws, and like the ocean itself, not subject to dominion but a pathway for all nations.

Wheaton's International Law, 150, 158; Vattel's Law of Nations, 187, 194; Campbell, J., Jackson v. Magnolia, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 340.

It has also been suggested that the reason why river and inland navigation was excepted from the operation of the Act of 1851 was, that there was serious doubt as to the jurisdiction of Congress over such navigation, while in relation to the navigation upon the great lakes, no such doubt existed.

But it is well settled that Congress has the same jurisdiction over navigation upon rivers that it has over that upon the lakes, and that it has no jurisdiction over either, except as it extends between States or with foreign nations.

Fretz v. Bull, 12 How., 466; Jackson v. Magnolia, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 296; Allen v. Newberry, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 244; Maguire v. Card, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 248.

There are few authorities bearing directly upon the question involved.

See 1 Conk. Adm., 209; 1 Pars. Ship., 401.

The Supreme Court of the Western District of New York at the February Term, 1858, in the case of Root v. Hart, decided that lake navigation was included within the exception by the phrase "inland navigation."

The Supreme Court of the City of Buffalo made the same decision, after fully considering the opinion of the court below in this case.

Bresler v. M. S. & N. I. R. R. Co., December Term, 1858. See, also, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 26.

An attempt to apply the term "inland navigation" in this country, as it exists in England, would be as difficult and impracticable as to apply here the English definition of navigable water.

Bowman v. Wathen, 2 McLean, 382; Ang. Wat. Courses', secs. 545, 550.

Or, as unreasonable as to adopt the English definition of admiralty jurisdiction, limiting it to the high seas outside the limits of any county. This rule was never adopted in this country.

The Jefferson, 10 Wheat., 428; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet., 342; U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet., 72.

The Supreme Court of the State of Michigan referred to several English decisions, to show that when a specific class of vessels was named in a statute, followed by general words that the latter were to be construed to apply only to vessels of the same class of build or business, and the inference, that they suggest rather than state, is that the words "vessels of any description whatsoever," are controlled by the vessel previously described, and must be held to apply only to vessels like barges, canal boats and lighters, and used in the same way.

5 Mich., 384.

We submit that there is no such arbitrary rule of construction, and whether the general words are thus be controlled and construed is a question of intent, to be drawn from the whole Act.

Here it is apparent that there is no such intent. Canal boats, barges and lighters, wherever and however used, are to be excluded from the benefits of the Act, and the words "any vessel," &c., are not used at all to enlarge the number and kind of vessels thus excluded. The object of the remaining part of the exception is to exclude from the benefits of the Act, vessels of every description, large or small, used in a certain way, viz.: in rivers or inland navigation, and to give the construction contended for would extend the benefit of the Act to all large vessels however used, and thus defeat the obvious intent of the Act of excepting from its benefit all vessels used in rivers and inland navigation.

In this respect the exception of the Act of Congress requires a different construction from the exception in the Stat. 53, sec. 8. There is but one class of vessels affected by this, other than unregistered ones.

But the English cases cited, so far from favoring the view suggested by the court, seem to us to have a directly contrary effect.

Hunter v. McGown, 1 Bligh, 574; Morewood v. Pollock, 18 Eng. L. & E., 343; 5 Mich., 384; Blanford v. Morrison, 15 Q. B., 724; Regina v. Reed, 28 Eng. L. & E., 133; Reed v. Ingham, 26 Eng. L. & E., 164; Tisdell v. Combe, 7 Adol. & E., 788.

We submit that none of these cases in the remotest decree authorize or favor the construction; that the words "any vessel of any description" are to be limited to vessels of the same kind or business as canal boats, barges and lighters.

It is further suggested that the navigation of the lakes is not to be deemed inland, because lake vessels also navigate the ocean. This is equally true of vessels navigating the great rivers, and the question whether such vessels are used in ocean navigation or in inland, must be determined precisely as such questions have before been determined. The question will be: what is the navigation in which they are principally used?

See The Coal Boat D. C. Salisbury, Olcott's Adm., 74; Buckley v. Brown, Bright's Dig. U. S. Laws, 305; McCormick v. Ives, Abb. Adm., 418; N. J. Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bk., 6 How., 392; Wallis v. Chesney, 4 Am. Law Reg., 307.

Mr. George B. Hibbard, for defendant in error:

The steamboat, at the time of her being burned, was not "used in inland navigation," and, therefore, the defendant in error, though a common carrier, was not liable for the loss of the goods.

The Act entitled "An Act to limit the liability of ship owners and for other purposes," exempts the defendant in error from that liability. 9 Stat. at L., 635.

The principle of the Act, unqualified by the limiting clause in question, has been operative in all modern civilized nations possessing a national commerce, whenever the policy of such nations has been finally adapted to the exigencies of that commerce.

By the civil law itself, the owners of vessels were liable in matters ex delicto, according to the amount of their respective interests in the ship. This, however, was not the case in matters arising ex contractu.

2 Br. Civ. & Ad. L., 136, 138, 141; The Rebecca, 1 Ware, 194, 195.

The principle of this rule was adopted by nearly, if not quite all, the maritime powers of Europe, excepting England; though England soon adopted it by legislation, with the important qualification, however, that the extent of the liability, both in matters arising ex contractu and ex delicto, should be equal only to the amount of the interest of the owner sought to be charged in the ship itself.

Grotius de jure belli et pacia, Liv. 2, chap. 11, sec. 18; Marine Ordinance, Louis XIV., tit. 4; 2 Pet. Ad. Decis., Appendix, 16; Cleirac, Navigation des rivieres, art. 15, p. 502; Consulat de la Mer., ch. 34; The Rebecca, 1 Ware, 195, 196, 197.

The whole principle which led to the legislation in England (and which legislation was the source of our own Act), was recognized in its application to ships; and that, too, be it observed, without limitation as to the waters upon which the ships were navigating.

Abb. Ship., 395; see, also, Boucher v. Lawson, Rep. temp. Hardwicke, 85; Abb. Ship., 395; Sutton v. Mitchell, 1 T. R., 18; Forward v. Pittard, 1 T. R., 27.

These decisions were followed (in the enlightened policy of promoting so much of commerce as was really national) by the Acts of 26 Geo. III., ch 86, in 1786; and this by 53 Geo. III., ch. 159, in 1813.

The courts have recognized the whole objects of this legislation to be "to encourage persons to become the owners of ships."

Gale v. Laurie, 5 Barn. & C., 156.

The Acts of Geo. III. are the sources and almost the exact originals of the Act of Congress of 1851.

The common law rule, unqualified by legislation, became the law of this country. The case of The Lexington was decided in 1848 (The N. J. S. N. Co. v. The Merchants' Bank, 6 How., 344), and was followed by the Act of 1851.

The causes which led to the passage of the Act of 1851 were, therefore, precisely similar to those which led to the English legislation. The Acts of both countries are essentially the same. The commercial policy of both countries and the objects to be subserved by the legislation of each in this particular in each case are alike. The authorities of either country bearing directly upon either of the Acts of kindred legislation, must aid in the construction sought for.

Approaching the immediate question, the defendant in error claims directly that the navigation of Lake Erie and the great western lakes is not "inland."

The meaning of the words "inland navigation," as thus employed, does not include the navigation of such waters.

The question is not what is the geographical meaning of the word "inland," used in distinguishing seas from oceans, or the waters within the body of a continent from the high seas. The question is as to the meaning of the phrase "inland navigation," employed in reference to a commercial business and to promoting commercial objects. In this view, the meaning of the same words, or equivalent phrases in the same connection, are the true governing authorities, so far as mere definition is concerned.

The exact definition of the word "inland," as well as the phrase "inland navigation," shows that such navigation is not the navigation of the great western lakes.

Webster's Dict. "Inland"; Worcester's Dict., "Inland"; Rees, Encyclopedia, "Inland Navigation"; Encyc. Brit., "Navigation Inland."

The word "inland" thus used is opposed in meaning to the word "foreign." Burrell's Law Dict., "Foreign;" Story, Bills, secs. 22, 23; Conk. Adm., 57.

The consideration of some decisions may further illustrate this view. The Statute of Limitations of the State of Georgia provided that in certain cases it should not apply to parties "beyond seas." It was held that the phrase meant beyond the limits of the State, irrespective of the question whether or not the party was in fact beyond any sea or other water.

Murray v. Baker, 3 Wheat., 541; Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat., 361.

Beyond the jurisdiction or the State of Georgia, the party was "beyond seas"—beyond the control of the jurisprudence of that State, and necessarily, therefore, not "inland."

Upon the actual meaning, therefore, of the word "inland" so used, it must be determined that the words "inland navigation" in the statute signify only a navigation carried on within the body of the country; and doubtless (particularly when considered, as the question must be, and is hereinafter, under the power of Congress over commerce), when applied to lake navigation, a navigation conducted beneath the jurisprudence of a single State. It means a navigation which, when carried on on the lakes, is not the coasting trade.

The navigation "to be inland" must be on waters themselves "inland." The great western lakes are not such inland waters.

This is a question of commerce and of law, not of geography. Other waters exist upon the face of the globe the precise parallel of the western lakes in commercial and legal view, which certainly are not "inland"; therefore the western lakes are not "inland."

The case of The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 443, which will be hereafter adverted to in a more important view, established the principle that the business of the western lakes and their national position determined their commercial and legal character, and that the distinctions convenient in England of the rise and fall of the tide and of the saltness of the water, had nothing to do with thus fixing that character. Excluding, therefore, once for all, these immaterial tests, the great western lakes, when viewed in comparison with other waters, not only are not "inland," but are commercial and legal seas.

Waters, over which extended the body of admiralty law which never was applicable to an "inland" trade, certainly never were "inland."

The Twee Gebroeders, 3 C. Rob., 336.

Our waters, their very parallel in every physical, commercial and legal feature, and over which the same body of laws as was decided in The Genesee Chief case from the very character of the waters, extends to-day, equally are not inland.

But as has been said, these waters are commercial and legal seas and, therefore, their navigation cannot be "inland." They are extra fauces terræ.

The Harriet, 1 Story, 251, 259.

They are waters where, to adopt the language of Sir Matthew Hale, "a man may not discern from shore to shore."

De port Maris Harg. Tracts, ch. 4, p. 10; Hawkins Pl. C., b. 2, ch. 9, sec. 14; U. S. v. Grush, 5 Mas., 290, 298.

They are not within the boundary of any county; and within the definition of Lord Coke himself, are not, therefore, inland.

4 Inst. 140, ch. 22; 2 East, P. C., ch. 17, sec. 10; Com. Dig. Adm., E, 7; De Lovio v. Boit, 2 Gall., 398, 426, 427; Waring v. Clarke, 5 How., 441, 462.

They are bordered not only by the States constituting the United States, but by the province of a foreign nation. Their navigation is subject to all the hazards that attend that of the ocean. "Hostile fleets," to use the language of Chief Justice Taney in The Genesee Chief, "have encountered upon them and prizes have been made there." The same system of admiralty law applies to them as to the commerce of the remoter oceans. That commerce is equally extensive with that of our foreign commerce itself.

It is repeated, there is not a characteristic (excluding the immaterial ones of the ebb and flow of the tide and the saltness of the water) excluded by The Genesee Chief, and which in this view always would have been excluded. (2 Pet. Ad. Decis., LXXI. Spellman, subj. Adm. Juris., 226; 2 Hale, P. C., 16) belonging to the "high seas"—the "main sea" of Coke and Hale and Seldon and Blackstone, which does not belong to the western lakes. How, then, can their navigation be termed inland? Would the navigation of such waters be termed inland within the meaning of the Statutes of Geo. II. and Geo. III.? Would the navigation of the waters of the "four seas" (Hargrave & Butler's Notes to Co. Litt., l. 2, ch. 6, sec. 157; Chit., Com. L., 88–102), including St. George's Channel or the Irish Sea, be deemed "inland" by an English court, construing the language in question as used in the Statutes of Geo. III.?

Some minor considerations will show in this connection that such navigation cannot be called inland.

By the law of nations, exclusive national jurisdiction for certain purposes is established over at least a marine league from the coast.

1 Kent's Com., 27, 28. The whole of Delaware Bay has been determined to be within national jurisdiction.

Opinion of Edmund Randolph, Atty-Gen. U. S., 1; Opinion, Atty-Gen., 13.

The navigation of none of these waters would be termed "inland," yet it should be if the western lakes are "inland."

The object of the law determines the fact that the navigation of the lakes is not "inland" within the meaning of the Act.

In ascertaining the object of the law, the court cannot, in the language of Chief Justice Taney, in any degree be influenced by the construction placed upon it by individual members of Congress in the debates which took place on its passage. We must gather the intention of Congress from the language used in the law, comparing it, where ambiguity exists, with the laws upon the same subject, and looking, if necessary, to the public history of the times in which it was passed.

The value of the property annually carried in the transactions of lake commerce exceeds $600,000,000 (exceeding the total value of property exported and imported in the United States in its foreign trade). It is conducted in more than sixteen hundred vessels, with an aggregate burden exceeding 400,000 tons.

Report of Com. of Commerce to H. of R. 1826, Vol. III., No. 316, pp. 9, 10, 11; Report of Hon. I. T. Hatch, Commissioner, &c., to H. of R., June 18, 1860.

The strictly foreign trade with Canada alone on the lakes exceeds $30,000,000 in amount annually, making our strictly foreign commerce with Canada a third in actual value and first in the amount of tonnage employed, compared with our commerce with all the foreign countries with which we have any trade.

Considering, therefore, the undoubted objects of the Act, the immediate cause which led to the passage of the Act—the loss of The Lexington, running in the coasting trade like the vessels on the western lakes, the extent of the waters on which the commerce is conducted, the extent and national importance of that commerce itself, it certainly must be apparent that the promotion of such a commerce must have been within the objects of the Act.

Our whole system of statutory law, in reference to the coasting trade, establishes the fact that such a trade has never been regarded as "inland in its character."

The whole spirit of express legislation on these subjects shows such to be the fact.

Watson v. Marks, 2 Am. Law Reg., 157. U. S. Dist. Court, E. Dist. Penn.; Champlain and St. L. R. R. Co. v. Valentine, 19 Barb., 484.

Admiralty jurisdiction, it was held in The Genesee Chief, extends over the Western lakes. They cannot, therefore, be "inland."

The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 443; The Chas. Mears, 1 Newberry, 197; Woolrych Law of Waters (Law Library), 62.

Admiralty jurisdiction was never held; and, regarding the remedies administered under it, never could have been held, to extend over inland navigation.

1 Curtis, Juris. Courts, U. S., 34, 48; De Lovio v. Boyt, 2 Gall., 393, 436, 468, and authorities cited.

This may especially be said under the recent decisions, that admiralty jurisdiction does not include matters relating to transactions taking place within the limits of a single State.

Allen v. Newberry, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 244; Maguire v. Card, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 248.

Congress intended by the phrase "inland navigation" simply to exclude from the operation of the Act only such places as it could not, under the Constitution, exercise such power over.

Congress has no power under the Constitution to legislate as to commerce carried on within the bounds of any one State.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1, 195; Steamboat Co. v. Livingston, 3 Cow., 713, 755.

Congress has the constitutional power to exercise Legislation over the western lakes.

The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 443.

Had it been the intent of the Act that it should not apply to any of the lakes, the words "rivers and lakes" would have been used. As it is, it uses the term "inland navigation," and so uses it in the meaning given it by the courts—the navigation of waters within the bounds of a single State over which Congress has no control.

Steamboat Co. v. Livingston, 3 Cow., 755; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 194; The James Morrison, 1 Newberry's Adm., 241, 246; Sewell v. Jones, 9 Pick., 412, 414.

In short, a proviso carves special exceptions only out of the enacting clause; and those who set up any such exception must establish it as being within the words as well as the reasons thereof.

The U. S. v. Dickson, 15 Pet., 141, 165.

II. The steamer in question was not, within the meaning of the Act, a "canal boat, barge or lighter, or vessel of any description whatsoever," and therefore the Act in question applies to her owner, and exempts the defendant in error from liability.

The body of the Act should be construed liberally, and the excepting clause strictly. The whole object of the Act sustains the position here taken, that under familiar rules of construction, the quoted words do not include steamboats of the class of The Spaulding. Canal boats, barges, lighters and other vessels of the same general kind, are not exposed to the hazards of the more important vessels, and the owners, therefore, do not need the same protection.

General words, such as the word "vessel" used in connection with particular words, such as canal boat, barge and lighter, can only be construed to mean something of the same kind and of no larger consequence than the things particularly named.

Dwar. St., 704, 706, 707; Broom, Leg. Max., 455.

This rule, about which there can be no doubt as applied to very similar words, is plainly shown in various cases.

In Regina v. Reed, it was expressly decided that a steam tug did not come within the meaning of the language, "Whereby, lighter or other craft," for the reason, as expressed by Lord Campbell, that "a steam tug is not a vessel ejusdem generis," as "wherry and lighter."

Reg. v. Reed, 29 Eng. L. & E., 133, 135.

The same question is again fully considered and further illustrated in Reed v. Ingham, 26 Eng. L. & E., 164; Sandiman v. Beach, 7 Barn. & C., 96 (14 Eng. C. L., 23), and Cashier v. Holmes, 2 B. & Ad., 592 (22 Eng. C. L. 146).

Similar rules govern the construction of contracts, and indeed the principle is undoubted.

2 Pars., Cont., 15, note (R), and 262 A, note (H. C.), and the very many cases cited.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan.

The suit was brought by the plaintiffs in the court below against the defendants, a Company incorporated under the laws of New York, and owners of the steam propellor M. B. Spaulding.

The goods in question were put on board of the propeller at Buffalo, on the 30th October, 1856, for transportation to Detroit, and on the next day they took fire, and vessel and goods were entirely consumed, without any default or negligence of the master or crew, or any knowledge of the defendants, their officers or agents. The propeller was of more than twenty tons burden, and was enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, and engaged in navigation and commerce, as a common carrier, between ports and places in different States upon the lakes, and navigable waters connecting the same.

The defendants relied, in their defense, upon the Act of Congress, passed March 3d, 1851, 9 Stat. at L., 635, entitled "An Act to limit the liability of ship owners, and for other purposes."

The 1st section provides that no owner of any ship or vessel shall be liable to answer for any loss or damage which may happen to any goods or merchandise which shall be shipped on board any such ship or vessel, by reason of any fire happening on board the same, unless such fire is caused by design or neglect of such owner, with a proviso that the parties may make such contract between themselves on the subject as they please.

The 2d section provides against any liability of the owner of the vessel, in case of precious metals, &c., unless notice and entry on the bill of lading.

The 3d section provides against liability of the owner, in cases of embezzlement or loss, &c., by the master, officers, &c., of any property shipped on board, or for any loss by collision, &c., without the privity or knowledge of the owner, exceeding the value of his interest in the ship and freight.

The 4th section provides for an apportionment of the proceeds, in case of the sale of the vessel, among the several freighters or owners of the goods, if these and the freight should not be sufficient to pay each loss.

The 6th section saves the remedy against the master and hands, in case of embezzlement or loss, or for any negligence or malversation by these persons.

The 7th section, after providing a penalty for shipping oil of vitriol, and such dangerous materials, without notice to the master, is as follows: "This Act shall not apply to the owner or owners of any canal boat, barge or lighter, or to any vessel of any description whatsoever, used in rivers or inland navigation."

It is insisted, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the navigation of Lake Erie, and also of all the other lakes in connection therewith, is within the exception to this Act, as falling within the words "inland navigation." The question thus raised is not without difficulty, as we have no clear or certain guide to lead us to the true meaning, attached to these words, by Congress. Looking at them in a very general sense, and without much regard to the reasons or policy of the law, it may, with some plausibility be urged, as has been, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that the phrase "inland navigation" was used as contradistinguished from navigation upon the ocean; and that all vessels navigating waters within headlands, and after they have passed out of the ocean, come within the designation. But a construction thus broad can hardly be maintained, for it would be unreasonable to suppose that Congress intended to apply one rule of responsibility to the owner in respect to the same vessel upon the ocean, and another upon the bays or rivers, in the course of the same voyage. Besides the absence of any good reason for such a distinction as to the rule of responsibility, it would have seriously embarrassed all parties engaged in commerce of this description in respect to their securities against accidents, and losses by means of insurance, bills of lading, charter parties, &c.

The connection in which this term "inland navigation" is used in the Act, we think, may throw some light upon the intent of the law makers.

It is declared that the Act shall not apply to the owner of any canal boat, barge or lighter, or to any vessel of any description used in rivers or inland navigation. It will be seen that certain craft is excepted from the Act eo nomine, and then a class of vessels without any designation, other than by a reference to the waters or locality in which used. But the character of the craft enumerated may well serve to indicate to some extent, and with some reason, the class of vessels in the mind of the law makers, which are designated by the place where employed. This class may well be regarded ejusdem generis, and thus aid us in interpreting the true meaning of the words of the Act, namely: vessels "used in rivers or inland navigation."

Many of the provisions of this Act were taken from the 53 Geo. III., ch. 159, as also the exception to the enacting clause. The exception in the English Act is as follows: that nothing in this Act shall extend to the owner of any "lighter, barge, boat or vessel of any description whatsoever, used solely in rivers or inland navigation."

The language of this exception is more specific than that used in ours; but the meaning intended to be conveyed, we think substantially the same. The words in ours are, "any vessel of any description whatsoever, used in rivers or inland navigation." This word "used" means, in the connection found, "employed," and doubtless, in the mind of Congress, was intended to refer to vessels solely employed in rivers or inland navigation. It was this species of navigation—that is, on rivers and inland—which was intended to be withdrawn from the limitation of the liability of the owner; and the addition of the term "inland navigation," as an alternative to rivers, was, doubtless, designed, speaking in a general sense, to embrace all internal waters, either connected with rivers, but which did not, in a geographical or popular sense, fall under that name, or which might not be connected with rivers, but fell within the reason or policy of the exception, such as bays, inlets, straits, &c. Vessels, whatever may be their class or description, solely employed upon these waters, are usually employed in the trade and traffic of the localities, carried on chiefly by persons residing upon their borders, and connected with the local business, and without the formalities and precautions observed in regular commercial pursuits, with a view to guard against accidents and losses, such as insurance, bills of lading, &c. It was fit and proper, therefore, in this description of trade and traffic, that the common law liabilities of the carrier should remain unaltered.

But the business upon the great lakes lying upon our northern frontiers, carried on between the States, and with the foreign nation with which they are connected (and this is the only business which Congress can regulate, or with which we are dealing), is of a very different character. They form a boundary between this foreign country and the United States for a distance of some twelve hundred miles, and are of an average width of at least one hundred miles; and this, without including Lake Michigan, of itself three hundred and fifty miles in length and ninety in breadth, which lies wholly within the United States. The aggregate length of these lakes is over fifteen hundred miles, and the area covered by their waters is said to be some ninety thousand square miles. The commerce upon them cor responds with their magnitude.

According to the best official statistics, the value of the property annually, the subject of this commerce, exceeds $600,000,000, employing more than sixteen hundred vessels, with an aggregate tonnage exceeding four hundred thousand tons. These vessels are duly licensed for the foreign trade, as well as for that carried on coastwise. This commerce, from its magnitude, and the well known perils incident to the lake navigation, deserves to be placed on the footing of commerce on the ocean; and we think, in view of it, Congress could not have classed it with the business upon rivers, or inland navigation, in the sense in which we understand these terms.

These lakes are usually designated by public men and jurists, when speaking of them, as great inland waters, inland seas, or great lakes; and if Congress intended to have excluded them from the limitation of the liabilities of owners, it would have been most natural and reasonable, and, indeed, almost a matter of course, to have referred to them by a more specific designation.

The decision in the case of The Lexington, which was burned upon Long Island Sound, led to this Act of 1851. That case was decided in 1848, subjecting the carrier in case of a loss by fire. 6 How., 344.

The sound is but one hundred and ten miles in length, and from two to twenty in breadth.

The waters of these lakes, in the aggregate, exceed those of the Baltic, the Caspian, or the Black Sea, and approach in magnitude those of the Mediterranean. They exceed those of the Red sea, the North Sea or German Ocean, the Sea of Marmora, and of Azoff. And, like the lakes, all of these seas, with the exception of the North Sea, are tideless. The marine disasters upon these lakes, in consequence of the few natural harbors for the shelter of vessels, and the consequent losses of life and property, are immense. According to the report of a committee in the House of Representatives in 1856, the destruction of property upon Lake Michigan in the year 1855 exceeded $1,000,000. The appalling destruction of life in the loss of The Erie upon Lake Erie, and of The Superior and Lady Elgin upon Michigan, are still fresh in the recollections of the country. The policy and justice of the limitation of the liability of the owners, under this Act of 1851, are as applicable to this navigation as to that of the ocean. The Act was designed to promote the building of ships, and to encourage persons engaged in the business of navigation, and to place that of this country upon a footing with England and on the continent of Europe. The Act not only exempts the owner from the casualty of fire, but limits his liability in cases of embezzlement or loss of goods on board by the master, officers, &c., and also for loss or damage from collisions, and, indeed, for any loss or damage occurring without the privity of the owner, to an amount not exceeding the value of the vessel and freight.

It has been suggested that our construction of the Act may embrace within the limitation of the liability of the owners western lakes lying within a State, such as the Cayuga, Seneca, and the like. But the answer is, that commerce upon these lakes, and all others similarly situated, is not within the regulation of Congress. The Act can apply to vessels only which are engaged in foreign commerce, and commerce between the States. The purely internal commerce and navigation of a State is exclusively under state regulation.

We think the court below was right, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

Mr. Justice Catron, dissenting:

By the common law of England ship owners were common carriers, and insurers against loss, of the goods shipped, without limitation as to the waters upon which the ships were navigated. Abbott on Shipping, 395. In the United States the same law governed. 2 Kent's Com., 599; New Jersey Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How., 234. In parts of continental Europe the law was different. The preamble of the British Act of 7 Geo. III. declares, "that it was of the greatest consequence and importance to the kingdom to promote and increase the number of ships and vessels, and to prevent any discouragement to merchants, and others, from being interested and concerned therein." The object of the British legislation was "to encourage persons to become owners of ships." By the Act of Geo. II., and others, the Parliament exempted ship owners from liability in several cases of loss, and among them, loss by fire. That these laws applied to commerce on the ocean, is not controverted. Nor are they in force on the great lakes, partly belonging to Great Britain, on this continent.

Our Act of Congress of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 635), was passed to put our commercial marine on an equal footing with that of Great Britain, so that the increase of the number of ships, and the navigation of them, might be equally encouraged. That competition with British shipping was the object of Congress, is manifest to my mind from the fact that the provisions of our statute correspond to British statutes. As there was no competition on our lakes, great or small, there was no reason for exempting owners of vessels from liability; and especially, for the reason that a vessel navigating a lake from one port to another, in the same State, is not within the Act: as Congress could only legislate by force of the commercial power, and regulate commerce among the States. The Act of 1851 does not in terms, nor by any fair intendment, as I think, attempt to regulate such internal commerce. Fearing, however, that it might be held to apply to actual navigation, an exception was appended to the Act, declaring that it should not apply to owners of canal boats, nor to lighters or barges. This description of vessels were brought into, or used, in harbors and bays; and these being arms of the sea, might be held as coming within the provisions of the Act of Congress, the commerce they were engaged in being connected with that on the ocean. The commerce on the Chesapeake, through the tide-water canal, into the Delaware, by vessels propelled by steam, and the commerce carried on through the Hudson, into New York harbor, by canal boats and barges, shows the reason why the exception was made, as respects this class of vessels.

And then comes the exception of vessels that had no connection with commerce on the ocean, which declares, that the Act shall not apply to any vessel, of any description whatsoever, used in rivers, or used in inland navigation. Why should navigation on the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence be governed by one law, and the great lakes, Green Bay, Lake Champlain, Great Salt Lake, Utah Lake, and many others, by another rule of liability? Congress has made no such distinction; but on the contrary, every section and clause of the Act of 1851 refer to losses happening on, or to vessels navigating, the ocean. The 3d section is especially significant of this conclusion.

What the expression, "inland navigation," means, must be ascertained from the geography of our own country, and the commerce carried on by vessels on its waters. Lake Erie is inland, and a voyage from Buffalo to Detroit is, in my judgment, "inland navigation." I am, therefore, of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed.

THE POWHATAN STEAMBOAT COMPANY, Plff. in Err., v. THE APPOMATOX RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C., 24 How., 247-257.)

Liability of one of several carriers forming continuous line—liability for loss by fire—Sunday law does not prevent recovery, or release carrier.

Plaintiff was the owners of a line of steamers, employed in the transportation of goods between Baltimore and Richmond.

Its steamboats were accustomed to stop at City Point, for the purpose of landing goods to be sent to Petersburg.

Defendant was a Railroad Company, and was engaged in the transportation of goods over its railroad from City Point to Petersburg.

A contract existed between the parties, whereby goods and merchandise destined for transportation to Petersburg were to be received by the plaintiff in Baltimore, carried in its steamers to City Point, and there delivered to the defendant, to be by it transported over its railroad to the place of destination.

One of the steamboats of the plaintiff left Baltimore every Saturday afternoon, arrived at City Point on Sunday, and there such of her cargo as was destined for Petersburg was landed and deposited in the warehouse of the defendant and remained in the warehouse until the following day.

After the goods in question had been so deposited, and on the same day the warehouse and all the goods were destroyed by fire, suit was brought against the plaintiff by the shipper of the goods, and payment was recovered against it.

All labor at any trade or calling on a Sabbath day, except in household or other work of necessity or charity, is prohibited in the State of Virginia by the 16th section of the code.

Plaintiff made the contract with the shippers in its own name, collected the entire freight money, and paid over to the defendant such portion of it as belonged to its under the arrangement.

To take care of the goods on the "Sabbath day," and safely and securely keep them, after the goods were received, was a work of necessity and, therefore, was not unlawful.

There is no authority in any court to declare the goods forfeited, even admitting that the acts of landing and depositing the goods, and of opening and closing the warehouse on Sunday were within the prohibition of the statute.

Subsequent custody of the goods was certainly not within that prohibition; and if not, then the law imposed the obligation upon the defendant to keep the good safely and securely until the following morning, and afterwards to transport them over the railroad to the place of destination, and deliver them to the consignees.

As the subsequent custody of the goods was not unlawful, the obligation of the defendant, under the circumstances of this case, was not varied by the fact that the goods were deposited in its warehouse by its consent on "a Sabbath day."

Messrs. William P. Joynes and William Schley, for the plaintiff in error:

The court below erred in regard to the foundation of the present action. It is not founded on the contract for the delivery and reception of the goods on Sunday. That contract was fully executed on both sides. The action is founded on a breach of duty alleged to have arisen on the delivery of the goods to the defendant—the duty to take care of them.[1] This was a duty which was lawful to perform on Sunday. It was not imposed or regulated by the contract, but was the legal consequence of the possession of the goods.

Granting that an action could not have been maintained on the contract if either party had refused to perform, yet it is only in that sense that such a contract is void.

When such a contract is executed, legal rights and obligations arise out of it as in other cases. P. W. & B. R. R. Co. v. P. & H. Towboat Co., 64 U. S. (23 How.), 209; Scarfe v. Morgan, 4 Mees. & W., 270.

When, therefore, the defendant received the goods into its possession, it became liable to take care of and account for them, and could not excuse itself by setting up the illegality of the contract under which it received them and which it had carried into execution.

Mr. C. Robinson, for defendant in error:

The contract between plaintiff and defendant, made in contemplation of illegal employment in labor or other business on a Sabbath day, furnishes no legal foundation for the plaintiff's action.

The defense is complete when, as in the present case, it appears that there was, on the part of the plaintiff, an unlawful act which has caused or concurred in causing, the damage complained of.

Bosworth v. Inhab. of Swansey, 10 Met., 365; Robeson v. French, 12 Met., 24.

If the plaintiff insists that its demand is collateral to the contract, it is decisive against it that its claim is so mixed with the illegal transaction in which it and the defendant were jointly engaged, that it cannot be established without going into the proof of that transaction.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia. All of the questions presented for decision in this case arise upon the instructions given by the court to the jury, but a brief reference to the pleadings and evidence will be necessary, in order that the precise nature of those questions may be clearly and fully understood.

It was an action on the case, and the declaration contained three counts, which are set forth at large in the transcript. Among other things, the plaintiffs alleged, in the first count, that the defendants were common carriers for hire; that they, the plaintiffs, at the special instance and request of the defendants, on the 26th day of June, 1853, at City Point, in the State of Virginia, caused certain goods and merchandise to be delivered to the defendants, as such carriers, to be by them transported from the place of delivery to Petersburg, in the same State; and that the defendants, in consideration thereof, and of certain hire and reward to be paid them therefor, undertook and promised safely and securely to carry and convey the goods and merchandise to the place of destination, and there to deliver the same; and the complaint is, that the defendants, not regarding their promise and undertaking in that behalf, so conducted themselves, as such carriers, that the goods and merchandise, through their negligence and carelessness, were wholly lost to the plaintiffs. To the whole declaration the defendants pleaded that they never undertook and promised, as the plaintiffs bad thereof alleged against them, and upon that issue the parties went to trial.

From the evidence in the case, it substantially appears that the plaintiffs were the owners of a weekly line of steamers, employed in the regular and stated transportation of goods and merchandise between the City of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, and the City of Richmond, in the State of Virginia. Their steamboats, on the trip each way, were accustomed to stop at the intermediate place called City Point, on James River, for the purpose of land-

Where statute makes all labor unlawful on Sunday, and makes no exception in favor of works of necessity, no damages can be recovered for breach of a contract to perform such labor, as the contract is invalid. Bernard v. Luffing, 32 Mo., 341; Slade v. Arnold, 14 B. Mon., 232. So where statute forbids ing goods to be sent to Petersburg, and also for the purpose of receiving other goods arriving from the same place to be transported to either terminus of the steamboat route. Defendants were a Railroad Company, and were also engaged in the transportation of goods and merchandise over their railroad, extending from City Point to Petersburg, in the same State. For many years there had been an arrangement and contract between the parties, whereby goods and merchandise destined for transportation to the latter place were to be received by the plaintiffs in Baltimore, carried in their steamers to City Point, and there delivered to the defendants, to be by them transported over their railroad to the place of destination. Receipts for the goods were given by the plaintiffs in Baltimore, promising to deliver the same to the consignees at Peteresburg, where the plaintiffs had an agent, who collected the entire freight money, and paid over one fourth part of the amount to the defendants. When the steamers arrived at City Point, the goods were landed, and deposited in the warehouse of the defendants, which was situated on the wharf adjacent to the railroad.

According to the regular course of the transportation, one of the steamboats of the plaintiffs left Baltimore every Saturday afternoon, arrived at City Point about noon on Sunday, and there such of her cargo as was destined for Petersburg was landed and deposited in the warehouse of the defendants, and the steamer on the same day proceeded on her voyage to the place of her destination. Goods so landed and deposited remained in the warehouse until the following day, because the defendants ran no merchandise train on Sundays. Usually the warehouse was opened on the occasion, and afterwards closed by the agent of the defendants; but the whole labor of landing and depositing the goods, except the opening and closing of the warehouse, was performed by the plaintiffs.

Pursuant to the regular course of the transportation, one of the steamers of the plaintiffs arrived at City Point on Sunday, the 26th day of June, 1853, about noon, with the goods in controversy on board. On the arrival of the steamer at the wharf, the goods, being destined for Petersburg, were landed and deposited in the warehouse, and the evidence shows that the whole labor of landing and depositing them was performed by the plaintiffs, except that the agent of the defendants unlocked and opened the warehouse for that purpose, and afterwards closed it, as he had been accustomed to do on former occasions. After the goods had been so deposited, the steamer proceeded on her voyage up the river, and on the same day the warehouse and all the goods were destroyed by fire. Suit was brought against these plaintiffs by the shipper of the goods, and payment was recovered against them for a sum exceeding $12,000, which they had to pay. Evidence was then introduced by the defendants, tending to show that the goods were deposited in their warehouse for the convenience and accommodation of the plaintiffs, upon the agreement and understanding that the goods should remain there until the following morning, and be at the risk of the plaintiffs. Under the instructions of the court, the jury returned their verdict in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs excepted to the instruction. It is to the concluding portion only of the instruction that the plaintiffs now object, and for that reason the preceding part of it is omitted. Having assumed that state of the case in the introductory part of the instruction—which the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs tended to prove, and which, if found to be true, and the goods had been deposited on an ordinary working day, would have entitled the plaintiffs to recover—the jury were substantially told by the presiding justice, in the concluding portion of the instruction, that notwithstanding the facts so assumed, still, if they found from the evidence that the goods were delivered on a Sunday, under a contract between the parties, express or implied, that they might be received and accepted on that day, and were destroyed by fire on the day on which they were delivered and received, to wit: on Sunday the 26th day of June, 1853, then their verdict should be for the defendants. Had the goods arrived and been deposited in the warehouse on an ordinary working day, the preceding part of the instruction assumed that the evidence in the case would authorize a finding in favor of the plaintiffs, and the principal question is, whether the rights of the parties were varied by the fact that the goods were landed and deposited on a Sunday. It is insisted by the defendants that it does vary their rights, especially as the goods were destroyed accidentally on the day they were delivered and received. To support that theory, they refer, in the first place, to the 16th and 17th sections of the Code of Virginia. By the 16th section it is provided, among other things, that "if a free person on a Sabbath day be found laboring at any trade or calling, or employ his apprentices, servants or slaves, in labor or other business, except in household or other work of necessity or charity, he shall forfeit $10 for each offense;" and by the 17th section it is provided, that no forfeiture shall be incurred under the preceding section for the transporting, on Sunday, of the mail or of passengers and their baggage. Most of the States have laws forbidding any worldly labor or business within their jurisdiction on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, except works of necessity or charity. Those laws were borrowed substantially from similar regulations in the parent country, and in some of the States were adopted at a very early period in the history of the Colonial Governments. Statutes of the description mentioned usually contain an express prohibition against such labor; but we are inclined to adopt the early rule upon the subject, that where the statute inflicts a penalty for doing an act, although the act itself is not expressly prohibited, yet to do the act is unlawful, because it cannot be supposed that the Legislature intended that a penalty should be inflicted for a lawful act. Adopting that rule of construction, it must be assumed that all labor "at any trade or calling on a Sabbath day, except in household or other work of necessity or charity," is prohibited in the State of Virginia by the 16th section of the code already cited. But the defendants do not attempt to maintain that the contract between the plaintiffs and the shipper of the goods, for the transportation of the same from Baltimore to Petersburg, falls within that implied prohibition, or that the voyage of the steamer from Baltimore to Richmond was illegal. As the evidence shows, the steamer left Baltimore on Saturday, the day previous to the fire which consumed the warehouse and the goods, and it is very properly conceded by the defendants that she might lawfully, under the circumstances, proceed on her voyage to her place of destination, notwithstanding the fact that, in so doing, she had to sail on "a Sabbath day;" and if so, it clearly follows that she might stop at any intermediate place on the route. Transportation of the goods, therefore, so far as they were carried in the steamer, was a lawful act, and, in effect, it is conceded to have been so by the defendants. Merchandise trains were not run by the defendants on Sundays; and, of course, neither the contract of the shipper nor the arrangement between these parties contemplated that the goods would be carried over the railroad on that day. Shippers made their contracts with the plaintiffs for the transportation of the goods over the whole route, from the place of departure to the place of destination, wholly irrespective of the circumstances which might afterwards attend the transfer of the goods from the steamer to the defendants, and without any knowledge, so far as appears, whether it would be accomplished on a Sunday, or on an ordinary working day.

When the shipper had delivered the goods to the plaintiffs, the contract between him and them was completed, and it is self-evident that it was one to which the Sunday laws of Virginia had no application whatever. All such contracts were made by the plaintiffs, but they were made for the separate benefit of the defendants, as well as themselves, and the arrangement between these parties had respect to the apportionment of the service to be performed in carrying out the contract made with the shipper, and the division of the freight money to be received for the entire service. Each party worked for himself, and not for the other, and the compensation for that service was to be derived from the shipper of the goods. Neither party promised to pay the other anything, but each was to receive a proportion of the freight money equal to the proportion of the service the arrangement between the parties required him to perform. Plaintiffs made the contract with the shippers in their own name, received the goods at Baltimore, transported them to City Point, and on the arrival of the steamer there, landed the goods and deposited them in the warehouse of the defendants. On the other hand, the defendants furnished the warehouse, opened and closed it on the occasion, took the custody of the goods until the following morning, and then transported them over the railroad to the place of destination, and delivered them to the consignees. After the goods were delivered to the consignees, the agent of the plaintiff collected the entire freight money, and paid over to the defendants such portion of it as belonged to them under the arrangement. Merchants sending goods knew only the plaintiffs in the entire transportation; but as between these parties, each performed a separate service for himself, and had no other claim for compensation than his proportion of freight money. Had the goods been lost at sea through the negligence of the plaintiffs, it is clear that the defendants would not have been answerable either to the shippers or to the plaintiffs, because the defendants had no interest in the steamer, and the arrangement between the parties did not contemplate that they should be responsible for her navigation. Shippers, however, had a right to proceed against the plaintiffs, although the loss had occurred while the goods were in the custody of the defendants, because their contract with the plaintiffs covered the whole route; and as between them and the defendants, the latter were but the agents of the plaintiffs. Accordingly, the shippers recovered judgment against the plaintiffs, and clearly the defendants are answerable over, unless it is shown that the case is one where courts of justice will not interfere to enforce the contract. It is insisted by the plaintiffs that the labor of landing and depositing the goods was a work of necessity, within the meaning of the exception contained in the statute; but in the view we have taken of the case, it will not be necessary to decide that question at the present time.

Suppose it be admitted that the plaintiffs violated the Sunday law in landing the goods and depositing them, and that defendants also violated the same law in opening and closing the warehouse on the occasion; still the admission will not benefit the defendants, for the reason that the cause of action in this case is not founded upon any executory promise between the parties, touching either the landing and depositing of the goods or the opening and closing of the warehouse, but it is based upon the non-performance of the duty which arose after those acts had been performed. If the action was one to recover a compensation for the labor of landing and depositing the goods, or to recover damages for a refusal to comply with the agreement to open and close the warehouse, the rule of law invoked by the defendants would apply. Granting, however, for the sake of the argument, that those acts of labor fall within the prohibition of the statute, still their performance did not have the effect to transfer the general property in the goods to the defendants, nor to release or discharge them from the subsequent obligations, which devolved upon them as common carriers for hire. Safe custody is as much the duty of the carrier as due transport and right delivery; and although the defendants were forbidden to transport the goods over the railroad, or to deliver the same on "a Sabbath day," yet they might safely and securely keep such as were in their custody, and it was their duty so to do. Irrespective of the Sunday Law, the plaintiffs could maintain no action against the defendants for the service they had performed in landing and depositing the goods, for the best of all reasons, that in performing it they had worked for themselves, and not for the defendants. Nothing, therefore, can be more certain than the fact that the claim in this case is not founded upon any executory promise necessarily connected with those supposed illegal acts. On the contrary, the real claim is grounded on the obligations which the law imposed on the defendants safely and securely to keep, convey, and deliver the goods, and upon their subsequent negligence and carelessness, whereby the goods were lost. To take care of the goods on "a Sabbath day," and safely and securely keep them, after the goods were received, was a work of necessity and, therefore, was not unlawful, even on the theory assumed by the defendants, and the defendants were not expected to convey or deliver the goods until the following day. On the theory assumed, the defendants might have refused to open the warehouse, or allow the goods to be deposited; and if they had done so, no action could have been maintained against them for the refusal. But they elected to do otherwise, and suffered the plaintiffs to deposit the goods; and when the warehouse was closed, all the supposed the illegal acts were fully performed.

Whatever contract or arrangement existed between the parties upon that subject had then been fully executed, and those who had been employed in landing and depositing the goods, as well as the agent of the defendants, who had opened and closed the warehouse, if the acts were illegal, had respectively become liable to the penalty which the law inflicts for such a violation of its mandate. That penalty is a fine of $10; but there is no authority in any court to declare the goods forfeited, nor do we perceive any just ground for holding that the general property in the goods was thereby changed. Unless the goods be considered as forfeited, or it be held that the property became vested in the defendants, it is difficult to see any reason why the plaintiffs ought not to recover in this suit, even admitting that the acts of landing and depositing the goods, and of opening and closing the warehouse, were within the prohibition of the statute.

Subsequent custody of the goods was certainly not within that prohibition; and if not, then the law imposed the obligation upon the defendants to keep the goods safely and securely until the following morning, and afterwards to transport them over the railroad to the place of destination, and deliver them to the consignees. To assume the contrary would be to admit that a carrier, accepting goods to be transported on an ordinary working day, may set off the fact that the labor of depositing the goods in his warehouse was performed on "a Sabbath day," against all the subsequent obligations which the law would otherwise impose upon him with respect to the goods. Such a rule of law, if acknowledged by courts of justice, and carried into effect, would amount to a forfeiture of the goods, so far as the shipper is concerned, as its practical operation would be to allow the carrier, if he saw fit, voluntarily to destroy the goods, or to appropriate them to his own use.

Upon a careful examination of the numerous authorities bearing upon the question, the better opinion, we think, is that, inasmuch as the subsequent custody of the goods was not unlawful, that the obligations of the defendants, under the circumstances of this case, were not varied by the fact that the goods were deposited in their warehouse by their consent on "a Sabbath day." Great injustice would result from any different rule, and although the precise question has seldom or never been presented for decision, yet we think the analogies of the law fully sustain the rule here laid down. For these reasons we are of the opinion that the instruction given to the jury was erroneous.

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to issue a new venire.

v.

GEORGE REED, JULIET S. REED, JAMES H. ROGERS AND THE MILWAUKEE AND MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C., 24 How., 284-287.)

Wisconsin Act of Limitations as to mortgage foreclosure—deed of assignees in bankruptcy—effect of.

The Act of Limitations of Wisconsin provides that "bills for relief in case of the existence of a trust not cognizable by the courts of common law, and in all other cases not herein provided for, shall be filed within ten years after the cause thereof shall accrue, and not after that time."

Where a mortgagor was declared to be bankrupt, and his property and rights of property were vested in an assignee appointed by the court, and the assignee conveyed by deed, it vested in the purchaser such title as the bankrupt had at the time of his bankruptcy, which was the date of the decree declaring him a bankrupt.

Where the bill prays that the equity of redemption be foreclosed, or that an undivided interest in the quarter section alleged to be covered by the mortgage be sold, and the proceeds appropriated towards paying the debts secured, as neither of these modes of release are cognizable at law, and the only remedy is in equity, it is barred by the limitation named in the Act.

Argued Feb. 7, 1861. Decided, Feb. 18, 1861.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconnsi.

The present appellants filed their bill in the court below, to foreclose a certain mortgage.

The district court dismissed the bill, and the case was brought to this court on appeal:

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. R. Doolittle, for appellants:

As to the Statute of Limitations we maintain:

1. By the Statutes of Michigan in force when the notes became due and the right to foreclose accrued, no limitation existed in equity. By analogy to ejectment, it was 20 years.

See Mich. Laws, 1833, 570, sec. 6.

If the notes as well as the mortgage were under seal, no period of limitation less than 20 years would attach at law or in equity. It is true the notes were unsealed, and an action at law upon them barred by the statute; but barring the action at law upon the notes, does not affect the plaintiffs' right to foreclose under the mortgage.

See Heyer v. Pruyn, 7 Paige, 465; 5 Smedes & M., 678; 4 Met., 164; 11 Conn., 160.

Discharge of the personal liability in bankruptcy did not affect the interest of the mortgagee in the land.

Barb. Ch., 613; 9 Mees & W., 434.

The Bankrupt Act expressly saves the lien of mortgages.

See 5 U. S. Stat., p. 442, sec. 2.

Messrs. James S. Brown, and W. P. Lynde, for the appellees:

The suit was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The mortgage and notes bear date Feb. 10, 1837. The suit was commenced Feb. 12, 1856. The first note became due Feb. 10, 1838.

The notes, as such, were barred in six years after they became due, and the only one personally bound, George Reed, was discharged by decree of the court under the Bankrupt Act. Rogers, the real defendant, had been in possession 19 years, and all this time he had resided in Wisconsin and been liable to process. There was no remedy against him personally; the remedy by ejectment had been taken away from the mortgagee by statutes.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill seeks to enforce a lien secured by mortgage on twenty acres of land, in what is denominated Finch's addition to Milwaukee. The mortgage debt became due in February, 1839. It is difficult to say, that were the bill standing on demurrer, that a sufficient description of the land claimed as bound for the debt could be established to justify an affirmative decree. But the view we take of the case renders this question immaterial.

In 1837, George Reed executed the mortgage to the Cleveland Insurance Company for $22,000, including the greater portion of a quarter section of land, part of which was covered by previous mortgages to others. These were acquired and foreclosed, and the title vested in James H. Rogers, the purchaser, and only material respondent to this suit. He took possession of the quarter section in 1838, claiming it as his own under previous mortgages of which he was assignee, and which he foreclosed, and became the purchaser of the equity of redemption, and he also claimed title under five tax sales and deeds founded on them.

In his answer, Rogers relies on the Act of Limitations of Wisconsin, passed in 1839, which provides that "bills for relief in case of the existence of a trust not cognizable by the courts of common law, and in all other cases not herein provided for, shall be filed within ten years after the cause thereof shall accrue, and not after that time."

To establish the fact of adverse possession, and to negative the conclusion that Rogers did not recognize the trust, the parties agreed "that for the purpose of bringing the above entitled suit to a hearing at the present term, it shall and may be taken as true and proved for all the purposes of this case, that the defendant, Rogers, has been in actual and continual possession and occupancy of the southeast quarter section 37, township 7, range 22 east, described in the bill of complaint in this suit, since sometime in the year 1838, and up to this time; and during all that time has openly controlled the same, and improved some portion of the premises."

To onerate Rogers with the obligation of a mortgagor and trustee, the complainant introduced a record from the bankrupt court held in Wisconsin, showing the proceedings against George Reed as a voluntary bankrupt under the Act of Congress of 1841. The proceeding was admitted on the hearing to be in all respects regular. On the 23d of July, 1842, Reed was declared to be a bankrupt, and his property and rights of property were vested in an assignee appointed by the court. He advertised Reed's interest in the property in controversy to be sold, and on the 3d day of May, 1843, it was sold, and purchased by Rogers, he being the best bidder, for the sum of $6, who took a regular deed for the same on the 6th day of July, 1846, in conformity to the 15th section of the Bankrupt Law.

The object of introducing this evidence by the complainant was, to avoid the operation of the Act of Limitations, by showing that, by his purchase, Rogers stood on the same footing of mortgagor that George Reed had stood before his bankruptcy, and that the assignee's deed to Rogers was not ten years old when this suit was brought.

The assignee came in as trustee by force of the decree declaring Reed a bankrupt; he held the land as Reed had done, and by the deed Rogers assumed the same position, because, by the proviso to the 2d sec. of the Bankrupt Law, the lien secured by the mortgage was excepted. The main question as regards the effect of this deed is, to what time does the title acquired by Rogers relate. It vested in him by its terms such title as the bankrupt had at the time of his bankruptcy, which was the date of the decree declaring him a bankrupt. To this effect is the 15th section of the Act.

This suit was brought in 1856, and the order declaring Reed a bankrupt was made in 1842, so that Rogers held the relation of mortgagor to the complainant more than ten years before this suit was brought.

But we deem this proceeding in bankruptcy altogether immaterial. Rogers claimed to own the quarter section in fee, and held it in actual adverse possession in 1839, when the ten years' Act of Limitations was passed. The Act then began to run, and ran on so as to complete the bar in 1849.

We do not doubt that the Act applies to this suit. The bill prays that the equity of redemption be foreclosed, or that the undivided interest, to the extent of twenty acres in the quarter section alleged to be covered by the mortgage, be sold, and the proceeds appropriated towards paying the debts secured. As neither of these modes of relief are cognizable at law, and the only remedy is in equity, it is manifestly barred by the terms of the Act.

By a previous provision of the Act of 1839, (sec. 37), where there are concurrent remedies at law and in equity, the remedy in equity is barred in the same time that the remedy at law is barred; and what we mean to say is, that the remedies demanded to be enforced by the bill have no corresponding remedy at law, and therefore fall within the 40th sec. of the Act.

As respects the other defendants to the bill, no relief can be had against them. By his purchase of the bankrupt's title, Rogers took the equity of redemption, and cut off all claims to the land the defendants had, assuming the statements in the bill to be true.

We forbear to express any opinion on the defense relied on by Rogers in his answer, namely: that he had purchased and had deeds for the said quarter section from several tax collectors, which he alleges are valid: and if not valid, that they are confirmed by adverse possession and the operation of the three years' Act of Limitations.

It is ordered that the decree of the circuit court, dismissing the bill, be affirmed.

JOHN B. GRAY AND KNOWLES TAYLOR.

(See S. C., 24 How., 303–307.)

Question of practice in discretion of inferior court, not reviewable on certificate of division, or appeal.

The Act of 1802, ch. 32, which authorizes a certificate of division, evidently did not intend to give this court jurisdiction, in that mode of proceeding, of any question of common law or equity, that would not be open to revision here upon writ of error or appeal.

It has repeatedly been held, that a decision of the inferior court, upon a question depending upon the exercise of a sound judicial discretion in a matter of practice as to the mere form of proceeding, is not open to revision in this court.

This discretion is a matter of practice resting exclusively with the inferior court, and no appeal will lie from its decision, made in the exercise of this discretionary power.

This court will not assume jurisdiction and exercise appellate powers over such questions when they come before it on a certificate of division.

The Act of 1802 contemplates a suit in court, in which plaintiff and defendant have both appeared; but where there is no party but the one in whose behalf the motion is made, and no defendant is named, and no process prayed for, the legality of this proceeding cannot be certified to this court for its opinion.

Argued Feb. 6, 1861. Decided Feb. 18, 1861.

ON a certificate of division of opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. James A. Bayard and John A. Collier, for complainants.

Messrs. Caleb Cushing, R. J. Walker, Louis Janin, Robert J. Brent and Henry May, for defendants.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon a certificate of division of opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court for the District of California, sitting as a court of equity.

In stating the facts upon which the question certified arose, the court gives a history of the case, and it appears that a bill was filed in a state court of California, and was afterwards removed to the District Court of the United States, by order of the court, pursuant to an agreement made by the counsel for the respective parties, that before it was transferred from the state court, one of the complainants and one of the defendants died; and the representatives of neither of them were afterwards made parties, either in the state court before the removal, or the District Court of the United States, after the case was transferred to that court. And in this condition of the case, and without these parties, a final decree was rendered in the last mentioned court. These proceedings were transferred to the Circuit Court of the United States, under the Act of Congress of April 30, 1856 (11 Stat. at L., 6); and a bill was afterwards filed in that court to set aside and vacate the final decree which had been rendered as above mentioned; but in that proceeding the circuit court held that it had not jurisdiction, because the parties made defendants resided in New York, where the process of the court could not lawfully be served upon them. The dates of these several proceedings in the different courts, and the motions and agreements of counsel, are particularly set forth in the statement; but they are not material to the decision of this court, and need not, therefore, be repeated here.

The circuit court further certify, that after all these proceedings were had, and the bill filed against the citizens of New York dismissed, a motion was made "to vacate the final decree rendered, and to remand the case to the state court, in which it originated; and that the motion was predicated on the ground that the whole proceedings, from the time the case was transferred thence, including the decree, were null and void, and not merely voidable, and, therefore, might be set aside on motion."

Upon this motion the judges divided in opinion, as they certify, upon the following question: "whether, under the circumstances detailed, this court (the circuit court) has authority to vacate summarily, on motion, the decree of the District Court of the United States for Northern District of California, and remand the case to the third judicial district of the State."

It will be observed that the grounds, upon which the decree of the district court is alleged to be void or voidable, are not stated; nor the questions which arose in the state court, or the courts of United States; nor does it appear what errors are supposed to have been committed, which it is proposed to bring for revision before the circuit court, and to correct by a summary proceeding on this motion.

The only question certified by the circuit court is, whether, under the circumstances of the case, as detailed in the statement, it could proceed summarily on motion to vacate and declare void the decree. The inquiry obviously relates altogether to the practice of the court as a court of equity. And this question often depends upon the sound judicial discretion of the court, regulated by the rules prescribed by this court, and the general principles and established usages which govern proceedings in a court of chancery; and whether it will proceed in a summary manner on motion, or require plenary proceedings by bill and answer, must depend upon the particular circumstances of the case before it, and the object sought to be attained.

The Act of April 29th, 1802, ch. 32 (2 Stat. at L., 156), which authorizes the certificate of division, evidently did not intend to give this court jurisdiction, in that mode of proceeding, upon any question of common law or equity, that would not be open to revision here upon writ of error or appeal. It was so decided in Davis v. Braden, 10 Pet., 288, and in Packer v. Nixon, 10 Pet., 410. And it has repeatedly been held that the decision of the inferior court, upon a question depending upon the exercise of a sound judicial discretion in a matter of practice as to the mere form of proceeding, is not open to revision in this court.

If the judges had united in refusing the summary proceedings on motion, it is very clear that the decision could not have been revised in this court upon appeal, although this tribunal might be of opinion that the relief sought might have been legitimately granted in that mode of proceeding; for this discretion in a matter of practice, resting exclusively with the inferior court, it has the right to determine for itself whether it will proceed in a summary way, or refuse to do so whenever it thinks the purposes of justice will be better accomplished in a plenary proceeding by bill and answer; and consequently no appeal will lie from its decision, made in the exercise of this discretionary power. In the case before us, by the division of opinion between the judges, the motion was as legally and effectually refused as if both had concurred in the refusal. And as the decision in the latter case could not have been reviewed here upon appeal, for want of appellate jurisdiction over such questions, we should hardly be justified in assuming jurisdiction, and exercising appellate powers over the same questions when they come before us on a certificate of division.

Besides, the Act of April 29th, 1802 (2 Stat. at L., 156), obviously contemplates a suit in court, in which plaintiff and defendant have both appeared, for it directs the point to be certified at the request of either party. But here there is no party but the one in whose behalf the motion is made. No defendant is named, and no process prayed for. And if, in this stage of the case, the legality of this proceeding can be certified to this court for its opinion, the same thing may be done at the commencement of any other equity proceeding and this court called on to decide in advance, before any process is issued or any party brought into court, whether a motion, or an original bill, or any other of the many description of bills known in equity practice, was the proper and appropriate remedy in the case which a party was about to bring before the circuit court. No one will suppose that such a practice was intended to be established by the Act of 1802.

The court order and adjudge that this opinion be certified to the circuit court, and that the cause be remanded.

WM. H. THOMAS AND ROBERT A. BAKER, Administrators of MAJOR J. THOMAS, Deceased, use of GEORGE T. ROGERS.

(See S. C., 24 How., 315-317.)

Surety—discharged by erasure of principal's name from bond—his liability not to be extended by implication—any change, in contract, even if beneficial, discharges him.

Bond of sureties in replevin held void, because after the same was executed by defendants as sureties, their principal, without their knowledge or consent, and with the consent of the marshal, erased his name from the bond.

The liability of the surety is not to be extended, by implication, beyond the terms of his contract. To the extent, and in the manner, and under the circumstances pointed out in the obligation, he is bound, and no further.

It is not sufficient that he may sustain no injury by a change in the contract, or that it may be for his benefit. He has a right to stand upon the very terms of his contract; and if he does not assent to any variation of it, and an alteration of it is made, it is fatal.

After the execution of the bond by the defendants, to be delivered to the marshal, it was refused and disagreed to by him, and it thereby became void. Any subsequent alteration would require a new deed or positive assent to the same, to make it valid against the defendants.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin.

This was an action on a bond commenced by the present defendant in error in the court

The case is further stated by the court.

Messrs. J. R. Doolittle and T. Ewing, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. J. C. Hopkins and Reverdy Johnson, for defendants in error:

The alterations of the bond are immaterial, and did not affect its legality.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a writ of error to the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin:

The action was replevin; the pleadings being filed, a jury was called, who rendered a verdict in damages for $9,708.96, with costs.

In the course of the trial a bill of exceptions was filed, on which the questions of law were raised. Be it remembered, that at the trial of the above entitled action, the plaintiff produced an instrument in writing, in the words and figures, and with interlineations and erasures following, to wit:

Know all men by these presents, that we and John T. Martin, and John Keefe, and Andrew Proudfit, are held and firmly bound unto Major J. Thomas, Marshal of the United States for the Wisconsin District, in the sum of $20,000, to be paid, &c.

Whereas the defendants have required the return of property replevied by the marshal, at the suit of George T. Rogers v. Henry M. Remington and John T. Martin, Jr.; now, the condition of this obligation is such, that if the said defendants in said suit shall deliver to the Marshal said property, if such delivery be adjudged, and shall pay to him such sum as may for any cause be recovered against the defendants, then this obligation to be void.

1. The bond upon which judgment was recovered was void, as against the defendants, because, after the same was executed by them as sureties, Remington, their principal, without their knowledge on consent, and with the consent of the Marshal, erased his name from the bond.

In Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat., 702, Mr. Justice Story said, nothing can be clearer, both upon principle and authority, than the doctrine that the liability of a surety is not to be extended, by implication, beyond the terms of his contract. To the extent and in the manner and under the circumstances pointed out in the obligation, he is bound, and no further. It is not sufficient that he may sustain no injury by a change in the contract, or that it may be for his benefit. He has a right to stand upon the very terms of his contract; and if he does not assent to any variation of it, and an alteration of it is made, it is fatal.

Hunt v. Adams, 6 Mass., 521.

2. After the execution of the bond by the defendants, to be delivered to the Marshal, it was refused and disagreed to by him, and it thereby became void. Any subsequent alteration would require a new deed or positive assent to the same, to make it valid against the defendants.

Shep. Touch., 70, 394.

The judgment is reversed.

v.

JOHN R. FORD ET AL.

(See S. C., 24 How., 322–333.)

Specific performance—contract not void—combinations to prevent bidding—public sale of lands—frauds at.

In a bill for specific performance of a contract, the contract held not void under the 4th and 5th sections of the Act of Congress of 31st of March, 1830, entitled "An Act for the relief of purchasers of public lands, and for the suppression of fraudulent practices at the public sales of the lands of the United States."

The 4th section is intended to protect the government and punish all persons who enter into combinations or conspiracies to prevent others from bidding at the sales, either by agreement not to do so, or by intimidation, threats or violence.

There is nothing to be found on the face of this contract which can be construed as an agreement not to bid, or to hinder, intimidate, or prevent others from doing so.

The 5th section is intended for the protection of those who propose to purchase lands at the public sales from the extortions of those who have formed the combinations made penal by the 4th section.

It is no part of the policy of this section to encourage frauds, by releasing the fraudulent party from the obligation of his contract.

Argued Feb. 1, 1861. Decided Feb. 18, 1861.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas.

John R. Ford and others, the present appellees, filed a bill in the First Judicial District of Kansas, against the appellant, one Madison Mills, to enforce the specific execution of a contract, an abstract of which appears in the opinion of the court.

The district court rendered a decree in favor of the complainants. The defendant appealed to the Supreme Court of the Territory, by which court the decree of the district court was affirmed. From this decree of affirmance the present appeal is prosecuted,

Messrs. Badger and Carlisle, for the appellant:

It is insisted by the appellant:

1st. That this agreement was in violation of the laws of the United States and their policy in respect to the sale of the lands. These Delaware lands were ceded to the United States by the Treaty of May 6, 1854.

10 Stat. at L., 1048.

These lands were agreed to be sold, and were sold, in every respect as other lands of the United States, although they were held in trust for the Indians, and the beneficial interest was not in the United States as the legal title was.

We insist that the contract on which this bill is filed is in conflict with the provisions of sections 4 and 5, Act March 31, 1830 (4 Stat., 392), and tends immediately to defeat or obstruct the purpose of Congress. That purpose in both sections is to secure free and open contest at the sales of the public lands by auction. The 4th section prohibits any contract or agreement to induce or prevent anyone from bidding at such sales. Here the plain result and effect of this contract was to prevent the appellees from bidding for land which the contract shows that they desired to possess; and this was directly within the scope of the agreement and purpose of the parties. And the agreement to pay the appellant $10,000 beyond the price to be paid to the United States, showed that the land to be bought was known to be worth many times that price. It was, therefore, a plain, direct purpose of the contract to prevent the land from bringing a fair value by stifling a contest and excluding the only party besides the appellant, desiring the land, from bidding. And further, this understanding was so much a part of the contract that the appellees could not have bid without violating the agreement on their part and discharging the appellant from his part thereof.

The same section makes it an offense by any "combination or unfair management" to hinder or prevent, or attempt to hinder or prevent, any person from bidding; and though this primarily refers to the hindering of persons from bidding who are not parties to the combination or management, yet in this case, upon this contract, the combination or management with each other to procure the land at a less price, by preventing one of the parties, is seen to be within the mischief which the statute was intended to prevent.

The 5th section prohibits any and every contract or secret understanding made by one or more persons with another who proposes to purchase any such lands, to pay or give to such purchaser for such land a sum of money or article of property over and "above the price at which the land may or shall be bid off," and declares every such contract, &c., and "every bond, obligation, or writing of any kind whatsoever, founded upon or growing out of the same," to be utterly null and void, and authorizes any party to such contract, &c., who may pay any such sum of money, &c., to sue for and recover back the same. The parties came to an understanding for what the statute prohibited, and then entered into a written contract, which is void. The whole scope and intent of the contract is in violation of the spirit of the law, which is to secure a fair competition at the public sales. This is sought by both sections, and the contract in our case embraces both the modes of evading the enactment and accomplishing the mischief against which the statute was directed.

The courts act upon the principle of giving no relief to parties to an unlawful contract.

This case, we submit, falls within this principle.

To establish this, we call the attention of the court to a few out of the many authorities which support it.

Kennett v. Chambers, 14 How., 38; Hannay v. Eve, 3 Cranch, 242; Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat., 258; Craig v. Missouri, 4 Pet., 410.

These decisions include our case, within their ruling, and decide it.

The contract was a bargain to prevent one party from bidding, and a combination to that effect, upon a mutual understanding that the land would be bought for greatly less than its true value, as known to the parties, for their profit and to the injury of the United States, or those for whom the United States sold and, therefore, is within the 4th section of the Act. Then, under the 5th section, it was an agreement on the part of the appellants to convey, upon the payment by the other party of a sum of money expressly forbidden to be promised.

Our defense rests not on any merits of our own, but on this: that the parties were engaged in an unlawful purpose, unlawful as in violation of a public law, and unlawful as in violation of the policy of Congress, in selling the public lands at auction, and especially in this sale for the benefit of the Indians, in which the government was bound by the highest obligations of honor and integrity to promote a sale at the highest price which competition of bidders might produce, and therefore, whatever the demerits of the appellants may be, the appellees have no right to assistance.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

Ford and others are complainants in a bill for specific performance of a contract made by them with Fackler & Mills.

The bill charges, that on and before the 22d of November, 1856, Fackler claimed, as actual settler thereon, a fractional section of land containing sixty acres, and Mills the east half of a quarter section, containing eighty acres, in Leavenworth County, Kansas Territory, being parts of the land purchased by the Government of the United States of the Delaware Indians.

These lands had been appraised at $8 an acre, and advertised for sale pursuant to law. That prior to that date, Fackler & Mills surveyed and laid off said tracts of land so claimed and held by them, into blocks, lots, public grounds, streets, alleys, &c., for a town to be known as "Fackler's addition" to Leavenworth City; that they made a plat of it and divided the whole into eighty shares of six lots each, executing certificates, on the back of each of which they indorsed the lots assigned; that they also represented themselves to be owners of a ferry right from the south part of Fackler's addition to and including a landing on the opposite side of the Missouri River, and a lease of a fractional section in Platte County, in Missouri, containing thirty-four acres; that Fackler & Mills were anxious to sell and dispose of the undivided half of the ferry, together with an equal and divided half in lots of the 140 acres, being forty shares, containing in the aggregate 240 lots: that on the 22d of November, 1856, they entered into covenant, under seal, to sell to complainant 40 shares, being one half of 140 acres in Fackler's addition to Leavenworth City, which shares were divided and agreed to be the following lots, viz.: 23, &c., &c., &c.; that the complainants have paid the sum of $10,000 as a consideration, and agreed to furnish one half the purchase money to be paid at the Delaware sales; that Fackler & Mills agreed to make a quitclaim deed to the vendees when they have obtained a title for the lands, and as part consideration of said payment, a deed for the undivided half of the ferry right and lease of grounds on the Missouri side should also be executed.

At the bottom of this agreement, of the same date, is a receipt by Fackler for $560, "being one half of the appraised value of the lands described in the within contract, which we are to use in paying for the said lands at Delaware sales, held at Leavenworth this day."

The bill further charges, that Fackler & Mills did obtain a title for said land, and now refuse to convey to complainant either the land or the moiety of the ferry right, and prays for a decree for specific performance.

The respondents demurred to this bill, and afterwards withdrew their demurrer and filed an answer. The answer admits the contract and receipt of the money, and purchase of the lands, but charges that the Government of the United States was trustee of the Delaware Indians, of these lands, and that the act of the officers of the government in fixing the value of the land, and in restricting the purchase thereof to settlers thereon, to such valuation, was a "fraud on the Indians," and that the plaintiffs were cognizant of such fraud; that the lands were appraised far below their true value; that respondents have not put the plat of their town on record; that, therefore, the description of the land is so vague and uncertain that a court cannot decree a specific performance; that a statute of Kansas requires all town plats to be recorded; that besides the money paid to the respondents, there was a parol representation made by complainants; that by their capital and influence they had built up other towns in the West, and would do the same with this if they could get a large interest at low rates; and that not having performed this part of their contract, respondent refused to make them a title; and lastly, the answer concludes with the following defense and apology:

"And this defendant says, that inasmuch as the plaintiffs have endeavored to avail themselves of a supposed technical legal advantage to aid them in a non-compliance with their contract, and have failed to comply with the same, defendant in turn claims that he is justified in charging, and does charge and insist, that said contract was made before the relinquishment of the title of the Delaware Indians to said land, and in violation of the said Treaty with said Indians; and that said agreement, settlement, survey and platte of said land were each in violation thereof, and in violation of the laws of the United States, and in violation of the statutes of the Territory of Kansas, and in violation of the public policy of the United States, and void."

Afterwards, on motion of complainants, the court ordered to be expunged from the answer each one of the charges, a summary of which we have just given. This left in the answer nothing but an admission of the charges in complainant's bill.

A bill of exceptions (according to the practice of that court) was taken to this order of the court, and the case was then heard on the bill, answer and exhibits, and a decree was entered for complainants, which was confirmed on appeal to the Supreme Court of the Territory.

The allegation that the United States defrauded the Indians, and that the lands were sold below their value and, consequently, that Fackler, having got his title by a fraud, was bound to commit the further fraud of keeping the complainants' money and the land too, might well have been expunged from the answer as "impertinent" in every sense of the term. The plea of vagueness of description in the contract, and that defendant had not put his town plat on record before he got a title from the United States, partake largely of the same quality.

The plea that plaintiffs had not used their influence to bring emigrants and make improvements in the intended addition to the city, and thus add value to the land which the respondent would not convey to them, was surely irrelevant, if not impertinent; and finally, the sweeping charge in the conclusion of the answer, that the whole transaction was in violation of the Treaty with the Indians, and in violation of the laws of the United States, and of the statutes of Kansas, does not indicate whether respondent intends to charge the complainants with fraud, or rely upon his own. It alleges no facts, and is followed by no proof. It is in fact a return to the demurrer to the bill, and as such has been argued in this court.

The question to be decided is, whether there is anything on the face of this contract which shows it to be void by any law of the United States. How the Treaty or the laws of Kansas can affect it has not been shown, and need not be further noticed. It was time enough to record the plat of the intended city when the respondents had obtained a title, and as it concerned the complainants, they could not be in default until they got a title and were offering their lots for sale. The enumeration of the lots in the contract was a mode of specifying how the land should be divided, and the plat of the intended town could be referred to for description and certainty just as any other private survey or draft.

The laws of the United States, which it is alleged invalidate this contract, are the 4th and 5th sections of the Act of Congress of 31st of March, 1830 (4 Stat. at L., 390), entitled "An Act for the relief of purchasers of public lands, and for the suppression of fraudulent practices at the public sales of the lands of the United States." These sections are in these words:

"Sec. 4. That if any person or persons shall, before or at the time of the public sale of any lands of the United States, bargain, contract or agree, or attempt to bargain, contract, or agree, with any other person or persons, that the last named person or persons shall not bid upon or purchase the land so offered for sale, or any parcel thereof, or shall by intimidation, combination or unfair management, hinder or prevent, or attempt to hinder or prevent, any person or persons from bidding upon or purchasing any tract or tracts of land so offered for sale, every such offender, his, her or their aiders and abettors, being thereof duly convicted, shall, for every such offense, be fined, not exceeding one thousand dollars, or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 5. That if any person or persons shall, before or at the time of the public sale of any of the lands of the United States, enter into any contract, bargain, agreement or secret understanding with any other person or persons, proposing to purchase such land, or pay or give such purchasers for such land a sum of money, or other article of property, over and above the price at which the land may or shall be bid off by such purchasers, every such contract, bargain, agreement or secret understanding, and every bond, obligation or writing of any kind whatsoever, founded upon or growing out of the same, shall be utterly null and void. And any person or persons being a party to such contract, bargain, agreement or secret understanding, who shall or may pay to such purchasers any sum of money or other article of property, as aforesaid, over and above the purchase money of such land, may sue for and recover such excess from such purchasers in any court having jurisdiction of the same. And if the party aggrieved have no legal evidence of such contract, bargain, agreement or secret understanding, or of the payment of the excess aforesaid, he may, by bill in equity, compel such purchaser to make discovery thereof; and if in such case the complainant shall ask for relief, the court in which the bill is pending may proceed to final decree between the parties to the same: Provided, every such suit, either in law or equity, shall be commenced within six years next after the sale of said land by the United States."

The 4th section is intended to protect the government and punish all persons who enter into combinations or conspiracies to prevent others from bidding at the sales, either by agreement not to do so, or by intimidation, threats or violence.

There is nothing to be found on the face of this contract which can be construed as an agreement not to bid, or to hinder, intimidate or prevent others from doing so.

The 5th section is evidently intended for the protection of those who propose to purchase lands at the public sales from the extortions of those who have formed the combinations made penal by the 5th section. The complainants stand in the character of the "party aggrieved" by the fraud, if there be any in the case. If Fackler had made his conveyance according to his contract, and the complainants were now seeking to recover back the $10,000 paid to him, this section of the statute might have been invoked by them, on proof of such a combination, and that Fackler was a party to it, as he now acknowledges. But it is no part of the policy of this section to encourage frauds by releasing the fraudulent party from the obligation of his contract. The allegation of the answer that the contract was in violation of the Treaty with the Indians, and of the Acts of Congress, may be a confession of the respondent's own fraud, but it can give no right to commit another.

The answer filed in this case is by Fackler alone; the record shows the agreement of counsel that the bill be dismissed as to Mills.

The court below were, therefore, right in decreeing a specific performance of the contract, but erred in that part of the decree which orders a conveyance of the undivided moiety of the 140 acres. The contract is for a specified and divided moiety of the land, and an undivided moiety of the ferry privilege; and that portion of the decree, which orders a conveyance according to the contract, is affirmed, with costs, and record remitted, with instructions to the court below to reform their decree in accordance with this opinion.

v.

JOHN G. CARNEY ET AL.

(See S. C., 24 How., 357-362.)

Decision of land office between claimants not binding on courts—land office cannot reverse its prior decision followed by possession and claims of bona fide purchasers.

The decision of the register and receiver of the land office, in favor of one of two claimants of government land, is not conclusive of the controversy.

The register and receiver are empowered to decide on the true location of grants or confirmations, but not on the legal and often complicated questions of title.

The decisions of the register and receiver do not preclude a legal investigation and decision, by the proper judicial tribunals, between the parties to interfering claims.

They had no authority in this case to overthrow the decision of a prior register and receiver, made more than twenty years before, and which had been followed by possession, and as to which there had intervened the claims of bona fide purchasers.

Argued Jan. 8, 1861. Decided Feb. 18, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana holding sessions for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

Carney, the defendants in error, instituted suit in the Eighth Judicial District of Louisiana against Charles Tate, Jr., claiming the tract of land in controversy.

Tate disclaimed title otherwise than an one of the heirs of Nancy Tate, whose succession was then under administration. The heirs of Nancy Tate intervened and claimed title by inheritance from their ancestor, the said Nancy. The issue was joined on this intervention by the original plaintiff. Both parties claimed title under the United States.

On the trial in the district court, judgment was entered in favor of the heirs of Nancy Tate. On appeal to the Supreme Court of Louisiana, the judgment of the lower court was reversed.

The heirs of Nancy Tate brought writ of error from this judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, rejecting their title, claimed under the laws of the United States.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. P. Benjamin and Robt. Gillet, for plaintiffs in error:

I. The decision of the register and receiver, ascertaining the location of the land confirmed to Nancy Tate, is final and conclusive, and the courts of justice cannot reverse that.

The Supreme Court of Louisiana erred in so doing.

Cousin v. Blanc, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 202.

II. But if that decision could be reversed, the result would be the same, the decision being clearly right.

Mr. Miles Taylor, for defendant, in error.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause comes before this court by a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act of September, 1789. The defendant in error (Carney) commenced a suit in the District Court of the Eighth Judicial District of Louisiana, in which he asserted that he had purchased, in the year 1844, at the probate sale of the succession of Sarah Cohern, deceased, five hundred and sixty acres of land on Cool Creek, in that district, and that Charles Tate had disturbed his possession and denied this title. He summoned Charles Tate to exhibit his claim to the land, and required the representatives of Sarah Cohern, deceased, to maintain the title they had warranted to him, or to refund the purchasemoney he had paid. The result of various proceedings in the district court was the forming of an issue between the defendants in error and the plaintiffs in error relative to their respective rights in the said parcel of land. It is situated in the section of country east of the Mississippi River and the Island of New Orleans, and west of the Perdido River, which was claimed by the United States under the Treaty of Paris of 1803 (8 Stat. at L., 200), for the cession of Louisiana, and which was adversely claimed and possessed by Spain as a portion of West Florida until 1812–'13. The Act of Congress for ascertaining the titles and claims to lands in that part of Louisiana which lies east of the Mississippi River and Island of New Orleans, approved 25th April, 1812 (2 Stat. at L., 713), is the first of the series of Acts that apply to this district. The 8th section requires the commissioners to be appointed under the Act to collect and report to Congress, at their next session, a list of all the actual settlers on land in said districts, respectively, who have no claims to land derived either from the French, British or Spanish Governments, and the time at which such settlements were made. The reports made by the commissioners appointed under the Act of 1812 were submitted to Congress, and are the subject of the Act of the 3d March, 1819 (3 Stat. at L., 528), for adjusting the claims to land, and establishing Land Offices in the district east of the Island of New Orleans.

The 3d section of this Act provides, "that every person whose claim is comprised in the lists or register of claims reported by the said commissioners, and the persons embraced in the list of actual settlers not having any written evidence of claim reported as aforesaid, shall, when it appears by the said reports or by the said lists that the land claimed or settled on had been actually inhabited or cultivated by such person or persons in whose right he claims, on or before the 15th of April, 1813, be entitled to a grant for the land so claimed or settled on as a donation; provided that not more than one tract shall be thus granted to any one person, and the same shall not contain more than six hundred and forty acres. By the 9th section of this Act, the register and receiver of the Land Offices in that district were authorized to make additions to the list of settlers, noting the time of their settlement, and to report the same to Congress. These, with other reports, were disposed of in the Supplementary Act for adjusting land claims in that district, adopted 8th May, 1822. (3 Stat. at L., 707.) The 3d section of the Act of 1822 is in the same language as the corresponding section in the Act of 1819 before cited. The 6th section of this Act requires the register and receiver to grant a certificate to every person who shall appear to be entitled to a tract of land under the 3d section of the Act, setting forth the nature of the claim and the quantity allowed. In 1820, Robert Yair made proof in the Land Office that in the year 1805 he had settled upon a parcel of land in the district, and had occupied and cultivated it from that time until the date of his application and proof. His claim was reported to Congress, and in 1824 a certificate issued to him for that land, which is the land in controversy. Robert Yair continued to occupy the land until his death, in 1825 or 1826, when it passed to his widow and heirs. The defendant in error (Carney) traces his title to these heirs. The claim of the plaintiffs in error is traced to Nancy Tate, their ancestress, who made a settlement in the same district in 1811, and whose claim was reported under the Act of 1812, before cited.

In the year 1847 her heirs applied to the register and receiver of the Land Office in that district for an order of survey, in which application they represented that Nancy Tate was entitled to a section of land under the Acts of Congress aforesaid; that she had settled upon public land in an adjoining section, forty-one; that John Tate was settled upon the same section; and that both could not have their complement of land, from their proximity, out of land contiguous to their settlement. But that there was vacant land to the east and northeast, not claimed by any person, sufficient to make up the quantity she had been entitled to, and prayed for the order, as one that could not injure any other person. The register and receiver caused a notice to be served on the defendant in error, to show cause why the order should not be granted. There is no evidence that he appeared on this notice.

In February, 1848, the register and receiver made a decision, in which they declared that Nancy Tate had settled upon this land; that they were satisfied that Robert Yair, at the time of the confirmation to him, was the holder of another donation for one thousand arpents, and that he was not entitled to this under the Act of 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 707), for that reason. They annulled the certificate that had been issued to him, and granted the order of survey as applied for. The survey was made to include this land, and a patent was issued in favor of the representatives of Nancy Tate in 1853. This patent describes the land as covered by the claim of Robert Yair, and releases the land, subject to any valid right, if such exists, in virtue of the confirmed claim of Robert Yair, or of any other person claiming from the United States, the French, British or Spanish Governments. The Supreme Court of Louisiana have found from the testimony that Nancy Tate was not an occupant of this land, and that the settlement of Robert Yair and his representatives had been continuous for some forty years. The question for the consideration of this court is, whether the decision of the register and receiver of the Land Office in favor of the plaintiffs in error is conclusive of the controversy. The Supreme Court decided that it was not, and we concur in that opinion.

In Barbarie v. Eslava, 9 How., 421, the defendant in error relied upon a decision of the register and receiver of a Land Office in the same district, with the same powers as were confirmed upon these, as conclusive in his favor. This court answered: "We do not consider that the Act of May 8th, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 707), and that of the same date, which is connected with it, and referred to as in pari materia, for a guide, meant to confer the adjudication of titles of land on registers and receivers. Sometimes, as in the case of preemptioners, they are authorized to decide on the fact of cultivation or not; and here, from the words used, no less than their character, they must be considered as empowered to decide on the true location of grants or confirmations, but not on the legal and often complicated questions of title, involving, also, the whole interests of the parties, and yet allowing no appeal or revision elsewhere. The power given to them is, to decide only how the lands confirmed shall be located and surveyed. The further power to decide on conflicting and interfering claims should apply only to the location and survey of such claims, which are the subject-matter of their cognizance; and on resorting to the reference made to the second Act of Congress, that Act appears also to relate to decisions on intrusions upon possessions and other kindred matters."

The case of Cousin v. Blanc, 19 How., 203, involved a question of the effect and binding operation of a decision of the register and receiver of the Land Office upon a location and survey of a claim confirmed under the Act of 1822, and refers to the Act of the 3d March, 1831 (4 Stat. at L., 492), as showing that the decisions of the register and receiver were not to be considered as precluding a legal investigation and decision by the proper judicial tribunals between the parties to interfering claims.

It furnishes no support of the argument that the decision of the register and receiver in such a case as this is conclusive of the title. There is no dispute in this case upon the subject of the location of the claim of Yair. The whole case shows that it had been identified and was actually possessed by Yair and his heirs. The patent of the defendants in error acknowledges that its location had been made, and that the new survey for the claim of Mrs. Tate covered this location. The decision of the register and receiver does not proceed upon any assumption of a conflict of location, but of a denial of the right of Yair. They had no authority to overthrow the decision of the register and receiver that had been made more than twenty years before, which had been followed by possession, and as to which there had intervened the claims of bona fide purchasers. It further appears that Mrs. Tate did not settle upon this parcel of land, and that the decision of the register and receiver in her favor is not supported by testimony.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana does not contain any error within the scope of the revising jurisdiction of this court, and it is, consequently, affirmed.

Preemption rights—applicable to alternate sections of lands granted to railroads.

The reserved sections of public lands along the lines of all the railroads, wherever public lands have been granted by Acts of Congress, after the restoration to market of such lands, lose their character as reserved lands, and will then be subject to the privileges of preemption in favor of settlers.

The policy of the Federal Government in favor of settlers upon public lands has been liberal. It recognizes their superior equity to become the purchasers of a limited extent of land comprehending their improvements, over that of any other person.

No Act of Congress has defined the meaning of the term "reserve" as applied to lands in the various Acts granting lands to a railroad, nor determined explicitly when these alternate sections lose their character as reserves.

No reason of public policy exists to exclude this class of public lands from the operation of the preemption laws.

Submitted Jan. 25, 1861. Decided Feb. 18, 1861.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States from the Southern District of Illinois.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the present appellee, to quiet title to land. The defendant demurred, and the demurrer was overruled, and the defendant electing to abide by his demurrer, judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed to this court.

The case is further stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. B. Ives, for appellant.

Mr. R. E. Williams, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee filed this bill in chancery in the circuit court to quiet his title to a portion of section 33, in township 17 north, of range 8 east, of the third principal meridian, in the County of Champaigne, Illinois. By the Act of Congress of the 20th September, 1850 (9 Stat. at Large, 466), for granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Illinois, Mississippi and Alabama, in aid of the construction of a railroad from Chicago to Mobile, there was granted to the State of Illinois, for the purpose of making the railroad described in the title of the Act, every alternate section of land designated by even numbers, for six sections in width on each side of the road; and in case any of these sections had been sold, or were subject to a preemption claim, then the State was authorized to select from the lands of the United States, contiguous to the tier of sections before mentioned, so much land in sections and parts of sections as should make up the full complement of land included in the concessions in the Act. The Act further provided, that the sections and parts of sections of lands which, by the grant, might remain to the United States within six miles on each side of the road, should not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands, when sold. To comply with the requirements of this Act, the Commissioner of the General Land Office withdrew from entry or sale the land on either side of the track of the road, until the State of Illinois could make the selections that were authorized by it. These were completed in 1852, and during that year the President of the United States, by a proclamation, directed the sale of those sections and parts of sections along the line of the road that had remained to the United States, after the satisfaction of the grant to Illinois. Such of the sections as were not sold became subject to private entry. The section of land described in the plaintiff's bill, a portion of which forms the subject of this suit, was one of these, and was purchased at private sale at the Land Office, in November, 1855, by a person under whom the plaintiff derives his claim, and who has the usual receipt given by the receiver of the Land Office.

The conflicting claim against which the appellee seeks relief originates in an entry by the appellant in November, 1856, as having a preemption right under a settlement begun in October, 1855, before the date of the entry on which the title of the appellee is founded. A patent issued to the appellant as having the superior claim. The object of the bill is to reverse the decision of the officers of the Land Office, and to obtain a relinquishment of the legal title evinced by this patent, and the only question presented is, whether the land was the subject of a preemption right in November, 1855.

The 10th section of the Act of the 4th September, 1841 (5 Stat. at L., 453), confers upon the beneficiaries of that Act, "who shall make a settlement in person on the public lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and which shall have been surveyed prior thereto, and who shall improve and inhabit the same, as specified in the Act, a right of preemption to one quarter section of land." Among the exceptions in the Act to the exercise of this right of preemption, is one that includes "sections of lands reserved to the United States, alternate to other sections granted to any of the States for the construction of any canal, railroad or other public improvement." 5 Stat. at L., 466.

Subsequent Acts of Congress extend the preemption privilege to lands not surveyed at the time of the settlement, and confer privileges upon settlers on school lands, and on lands reserved for private claims. Mar. 3, 1843; 5 Stat. at L., 620, secs. 3, 9.

In 1853 the preemption laws, as they now exist, were extended to the reserved sections of public lands along the lines of all the railroads, wherever public lands have been granted by Acts of Congress, in cases where the settlement and improvements had been made prior to the final allotment of the alternate sections to such railroads by the General Land Office. Mar. 3, 1853; 10 Stat. at L., 244.

In the administration of these laws, the Executive Department of the Government has decided, that after the restoration to market of the lands embraced in the exception we have quoted from the Act of 1841, and when they have become subject to entry at private sale, they lose their character as reserved lands, and will then be subject to the privileges of preemption in favor of settlers. The policy of the Federal Government in favor of settlers upon public lands has been liberal. It recognizes their superior equity, to become the purchasers of a limited extent of land comprehending their improvements, over that of any other person.

By the Act of 1841 (5 Stat. at L., 453), the preemption privilege in favor of actual settlers was extended over all the public lands of the United States that were fitted for agricultural poses and prepared market. Later statutes enlarged the privilege, so as to embrace lands not subject to sale or entry, and clearly evince that the actual settler is the most favored of the entire class of purchasers. No Act of Congress has defined the meaning of the term "reserve," as applied to lands in these various Acts, nor determined explicitly when these alternate sections lose their character as reserves. But all other public lands fitted for agricultural purposes, after they have been offered at public sale, are affected by the privilege of the actual settler to have the preference of entry. No reason of public policy exists to exclude this class of public lands from the operation of the same law, under under the same conditions. No violence is done to the language of the Act by limiting the exception to the temporary withdrawal of the lands from the market, and the liberal policy of Congress in favor of the actual settler is better accomplished by a restrictive rather than extensive interpretation of the exceptional clause in the Act. We, therefore, sanction the construction adopted in the Land Office.

The circuit court overruled the demurrer of the defendant to the bill, and made a decree in conformity to the prayer of the bill. This is error.

The decree of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the circuit court, with directions to dismiss the bill, with costs.

v.

AARON D. FENTON, OLIVER H. LEE, WM. H. DAVIS AND MERRITT T. COLE.

(See S. C., 24 How., 407–413)

Insolvent debtor may alienate his property pending suits against him—general creditor cannot bring action to set aside deed as fraudulent to creditors.

Chancery will not interfere to prevent an insolvent debtor from alienating his property to avoid an existing or prospective debt, even when there is a suit pending to establish it.

A creditor acquires a lien upon the lands of his debtor by a judgment; and upon the personal goods of the debtor, by the delivery of an execution to the sheriff. It is only by these liens that a creditor has any vested or specific right in the property of his debtor.

Before these liens are acquired, the debtor has full dominion over his property; he may convert one species of property into another, and he may alienate to a purchaser.

The rights of the debtor and those of a creditor are defined by positive rules, and cannot be contravened or varied by any interposition of equity.

A general creditor cannot bring an action on the case against his debtor or against those combining and colluding with him to make dispositions of his property, although the object of those dispositions be to hinder, delay and defraud creditors.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin.

NOTE.—Fraud in avoidance of deeds. See note to Harding v. Handy, 24 U. S. (11 Wheat.), 103.

This was an action on the case brought by the present defendants in error in the court below.

Upon the trial below, the jury, under the charge of the court, rendered a judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant brought the case to this court upon various exceptions.

The case fully appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. James S. Brown and J. R. Doolittle, for the plaintiffs in error:

We contend that a creditor, as such, having neither judgment nor writ, has no interest in his debtor's fraud.

Wiggins v. Armstrong, 2 Johns. Ch., 144; Tate v. Liggat, 2 Leigh, 84: Beck v. Burdett, 1 Paige, 305; 9 Wend., 565.

If this be conceded, it follows that he can be legally affected by no conspiracy which relates merely to the removal or destruction of that property, whatever be the motive of the act. Even should it result in the ruin of his debtor and the final loss of the debt, it becomes damnum absque injuria.

See, also, Williams v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch., 682.

Mr. William P. Lynde, for defendants in error:

Whenever there is fraud or deceit by the one party and injury to the other, or damnum cum injuria, then an action will lie.

Jones v. Parker, 1 Cow., 446; Tappan v. Powers, 2 Hall, 77; 3 Bl. Com., 122; 3 Rob. Pr., 423; Adams v. Page, 7 Pick., 542; Hopkins v. Bebee, 26 Pa., 86; Upton v. Vail, 6 Johns., 182; Meredith v. Johns, 1 Hen. & M., 585; Cotterell v. Jones, 11 C. B., 717; Smith v. Tonstall, Carthew, 3.

A creditor without judgment or execution, and even before his debt is due, may sue parties at law in an action on the case, who conspire to defeat the right of collection, by fraudulently concealing and converting the debtor's goods.

Kelsey v. Murphy, 26 Pa., 84; Mott v. Danforth, 6 Watts, 304; Morrison v. Witherill, 8 Serg. & R., 502.

The action is for a wrong independent of contract. The amount of the indebtedness is shown in ascertaining the damages. It is not universally true that when, by agreement, an act is to be done on a future day, no action can be brought for a breach of the agreement till the day for doing the act in question has arrived.

See Hochster v. De La Tour, 2 El. & B., 678; Short v. Stone, 8 Q. B., 358; Ford v. Tiley, 6 Barn. & C., 325; Lovelock v. Franklyn, 8 Q. B., 371; Bowdell v. Parsons, 10 East, 359.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by the defendants in error in the district court, as creditors of two of the plaintiffs in error, Adler & Schiff, upon the complaint that this firm had combined and conspired with their co-defendants in the court below to dispose of their property fraudulently, so as to hinder and defeat their creditors in the collection of their lawful demands, by means of which fraudulent acts they affirm they suffered vexation and expense, and finally incurred the loss of their debt.

The defendants pleaded the general issue. Upon the trial the plaintiffs proved that Adler & Schiff were traders in Milwaukee, and to carry on their business, in August, 1857, purchased of the plaintiffs, and other merchants in New York, upon credit, a large quantity of merchandise, which, with their other property, shortly after its delivery at Milwaukee, was assigned to one of their co-defendants, for the ostensible purpose of paying their debts, but really with the purpose of more effectually concealing it from the pursuit of their creditors.

There was testimony conducing to convict all the defendants of a common design to accomplish this purpose. The plaintiffs had extended a credit to Adler & Schiff of two, four and six months. They caused an attachment to issue against this firm upon all their debt which had become due at the time these transactions occurred, which was levied upon sufficient property to satisfy it, and afterwards, and before the maturity of their remaining demand, this suit was commenced. At the time of the trial, this demand was their only claim against Adler & Schiff.

The defendants requested the court to instruct the jury, "that a creditor at large, as such, has no legal interest in the goods of his debtor, and cannot maintain an action for any damages done to such property; and that if the defendants had been guilty of a conspiracy to remove the property of a debtor, and thereby to defraud his creditors, a creditor at large, not having a present right of action against such debtor, has not such an interest in the subject of the fraud as to enable him to maintain an action for damages against the defendants, and that the declaration discloses no cause of action against the defendants." The court declined to give this instruction, but charged the jury "that the plaintiffs sold their goods to Adler & Schiff on credit: they had no interest in the goods sold, or in the other property of these defendants, but an interest in the debt owing for the goods so sold on credit. And if the defendants have been guilty of a conspiracy to remove the property of Adler & Schiff, and they did so remove their property, with intent to defraud the plaintiffs in the collection of their debt when it should become payable, even though it was not payable when such removal was effected, the plaintiffs have a cause of action after the debt became payable." To enable the plaintiffs to sustain an action on the case like the present, it must be shown that the defendants have done some wrong, that is, have violated some right of theirs, and that damage has resulted as a direct and proximate consequence from the commission of that wrong. The action cannot be sustained, because there has been a conspiracy or combination to do injurious acts. In Savile v. Roberts, 1 Ld. Raym., 374, Lord Holt said, "it was objected at the bar against these old cases, that they were grounded upon a conspiracy, which is of an odious nature and, therefore, sufficient ground for an action by itself. But to this objection he answered, that conspiracy is not the ground of these actions, but the damages done to the party; for an action will not lie for the greatest conspiracy imaginable if nothing be put in execution." There are cases of injurious acts for which a suit will not lie unless there be fraud or malice concurring to characterize and distinguish them. But in these cases the act must be tortious, and there must be consequent damage. An act legal in itself, and violating no right, cannot be made actionable on account of the motive which superinduced it. It is the province of ethics to consider of actions in their relation to motives, but jurisprudence deals with actions in their relation to law, and for the most part independently of the motive. In Hutchins v. Hutchins, 7 Hill (N. Y.), 104, the defendants had successfully conspired to induce a testator by fraudulent representations to alter a will he had made in favor of the plaintiff.

The court said, "for injuries to health, liberty and reputation, or to rights of property, personal or real, the law has furnished appropriate remedies. The former are violations of the absolute rights of the person, from which damage results as a legal consequence. As to the latter, the party aggrieved must not only establish that the alleged tort or trespass has been committed, but must aver and prove his right or interest in the property or thing affected, before he can be deemed to have sustained damages for which an action will lie." And because the plaintiff had a mere possibility of benefit, and was deprived only of hopes and expectations, it was decided that the action in that case would not lie. In Stevenson v. Newnham, 18 C. B., 285, it was determined, that when the act complained of is not unlawful per se, the characterizing it as malicious and wrongful will not be sufficient to sustain the action. In the present suit, the plaintiffs do not allege that they were defrauded in the contract of sale of their merchandise, although there is abundant testimony to show that the purchases were made by Adler & Schiff, with the intention of defrauding their vendors. But the plaintiffs, by electing to sue for the price, have waived that fraud and confirmed the sale. Adler & Schiff were the lawful owners of the property at the time this suit was commenced. They had the legal right to use and enjoy it to the exclusion of others, and no one had any right to interfere with their use or disposition; none, unless there be a right conferred by the law upon a creditor to prevent the accomplishment of fraud by his debtor, and to pursue him, and others assisting him, for a revocation of acts done to hinder, delay or defraud him, in the collection of his demand.

The authorities are clear, that chancery will not interfere to prevent an insolvent debtor from alienating his property to avoid an existing or prospective debt, even when there is a suit pending to establish it. In Moran v. Dawes, Hopkins Ch., 365, the court says: "Our laws determine with accuracy the time and manner in which the property of a debtor ceases to be subject to his disposition, and becomes subject to the rights of his creditor. A creditor acquires a lien upon the lands of his debtor by a judgment, and upon the personal goods of the debtor by the delivery of an execution to the sheriff. It is only by these liens that a creditor has any vested or specific right in the property of his debtor. Before these liens are required, the debtor has full dominion over his property; he may convert one species of property into another, and he may alienate to a purchaser. The rights of the debtor, and those of a creditor, are thus defined by positive rules; and the points at which the power of the debtor ceases and the right of the creditor commences, are clearly established. These regulations cannot be contravened or varied by any interposition of equity. There are cases in which the violation of the rights of a creditor, within these limits, has formed the subject of an action at law against third persons. Smith v. Tonstall, Carth., 3; Penrod v. Mitchell, 8 Serg. & R., 522; Kelsy v. Murphy, 26 Pa. St., 78; Yates v. Joyce, 11 Johns., 136. But the analogies of the law, and the doctrine of adjudged cases, will not allow of an extension, by the courts, of the remedy employed in those cases in favor of a general creditor. This subject was discussed much at large in Lamb v. Stone, 11 Pick., 527.

"The plaintiff complained of the fraud of the defendant in purchasing the property of his absconding debtor, in order to aid and abet him in the fraudulent purpose of evading the payment of his debt. The court ask, what damage has the plaintiff sustained by the transfer of his debtor's property? He has lost no lien, for he had none. No attachment has been defeated, for none had been made. He has not lost the custody of his debtor's body, for he had not arrested him. He has not been prevented from attaching the property, or arresting the body of his debtor; for he had never procured any writ of attachment against him. He has lost no claim upon, or interest in the property, for he never acquired either. The most that can be said is, that he intended to attach the property, and the wrongful act of the defendant has prevented him from executing this intention. * * * On the whole, it does not appear that the tort of the defendant caused any damage to the plaintiff. But even if so, yet it is too remote, indefinite and contingent to be the ground of an action." The same court reaffirmed this doctrine in Wellington v. Small, 3 Cush., 146.

Unquestionably, the claims of morality and justice, as well as the legitimate interests of creditors, require there should be protection against those acts of an insolvent or dishonest debtor that are contrary to the prescriptions of law, and are unfaithful and injurious. But the Legislature must determine upon the remedies appropriate for this end; and the difficulty of the subject is evinced by the diversity in the systems of different States for adjusting the relations of creditor and debtor, consistently with equity and humanity. Bankrupt and insolvent laws, laws allowing of attachment and sequestration of the debtor's estate, and for the revocation of fraudulent conveyances, creditor's bills and criminal prosecutions for fraud or conspiracy, are some of the modes that have been adopted for the purpose. In the absence of special legislation, we may safely affirm that a general creditor cannot bring an action on the case against his debtor, or against those combining or colluding with him to make dispositions of his property, although the object of those dispositions be to hinder, delay and defraud creditors.

The charge of the district judge is erroneous, and the judgment of that court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

THE UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY OF PHILADELPHIA, Claimant and Owner of the Steamship PENNSYLVANIA, her Tackle, &c.

v.

THE NEW YORK & VIRGINIA STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

(See S. C., 24 How., 307-315.)

Collision by inevitable accident—where damages must fall—where one or both parties in fault, who liable for damages—what is inevitable accident—negligence, what is—starboarding the helm—insufficient excuse.

Collision between two steamboats where it is conceded that the collision was not occasioned by any fault on the part of those in charge of the injured vessel, but it is insisted that the colliding steamer was also without fault, and that the collision was the result of inevitable accident.

Where a collision occurs exclusively from natural causes, and without any negligence or fault either on the part of the owners of the respective vessels, or of those intrusted with their control and management, the rule of law is, that the loss must rest where it fell; on the principle that no one is responsible for such an accident, if it was produced by causes over which human agency could exercise no control.

But that rule has no application, whatever, to a case where negligence or fault is shown to have been committed on either side.

If the fault was one committed by the libelant alone, proof of that fact is of itself a sufficient defense; or if the respondent alone committed the fault, then the libelant is entitled to recover; and if both were in fault, then the damages must be equally apportioned between them.

It is only when the disaster happens from natural causes, and without negligence or fault on either side, that the defense of accident can be admitted.

Inevitable accident, as applied to cases of this description, must be understood to mean a "collision which occurs when both parties have endeavored, by every means in their power, with care and caution, and a proper display of nautical skill, to prevent the occurrence of the accident."

It is not inevitable accident where a master proceeds carelessly on his voyage, and afterwards circumstances arise, when it is too late for him to do what is fit and proper to be done.

He must show that he acted seasonably, and that he "did everything which an experienced mariner could do, adopting ordinary caution," and that the collision ensued in spite of such exertions.

Where it was so dark that the lights of the approaching steamer could not be seen, it was negligence in the master, while his steamer was proceeding at the rate of six miles an hour, to remain in the saloon, wholly inattentive to the peculiar dangers incident to the character of the night.

If it was not unusually dark, then it is clear that there was gross negligence on the part of those in charge of the deck.

The great fault committed, was that of putting the helm to starboard, instead of keeping the course or porting it, when it become known that the other steamer was approaching.

The excuse given for it by the pilot, that he supposed his own steamer was backing, only adds to the magnitude of the error, as it shows that the order was given without knowing what its effect would be.

Argued Feb. 13, 1861. Decided Feb. 25, 1861.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia.

This was a case growing out of a collision. The libel was filed by the present appellees in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia. The court decreed in favor of the libelants; and the claimants, the present appellants, appealed to the circuit court, by which court the decree of the district court was affirmed. The claimants appealed to this court.

The case is further stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Robert P. Kane and A. A. Smith, for the appellant.

Mr. William F. Watson, for the appellees.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, sitting in admiralty. The libel was filed in the district court by the appellees, on the 18th day of June, 1855. It was a proceeding in rem against the steamship Pennsylvania, and was instituted to recover compensation for certain damage done to the steamship Jamestown, by means of a collision which occurred between those steamers in Elizabeth River, on the night of the 7th of January, 1855, some five or six miles below the port of Norfolk, in the State of Virginia. At the time of the collision, The Jamestown was on her regular weekly trip from the port of Norfolk to Richmond, in the same State, and The Pennsylvania was proceeding up the river to Norfolk, in the prosecution of her regular semi-monthly trip from Philadelphia to her place of destination. Libelants allege that The Jamestown was pursuing her usual and proper course down the river, and that the collision occurred in consequence of the improper and unskillful management of those in charge of the other steamer. Process was duly served, and the respondents appeared and answered to the suit. They admitted the collision but alleged, in effect, that it occurred in consequence of the intense darkness of the night, occasioned by a dense fog, without any such negligence or fault as alleged in the libel, and in spite of every possible precaution on the part of those in charge of their steamer to prevent it. A decree was entered for the libelants in the district court, which was affirmed, on appeal, in the circuit court, and thereupon the respondents appealed to this court. It is now conceded by the respondents that the collision was not occasioned by any fault on the part of those in charge of the injured vessel, but it is insisted in their behalf that the colliding steamer was also without fault, and that the collision was the result of inevitable accident. To establish that defense, they rely entirely upon the character of the night, as shown by the evidence, and the circumstances attending the disaster. From the evidence, it appears that The Jamestown left the wharf at Norfolk on the 7th of January, 1855, about eleven or half past eleven o'clock at night, as alleged in the libel. When she started, there was a thick fog in the harbor, but she met with no difficulty in passing out, and it so far cleared away in about half an hour that those in charge of her deck, as she proceeded down the river, could see the lights and even the hulls of vessels ahead, and the land on the eastern shore. Several witnesses also testify that the moon had risen, and that stars were occasionally visible, though they admit that it was still quite foggy, and that there was a heavy mist on the water. Two competent lookouts were accordingly stationed at the usual place in the forecastle, and the signal lights of the steamer were properly displayed. Those precautions had been taken at the time the steamer left the wharf, but about the time she passed the naval hospital, the master, as he had been accustomed to do on similar occasions, left the quarter deck, and took a position in the rigging of the steamer, some ten feet above the hurricane deck. Leaving the lookouts properly stationed in the forecastle to perform their usual duties, he doubtless chose that more elevated situation to get a less obstructed view of distant objects, and he testifies that he could then see a mile and a half ahead, and the evidence furnishes no good reason to doubt the truth of his statement.

Intending to take the eastern side of the channel, another precaution also became necessary, so as not to incur the hazard of running the steamer aground; and to guard against any such danger, he directed the mate to heave the lead at short intervals, and to report to him the soundings; and the order was faithfully obeyed. Having taken these precautions, he continued to prosecute the voyage at a moderate rate of speed, sometimes stopping the engine when the fog shut in, and occasionally ringing the bell and sounding the whistle; and the steamer, pursuing her regular course, rounded Lambert's Point in perfect safety, passing so near to the buoy located there that it was seen by the master from his position in the rigging, and particularly noticed. On arriving there, it was necessary to change the course of the steamer; and inasmuch as he had noticed the buoy, he was enabled to perform that duty without danger of mistake. Orders were accordingly given to the wheelsman to set the course north one fourth east, and to run by the compass. During all this time the master remained in the rigging, and he testifies that after the steamer rounded the point, he could see from the buoy to Craney Island light ship, which, according to his estimate, is a mile and a half. Presently, however, as the steamer advanced, he saw another light, on the larboard bow of the steamer, and finding upon inquiry that the wheelsman had not seen it, he called his attention to the fact that there were two lights, expressing the opinion, at the same time, that the one last discovered was the light of The Pennsylvania coming up the river. His own steamer at that time was heading north, half east, and he directed the wheelsman to port the helm, so as to keep both lights well on the larboard bow, which had the effect gradually to sheer the steamer still closer to the eastern side of the channel. She had previously been running in about four fathoms of water, but the mate soon reported that the soundings showed only three, and as she advanced, he informed the master that there was but two and a half fathoms, and cautioned him that there was danger of running aground. At this time the master saw the signal lights and hull of The Pennsylvania, as she passed the light ship, on the western side of the channel. Immediate orders were then given to ring the bell and sound the whistle, and the master testifies that the signals were answered from the approaching steamer. Shortly afterwards, the mate reported that the soundings showed but ten feet of water, and immediately upon receiving that information he gave the necessary orders to stop the machinery, and reverse the engine. Both orders were promptly obeyed, and it was then the master first discovered that the approaching steamer had altered her course, and was heading diagonally across the channel towards The Jamestown. They were then less than a quarter of a mile apart, and seeing that a collision was almost inevitable, he instantly directed the alarm bell to be rung, and the whistle of the steamer to be sounded; and as there was nothing more that he could do to avoid the danger, he gave warning to the men in the forecastle, and left the rigging, and returned to the quarter deck. Further reference to the circumstances preceding the collision, so far as respects the injured steamer, is unnecessary at this stage of the investigation. According to the evidence, it seems that The Pennsylvania arrived off Cape Henry at an early hour in the evening of the day of the collision, but in consequence of the fog and the difficulties of the navigation, she did not enter the river till after eleven o'clock at night. She proceeded up the river at the rate of about six miles an hour, and the mate, who was the acting pilot after she entered the river, and had charge of her deck, admits that she ran very close to the before mentioned light ship, and that her course at that time was south, half east, and it is not possible to doubt that if she had continued on that course a short time longer, all danger would have been avoided. Such, however, was not the fact, as is clearly shown by the pilot himself, and we refer to his testimony in preference to that of the master, because the latter remained in the saloon until just before the collision occurred. Among other things, the pilot admits, that shortly after his steamer passed the light ship, he gave the order to starboard the helm; and what seems even more remarkable, in cases of this description, he acknowledges that he gave the order after he knew that another steamer was approaching, though he denies that he had seen her lights. His theory is, and he accordingly testifies, that he first gave the order to stop and back; and inasmuch as that order had been executed, and the steamer had actually commenced to back, that putting the helm a-starboard had the same effect as porting the helm would have produced if the steamer had been going ahead. But it is a sufficient answer to that theory, as applied to this case, to say that the evidence shows, beyond the reach of doubt, that the steamer was still advancing at the rate at least of three or four miles an hour, so that, upon his own theory, he committed an error, and according to his own testimony he committed it with a knowledge of the approaching danger. Three or four witnesses, including the master of the colliding steamer, testify that she was advancing three or four miles an hour when the collision occurred, and the damage done to the injured steamer proves to a demonstration that her headway must have been very considerable. On the contrary, the injured steamer had nearly stopped, and being already as close to the eastern side of the channel as the means of navigation would allow, she was almost as powerless to prevent the collision as if she had been lashed to the wharf from which she started. It was under these circumstances that the two steamers came together, and the evinence shows that the colliding steamer struck the other on the port bow near the forward gangway, some thirty or forty feet abaft the stem. As described by the witnesses, it was a full blow at right angles, and had the effect to force the stem of the colliding steamer some six feet into the hull of the other, tearing up the deck of the forecastle a third part of the way across the vessel, and breaking into two pieces six or eight of the largest timbers. Looking at the whole circumstances of the collision, it is vain for the respondents to suppose that this court can hold that it was the result of inevitable accident. Where the collision occurs exclusively from natural causes, and without any negligence or fault either on the part of the owners of the respective vessels, or of those intrusted with their control and management, the rule of law is, that the loss must rest where it fell; on the principle that no one is responsible for such an accident, if it was produced by causes over which human agency could exercise no control. Stainback v. Rae, 14 How., 533; 1 Pars. M. L., 187. But that rule can have no application whatever to a case where negligence or fault is shown to have been committed on either side; for if the fault was one committed by the libelant alone, proof of that fact is of itself a sufficient defense; or if the respondent alone committed the fault, then the libelant is entitled to recover; and clearly, if both were in fault, then the damages must be equally apportioned between them. Plainly, therefore, it is only when the disaster happens from natural causes, and without negligence or fault on either side, that the defense set up in this case can be admitted. Inevitable accident, as applied to cases of this description, must be understood to mean "a collision which occurs when both parties have endeavored, by every means in their power, with due care and caution, and a proper display of nautical skill, to prevent the occurrence of the accident. The Lochlibo, 3 W. Rob., 318; The James Gray v. The John Frazer, 21 How., 184. It is not inevitable accident, as was well remarked by the learned judge in the case of The Juliet Erskine, 6 Notes of Cases, 634, where a master proceeds carelessly on his voyage, and afterwards circumstances arise, when it is too late for him to do what is fit and proper to be done." He must show that he acted seasonably, and that he "did everything which an experienced mariner could do, adopting ordinary caution," and that the collision ensued in spite of such exertions. The Rose, 7 Jur., 381. Unless the rule were so, it would follow that the master might neglect the special precautions which are often necessary in a dark night, and when a collision had occurred in consequence of such neglect, he might successfully defend himself upon the ground that the disaster had happened from the character of the night, and not from any want of exertion on his part to prevent it. The Batavier, 40 Eng. L. & Eq., 25; The Europa, 2 Eng. L. & Eq., 564; The Mellona, 5 Notes of Cases, 558. Applying these principles to the present case, it is obvious that the defense set up by the respondents cannot be sustained. They not only fail to show that the steamer was without fault, but the testimony of those in charge of her incontestably proves that they were guilty of negligence in more than one particular. Both steamers were in the prosecution of their regular and stated trips and, of course, those in charge of them knew, or ought to have known, that they were liable to meet each other on the route; and if it was so dark that the lights of an approaching steamer could not be seen, it was negligence in the master, while his steamer was proceeding at the rate of six miles an hour, to remain in the saloon, wholly inattentive to the peculiar dangers incident to the character of the night; and if it was not unusually dark, then it is clear that there was gross negligence on the part of those in charge of the deck. It is shown by the evidence that the colliding steamer had two lookouts; but it is not shown what, if any, duty they performed in the emergency, or that any inquiries were made of them, either when the course of the steamer was changed near the light ship, or when the pilot heard the noise made by the wheels of the approaching steamer. But the great fault committed on the occasion was that of putting the helm to starboard, instead of keeping the course or porting it when it became known that the other steamer was approaching; and the excuse given for it by the pilot, that he supposed his own steamer was backing, only adds to the magnitude of the error, as it shows that the order was given without knowing what its effect would be, which could only have happened from indifference or inattention to duty.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the decision of the circuit court was correct, and the decree is, accordingly, affirmed, with costs.

CHARLES McMICKEN PERIN, CLYDE PERIN, AND MARY E. PERIN, Infants, by their Father and Next Friend, FRANKLIN PERIN, Appts.,

v.

FREEMAN G. CAREY, WM. CROSSMAN, WM. M. T. HEWSON, THE CITY OF CINCINNATI, ELIZABETH RANDALL, DAVID P. STILLE AND ELIZABETH, HIS WIFE, AND ANDREW McMICKEN.

(See S. C., 24 How., 465-508.)

Will, conveying property to a city for charitable uses, is valid—city corporation may take devises and bequests in trust for charitable uses—preference of particular classes of persons as beneficiaries, is valid—what devises are charities—Ohio Legislature.

Where a testator devised to the City of Cincinnati, and its successors, real and personal estate, in trust, for the purpose of building and maintaining two colleges for the education of boys and girls, the surplus to be applied to education and support of poor orphans, preference to be given to his relations and descendants; held, that the doctrines founded upon the Statute of 43 Eliz., ch. 4, in relation to charitable trusts to corporations, either municipal or private, have been adopted by the courts of equity in Ohio, but not by express legislation; nor was that necessary to give courts of equity in Ohio that jurisdiction.

The English Statutes of Mortmain were never in force in the English colonies; and if they were ever considered to be so in the State of Ohio, they were repealed by the State Act of 1806.

The City of Cincinnati, as a Corporation, is capable of taking, in trust, devises and bequests for charitable uses, and can take and administer the devises and bequests in the will.

Those devises and bequests named are charities, in a legal sense; and are valid in equity, and may be enforced in equity by its jurisdiction in such matters without the intervention of legislation by the State of Ohio.

The direction in the will, that the real estate devised should not be alienated, makes no perpetuity in the sense forbidden by the law, but only a perpetuity allowed by law and equity in the cases of charitable trusts.

There is no uncertainty in the devises and bequests as to the beneficiaries of testator's intention; and his preference of particular persons, as to who should be pupils in the colleges which he meant to found, was a lawful exercise of his rightful power to make the devises and bequests.

The disposition which he makes of any surplus after the complete organization of the colleges is a good charitable use for poor white male and female orphans.

Legislation of Ohio upon the subject of corporations, by the Act of April 9, 1852, does not stand in the way of carrying into effect the devises and bequests of the will.

Argued Jan. 30, 1861. Decided Feb. 25, 1861.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

This was a bill in equity filed by the complainants, the present appellants, collateral heirs at law of one Charles McMicken, in the court below, for the purpose of invalidating the last will and testament of the said Charles McMicken.

The provisions of the will in question appear in the opinion of the court. The objections to the will set out in the bill are as follows:

1st. "Said City of Cincinnati was formerly a Municipal Corporation, created and having certain powers conferred upon it by an Act of Incorporation of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, but it now exists only as a political division of a State under a general law having a uniform operation throughout the State, and is without any power or authority to accept said devises or bequests, to acquire or hold the title to the said property mentioned in the said devises or bequests for the purposes therein expressed, or to execute the trusts or any of them therein set forth and declared.

2d. "Said Charles McMicken, deceased, has undertaken, by said alleged devises and bequests, to render a large amount of real estate above described, situate in said City of Cincinnati in said State of Ohio, and an indefinite amount of real estate to be hereafter purchased in said City of Cincinnati, forever unalienable, contrary to the law and public policy of said State.

3. "There are no persons mentioned or referred to as beneficiaries under the trust attempted to be created by said will, who are so described that they are entitled to and can claim the benefit to said trusts or any of them, and the same are, therefore, void for uncertainty.

4th. "By the terms of said will, the establishment of the regulations necessary to carry out the objects of the endowment attempted to be made, and the power to appoint directors of the institutions therein named, are vested in the corporate authorities of the City of Cincinnati; but there are no persons, either artificial or natural, who fall within or are sufficiently identified by said description.

5th. "The trusts attempted to be created by said will are uncertain and illegal for the further reason that the distribution of the trust fund between the two objects of the education of white boys and girls and the support of poor white male and female orphans, is to be left to the unrestrained discretion of the City of Cincinnati, or of the corporate authorities of the said City of Cincinnati.

6th. "The trusts attempted to be created by said will for the support of poor white female orphans is illegal and void, because, without authority of law, and in violation of the statutes and public policy of the State of Ohio, it is therein requested that before they shall receive any benefits therefrom, their guardian, or those in whose custody they are, shall have first entirely relinquished the control of them to the said City, and provided that those orphans who may have remained until they have reached any age between fourteen and eighteen years, shall be bound out by the said City to some proper art, trade, occupation or employment."

The circuit court sustained the demurrer of the defendants, and dismissed the bill of complaint with costs, from which decree the complainants have taken this appeal.

Messrs. T. Ewing, F. Perin and N. Headington, for appellants:

We claim, first, that the devise and bequest is void, on the ground that the trustee is incapable of taking and executing the trust, and the cestuis que trust are dependent on the selection of the trustee and, therefore, there can never be either trustee or cestuis que trust.

We will consider this point first, irrespective of the law of charities, under the ordinary rule of equity.

If the trustee be incompetent to take, and the cestui que trust uncertain or incompetent, the estate descends unincumbered to the heir; but if the trustee can take the estate, but cannot execute the trusts, and the cestui que trust is incapable of taking, or dependent on an act of the trustee to designate him, or call him into being, and the trustee cannot do the act, or if in any way it become impossible that the cestui que trust should come into being, the trustee holds for the benefit of the heir.

King v. Mitchell, 8 Pet., 349; Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 10 Ves., 535; Atty Gen. v. Bishop of Oxford, 1 Bro. C. C., 444, note q; Hill. Trust., 118.

The prime object or destination of the fund devised, is the erection of two colleges, one for boys and one for girls, and the education therein of such of the testator's relations and their descendants, his legatees and their descendants, &c., &c., as should apply to and be selected by the City.

It was also provided that the land devised and thereafter purchased for the benefit of the trust should be inalienable forever, and that the colleges should be immortal and free from legislative control. Now, if the City of Cincinnati cannot take charge of this prime destination of the fund, independently of all else, it cannot execute the trust.

Atty Gen. v. Bishop, 1 Bro. C. C., 444, note q; Atty-Gen. v. Goulding, 2 Bro. C. C., 427, 430; Grieves v. Case, 1 Ves., Jr., 548, 551; Chapman v. Brown, 6 Ves., 404; Atty-Gen. v. Hinxman, 2 Jac. & W., 270, 278.

The first question then is, can the City take and execute the trusts to build colleges and superintend them forever for the education of the descendants of the relatives and devisees of Charles McMicken, whether rich or poor, without regard to residence.

The City derives all its powers from the Statute of May 1, 1852.

Many specific powers are enumerated, under none of which could it exercise this or like trusts. The 18th section contained this clause: "to exercise such other powers and to have such other privileges as are incident to municipal corporations of like character or degree, not inconsistant with this Act or the general laws of this State."

We are to determine, then, what are the general powers of municipal corporations. Such corporations are confined strictly to the letter of their charters.

7 Ohio, part 1, 232; Collins v. Hatch, 18 Ohio, 524; New London v. Brainard, 22 Conn., 555; Hodges v. City of Buffalo, 2 Den., 110.

Corporations in the United States are, with few exceptions, creatures of statutory creation. They have just such powers as the statute gives them directly or by implication.

Head v. Providence Ins. Co., 2 Cranch, 167; Dartmouth Col. v. Woodward, 4 Wheat., 636; Bank v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat., 68; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet., 544; Bank v. Earl, 13 Pet., 587; Perrine v. Canal Co., 9 How., 184.

The Ohio decisions conform to the above.

Gallia Co. v. Holcomb, 7 Ohio, part 1, 232; Bank of Chillcothe v. Town of Chillicothe, 7 Ohio, part 2, 35, 36; 5 Ohio, 393; Bank v. Swayne, 8 Ohio, 286; Collins v. Hatch, 18 Ohio, 523.

Such was the law in Ohio in 1852, and the Act of that year should be construed in conformity therewith.

There have been two subsequent decisions. Bartholomew v. Bentley, 1 Ohio St., 41; Straus v. Eagle Ins. Co., 5 Ohio St., 60.

Now, if we examine the charter of this City by the light of these principles, and compare it with the terms of the trust, we shall find them absolutely irreconcilable. The trust, therefore, and the devise which creates it, must be void, or they must stand without the support of the City as trustee.

The City cannot take, as discretionary trustee, for any person or any object not within the scope of its own proper function.

The Legislature has deemed an express provision necessary to authorize the City to erect and maintain infirmaries for the accommodation of their poor (Swan, p. 973, sec. 77); to erect, regulate and maintain a house of refuge for children under 16, convicted of offenses, to erect city prisons (sec. 82); but the power to found colleges is nowhere expressly granted, and cannot be implied, as it is not necessary to carry out any of the expressly granted powers, nor is it incident to the existence of the Corporation.

See, also, McDonogh v. Murdoch, 15 How., 410; King v. Mitchell, 8 Pet., 349; Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves., Jr., 334; Briggs v. Penny, 3 McN. & Gordon, ch. 557.

II. We maintain that this devise, void on general principles, cannot be sustained as a charity.

The peculiar course of decisions under the head of charities, finds no warrant in the doctrines of the common law, or the practice of courts in equity prior to the Statute of Elizabeth.

Whatever doubt may exist upon the question of jurisdiction, it is now settled beyond dispute that the power which the Chancellor exercises over donations to charitable uses, whether it existed before the Statute of 43 Elizabeth, or not, so far as it differs from the power he exercised in the other cases of trusts, does not belong to the court of chancery as a court of equity, nor is it a part of its judicial power and jurisdiction. It is a branch of the prerogative power of King as parens patriæ which he exercises by the Chancellor.

The course of decision in England under the Statute of Elizabeth is not entitled to the special favor of our courts. They are entitled to favor just as far as the law favors them and no farther. If they be specially favored, the inheritance of the heir must be specially disfavored. Such devises as these are said to be beneficial to the public just the same, whether the public or an individual be interested, and surely equity cannot take from the heir the inheritance which is his by law, simply because the public will profit by devesting him.

See, on this subject, Stat. 9 Ga., 2, ch. 36; 2 Am. b., 616; 7 Ves., 42, 77, 87; 4 Wheat., 48, 49; 2 Sto. Eq. Jur., secs. 1193, 1194; Wheeler v. Smith, 9 How., 78; Fontain v. Ravenel, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 387, 394–396.

Bt it is said there has been a course of legislation in Ohio tending to the same result with the Statute of Elizabeth, and that, pro tanto at least, the decisions under that statute ought to be regarded. An analysis of those laws will, I think, set these questions of legislative sanction at rest. They are six in number, providing,

1st. That a devise to the poor of a township shall vest the estate in the trustees of the township, for the use of the poor.

Swan, 612, sec. 14.

2d. A devise to the State of Ohio, or to any person whomsoever, in trust for the common school fund, shall be vested in the common school fund.

Swan, 832, sec. 5.

3d. The respective Township Boards of Education shall have power to take and hold in trust for the use and benefit of any "central or high school or sub-district school in the township."

Swan, 852.

4th. The trustees of the lunatic asylum may take and hold in trust any lands, &c., conveyed, &c., to be applied to any purpose connected with the institution.

Swan, 556 and 127.

5th. Townships which have been lawfully laid off and designated shall have power to receive any devise, &c., to the township for the benefit of the township, either for a public square or other useful purpose specified in such devise, &c., and shall hold the same in trust for the township for the purposes specified in such conveyance.

Swan, 992, sec. 1.

6th. The trustees of any university, college or academy (created according to the provisions of the Act in which the authority is found), may hold in trust any property devised, bequeathed or donated upon any specific trust consistent with the objects of such corporation.

Swan, 192, sec. 3.

Now, all these provisions are very distinct and exact, and require no loose or irregular construction. On the contrary, they seem intended to prevent it by laying down plain rules for conveyances to all such uses as the Ohio Legislature thought proper to regard with favor; and if any of the requisites of an ordinary conveyance in trust is dispensed with, it is written down in plain terms.

The Statute of March 26, 1856, is relied on by defendant's counsel.

But it cannot be supposed that this Act, under any ordinary construction, can reach the case; but enlarged and extended under the Statute of Elizabeth, it might answer any purpose to which chancellors should please to apply it. According to the ordinary rules of construction, it has the reverse effect. The Legislature had the subject of donation for educational purposes before them. They provided for schools and academies, but did not choose to provide in like manner for colleges. And the testator did not think fit to give his land or money to a school or academy under the control of trustees selected by the court of common pleas.

While denying the application of the Statute of Elizbeth in Ohio, we are safe in saying that this devise could not be sustained in the English chancery by the present settled construction of the law under that Act. There is no expression of a general charitable intent dehors the defined object, and equity could not apply it cy pres to any other like charity.

Atty-Gen. v. Whitchurch, 3 Ves., 145; Corbyn v. French, 4 Ves., 431; Clark v. Taylor, 21 Eng. L. & E., 308, 309.

There are some familiar cases where corporations or associations made trustees were incompetent to execute the trust; in which the Legislatures, as parens patriæ, having passed enabling Acts granting the power, as in case of The Sailor's Snug Harbor in New York, The Girard College in Pennsylvania, and The McIntire Poor School in Ohio.

But the Constitution of Ohio of 1851 does not admit, in future, of such enabling statutes. The Legislature of that State cannot now confer upon a corporation any special powers.

Art. 13, sec. 1, Swan, 27.

There is no judicial decision in Ohio, even prior to the Constitution of 1851, which would sustain this trust. The first case that was supposed to involve the English doctrine of charity was that of The McIntire Poor School, 9 Ohio, 262. The court held that the Corporation thus empowered took the estate as a contingent remainder, and this is all that was decided in that case.

The case of Urmey's Exrs. v. Wooden, 1 Ohio St., 160, is also relied on. In that there was a competent trustee and a cestui que trust recognized by statute.

We claim, further, that this trust is void, on the general grounds that it makes the colleges it creates immortal, and that it creates a perpetuity in the lands with which it endows them.

1. The City is trustee, and though its charter is subject to repeal, there must be, in the very nature of things, organizations which will be its successors ad infinitum; the trustwhich the city Corporation and its successors must therefore endure, and the colleges exist forever. If the City can accept the trust, it constitutes a contract, the validity of which no law of State can ever impair; thererore, either the trust is not void, or the colleges are immortal and the lands devised and hereafter to be acquired are so absolutely in mortmain that neither a corporation nor man nor law will have, over it, the power of alienation.

2. Colleges created according to law have not this immunity from destruction or change. The law under which they may be chartered is subject to repeal or amendment, and there can be no vested right to corporate powers in those created under the Constitution of 1851.

3. The State of Ohio has abolished entails, and the issue of the first tenant in entail takes in fee simple.

See Swan, 355, 193.

4. The law may not be evaded by making trustee of an immortal being. Equity limits an estate in trust, as the law limits a legal estate.

1 Vern., 163.

The cestui que trust cannot take an estate of the trustee of longer duration, or bound by more permanent restraints against alienation, than if the legal title were made directly to himself; and an estate, either at law or in equity, which exceeds the limits allowed by law within which property may be rendered inalienable, is void in its creation, and incapable of modification so as to establish it to the extent to which it might have been originally carried.

Mr. G. E. Pugh and Messrs. Taft & Perry, for appellees:

I. The doctrines founded upon the Statute of 43d Eliz., ch. 4, have been adopted by the courts of Ohio, and are recognized in that State by express legislation.

The original jutisdiction of courts of equity to protect and preserve such charitable trusts as this under Mr. McMicken's will, has been recognized and thoroughly established both by statute and judicial decision, not only in Ohio, where it is now the settled law, but in nearly all the States of the Union.

We are advised that this court is to be asked to review and overrule the case of Vidal v. Philadelphia, so far as it recognizes the original jurisdiction of the court of equity over charities, prior to and independent of the Statute of Elizabeth. Never was there a case more thoroughly investigated than that. After the enactment of 43 Elizbeth, it was easy for the English courts to refer cases of the kind to the statute. The most thorough investigation of the subject is found in the Irish and American courts. English cases, however, are abundant sustaining the original jurisdiction of the court of equity.

See Moggridge v. Thackwell, 3 Bro. Ch., 517; Atty-Gen. v. Mayor of Dublin, 1 Bligh. N. R., 347; Incorporated Society of Dublin v. Richards, 1 Drury & Warran, 293.

The case of The Baptist Ass. v. Hart, 4 Wheat., 1, is distinguishable from this.

Without going further into the English cases, we will refer to the cases showing how the current opinion stands in the courts of the States of the Union. The court is familiar with the position of the courts of Virginia and Maryland on the subject, and the history of the course of decisions in those States.

It should be premised that that class of charities where the testator did not select anything among the numerous objects of charity, and which was helped out by the King's prerogative, has not been upheld by the American courts, neither has the cy pres doctrine been popular in the state courts, although that has not been universally rejected. But the state courts have, with strong concurrence, sustained the validity of charitable trusts, as largely as they have been sustained in England, with the exceptions above named.

See Whitman v. Lex, 17 Serg. & R., 89; Philadelphia v. Wills, 3 Rawle, 170; Sarah Zane's Will, Brightly 367; Domestic and Foreign Missionary Soc., 30 Pa., 425; 9 Pa., 425; 9 Pa., 433; 10 Pa., 23; Williams v. Williams, 8 N. Twenty-two of the States have adopted, by express decisions of their highest courts, the doctrines of charity. Against it, there is not one, except Virginia and Maryland. The decisions of Louisiana cannot bear upon this question. The decisions of this court bearing upon this question are:

4 Wheat., 1; 3 Pet., 119; 2 How., 127; 9 How., 55; 15 How., 400; 58 U. S. (17 How.), 382.

II. The devises and bequests are to the City of Cincinnati for its own use as a Corporation, and are valid, therefore, without regard to the Statute of 43 Elizabeth.

1. There is no statute of mortmain in Ohio, nor any exceptions against bodies corporate in the Act relating to last wills and testaments.

2. The City is a Corporation authorized by law to take and hold property, real or personal, by deed or will, for both the purposes designated.

Municipal Corporation Act of May 3d, 1852, secs. 18, 34; Swan's Stat., 960, 964; Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How., 186–190; McDonogh v. Murdoch, 15 How., 406, 407; Collins v. Hatch, 18 Ohio, 524; Statutes of Ohio, cited; Act of Jan. 14, 1853, Ohio Laws, Vol. II., p. 503; Act of March 14, 1853, Swan's Stat., 610; Act of March 11, 1853, Swan, 988, 989; Act of April 29, 1854, Swan, 991 a, 991 b; Act of March 8, 1831, Swan, 41; Act of March 12, 1853, Swan, 43, 44; Act of March 11, 1853, Swan, 588; Phillips v. Bury, 2 T. R., 353.

III. The City of Cincinnati has the legal capacity to take the title of property given to it by deed or will, in trust for a valid charity, though it be not certain that such trust falls within the specified purposes of the Corporation, in which case, the State only, and not the heirs, can intervene to prevent it from holding a title and executing the trust.

Runyan v. Coster, 14 Pet., 122; Goundie v. Northampton Water Co, 7 Pa., 239, 249; Leazure v. Hillegas, 7 Serg. & R., 320; Sheaffe v. O'Neil, 1 Mass., 257, 258; Fairfax v. Hunter, 7 Cranch, 603; Co. Litt., 2.

The theory of the plaintiffs' counsel gives this point some importance; the objection, as we understand it, is purely technical. It is that there is a want of a party capable of holding the legal title and performing the trusts at the time when the testator died, and this fact destroys a trust which would otherwise be good, and no other court has jurisdiction to support the trust by the appointment of a trustee that can peform it.

The consequences claimed would not follow, even with the objections to the power of the Corporation well founded. Our present purpose, however, is to show that the objection itself has no foundation in law. This point is well settled by the following authorities:

Silverlake v. North, 4 Johns. Ch., 373; McIndo v. St. Louis, 10 Mo., 576; Goundie v. Northampton Water Co., 7 Pa., 239; Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand., 136; Chambers v. City of St. Louis, 29 Mo., 572; Runyan v. Coster, 14 Pet., 122; Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How., 187; Baird v. Bank of Washington, 11 Serg. & R., 418; Leazure v. Hillegas, 7 Serg. & R., 319; Webb Moler, 8 Ohio, 552; Wade v. Am. Col. Soc., 7 Smedes & M., 697.

Angell & Ames in their work on Corporation, section 152, have laid down as a doctrine sustained by the authorities, that where a general power "to have, hold, purchase, receive," &c., is limited in amount, and qualified by a proviso, "that nevertheless, such lands" "such said corporation" should "be enabled to purchase and hold," "should only extend to such lots as should be necessary for a bank and occupied for its ordinary purposes," that even in that case the State only can question the taking and holding the property excluded by the proviso.

These authorities go directly to the point that the Corporation may take the title in a case of this kind, and thereby preserve the trust.

Chambers v. Graham and Vidal v. Philadelphia, established not only that the title passed to the corporation, but that such passing of the title was efficient to cut off the heirs of the testator and save the trust for the charitable purposes declared by the testator. This doctrine does not set aside the principle that corporations derive all their powers from their charter. In these cases, the power is granted in the charter and it is the limit it is sought to imply. The court would not attempt to assign a limit by implication in the proceedings where the State is not a party.

If the Corporation uses a power for other purposes than those intended, it is a breach of its implied contract with the State, and to the State only is it answerable; but that such express power may be exercised by the Corporation, cannot be denied by any other party than the State, or any other proceedings than such as is instituted to inquire into the very question. There is not a case to be found in the reports where a corporation, with the expressed power granted in its charter to take property, real and personal, without any limitation expressed has been held incapable of taking the property given for a valid, charitable trust.

3. The City of Cincinnati has capacity to acquire and hold the property, and to execute the trust under this will.

VI. It furnishes no ground for objection that the apportionment of bounty as between the colleges and the asylum will depend somewhat on circumstances, or even the discretion of municipal authority.

Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How., 127; McDonogh v. Murdoch, 15 How., 367; Pickering v. Shotwell, 10 Penn., 23.

VII. The statutes of Ohio authorize such disposition of orphan and destitute children as the 23d section of McMicken's will contemplates.

Act of March 12, 1853, concerning appretices and servants, secs. 1, 2, 3, 4; Swan, Stat., 43, 44; Act of March 11, 1853; for the better management of orphan asylums, see 2 Swan, Stat., 588; Amendment of March 25, 1854, Swan. Stat., 588.

VIII. It furnishes no ground of objection that McMicken stipulated for the preference of particular persons as pupils or beneficiaries whether such person be his own relatives or the children of certain friends or others.

Atty-Gen. v. Earl of Lonsdale, 1 Sim., 105; Wright v. Linn, 9 Penn., 433.

IX. It is of no consequence whether the colleges intended by McMicken be or be not within the Act of April 9, 1852, "to enable the trustees of colleges, academies, universities or other institutions, for the purpose of promoting education, to become corporate bodies." Or its supplement of March 12, 1853, Swan, Stat., 193, 195.

The colleges need not be incorporated, inasmuch as the title of all the property is vested in the City of Cincinnati, and the City is a Corporation with perpetual succession. If this were otherwise, the Act of March 26, 1856, would be amply sufficient.

Ohio Laws, Vol. LIII., p. 33.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants here were the complainants in the court below.

The object of their bill is to set aside the devises and bequests in the will of Charles McMicken to the City of Cincinnati, in trust for the foundation and maintenance of two colleges

The testator says: "Having long cherished the desire to found an institution where white boys and girls may be taught, not only a knowl- of their duty to their Creator and their fellow men, but also receive the benefit of a sound, thorough, and practical English education, and such as might fit them for the active duties of life, as well as instruction in all the higher branches of knowledge, except denominational theology, to the extent that the same are now or may be hereafter taught in any of the sev-lar colleges or universities of the highest grade in the country, I feel grateful to God that through His kind providence I have been sufficiently favored to gratify the wish of my heart. I therefore give, devise, and bequeath to the City of Cincinnati, and its successors, for the purpose of building, establishing and maintaining, as far as practicable, after my decease, two colleges for the education of boys and girls, all the following real and personal estate, in trust forever, to wit:" describing the property in nine clauses of the thirty-first article of the will.

He then proceeds to declare that none of the real estate devised, whether improved or otherwise, or which the City may purchase for the benefit of the colleges, should at any time be sold, but that the buildings upon any part of it should be kept in repair out of the revenues of his estate. In the event, however, of dilapidation, fire, or other cause, or if it shall be deemed expedient to have a larger income, he directs houses to be taken down, and that they are to be rebuilt out of the income of his estate. He further authorizes purchases to be made of other property, buildings to be put up on his vacant lots, and designates a part of the eastern boundary of the grounds devoted to the college for the boys for the erection of boarding houses for the accomodation of the students, from which a revenue may be derived. The testator then declares where the colleges shall be located, that there might be a separation between that for the boys and that for the girls. There are other particulars under this article of the will which we need not recite, as they have no bearing upon the controversy made by the bill. Passing over the 33d article of the will for the same reason, the next article in the will is a direction that the Holy Bible of the Protestant version, as contained in the Old and New Testaments, shall be used as a book of instruction in the colleges. Next, it is declared that in all applications for admission to the colleges, that preference should be given "to any and all of the testator's relations and descendants, to all and any of his legatees and their descendants, and to Mrs. McMicken and her descendants." Then he directs: "If, after the organization and establishment of the institution," and the admission of as many pupils as in the discretion of the City have been received, there shall remain a sufficient surplus of funds, that the same shall be applied to making additional buildings, and to the support of poor white male and female orphans, neither of whose parents are living, &c., &c., preference to be given to my relations and collateral descendants, &c., &c.; that they were to receive a sound English education, &c., &c.; and afterwards, directions are given as to the mode of receiving such poor white male and female orphans, and the privileges to be allowed under certain circumstances. The testator, in the thirty-fourth article of his will, declares that "the establishment of the regulations necessary to carry out the objects of my endowment I leave to the wisdom and discretion of the corporate authorities of the City of Cincinnati, who shall have power to appoint directors to said institution." The last article of the will relates to the devises and bequests to the City, and directions as to paying the accounts of the trust. The testator then nominates executors, and they are the appellees in this appeal.

This statement has been made, that the devises and bequests of the testator may be fully disclosed, and the merit of them as a charitable use may be fully understood.

Our first observation is, that it was his intention to establish primarily two colleges for boys and girls, and then a third for the support of poor white male and female orphans, neither of whose parents were living, and who were without any means of support, who were to receive a sound English education. This third school was to be founded by applying to the purpose the surplus funds which might remain after the complete organization of the colleges. (36th article of the will.) The testator anticipated that there would be such a surplus, as he left it in the discretion of the City to determine the number of the pupils who were to be admitted to the colleges. We must then keep in mind the thirty-first and thirty-sixth articles of the will in considering it, though they are but contingently connected by the happening of a surplus in the way just mentioned. For, now, if the first is subject to a failure as a gift for charitable purposes, the devises and bequests may be good under the second. Our attention, however, will be chiefly given to the thirty-first section and its clauses, as under that it was principally argued by counsel.

The learned sergeant, Sir Francis Moore, who drew the Statute of 43 Elizabeth, ch. 4, says, in his exposition of it: "As in all other grants, so in a gift to a charitable use, four things are principally to be considered: 1. The ability of the donor. 2. The capacity of the donee. 3. The instrument or means whereby it is given. 4. The thing itself which is or may be given to a charitable use." And then, by way of caution to donors, he says: "There are five things which cannot be granted to such a use: 1. Things that yield no profit. 2. Things that are incident to others, and inseparable. 3. Possibilities of interest. 4. Conditions—meaning that such things are from their nature insusceptible of serving such a purpose;" and then he adds the 5th: "Copyholds, if in any way prejudical to the lord." We shall not consider them numerically, but both seem to be the natural way to discuss such a gift when its validity is disputed. We shall follow it in those particulars as briefly as we can.

No question is made, however, in this case, as to the execution of the will nor as to the capacity of the devisor. It is insisted, though, that the devises and bequests to the donee, the City of Cincinnati, are void, because the City has not the capacity to take them, and also that they create a perpetuity from being inalienable, which is contrary to law.

Charity, in a legal sense, is rather a matter of description than of definition; and the word "perpetuity" in law is only determined by the circumstances of such cases. But for the purpose of this case, the objection to the validity of the charity on account of its perpetuity, we will place under Mr. Sanders' definition in his Essay upon Uses and Trusts, 196: "A perpetuity may be defined to be a future limitation, restraining the owner of the estate from aliening the fee of the property, discharged of such future use or estate, before the event is determined or the period is arrived when such future use or estate is to arise. If that event or period be within the bounds prescribed by law, it is not a perpetuity." It is then a limitation upon the jus disponendi of property, upon the common law right of every man to dispose of his land "to any other private man at his own discretion." And one class of those limitations is technically termed "alienation in mortmain, and to charitable uses." Alienation in mortmain, in its primary signification, is an alienation of lands or tenements to any corporation, aggregate, ecclesiastical or temporal, the consequence of which in former times was, that by allowing lands to become vested in objects endued with perpetuity of duration, the lords were deprived of escheats and other feudal profits, and the general policy of the common law, which favored the free circulation of property was frustrated, although it is true that at the common law the power of purchasing lands was incident to every corporation. The effect of these statutes deprived every corporation in England, spiritual or secular, from acquiring, either by purchase or gift, real property of any description, without a general license from the Crown enabling it to hold lands in mortmain, or a special license in reference to any particular acquisition. These restraints were subsequently relaxed in many particulars, including gifts to a corporation for purposes of education. But this case does not require us to particularize them; our only purpose for having alluded to statutes of mortmain being to show, from the view taken of them from an early day by the courts in England, that devises to corporations, which generally cannot take lands under a will, were held good when made in favor of charities, and that such gifts, from the purposes to which they were to be applied, and the ownership to which they are subjected, have had the protection of courts of equity to prevent any alienation of them on the part of the person or body interested with the offices of giving them effect; and that in all such cases land has been decreed by courts of equity to be practically inalienable, or that a perpetuity of them exists in corporations when they are charitable gifts.

Hillam's case, Duke, 80, 375; Mayor of Bristol v. Whitton, 1933, Duke, 81, 377; Mayor of Reading v. Lane, 1601, Duke, 81, 361; Lewis on Perpetuity, 684; Christ's Hospital v. Grainger, 1 Macn. & G., 460; Griffin v. Graham, 1 Hawks, 130; State v. Gerard, 2 Ired. Eq., 210.

The objection, that the devises and bequests create a perpetuity, cannot be maintained unless they are forbidden by the law of Ohio. And if a perpetuity was forbidden, the charitable trust would not fail, but would be held good and carried out in equity.

We are told that the 1st and 2d secs. of the 18th article of the Constitution, in connection with the legislation of the State under them, prevent an estate in perpetuity from being made in Ohio. And for showing the bearing of them upon this case, we were referred to an Act of Ohio to restrain the entailment of real estates. 2 Swan, secs. 355, 356.

We are unable to see any fair connection between them. The 1st and 2d secs. of the 18th article of the Constitution were, that the General Assembly shall pass no special Act Conferring coporate powers. Sec. 2. Corporations may be formed under general laws, but all such may from time to time be altered or repealed—that is, though they may be formed under general laws, that the Legislature may alter or repeal them. That by the provision they meant to retain their legislative powers to give larger powers than a corporation might have had, to reform them in any particular that might become necessary, that of a violation of the contract excepted. The Act to restrict the entailment of real estates obviously applies to individuals exclusively, and not at all to corporations, and especially to such of them as may take and hold charitable gifts in perpetuity.

The first Act passed under the Constitution of 1851, relating to corporations, was to enable the trustees of colleges, academies, universities, and other institutions for promoting education, to become bodies corporate. We will give it in its terms, for nothing in the legislation of that State can show more satisfactorily than it does, that public spirit there is, in harmony with and fully up to that of the age, upon the subject of education. The language of the 1st section is, that any number of persons, not less than five, desiring to establish a college, university, or other institution for the purpose of promoting education, religion or morality, agriculture and the fine arts, may, by complying with the provisions of the Act, become a body corporate and politic, with perpetual succession, and may assume a corporate name, by which they may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in all courts of law and equity; may have a corporate seal, and the same alter or break at pleasure; may hold all kinds of estate, real, personal and mixed, which they may acquire by purchase, donation, devise, or otherwise, necessary to accomplish the objects of the corporation; and further, the trustees of any university, college or academy, may hold in trust any property devised, or bequeathed, "or donated" to such institution, upon any specific trust consistent with the objects of said corporation; also, when any number of persons shall have procured by subscription, donation or devise, purchase, or otherwise, the sum of $500 for the purpose of establishing an academy, they may become a body corporate, &c., &c., and do all acts and things necessary for the promotion of education and the general interests of such academy. Time and the occasion will not permit us to give more of this liberal and enlightened statute and of the Supplemental Acts passed in August, 1852, and March, 1853. 2 Swan, secs. 195, 196.

There is nothing in either of them in any way interfering with the power of before existing corporations, to become the trustees of charitable devises and bequests for education, and to hold them in perpetuity. There is rather a disposition manifested to enlarge and confirm their power to do so, and to give to other corporations under the Act certainty and security in the administration of such trusts. The Legislature has succeeded in giving to corporations, for the promotion of education, what the learned gentlemen who brought this bill said were the requisites of a corporation: lawful existence; artificial capacity and perpetuity of existence; and, we add, the unquestioned enjoyment of all these privileges, which courts of equity have said for more than two hundred years they were entitled to, in the construction of devises and gifts for charity, and for the administration of them.

It was conceded in the argument, that the trusts in this will fall within the description of public trusts or charitable uses, as recognized in England since the Statute of 43 Elizabeth, ch. 4, notwithstanding that statute is not in force in Ohio, and, in our opinion, never was, as we shall show presently.

Charities had their origin in the great command, to love thy neighbor as thyself. But when the Emperor Constantine permitted his subjects to bequeath their property to the church, it was soon abused; so much so, that afterwards, when it became too common to give land to religious uses, consistently with the free circulation of property, the supreme authority of every nation in Europe, where Christianity prevailed, found it necessary to limit such devises by statutes of mortmain.

In France, by the ancient constitutions of that Kingdom, churches, communities, chapters, colleges, convents, &c., were not permitted to acquire or hold immovable property. Dumoulin sur, 1st art., 51 De la Cou., Paris. This incapacity after a long time was relaxed, and they were allowed to hold, by license of the King.

In Spain, the communities mentioned before could neither acquire nor hold property, unless by authority of the sovereign; but in England, corporations had the capacity to take property by the common law. Co. Litt., 99. They were rendered incapable of purchasing without the King's license by a succession of statutes from Magna Charta, 9 Henry III. to 9 Geo. II.

They are known as the Statutes of Mortmain; that is, as it was the privilege of anyone, before such statute restrained it, to leave his property of every kind by testament to whom he pleased, and for such purposes, charitable or otherwise, as he chose; and the will was, in every particular, administered according to the testator's intentions, sometimes by the courts of common law, and at others by a court in chancery, as may be seen from the cases in Duke and other writers upon charities. The question, then, under such a condition of the law in Ohio, where there was no statute of mortmain, cannot be in this case, whether chancery had such a jurisdiction, or whether Ohio had adopted in whole or in part the common law, but whether Ohio, in the construction of her judicial system, did not mean to give to those courts which were to have equity jurisdiction cognizance of trusts made by wills for charitable uses, as well as of other trusts; and whether the judges in Ohio have not uniformly entertained it upon that principle. We cannot be mistaken in the conclusion that they have done so from the cases cited on both sides in the argument of this case, the larger number of which we have verified by examination.

And we are more confirmed in what has just been said, for the English Statutes of Mortmain were never in England supposed to have been meant to extend to her Colonies, and were never in force in those of them in America which became independent States, but by legislative adoption.

First, it will be observed in all commentaries upon those statutes they are termed local or political laws, meant to suppress a public mischief and abuse in England. The Stat. of 43 Elizabeth is entitled, "An Act to redress the misemployment of lands, goods and stocks of money, heretofore given to charitable uses." The mode and manner for the enforcement of it in any particular did not exist in any one of the English Colonies. There was not in either of them a Lord Keeper or Lord Chancellor, or any corresponding officer to mature the regulations enjoined by the Act for its enforcement. There were not in the Colonies any abuses to redress for the misemployment of lands, goods or money heretofore given to charitable uses; further, there were not then in any one of them those religious institutions which the monarchs of Europe deemed it politic to restrain from holding lands.

The statute, after beginning with a statement of the abuses to be controlled, declares that for the redress of them it shall be the duty of the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper of the great seal for the time being, and for the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for the time being, to award commissions, &c., into all or any part of the realm, for the purpose of executing the, &c., statute, and the realm or kingdom of England, in statutory parlance, as well in the time of Elizabeth as now, "meant the kingdom over which her municipal laws or the common law had jurisdiction, and did not include either Wales, Scotland or Ireland, or any other part of the King's dominions, except the territory of England only." 1 Bl. Com., sec. 4, p. 93, Wendell.

And in the same section, after having enumerated those dominions which had been subjected by statute or otherwise to the laws of England, and such as had not been, all being adjacent to England, Blackstone says; our more distant plantations in America or elsewhere, are also in some respects subject to English law. But that must be understood with very many and very great restrictions. Such colonies carry with them only so much of the English law as is applicable to their own situation and the condition of an infant Colony; such, for instance, as the general rules of inheritance and of protection from personal injuries. Pp. 107, 108, marginal. But we are not left to inferences to establish the locality of the operation of the Statutes of Mortmain to England, and that they never had any force in the Colonies. The whole subject in all its generality was ably discussed and decided in the High Court of Chancery in England some forty years since. In that case, Atty-Gen. v. Stewart, 2 Mer., 143, the question being whether the Statute of Mortmain, 9 Geo. II., extended to the Island of Grenada, in the West Indies, it was ruled that it did not, and that none of the English Mortmain Acts were of force in the Colonies.

Without, then, a particular enactment for such purpose, the Statute of 43 Eliz., ch. 4, could never have been in force in Ohio. Nor do we think it to be a point of judicial uncertainty there, for we cannot find a decision in the courts of Ohio directly declaring that it ever was.

The law was adopted in terms from the Statute of Virginia by the governor and judges of the Territory. 1 Chase, 190. Whatever may have been its validity in other respects, it did not comprehend the Statute of Elizabeth. For though it was a remedial statute to correct abuses, it was a restraining statute of the common law right of every man to dispose of his property, by will, as he pleased. The law taken from Virginia for Ohio made statutes and acts of Parliament in aid of the common law, which were of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, of force in Ohio. It was not in aid of the common law, but being restrictive of it, it should have, as to the places assigned for its operation, a strict interpretation.

But whether we are right or not so, in respect to the law adopted from Virginia, and passed in the Territorial Legislature of Ohio, it is certain that in the year 1806 it was repealed; and that since the Statute of Elizabeth has had no force in Ohio as a statute, though the judges of that State, without any assumption, have applied its principles to all cases of charitable devises as a part of chancery jurisdiction. It certainly was right in them and a duty to carry out the charitable intentions of a testator by the same principles that his will was executed in every other respect, when the Legislature was silent in respect to such devises, or had given no other rule concerning them.

No more was done by them in Ohio than was done in every other State in this Union where the Statute of Elizabeth had not been adopted by legislative enactment.

But in justice to the subject we cannot leave it without saying that original chancery jurisdiction over charities existed in England, and was exercised there, before the Statute of Elizabeth was passed; also, that it has now become an established principle of American law, that courts of chancery will sustain and protect such a gift, devise or bequest, or dedication of property to public charitable uses, provided the same is consistent with local laws and public policy, where the object of the gift is a dedication specific and capable of being carried into effect according to the intentions of the donor. In confirmation of this we refer to the cases collected in Angell & Ames upon Corporations, private and aggregate, 6th edition, 182, 177, and from pages 170 to 180, inclusive.

And this court, in Vidal v. Mayor of Philadelphia, 2 How., 127, reviewed its opinion to the contrary of what has just been said in the case of The Bapt. Ass. v. Hart, 4 Wheat., 1, and admitted, whatever doubts had been expressed in that opinion, that they had been removed by later and more satisfactory sources of information.

And in Vidal's case the court went on to say: "It may, therefore, be considered as settled, that chancery has an original and necessary jurisdiction in respect to devises and bequests in trust to persons competent to take for charitable purposes, when the general object is specific and certain, and not contrary to any positive rule of law."

2 Kent's Com., 287, 288, 4th ed.; Gibson v. McCall, 1 Rich. (S. C.) Law, 174; Atty-Gen. v. Jolly, 1 Rich. (S. C.) Law, 176 n.; Sohier v. St. Paul's Church, 12 Met. (Mass.), 250; Beall v. Fox, 4 Ga., 404; Miller v. Chittenden, 2 Clarke (Ia.), 315; and Williams v. Williams, Opinion by Judge Denio, 8 N.Y., 525.

We also refer to the opinion of Mr. Justice Baldwin, which led the way upon this question of jurisdiction in the United States in the will of Sarah Zane in pamphlet, Cir. Co. in Pennsylvania, April Term, 1838; and to Mr. Justice Story's Essay in the Appendix to 3 Pet., 481 to 502, inclusive.

The same results have been announced by the decisions in Ohio: McIntyre Poor School v. The Zanesville Can. & Mfg. Co., 9 Ohio, 203, does so. Lane, Ch. J., avoiding the discussion of the extent of chancery jurisdiction over charities, independently of the statute, says: But one of the earliest claims of every social community upon its law-givers is an adequate protection to its property and institutions, which subserve public uses, or are devoted to its elevation, &c.; and, in a proper case, the courts of one State might be driven into the recognition of some principle analogous to that contained in the Statute of Elizabeth as a necessary element of our jurisprudence. But without reference to these considerations, where a trust is clearly defined, and a trustee exists capable of holding the property and executing the trust, it has never been doubted that chancery has jurisdiction over it by its own inherent authority, not derived from the statute, nor resulting from its functions as parens patriæ. The same ruling was made afterwards in 15 Ohio, 593, and in 18 Ohio, 500, and the main point in both of them could not have been decided without maintaining the jurisdiction in chancery over charitable uses, independently of the Statute of Elizabeth. The same may be assumed of the case growing out of the will in 20 Ohio, 483. Indeed, it was assumed that no case in Ohio of a charitable trust has been judicially maintained, or could have been valid under the universal admission that the Statute of the 43 Elizabeth, ch. 4, was not in force in Ohio, unless the courts there had acted from the conviction that in such cases chancery had a jurisdiction over them by its own authority.

We shall now consider the objections which were made by the counsel for the appellants to the validity of the devises and bequests of Mr. McMicken, that the City of Cincinnati has not the capacity to take them and to execute the trusts of the will, and that no other trustee can be appointed.

In our view, the answers to them from the opposing counsel were decisive. No incapacity of the City of Cincinnati to take in this instance can be inferred from its charter. It has the power to acquire, to hold, and possess real and personal property, &c., &c., and to exercise such other powers and to have such other privileges as are incident to municipal corporations of a like character and degree, not inconsistent with this Act or the general laws of the State. Swan, 960. It was admitted in the argument, that the section just read confers power upon the City to acquire and hold real estate for the legitimate objects of the City. These objects are enumerated in many particulars directly connected with its powers to govern the City; and in the nineteen sections following that cited, there is not a sentence or word from which an inference can be made that the Legislature meant to deprive the City of Cincinnati from taking and administering charitable trusts. Indeed, such a course would have been inconsistent with the Legislature's caution in its enactments under the Constitution of 1851. It would be doing great injustice to the Legislature even to suppose that it meant, in passing an Act for the government of corporations, under the provisions of the Constitution, that it designed to enroach upon that of the judiciary, or to alter the whole power of chancery in respect to charitable uses, and the long established practice of corporations, private and municipal, to receive them as trustees, and to administer them according to the intention of donors. So far from any intention to interfere with such a privilege in the City of Cincinnati, we infer from previous and subsequent legislation that it was to have an important agency in carrying out the 6th article of the Constitution in respect to education. We allude to the Act for the better organization and classification of the common schools of Cincinnati and Dayton, passed in the year 1846 (Ohio Local Laws, 91), and to that of the 27th January, 1853, both now in force. In the first, the trustees and visitors of common schools in the City of Cincinnati, with the consent of the city council, have the power to establish and maintain out of any funds under the control of the trustees and visitors, such other grades of schools than those already established as they may deem expedient for such purpose. Further, by the 68th sec. of the State School Law, Swan, 852, passed in January, 1856, power is given to Township Boards of Education, and their successors in office, to take and hold in trust for the use of central or high schools, or sub-district schools, in the township, any grant or donation, or bequests of money, or other personal property, to be applied to the support of such public schools. Again, in Ohio Laws, 33, March 26, 1856, it is declared that whenever anyone gives lands or money for the endowment of a school or academy, not previously established, and shall not provide for the management of it, that the court of common pleas shall appoint trustees with corporate powers. That Act provides also for the management of charities when the founders have not given directions; and another Act (Swan, 193, 1856) provides how colleges may be incorporated by their own act, and how trustees of an endowment may also become a corporation by their own act. These Acts have been cited to show that Ohio, in her legislation, has made municipal corporations trustees for charity devises and bequests, and that the management of them is a duty. They also prove that the privilege to take them is one given and imposed by law.

After a close examination of all the legislation of Ohio relating to corporations, and its system of education, we have not been able to detect any sentence or word going to show any intent to alter the law as it stood before the adoption of the Constitution of 1851, in respect to a corporation receiving and taking, either by testament or donation, property for a charity, or to prevent them from having trustees for the execution of it according to the intention of the donor. To take such privileges from them can only be done by statute expressly, and not by any implications by statutes, or from any number of sections in statutes analogous to the subject, containing directions for the management of corporations. The law is, that where the corporation has a legal capacity to take real or personal estate, then it may take and hold it upon trust in the same manner and to the same extent as private persons may do. It is true that if the trust be repugnant or inconsistent with the proper purposes for which it was created, that may furnish a good reason why it may not be compelled to execute it. In such a case, the trust itself being good, will be executed under the authority of a court of equity. Neither is there any positive objection, in point of law, to a corporation taking property upon trust not strictly within the scope of the direct purposes of its institutions, but collateral to them, as for the benefit of a stranger or another corporation. But if the purposes of the trust be germain to the objects of the corporation, if they relate to matters which will promote and perfect these objects, if they tend to the suppression of vice and immorality, to the advancement of the public health and order, and to the promotion of trade, industry and happiness, where is the law to be found which prohibits the corporation from taking the devise upon such trust in a State where the Statutes of Mortmain do not exist, the corporation itself having an estate as well by devise as otherwise? We know of no authority which inculcates such a doctrine, or prohibits the execution of such trusts, even though the act of incorporation may have for its main objects mere civil and municipal government and powers. 2 How., 190. This court announced the same principle again in the case of McDonogh v. Murdoch, 15 How., 367, with other and new illustrations, and with direct reference to the capacity of a corporation to take such trusts, if within its general objects, or such as were collateral or incidental to its main purpose. There is nothing in the Ohio Statute of Wills to prevent corporations from taking by devise. Much was also said in the argument, denying the legality of the trusts, in consequence of the uncertainty of the beneficiaries, and because the relatives of the testator were to have the preference. As to the first, white boys and girls make as distinctive a status of a class who are to be the first beneficiaries of the trust, and the words in the 36th section, that "if any surplus shall remain, &c., it shall be applied to the support of poor white male and female orphans, neither of whose parents are living, and who are without any means of support," make as certain a description as could have been expressed.

It seems to us, now, that the objection relative to the condition of the beneficiaries is at variance with the established primary rule in respect to a charity, not only with reference to the Statute of 43 Elizabeth, ch. 4, but to a charity under the common law. The answer is, that a charity is a gift to a general public use, which extends to the rich as well as to the poor. Jones v. Williams, 2 Amb., ch. 651. Generally, devises and bequests having for their object establishments of learning are considered as given to charitable uses, under the Statute of Elizabeth, Atty-Gen. v. Earl of Lonsdale, 1 Sim., 105; but that does not make a devise good to a college for purposes not of a collegiate character, intended chiefly to gratify the vanity of the testator. And we cannot be mistaken, that a devise to a corporation in trust for any person is good, and will be effectuated in equity. 1 Bro. Ch. Cas., 81. And a fortiori, a devise to a charitable corporation, in trust for any other charitable use, would be good. All property held for public purposes is held as a charitable use, in the legal sense of the term "charity." Law Library, Vol. LXXX., p. 116, Grant, Corporations.

We will not pursue the subject further; for, without having discussed either of the six objections made in the bill of the complainants, or the points made by counsel in support of the demurrer to the bill, numerically, both have been under our examination; for all were appropriately in the argument of the cause, and in this opinion we meant to decide all of them, and have done so.

We cannot announce them more expressively than they were urged in argument.

1. The doctrines founded upon the Statute of 43 Elizabeth, ch. 4, in relation to charitable trusts to corporations, either municipal or private, have been adopted by the courts of equity in Ohio, but not by express legislation; nor was that necessary to give courts of equity in Ohio that jurisdiction.

2. The English Statutes of Mortmain were never in force in the English Colonies; and if they were ever considered to be so in the State of Ohio, it must have been from that resolution by the governor and judges in her territorial condition; and if so, they were repealed by the Act of 1806.

3 The City of Cincinnati, as a Corporation, is capable of taking in trust devises and bequests for charitable uses, and can take and administer the devises and requests in the will of C. McMicken.

4. Those devises and bequests are charities, in a legal sense, and are valid in equity, and may be enforced in equity by its jurisdiction in such matters without the intervention of legislation by the State of Ohio.

5. McMicken's direction, in section 32 of his will, that the real estate devised should not be alienated, makes no perpetuity in the sense for bidden by the law, but only a perpetuity allowed by law and equity in the cases of charitable trusts.

6. There is no uncertainty in the devises and bequests as to the beneficiaries of his intention: and his preference of particular persons, as to who should be pupils in the colleges which he meant to found, was a lawful exercise of his rightful power to make the devises and bequests.

7. The disposition which he makes of any surplus after the complete organization of the colleges is a good charitable use for poor white male and female orphans.

8. Legislation of Ohio upon the subject of corporations by the Act of April 9, 1852, does not stand in the way of carrying into effect the devises and bequests of the will.

This cause was argued on both sides with such learning and ability, that we feel it to be only right to the profession to acknowledge the assistance given to us in forming our conclusions; and our only regret is, that it should necessarily have extended this opinion to a greater length than we wished it to be.

We shall direct the affirmance of the decree, dismissing the bill, by the court below.

v.

W. A. WASHBURN AND JOHN A. KEITH.

(See S. C., 24 How., 352-357.)

Chancery only gives preference to creditors having specific liens; but will, without judgment or execution, enforce pro rata division of trust fund, for benefit of creditors, among them.

The court of chancery does not give any specific lien to a creditor at large, against his debtor, further than he has acquired at law.

It is only when he has obtained a judgment and execution in seeking to subject the property of his debtor in the hands of third persons, or to reach property not accessible to an execution, that a legal preference is acquired, which a court of chancery will enforce.

Where creditors have not reduced their demands to judgment and execution before seeking relief against a fraudulent assignment of the debtor, they cannot set up any claim to a preference over the other creditors or object to an equitable distribution of the assets among all the creditors.

Where a specific fund has been assigned or pledged for the benefit of creditors, chancery upon its own principles, distributes the fund pro rata among all the creditors, unless preference is given in the pledge or assignment of the fund.

If a bill is filed to enforce a trust, no judgment or execution is necessary as preliminary steps to the interposition of the court; but in that case the complainants are not entitled to a preference, where none is given to them in the trust deed.

Where the bill is filed to set aside the deed as fraudulent, to defeat the preference given therein to other creditors, the objection that the demands of complainants had not been reduced to judgment and execution before filing the bill, is fatal to the relief sought, if taken in time.

When such objection was waived, the court was right in proceeding to make a ratable distribution among all the creditors.

Submitted Feb. 21, 1861. Decided Mar. 5, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The case is fully stated by the court.

Messrs. William Henderson and R. W. Thompson, for plaintiffs in error:

1st. Can the complainants, not being judgment creditors of Washburn, maintain this bill in chancery to reach his equitable assets in the hands of his assignee, to whom he has fraudulently assigned them?

The bill avers that Washburn had no real estate upon which a judgment at law would be a lien; that he had no personal property, whatever, subject to execution; these facts are admitted by the answer. What, then, was to be gained by the complainants first suing at law, and obtaining a judgment, and having an execution returned nulla bona? It would be doing a useless thing. The law does not require a party to do a useless thing.

We think the law well settled, "that if a claim is to be satisfied out of a fund which is accessible only by the aid of a court of chancery, application may be made in the first instance to that court, which will not require that the claim should be first established in a court of law.

Russell v. Clark's Exec, 7 Cranch, 69; O'Brien v. Coulter, 2 Blackf., 421; Piatt v. St. Clair, 6 Ohio, 227.

2d. The other creditors of Washburn, none of whom were judgment creditors, were not necessary parties to the bill. If the object of the bill had been to enforce the due execution of the assignment, then there would have been some plausibility in making them parties. The claim of the complainants being antagonistic to the assignment, it was only necessary to make the assignor and assignee defendants.

3d. The complainants contend that by filing their bill to avoid the assignment they thereby obtained a specific lien on the assets in the hands of the assignee and were, under the law of the case, entitled to be fully paid to the exclusion of the other creditors whose equity is not superior to complainants. It is a well established rule in equity, "that when the equities are equal, that title which is prior in time shall prevail."

1 Story, Eq. Jur., 400.

This rule applies as well to a case like the one before the court as to equities growing out of conveyances. With regard to cases like this, the general rule is laid down by numerous adjudications, that a creditor may file a bill in his own name for his sole benefit, or he may file in behalf of himself and all others who may be entitled and may choose to come in. If he proceeds on his own account alone, and no lien has been gained or can be acquired at law, he acquires a specific lien by filing the bill, and is entitled to priority over other creditors.

Messrs. McDonald and Porter, for defendants in error:

Some authorities state that where a creditor's bill is filed to reach assets of a purely equitable nature, it is not incumbent upon the creditor to show that he had first obtained a judgment at law, but it is believed that the better opinion is the other way.

McElwain v. Willis, 9 Wend., 548; 1 Man. Mich., 446.

But where the assets are not of that nature, and especially in all cases where the demand is of a legal nature, the averment is indispensable.

Hendricks v. Robinson, 2 Johns. Ch., 296; 1 Am. Lead. Cas., 84, and numerous cases there cited.

The complainants in the present case endeavor to dispense with this averment by an allegation that Washburn has no property upon which a judgment or execution would be a lien.

But there are other averments in the bill showing just the contrary. The property being such that a judgment would have been a lien on the real estate, and an execution on the personalty, the demurrer ought to have been sustained.

Before the court proceeded to render a decree certain, other creditors of Washburn, whose names appear in the record, presented a supplemental bill and applied upon motion to be admitted as co-complainants, and to be permitted to establish their claims and to participate equitably in the distribution of the assets. The motion was granted. The court afterwards found the assignment to be fraudulent and void, and decreed that the moneys in the hands of Keith should be distributed ratably among the creditors who were parties to the record.

Whether the decree, so far as it directs a ratable distribution of the assets, was right or not, is not now before the court. The appellees do not and did not object to such ratable distribution. The question, so far as relates to that, is a question between the appellants and their co-complainants, and the latter are not made parties to the appeal. Of course, therefore, nothing affecting their interest will be adjudicated by this court.

7 Pet., 399; 16 Pet., 521.

If this view were not correct, still the appellants cannot reverse that part of the decree. 1. Because they do not assign for error, in their brief or otherwise, that the court improperly admitted as complainants the other creditors. 2. The decree was for the ratable distribution of money so far as the appellants complain of it; and the creditors, admitted as co-complainants, were the first to aver specifically, that Keith had moneys in his possession. So far, therefore, as diligence is concerned in reference to the very thing to which the decree applies, these second complainants were more diligent than the appellants. 3. In equity there is no preference between creditors.

Purdy v. Doyle, 1 Paige, 558; Codwise v. Gelston, 10 Johns., 507; Morrice v. Bank of England, cases temp. Talbot, 216; Robinson v. The Bank, 18 Ga., 108.

It is admitted that there are cases the other way, but it is believed that the better opinion coincides with that of Chancellor Walworth in the case first cited.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The bill was filed in the court below by two mercantile firms, creditors of Washburn, against him and the assignee of his property, for the purpose of setting aside the assignment as fraudulent against creditors, and that the property might be applied in satisfaction of the complainants' demands. These demands were simple contract debts, not reduced to judgment.

The defendants demurred to the bill, and assigned, as the ground of the demurrer, the want of equity.

The court overruled the demurrer, and the defendants answered separately, among other things denying all fraud in the assignment. Replications were filed to the answers.

In this stage of the case, the other creditors of Washburn applied by petition to the court to be made parties to the bill, charging fraud in the assignment, and praying that it might be set aside, and the property and effects of the debtor be subjected to the payment of all his debts, and be divided equally among all the creditors.

The court ordered that these petitioning creditors become co-complainants, and referred the case to a master to take an account of what was due to each of the complainants, which account was duly taken, and a report made to the court; and afterwards the defendant, Keith, was ordered to bring into court the amount of moneys admitted by him to be in his hands, made out of the assigned property, amounting to the sum of $2,497; and then, at a subsequent day in the term, the court overruled a motion made, on behalf of the two firms who filed the bill, to have the moneys in court applied to the payment of their debts in preference to the other creditors; and adjudged the assignment fraudulent as to creditors, and directed that the whole fund be distributed ratably among all of them, according to their respective demands, and referred the case to a master to make the distribution; and, on his report, confirmed the same.

The case is before us on appeal by the two firms who filed the bill, alleging for error the refusal of the court to give them preference in the distribution of the assets.

The proceedings in the case have not been conducted with much regularity, but the principles of equity governing the rights of the parties concerned are very well settled, and the application of them to the facts as presented will satisfactorily dispose of it.

The court of chancery does not give any specific lien to a creditor at large, against his debtor, further then he has acquired at law; for, as he did not trust the debtor on the faith of such lien, it would be unjust to give him a preference over other creditors, and thus defeat a pro rata distribution, which equity favors, unless prevented by the rules of law. It is only when he has obtained a judgment and execution in seeking to subject the property of his debtor in the hands of third persons, or to reach property not accessible to an execution, that a legal preference is acquired, which a court of chancery will enforce. 2 Johns. Ch., 283; 4 Johns. Ch., 691.

The two firms, therefore, who filled the bill, the appellants here not having reduced their demands to judgment and execution before seeking relief against the fraudulent assignment of the debtor, are not in a situation to set up any claim to a preference over the other co-complainants, or to object to an equitable distribution of the assets among all the creditors.

Indeed, the principle upon which the bill seems to have been drawn, and is now sought to be sustained, would preclude any preference in favor of the appellants—which is, that the debtor's property, in the hands of the assignee, constituted a fund for the benefit of creditors, which a court of equity only could reach, and hence that the creditor had a right to the interposition of the court without first obtaining a judgment and execution. It is true, where a specific fund has been assigned or pledged for the benefit of creditors, and it is necessary to go into a court of chancery to make a distribution among them, the equitable lien of each creditor upon the fund lays a sufficient foundation for the interposition of the court. It will enforce this equitable lien thus arising out of the assignment or pledge for the benefit of the creditors, in the exercise of its own appropriate jurisdiction. But in all these cases, chancery, upon its own principles, distributes the fund pro rata among all the creditors, unless preference is given in the pledge or assignment of the fund. In the pressnt case, as the assignment was made to Keith, in trust for the benefit of creditors, if the bill had been filed to enforce the trust, no judgment or execution would have been necessary, as preliminary steps to the interposition of the court; but in that case the appellants would not have been entitled to a preference, as none was given to them in the trust deed, but the contrary.

For this reason, doubtless, the bill was filed to set aside the deed as fraudulent, with a view to defeat the preferences given therein to other creditors. The objection that the demands of the appellants had not been reduced to judgment and execution before filing the bill, would have been fatal to the relief sought, if taken in time by the defendants. It was waived, however, both as respected the appellant and the other complainants; and as the court was left unembarrassed by the objection, it was right in proceeding to dispose of the property and effects of the debtor, and to make the proper application of them; and as we have seen, neither of the creditors had acquired a preference at law, the application in chancery, upon its own principles, was a ratable distribution among all the creditors, as decreed by the court below.

Decree affirmed.

LESSEE OF ROBT. W. SMITH AND CAREY W. BUTT, Plff. in Er.,

v.

WM. McCANN.

(See S. C., 24 How., 398–407.)

In Maryland, ejectment is the proper action to try title to lands—plaintiff must show a legal title—cannot recover on equitable title—purchaser under execution must show legal title in debtor—naked legal title of trustee not sufficient to recover on—parol evidence inadmissible to enlarge estate of trustee—trust fraudulent as to creditors—trustee bound by trusts.

In Maryland the distinction between common law and equity, as known to the English law, has been constantly preserved in its system of jurisprudence; and the action of ejectment is the only mode of trying a title to lands.

In that action the lessor of the plaintiff must show a legal title; he cannot support the action upon an equitable title, nor is the defendant required to show any title in himself; and if the plaintiff makes out a prima facie legal title, the defendant may show an elder and superior one in a stranger, and thereby defeat the action.

The purchaser under a fi. fa. when compelled to bring an ejectment to obtain the possession, must show a legal title to the land; and, consequently, must show that the debtor, at the time of the levy, had a legal title.

If the debtor had but an equitable title, the purchaser is compelled to go into equity, and obtain a legal one before he can support an action of ejectment against the party in possession.

It is not every legal interest that is made liable to sale on a fi. fa.; the debtor must have a beneficial interest in the property.

Where the deed to the debtor only conveyed to him a naked legal title as a trustee for others, he took under it no interest that could be seized and sold by the Marshal upon a fi fa.; and the deed of the Marshal, therefore, conveyed no title to the plaintiff.

Standing only upon this title, derived under this deed, and showing no other title, the plaintiff certainly could not recover in an action of ejectment.

Evidence to prove that the trusts in the deed are fraudulent, and that the deed was executed to hinder and defraud creditors, is not admissible to show that the grantee had a beneficial interest in the property, liable to be seized and sold for the payment of his debts.

Parol evidence is inadmissible to enlarge the estate of a trustee, and to show that he had not merely a barren legal title, but a beneficial interest, which was liable for the payment of his debts.

If the evidence was admissible, the fraudulent character of the trusts, as against his creditors, could not enlarge his legal interest beyond the terms of the deed.

As between the trustee and the cestuis que trust, the trustee can have no equity against the express trusts to which he assented.

Where the cestuis que trust are not before the court, an inquiry into the validity of the trusts cannot be made.

Argued Feb. 11, 1861. Decided Mar. 5, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

This was an action of ejectment commenced in the court below by the present plaintiff in error.

The case is fully stated by the court.

Messrs. Francis Lee Smith and H. Winter Davis, for plaintiffs in error:

The plaintiffs in error insist that the instruction given to the jury by the court below is erroneous.

McMechen v. Marman, 8 Gill & J., 57, 73, 74, 75; Jackson v. Graham, 3 Cai., 188; Jackson v. Scott, 18 Johns., 94; Jackson v. Parker, 9 Cow., 83; Jackson v. Walker, 4 Wend., 462; Culbertson v. Martin, 2 Yeates, 443; Remington v. Linthicum, 14 Pet., 84; Young v. Algeo, 3 Watts, 223, 227; Jackson v. Bush, 10 Johns., 223.

In ejectment against a defendant in an execution or those claiming under him, the purchaser of land at a sheriff's sale, having complied with the terms of sale, is entitled as plaintiff to recover the possession against said defendant or his alienee, and the defendant will not be permitted to controvert the title by showing it to be defective, or by setting up a better outstanding title in a third person.

The trusts in the deed from Brown and wife to Richard D. Fenby being fraudulent and void, the deed passed an absolute title to Fenby, of the land in controversy.

The terms of trust, in the deed from Brown and wife to Fenby, not being established by any evidence aliunde, the said trust can be considered as existing, if at all, only from the date of the deed.

Hill, Trust., top. pa. 86, 87, note 2.

Messrs. J. Mason Campbell and James Malcolm, for defendant in error:

In support of the correctness of the instruction, the defendant in error will rely on the following points and authorities:

1. This action of ejectment being brought in Maryland, and the common law of that State being unchanged, the plaintiff must show in evidence a legal title, to enable him to recover. The Maryland Statute (1810, ch. 160), which authorizes a sale on execution at law, of equitable estates, does not change an equitable into a legal title, and a purchaser must assert his rights in their appropriate form.

Carroll v. Norwood, 5 Harr. & J., 155; Wilson v. Inloes, 11 Gill & J., 351; Hammond v. Inloes, 4 Md., 138.

The deed, from Brown and wife to Fenby, given in evidence, gave him but a dry legal title with no beneficial interest in himself, and so vested nothing in him which could be attached or taken in execution upon process against him.

Houston v. Nowland, 7 Gill. & J., 493.

The plaintiffs in error seek, by a charge of fraud against the deed, to extinguish the trust. But if the deed be void against creditors, the Statute of Elizabeth avoids it in toto. If the deed be wholly void, for fraud or any other cause, then the foundation of the plaintiffs' title fails, for without it Fenby had no estate.

Mackie v. Cairns, Hopk. Ch., 405; 5 Cow., 580; 17 Me., 369; 4 Yerg., 164; Goodhue v. Berrien, 2 Sandf. Ch., 630; State v. Bank of Maryland, 6 Gill & J., 231.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes up upon a writ of error to revise the judgment of the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland, in an action of ejectment, brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendant, to recover certain lands lying in that State.

The plaintiff, in order to show title to the land claimed, offered in evidence, that Smith & Butt, lessors of the plaintiff, having sold cotton to Fenby & Brother, of Baltimore, in 1857, drew on them for the sum due, and their bills were protested to the amount of $13,708. They, thereupon, brought suit on the 3d of June, 1857, and recovered judgment in the circuit court on the 6th of April, 1858; and on the 10th of the same month they issued a fieri facias, which was, on the same day, levied by the Marshal on the land in controversy; and afterwards, on the 2d of September next following, sold at public auction. At this sale the lessors of the plaintiff were the purchasers, and received from the Marshal a deed in due form.

The plaintiff further proved that a certain Robert D. Brown was seised in fee of the land at the times hereinafter mentioned, and read in evidence a deed from him and his wife, dated April 6th, 1857, whereby they conveyed it to Richard D. Fenby, one of the defendants, against whom the judgment was afterwards obtained, stating at the time he offered it in evidence, that he impeached the trusts in the deed for fraud, and intended to show such trusts to be void against him.

The deed purports to be in consideration of $7,800.50, and recited that the land was purchased by Fenby, from Brown, on the 18th of March, 1852, and then grants to Fenby, "as trustee," the lands in question in fee simple, in "trust" for the sole and separate benefit of Jane Fenby, the wife of the said Richard D. Fenby, for and during the term of her natural life, in all respects as if she was a feme sole, free from all liability for the debts of her husband, and from and immediately after the death of the said Jane Fenby, in trust for such child or children and descendants of a deceased child or children of the said Jane, as she may leave living at the time of her death. Such child, children, and descendants, to take per stirpes.

The deed gives authority to Fenby to sell and dispose of any part of the trust property, and to invest the proceeds in safe securities upon the same trusts.

The plaintiff further offered evidence tending to prove that Fenby was hopelessly insolvent when this deed was made, and that he was in possession of the land from the time he purchased it in 1852.

The defendant (McCann) then read in evidence a deed from Fenby to him, dated March 23d, 1858, purporting to be made in execution of the power conferred by the trust deed, and conveying the property in fee simple in consideration of $22,000.

And the plaintiff thereupon offered evidence tending to show that this deed was intended to cover the previous fraud of the one to Fenby; that McCann was privy to this design, and co-operated in it; that he paid no money; and that notwithstanding this deed, Fenby continued in possession after the land had been advertised for sale by the Marshal, and that the possession was delivered to McCann only a few days before the sale was actually made.

The defendant offered evidence for the purpose of rebutting the charge of fraud against Fenby and himself, and upon the whole testimony as offered, several instructions to the jury were moved for by each of the parties, which were all refused, and the following instruction given by the court:

"The deed from Robert P. Brown to Richard D. Fenby, of the 6th of April, 1857, conveyed only a naked legal interest to said Fenby, which could not be levied on and sold under a fi. fa. issued on a judgment against him, he having no beneficial interest therein. And as the plaintiff, to sustain this action, has offered the said deed in evidence, and as without it there is no evidence of any legal title whatever in said Fenby at the date of the levying of said fi. fa., or at any other time, the plaintiff cannot recover in this action."

As this instruction disposed of the case, it is unnecessary to state at large the prayers offered by the respective parties, or the testimony upon which they respectively relied to prove or disprove the imputations of fraud.

In discussing the question thus presented by the decision of the court below, it is proper to state, that in Maryland the distinction between common law and equity, as known to the English law, has been constantly preserved in its system of jurisprudence; and the action of ejectment is the only mode of trying a title to lands. And in that action the lessor of the plaintiff must show a legal title in himself to the land he claims, and the right of possession under it, at the time of the demise laid in the declaration, and at time of the trial. He cannot support the action upon an equitable title, however clear and indisputable it may be, but must seek his remedy in chancery; nor is the defendant required to show any title in himself, and if the plaintiff makes out a prima facie legal title, the defendant may show an elder and superior one in a stranger, and thereby defeat the action.

The law upon this subject is briefly and clearly stated by the Court of Appeals of the State, in 11 Gill & J., 358, and 4 Md., 140, 173.

We state the law of Maryland upon this subject, because very few of the States have preserved the distinction between legal and equitable titles to land. And in States where there is no court of equity, the courts of common law necessarily deal with equitable interests as if they were legal, and exercise powers over them which are unknown to courts of common law, where a separate chancery jurisdiction is established. Cases, therefore, decided in States which have no courts of equity, as contradistinguished from courts of common law, can have no application to this case so far as trusts or any other equitable interest is involved. And even in States where the chancery jurisdiction has been preserved, the decisions of their respective courts do not always harmonize in marking the line of division between law and equity. And as the title to real property, whether legal or equitable, and the mode of asserting that title in courts of justice, depend altogether upon the laws of the State in which the land is situated, cases like that now before the court are questions of local law only, in which we must be guided by the decisions of the state tribunals.

Since the passage of the Act of George II., which made land in the American Colonies liable to be sold under a fi. fa. issued upon a judgment in a court of common law, the process of extent has fallen into disuse, and is regarded as obsolete in Maryland. But this statute did not interfere with the established distinction between law and equity, and an equitable interest could not be seized under a fi. fa. until the law of Maryland was in this respect altered by an Act of Assembly of the State in 1810. But this law does not convert the equitable interest into a legal one, in the hands of the purchaser. He buys precisely the interest which the debtor had at the time the execution was levied; and if he purchased an equitable interest and desires to perfect his title, he must go into equity, where the court will decree a conveyance to him from the holder of the legal title, if he shows that the debtor was entitled to it at the time of the levy.

But the Statute of George II. which authorized the sale of lands under a fi. fa., did not authorize the sheriff to deliver them, nor the court to issue the writ of hab. fac. poss. upon the return of the process. And the result of this was, that the purchaser was compelled to bring an ejectment to obtain the possession, in which, as we have already said, he must show a legal title to the land; and, consequently, must show that the debtor, at the time of the levy, had a legal title, and such a title as was subject to seizure and sale under the fieri facias. And if the debtor had but an equitable title, the purchaser was compelled to go into equity, and obtain a legal one before he could support an action of ejectment against the party in possession. A more summary process in certain cases has been since provided, by a law of the State passed in 1825. But up to that time the principles above stated were the settled law of the State; and remain so, except in so far as they are altered by that Act of Assembly. It is unnecessary to state the provisions of that Act, because the plantiff did not proceed under it. He has resorted to the action of ejectment to obtain possession, and cannot recover, unless he can show a legal title to the premises. It is not, however, every legal interest that is made liable to sale on a fi. fa. The debtor must have a beneficial interest in the property. And in Houston v. Newland, 7 Gill & J., 493, where a party had sold the land to another bona fide, but had not conveyed the legal title, the court held that the title remaining in the vendors was a barren legal title, in trust for the purchaser, and could not be sold for the payment of his debts. And a still later case, Matthews v. Ward, 10 Gill & J., 443, 451, 452, where land had been conveyed to a trustee, in trust for third persons, and the cestuis que trust had died without heirs, the court decided that the land escheated to the State, although the heirs of the trustee to whom the legal estate was conveyed were still living, and said that "the rights of such trustee, who is a mere instrument, are treated with no respect, and the State deals with the property as her own."

We proceed to apply these principles to the case before us. The deed to Fenby, in plain and unambiguous words, conveyed to him a naked legal title; he took under it no interest that could be seized and sold by the Marshal upon a fi. fa.; and the deed of the Marshal, therefore, conveyed no title to the lessors of the plaintiff. Standing only upon this title, derived under this deed to Fenby, and showing no other title, he certainly could not recover in an action of ejectment.

But the plaintiff offers evidence to prove that the trusts in the deed are fraudulent, and that Fenby purchased the land and procured the deed from Brown in this form, in order to hinder and defraud his creditors. And he offers this proof to show that Fenby had a beneficial interest in the property, liable to be seized and sold for the payment of his debts.

The proposition to enlarge or change the legal estate of the grantee in a deed, by parol evidence, against the plain words of the instrument, is without precedent in any court of common law. And in the case of Remington v. Linthicum, 14 Pet., 84; relied on by the plaintiff, the evidence was offered, not to change the estate limited in the grant, but to show that the grant was fraudulent and utterly void, and conveyed no interest whatever to the grantee named in it. The party offering the evidence did not claim under that deed, but against it. And if, in this case, the evidence was offered for a like purpose, and the deed proved to be fraudulent and void, it would defeat the plaintiff's action instead of supporting it.

He does not, however, offer the parol evidence for this purpose, but offers it to enlarge the estate of Fenby, and to show that he had not merely a barren legal title, but a beneficial interest, which was liable for the payment of his debts. But if the evidence were admissible, we do not perceive how the fraudulent character of the trusts, as against his creditors, could enlarge his legal interest beyond the terms of the deed. It is true he paid the money for the property. And if this circumstance could be supposed to create a resulting trust for the benefit of Fenby, it would be a mere equitable right exclusively within the jurisdiction of a court of chancery, and a court of common law could neither enforce it nor notice it; and consequently it would not be a title upon which an action of ejectment could be maintained. But it obviously is not a case to which the doctrine of resulting trusts can be applied; for, as between Fenby and the cestuis que trust, he can have no equity against the express trusts to which he assented, and which, indeed, according to the plaintiff's allegation, he procured to be made. And when the deed is offered in evidence by the plaintiff, in order to derive to himself a legal title under it, the interests and estates thereby conveyed cannot be enlarged or diminished by testimony dehors the deed. The deed must speak for itself.

If these trusts are fraudulent, the lessors of the plaintiff have a plain and ample remedy in the court of chancery, which has the exclusive jurisdiction of trusts and trust estates. In that forum all of the parties interested in the controversy can be brought before the court, and heard in defense of their respective claims. But as the case now stands, the only interest which the plaintiff seeks to impeach is that of the cestuis que trust; yet they are not before the court, nor can they, by any process, be made parties in this ejectment suit, nor even be permitted to make themselves parties if they desired to do so, and cannot have an opportunity of adducing testimony in defense of their rights. Under such circumstances, an inquiry into the validity of these trusts would not only be inconsistent with the established principles and jurisdiction of courts of common law, but also inconsistent with that great fundamental rule in the administration of justice, which requires that everyone shall have an opportunity of defending his rights before judgment is pronounced against him.

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed.

Jurisdiction of this court—when conferred by the Constitution, may be exercised without further Act of Congress—when State is a party, suit may be in name of the governor—mandamus—delivery, by one State, of fugitives from another—constitutional provisions in regard to—what offenses they include—the right is absolute—practice—Act of 1793—executive certificate conclusive—duty to deliver—no power to coerce governor.

This court may exercise its original jurisdiction in suits against a State, under the authority conferred by the Constitution and existing Acts of Congress.

In all cases where original jurisdiction is given by the Constitution, this court has authority to exercise it without any further Act of Congress to regulate its process or confer jurisdiction, and the court may regulate and mold the process it uses, in such manner as in its judgment will best promote the purposes of justice.

Where the State is a party, plaintiff or defendant, the governor represents the State; and the suit may be, in form, a suit by him as governor in behalf of the State, where the State is plaintiff; and he must be summoned or notified as the officer representing the State, where the State is defendant.

The writ of mandamus does not issue from or by any prerogative power, and is nothing more than the ordinary process of a court of justice, to which everyone is entitled where it is the appropriate process for asserting the right he claims.

The words (in the U. S. Constitution as to delivery by one state of fugitives from another) "treason, felony, or other crime," embrace every act forbidden and made punishable by a law of the State.

The word "crime" of itself includes every offense from the highest to the lowest in the grade of offenses, and includes what are called "misdemeanors" as well as treason and felony.

History and reason for this article in the Constitution, stated.

It included, and was intended to include, every offense made punishable by the law of the State in which it was committed, and gives the right to the executive authority of the State to demand the fugitive from the executive authority of the State in which he is found.

The right given to "demand" implies that it is an absolute right; and there is a correlative obligation to deliver, without any reference to the character of the crime charged, or to the policy or laws of the State to which the fugitive has fled.

The executive authority of the State is not authorized by this article to make the demand, unless the party is charged in the regular course of judicial proceedings.

The executive authority of the State upon which the demand is made, should be satisfied by competent proof that the party is so charged. The proceeding, when duly authenticated, is his authority for arresting the offender.

The duty of providing by law the regulations necessary to carry this compact into execution, is devolved upon Congress.

The Act of 1793, February 12th, as far as relates to this subject, recited.

The judicial acts which are necessary to authorize the demand are plainly specified in the Act of Congress; and the certificate of the executive authority is made conclusive as to their verity when presented to the Executive of the State where the fugitive is found.

He has no right to look behind them, or to question them, or to look into the character of the crime specified in the judicial proceedings. The duty which he is to perform is merely ministerial.

That he must inquire and decide who is the person demanded, is not a discretionary duty upon which he is to exercise any judgment, but is a mere ministerial duty.

Whether the charge is legally and sufficiently laid in the indictment is a judicial question to be decided by the courts of the State in which the crime was committed, and not by the executive authority of the State upon which the demand is made.

The Act of Congress declares, that "it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the State," to cause the fugitive to be arrested and secured, and delivered to the agent of the demanding State.

The words "it shall be the duty" were not used as mandatory and compulsory, but as declaratory of the moral duty which this compact created.

If the governor refuses to discharge his duty, there is no power delegated to the General Government, either through the Judicial Department or any other department, to use any coercive means to compel him.

ON PETITION for a mandamus, or for a rule on William Dennison, the Governor of Ohio, to show cause why a mandamus should not be issued by this court, commanding him to cause Willis Lago, a fugitive from justice, to be delivered up to be removed to the State of Kentucky, having jurisdiction of the crime with which he is charged. The petition was filed and the motion for mandamus, or for a rule to show cause made by Mr. Thomas D. Monroe, Jr.

The court ordered that the motion be set down for argument three weeks thereafter, and that a copy of the order and petition and exhibits be served on the Governor of Ohio. The petition of the Commonwealth of Kentucky by Beriah Magoffin, Governor, filed as above, set forth substantially the following state of facts:

The Grand Jury of Woodford County, Kentucky, indicted Willis Lago under an Act of the State of Kentucky which became a law July 1st, 1852, and which is still in force in Kentucky, which is as follows:

Sec. 1. If any free person, not having lawful or in good faith a color of claim thereto, shall steal or shall seduce or entice a slave to leave his owner or possessor, or if he shall make, or furnish, or aid, or advise in the making or furnishing a forged or false pass or deed of emancipation or other writing purporting to liberate a slave, or if in any manner he aid or assist a February 10th, 1860, Beriah Magoffin, Governor of Kentucky, made demand upon William Dennison, the Governor of Ohio, for the person of said Willis Lago, as a fugitive from justice, the said Lago having fled from Kentucky after the commission of the alleged crime, and being found in the State of Ohio, to be delivered up and removed to the State of Kentucky, having jurisdiction of the crime. This demand was accompanied by a copy of the indictment above mentioned. One William S. Manson was appointed agent of the executive authority of Kentucky to receive the said fugitive. Said Manson duly presented the above demand and copy of indictment to the Governor of Ohio.

Governor Dennison referred the matter to the Attorney-General of Ohio, and after receiving the opinion of the Attorney-General, he refused to deliver up the fugitive Lago, and transmitted to the Governor of Kentucky, as his reason therefor, the opinion of the Attorney-General of Ohio. In this opinion the Attorney-General, after stating that the offense was not treason or felony, though it was a crime under the law of Kentucky, went on to say that the offense charged was not a crime in Ohio, nor was it an offense affecting the public safety, nor was it malum in se. He stated as his opinion that the rule which should govern cases like the present was that which "holds the power" (that is, the power of delivering up fugitives from justice from another State on the demand of the Executive of that State), "to be limited to such acts as constitute either treason or felony by the common law, as that stood when the Constitution was adopted, or which are regarded as crimes by the usage and laws of all civilized nations." He also added, that even in such cases the power of the Executive of a State to deliver up fugitives from justice was only to be exercised in accordance with a sound legal discretion. Governor Magoffin replied to the letter of the Governor of Ohio, transmitting the opinion of the Attorney-General, at considerable length, criticising that opinion and stating, as the true doctrine, that it was for each State to determine for itself what were or were not crimes within the meaning of the Constitution and the Acts of Congress, and that the executive of the State called upon to deliver up the fugitives had no discretion in the matter.

Governor Dennison made no reply to this letter of Governor Magoffin, but in the language of the petition "still fails and refuses, in violation of his legal obligation under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and of the rights and dignity of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, to cause such fugitive from justice, Willis Lago, to be arrested and delivered to said agent, William S. Manson, to be removed to the State of Kentucky, having jurisdiction of the crime with which he is charged.

Upon the above state of facts, the application for mandamus came up for argument.

Messrs. Cooper, H. Marshall, J. W. Stevenson, Crittenden and Thos. B. Monroe, Jr., in support of the motion.

The extradition of Lago has been duly demanded by the Governor of Kentucky from the Governor of Ohio, but the latter "refused and still refuses" to surrender Lago, and this refusal, it is insisted, is a "violation" by the Governor of Ohio "of his legal obligation under the Constitution and laws of the United States." Hereupon application is made in the name of the "Commonwealth of Kentucky to the Supreme Court of the United States, praying it to issue, as an act of original jurisdiction, the writ of mandamus against William Dennison, Governor of Ohio, compelling him to deliver up said Lago."

12 Pet., 614; 2 Pet., 450.

It is not by the office of the person to whom the writ is directed, but the nature of the thing to be done, that the propriety of issuing a mandamus is to be determined.

1 Cranch, 170; 3 How., 99.

There is no remedy for the grievance inflicted on the State of Kentucky by the refusal of Governor Dennison, unless the mandamus applied for will lie. If mandamus will lie in any case where the Supreme Court exercises original jurisdiction, all considerations and all conditions concur to point it out as the proper remedy in this case; for,

1. The duty to be performed is single, simple, only ministerial, and public in its nature and office.

2. The party directed to perform it is certainly named.

3. No other adequate remedy exists or is prescribed by law.

4. The duty is distinctly prescribed by the Constitution and the Act of 1793.

5. The office held by Mr. Dennison does not shield him from the performance; "it is the nature of the duty which determines the propriety of mandamus as a remedy."

The Supreme Court of the United States has never adjudicated the question of this remedy as now it is presented.

In U. S. v. Lawrence, 3 Dall., 53 (A. D. 1795), this court was applied to as a court of original jurisdiction and it entertained the jurisdiction. The case was disposed of on the point that the duty of Judge Lawrence involved the exercise of discretion.

In Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 75, the mandamus was refused because the Act of 1789 was unconstitutional in so far as it disturbed the constitutional distribution of the judicial power of this court. The application was to this court in its original jurisdiction, whereas the case belonged to it only under its appellate jurisdiction.

In McIntire v. Wood, 7 Cranch, 504, the point was as to the power of the Circuit Court of the United States, and the same remark applies to McClung v. Silliman, 6 Wheat., 600.

Ex parte Roberts, 6 Pet., 216, and Ex parte Davenport, 6 Pet., 664, were applications to control the judge of an inferior court by mandamus, which was refused because of the discretion the inferior officer had a right to exercise. Ex parte Bradstreet, 8 Pet., 588; Ex parte Story, 12 Pet., 339, were cases addressed to this court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction; so was the case of Kendall v. The U. S., 12 Pet., 525–655. Ex parte Guthrie, and all the rest of the cases of the applications for mandamus, have been to this court as an appellate court.

The judicial power of the United States is vested by the Constitution in the Supreme Court and in such inferior court as Congress may from time to time establish. This power "shall extend" to a number of classes of cases, among which is "all cases in law or equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States," &c., &c., and within the enumerated classes "in all cases in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction."

It is respectfully submitted, that under these constitutional grants of power and jurisdiction, this court may debito justitiæ, entertain the application for mandamus while a State is a party, and this without resort to the act of Congress distributing the means of enforcing the jurisdiction. The judicial power, so far as this jurisdiction of the court is concerned, is vested by the Constitution. It would neither remain dormant nor would it expire, though the legislative power had never passed a law to authorize certain processes to assert such jurisdiction. We adopt the views taken by the counsel in the case of The U. S. v. Peters, 3 Dall., 126.

If mandamus would then be granted by the court of king's bench, debito justitiæ it can be issued in a case of original jurisdiction upon a proper showing by this court, and the express power is extended by the 14th sec. of the Judiciary Act of 1789, if the writ is necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction belonging to the court.

If mandamus should not be regarded as "a prerogative writ," but as an action, a case, it falls in this matter directly within the vested power and original jurisdiction of the court, and can be entertained independently of the Judiciary Act as a constitutional "flower" of this court.

III. The original jurisdiction of this court is limited to those cases in which foreign ambassadors, ministers, consuls and American States are interested, but in this range it has no limit. There is no judge who can interpose to exercise power over them, but this court in its original jurisdiction. From the very nature of the Constitution, the great police power of the mandamus, as between the States, is a necessity to the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred on this court.

It is the case which gives the jurisdiction, not the court.

Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 304.

IV. Under the precepts of the law of nations, the obligation to deliver fugitives from justice touched only a few classes of criminals—those whose crimes "touched the State," or were so enormous as to make them hostes humani generis—poisoners, assassins, &c. These were delivered up when convicted, and sometimes before. This was done for comity.

Vattel, book 1, ch. 19; book 2, ch. 6.

The character of this obligation was more frequently rendered certain by treaty. But the Constitution of the United States has among the States of the Union extended and enlarged the rule of the publicists. Our States obey the demand where a person is charged with treason, felony or other crime. Crime is synonymous with misdemeanor (4 Bl. Com., 5), and includes every offense below felony, punished by indictment as an offense against the public.

9 Wend., 222.

We know that in the first draft of this clause of the Constitution the words "high misdemeanor" were used. They were stricken out and "other crime" inserted, because "high misdemeanor" might be technical and too limited. The framers wanted to "comprehend all proper cases."

5 Elliott, 487.

The Constitution is harmonious in its complicated structure. As the Federal Government is the repository of the power over foreign intercourse, so the inter-state intercourse is established upon a fixed and stable basis by dispensing with comity and the rule of the publicists, and making the obligation to render criminals to the jurisdiction they have offended, a perfect obligation in express constitutional compact. The States have left themselves no discretion on this subject. They cannot enlarge, diminish, abridge or modify the constitutional arrangement: "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State," &c.

Congress cannot waive an express and mandatory provision of the Constitution. A person charged with treason, felony or other crime, &c., shall be delivered up, &c. Can two of these States negotiate with each other, a modification of this obligation? Certainly not. Can they with the consent of Congress? Certainly not. It is a fixed, well defined and perfect obligation which furnishes all the essentials for its own execution, if properly considered as an inter-state obligation, subject to the judicial grants of the government to enforce its due and proper execution. It expresses plainly what is to be done. The Executive of the State is a mere instrument of the Constitution pointed out by the law, because he holds the executive authority of his State, and is a sworn officer of the Constitution of the United States, bound by his oath to observe its mandate and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, as the supreme law of the land, even in preference to those of his own State.

It would not be within the right or competency of the State of Ohio to refuse this delivery. All its departments could not make a law effective to prevent it. Can its Executive alone avoid it? If he can, why may not any one else, no matter how appointed or in what way qualified?

The State of Ohio must be considered as willing to abide by its constitutional obligations; for this refusal is not the act of the government of the State, it is only the act of its Executive, of one department of its government. The State is bound so strongly by the term of the Constitution, it cannot refuse. If, then, it is consenting and Kentucky is demanding, and only Mr. Dennison refusing, it remains to be seen whether there resides in the Judicial Department of the Federal Government power to compel him to the performance of a ministerial duty assigned to him by law, in order to execute the inter-state covenants inscribed in the Constitution. In that memorable case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet., 539, several leading principles of construction were asserted, to the observance of which we now invite the attention of this court.

1st. When the end is required, the means are given. When the duty is enjoined, the ability to perform it is contemplated to exist on the part of the functionaries to whom it is intrusted.

2d. The General Government is bound, through its own Departments, Legislative, Judicial or Executive, as the case may be, to carry into effect all the rights and duties imposed upon it by the Constitution.

We are perfectly aware that reliance may be placed on the very case from which these principles are extracted, to prove that the obligation to deliver the fugitive from justice is "exclusively federal," and that, therefore, it may be insisted that Congress cannot direct a State executive authority to execute it, but must impose this duty on some person who will be amenable as belonging to one of the departments of the Federal Government. The court says the obligation is "exclusively federal," that "the states cannot be compelled to enforce it." From this dictum the inference is drawn, that if the person indicated to perform the duty (though it be only ministerial) holds any office under the State Government, this court cannot or will not compel him to perform the duty, but will wait for Congress to remodel the legislation of 1793, so as to make the person exclusively a federal officer. We resist the propriety of such inference from the points decided by the court in Prigg's case. The court alluded to the resort which the claimant of a fugitive from service must have to the judiciary to ascertain a fact, in order to support a right upon the finding of the fact, that did intimate that the action of the state magistracy was voluntary though valid unless prohibited by the State. In the case of a fugitive from justice, however, there is no fact to be ascertained, no question to be adjudicated, no necessity to appeal to anyone to support a right, but simply to deliver upon a demand. Will it be replied that to afford even this facility Congress must by law indicate who is to perform the duty? We rejoin that Congress has so indicated by the Act of 1793. As well might the defendant plead his citizenship or inhabitancy in Ohio to relieve him, as that he is relieved by being governor or holding an office by authority of the State. The power of this government extends so far that the performance of a public duty may be demanded and the incumbent of a particular office may be required to perform it, especially where the duty is only ministerial, though at the same time he may be in office in the State. We think it is eminently proper that the executive authority of the State should be the power indicated for the performance of this duty; because that officer is at the same time sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and the laws of Congress made in pursuance thereof; and because he represents the state on which the demand is made, and bound by the constitutional compact on which the demand is founded.

The obligation is said to be "exclusively federal." Does it not bind the State of Ohio? Is it not from its power the compact subtracts? We think the State has peculiarly come under the obligation expressed in the clause in question. Its hands are tied by the clause. Without the clause it might have been guided by its own discretion or by comity—now it is obliged by the terms of the covenant to which it has consented. It may be it cannot be compelled to enforce the delivery of the fugitives. It may be the General Government is compelled through its own department "to carry this into effect;" but that necessity does not shift the obligation. The citizen owes obedience to the law, and is under obligation to perform the duties the law enjoins. But if he fails, the court enforces the law and secures the right which was infringed by the violation of the duty. Nothing can be more familiar than an obligation resting upon one party, and the right and power to enforce its execution vested in another. We submit very respectfully that this is just the case under our Constitution. The obligation to surrender the fugitive from justice rests upon the State—the power and duty to enforce the obligation resides in the General Government. The State of Virginia failing in 1790 to deliver certain fugitives upon the demand of Gov. Mifflin of Pennsylvania, he brought the facts before the President, and the Act of 1793 was the consequence, whereby the Executive of the State was directed to perform the duty answering such demand. Every condition has been met. They who would escape the conclusion at which we wish to arrive must take the position, not only that in our system the States may prohibit the use of their State agencies to the General Government in carrying the supreme law into effect within their boundaries; but this further position, that it is not in the power of the Federal Government to demand of anyone in a State to perform a duty essential to the execution of the obligations inscribed in the Constitution.

We may well ask the Supreme Court to pause before ruling to this extent. When we remember that all executive, legislative and judicial officers in the several States, are required, by the express letter of the Constitution of the United States, to be sworn "to support the Constitution," and that the "laws of Congress made in pursuance thereof are the supreme laws of the land," overriding all state laws coming into conflict with them—that this body of state officers is bound solemnly to render obedience primarily to this supreme law, even in their respective jurisdictions, and though oppposed to their State laws, it is difficult to comprehend the wisdom of that policy which teaches that those States can prohibit the use of these agencies in carrying into effect those very laws which the State has consented to observe as the supreme law, and its agents have been sworn to support as paramount.

We submit to the court, that the case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet., 539, has been modified by the subsequent decisions of Moore v. The People of Illinois, 14 How., 18, so far at least as to authorize state legislation, which is ancillary to the effectuation of the obligation to be "carried into effect" by the federal power. We hope the court will not carry the exclusive action of the federal power so far as to say that it cannot indicate "the executive authority of a State," as the instrument to perform the purely ministerial act acquired by the 2d section, 4th article of the Constitution.

V. The duty required by the Governor of Ohio in arresting a fugitive from justice, results in an express obligation of his State, which he, as the executive authority of that State, is directed by the Act of 1793 to carry out. He has no judgment to exercise touching the point of arrest. He cannot even hear a question on the point of identity of person that a judge might hear on habeas corpus. He cannot consider the question of guilt or innocence.

9 Wend., 221.

We refer to Clark's case, because it is a strong case adjudicated in the better days of the Republic, by a patriotic public officer, who strove only to perform his duty under the law.

May every state executive at pleasure violate the Constitution in its most direct mandate and most express obligation? Has the judicial power an arm not strong enough to reach him? If so, the obligations of the Constitution may at any time and under any pretext be avoided; the instrument is a myth.

Governor Dennison has mistaken his power in this matter, by assuming the discretion to judge in regard to the alleged crime. The words of the Constitution are unambiguous. That the crime is to be judged by the law of the State through whose Executive the demand is made, appears from the Constitution itself; for the object of the delivery of the fugitive is "that he may be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime." To say that the authority on whom the demand is made shall judge of the guilt of the party, or of the fact of the crime, or whether the alleged act is a crime, is to nullify the sense, object and intent of the framers of the Constitution, and to assume a supervisory power by the Executive of a State over the law making and police powers of another State. The police power of the States was reserved, and has never been surrendered to the Federal Government.

Moore v. The People of Illinois, 14 How., 18; 11 Pet., 139.

The Governor of Ohio, in refusing the demand, has not denied his general responsibility under the Constitution and law of the United States to make delivery of a fugitive from justice. His refusal was based upon the allegation that the offense charged in the Kentucky indictment was not crime, according to the signification of that word in the Constitution. To confine the terms to such offense as was denominated crime at the date of the Constitution would give a restrictive operation to that instrument, which would vastly impair its adaptation to the progress and wants of society. It would, in effect, destroy the force of this clause of the Constitution at its inception; and instead of placing the States in bonds of mutual obligation to vindicate the jurisdiction of each other through future years, would make each a supervisor of the police powers of the others, and, by reason of conflicting policies in their progress, would inevitably lead to alienation, confusion and ultimate discord. The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence: hence its powers are expressed in general terms.

1 Wheat., 305, 326.

It only remains for the counsel for the demandant to say that the State of Kentucky, in bringing this case before the Supreme Court, pursues the law as it exists, and asks its enforcement if the law can be enforced. If the Act of Congress has exceeded the power vested in Congress by the Constitution, and we have been since 1793 acting through instruments over which the government has no control, Kentucky desires, through the Supreme Court, to know the fact, so that Congress may without delay so treat this important subject as hereafter to assure the faithful and prompt execution of this clause of the Constitution. To it it is a vital question, as to all the other States in fact, whose institutions are similar to its.

1. The Government of the United States is one of limited and enumerated powers, derived primarily from the specific grants of the Constitution, which is at once the source and the law of all its being. It is a necessary correlative of this proposition, and one declared by the fundamental law itself, that each State still retains complete, exclusive and supreme power over all persons and things within its limits, where that power has not been specially granted or restrained by the Constitution, and that in respect to all this mass of undelegated and unprohibited power, the States stand to each other and to the General Government as absolutely foreign nations.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 203, 208; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419, 443; Wilson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet., 251, 252; Buckner v. Finley, 2 Pet., 586, 590; New York v. Miln, 11 Pet., 102, 136; U. S. Bank v. Daniel, 12 Pet., 32, 34; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. 720; License Cases, 5 How., 504, 588.

II. The Judicial Department of the Federal Government, sharing of necessity the intrinsic quality which marks that government in its unity, is also one of limited and specific powers.

The authority of the Judicial Department is restrained, not only by the limitations specially affixed to it, but also by those more general considerations which grow out of the very nature and purpose of a federal government. Thus the judicial power of the United States cannot extend to a controversy in which a state may—even by a purely civil action—pursue a citizen of another State for his violation of its municipal laws. Though in that instance, the controversy would, as to its subject-matter, be one proper for judicial cognizance in the general sense of that term, and would, also, in respect of its parties, fall within the enumerated cases; yet no tribunal of the United States could entertain it, because all matters of merely internal concern have been kept by the States for their own original, exclusive and sovereign control.

New York City v. Miln, 11 Pet., 139; License Cases, 5 How., 588.

III. The Supreme Court of the United States, while fettered by each of the conditions so attaching to the whole Judicial Department—of which it is simply the highest organ—has been otherwise so narrowly confined as to permit it to wield in an original form, only a very scant degree of the scant power confided to the range of the Judicial Department. Of necessity all judicial power must be exerted in an original or appellate form, and the Constitution has declared the precise cases in which, under either of these forms, the judicial power of the United States may be imparted to the Supreme Court.

The original jurisdiction is expressly limited to—

1. Cases "affecting ambassadors, other public ministers or consuls."

2. Cases "in which a State shall be a party;" and "since the adoption of the 11th Amendment—in which a State shall be the plaintiff or other pursuing party." It is not enough that it may be "consequentially affected or indirectly interested."

Fowler v. Lindsey, 3 Dall., 411; U. S. v. Peters, 5 Cranch, 115, 139; Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat., 738, 850; U. S. Bank v. Planters' Bank, 9 Wheat., 904, 906; Wheeling Bridge case, 13 How., 518, 559.

IV. The Constitution does not of itself vest any power of action in the Supreme Court. It simply enables the court—under the regulating control of Congress—to exert judicial authority in the prescribed cases; but the existence in the court, of the power itself and the methods and instruments of its exercise, depend on the affirmative legislative action of Congress. The Supreme Court, in respect of both forms of its jurisdiction, is the organ of the Constitution and the law.

Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall., 419, 432, 452; Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 173; Bollman's case, ex parte, 4 Cranch, 75, 93, 94; Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat., 1, 21, 22; New Jersey v. New York, 5 Pet., 283, 290; Crane's case, ex parte, 5 Pet., 190, 193; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet., 657, 721, 722; Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet., 524, 622; Christy's cases, ex parte, 3 How., 293, 322.

The Congress exercising its power in this behalf has regulated the jurisdiction of this court and its form and mode of proceeding.

1. The original cognizance of this court, as to cases in which a State is a party has been limited to "controversies of a civil nature"—a limitation not expressed by the Constitution, and yet certainly effectual.

The Judiciary Act, sec. 13.

2. Power has been given to the Supreme Court to issue the two named writs, the writ of prohibition and the "writ of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed or persons holding office under the authority of the United States."

Judiciary Act, sec. 13.

The general authority to regulate its modes of proceeding conferred on this court by the "Process Act," sec. 2, and to issue "other writs" ancillary to the exercise of its jurisdiction conferred by the Judiciary Act, sec. 14, does not enable the court to enlarge the uses of the writ of mandamus. The express grant of this writ, as against a specific class of functionaries, is a clear exclusion of any such authority, and an emphatic prohibition against the use of the writ in any other case or for any other purpose.

Christy, ex parte, 3 How., 293, 322.

V. Arranging in continuous order the ascertained general conditions which limit the existence and exercise of the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in all possible cases—excepting only those "affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls," of whom there is now no question—it will be seen that no controversy can gain a foothold here, unless it be—

1. Appropriate for the action of judicial as distinguished from political power;

2. Within the scope of "the judicial power of the United States, as distinguished" from the general mass of the judicial power reserved by and to the several States for their own exclusive exercise.

3. Instituted by a State as the "entire party" plaintiff on the record—in virtue of such direct legal or equitable interest in the subject-matter as, according to the ordinary rules applied to other parties, entitles it to "move" a case at law or in equity—against a party subject to the control of the court.

4. Of a "civil" as opposed to one of "criminal" nature.

5. Conducted in a form of proceeding consistent with its subject-matter, with the character of its parties and with the regulations prescribed by Congress for the use of that form of proceeding.

But the controversy, if a writ of mandamus can be so called, moved for by the present application, has no one if all these vital characteristics. For—

VI. The subject-matter of the controversy excludes it from discussion or adjudication by any judicial tribunal.

1. It is not appropriate for the action of judicial power, since it only concerns the execution of a compact between the States—independent as to each other—for the extradition of fugitive offenders.

Affecting the States at large as to their exterior relation and their reciprocal national rights and duties, it is in essence a political question. Without express provision committing them under specific regulations to the judicial authority, the performance of national engagements addresses itself to the department wielding the political power and able to weigh political considerations. No such valid provision has been made in respect of this compact. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 170; U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat., 610, 634, 670; The Divina Pastora, 4 Wheat., 52, 63; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet., 253, 307, 314; Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet., 1 U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 691, 735.

2. If fit for judicial cognizance under any circumstances or by any tribunal, the subject of the proceeding is, nevertheless, not within the scope of the judicial power of the United States.

(a) The Constitution has not granted any power to any department of the Federal Government concerning the reclamation of fugitives from justice as between the States. The provision which it contains in this behalf is a simple engagement made by the States with each other—regulating matters of purely state concern and addressed to the States alone. If, as an original question, this interpretation could be doubted, it has become the fixed one by long usage and aquiescence. Since the foundatian of the governmeut, each State has habitually determined for itself the extent of this obligation—many of them (and Kentucky is one—1 Stanton's Rev. Stat., 557) have regulated its discharge by express enactments—but never until now has the authority of the Federal Government been invoked to constrain its fulfillment. This practical exposition, acted upon for nearly eighty years, is too strong and obstinate to be shaken or controlled.

VII. The proceeding is not one in which a State is the pursuing party on the record; nor is any State so interested in its subject-matter as to be entitled to pursue here any form of controversy in respect to it; nor is the adverse party one over whom this court can, under any circumstances or by any mode, exercise any control.

1. The writ of mandamus is a prerogative writ issued by the government in its own name to its own functionaries, to redress or prevent a wrong done or threatened to itself as a government. If granted in this case, it will be a proceeding instituted by "the United States of America" against "the Governor of Ohio." Though the State of Kentucky may be interested in the performance of that duty, yet the writ will issue upon reasons of public policy, simply to constrain the discharge of a public duty imposed by the authority of the General Government and essential to its own peculiar welfare.

2. The Commonwealth of Kentucky has not such an interest in the discharge of the asserted duty as entitles it to set the writ in motion. The ground on which it must base its interests in the extradition of Lago, is simply one phase of that general obligation springing out of the simple compact itself, which binds every organized political community to avenge all injuries aimed at the wellbeing or welfare of its society.

3. The claim made for the surrender of Lago must be prosecuted by the executive authority eo nomine of the Commonwealth of Kentucky. That "authority" alone is empowered by the Constitution to demand the extradition, and by parity of reason, can alone institute proceedings for its enforcement. But a suit by or against a state functionary as such, is not a suit by or against the State itself.

Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat., 852, 859; U. S. Bank v. Planters' Bank, 9 Wheat., 904.

4. The official personage against whom the writ is prayed, is not subject in any form or degree to the jurisdiction of this court. No power has been confided to any department of the Federal Government to impose a duty upon any functionaries of a State, or to constrain the discharge of their official concerns.

Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 304, 336; Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat., 1, 23; Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet., 539.

VIII. The controversy raised by the motion is not of a civil nature. It involves no question of the rights of persons or the rights of property. The power of the court is invoked simply in aid of the administration of the Criminal Code of Kentucky, to the end that it may be able to try Lago for an imputed offense against its laws, and, if guilty, to imprison him in its penitentiary.

IX. The original jurisdiction of this court cannot be exercised through the method of the writ of mandamus, and this disability springs as well from the inherent nature of the writ itself as from the regulations prescribed for its use by the legislative power.

1. The writ comes to us from the common law, and this court has judicially determined that the common law remedies in the federal tribunals are to be according to the principles of that law as settled in England (Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat., 212), subject, of course, to the modifications made by Congress or under its authority, and also to such limitations as result from the constitution of the court and the nature of the Federal Government. According to these principles, this writ, as tersely defined by Lord Mansfield, is "a high prerogative one, flowing from the King himself, sitting in the Court of King's Bench, superintending the police and preserving the peace of the country. Rex v. Barker, 1 W. Bl., 300, 352.

Stated in a different form, the writ at common law is issued by a tribunal in which not only the judicial sovereignty but the prerogative of general superintendency resides, and it is employed extrajudicially (Avodeley v. Joye, Popham, 176) as well as judicially. Its judicial use is to supervise the administration of the King's justice by his inferior judicatures, and its extrajudicial function is "to preserve peace, order and good government," by constraining the prompt and rightful performance of every public duty confided to any public functionary or tribunal by Parliament or the King's charter.

Tapp. Mand., secs. 6, 11, 12; Bac. Abr., tit. Mandamus, a; Butler's Nisi Prius, 195; Rex v. Baker, 3 Burr., 1266; Rex v. Bank of England, 2 Barn. & Ald., 622; Rex v. Fowey, 2 Barn. & C., 596; Rex v. North Riding, &c., 2 Barn. & C., 290; Reg. v. E. C. Railway, 10 Adol. & E., 557; Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet., 621.

But this court is one of very special and limited jurisdiction. The judicial sovereignty in its general sense, does not reside here, and it has no prerogative power, no police power, no power to superintend the conduct of public affairs. The court cannot, under the Constitution, be empowered to issue the writ of mandamus save to the inferior judicatures of the United States in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction.

Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 176; Kendall v. U. S. 12 Pet., 524, 621.

The Judiciary Act, as already noticed, in regulating the conditions under which the great common law writs may be issued by this court, has interdicted the employment of this writ, except as it may, agreeably, to the "principles and usages of law," be directed against "courts appointed or persons holding office under the sovereignty of the United States." The court has solemnly determined that the Constitution prohibits it from issuing the writ, except to the courts of the Federal Government, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction.

Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 176; Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet., 524, 621.

But the party against whom the writ is now invoked does not come within either of the categories prescribed by the Judicial Act.

X. The results now attained demonstrate that the controversy which the present application seeks to inaugurate is, in its form and in its essence, in its whole and its every part and element, beyond the utmost sweep of the jurisdiction of this court. The power to compose this national and political strife does not reside in this tribunal; the pursuing party cannot cross it threshold; the party pursued is without the reach of its arms; the subject of the difference has been excluded from its action; and the writ which it is solicited to grant, has been denied to it as a method for the exercise of its original jurisdiction.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

The court is sensible of the importance of this case, and of the great interest and gravity of the questions involved in it, and which have been raised and fully argued at the bar.

Some of them, however, are not now for the first time brought to the attention of this court; and the objections made to the jurisdiction, and the form and nature of the process to be issued, and upon whom it is to be served, have all been heretofore considered and decided, and cannot now be regarded as open to further dispute.

As early as 1792, in the case of Georgia v. Brailsford, 2 Dall., 402, the court exercised the original jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution, without any further legislation by Congress, to regulate it, than the Act of 1789. And no question was then made, nor any doubt then expressed, as to the authority of the court. The same power was again exercised without objection in the case of Oswold v. The State of Georgia, in which the court regulated the form and nature of the process against the State, and directed it to be served on the governor and attorney-general. But in the case of Chisholm v. Georgia, at February Term, 1793, reported in 2 Dall., 419, the authority of the court in this respect was questioned, and brought to its attention in the argument of counsel; and the report shows how carefully and thoroughly the subject was considered. Each of the judges delivered a separate opinion, in which these questions, as to the jurisdiction of the court, and the mode of exercising it, are elaborately examined.

Mr. Chief Justice Jay, Mr. Justice Cushing, Mr. Justice Wilson, and Mr. Justice Blair, decided in favor of the jurisdiction, and held that process served on the governor and attorney-general was sufficient. Mr. Justice Iredell differed, and thought that further legislation by Congress was necessary to give the jurisdiction, and regulate the manner in which it should be exercised. But the opinion of the majority of the court upon these points has always been since followed. And in the case of New Jersey v. New York, in 1831, 5 Pet., 284, Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, refers to the case of Chisholm v. The State of Georgia, and to the opinions then delivered, and the judgment pronounced, in terms of high respect, and after enumerating the various cases in which that decision had been acted on, reaffirms it in the following words:

"It has been settled by our predecessors, on great deliberation, that this court may exercise its original jurisdiction in suits against a State, under the authority conferred by the Constitution and existing Acts of Congress. The rule respecting the process, the persons on whom it is to be served, and the time of service, are fixed. The course of the court, on the failure of the State to appear after due service of process, has been also prescribed."

And in the same case, page 289, he states in full the process which had been established by the court as a rule of practice in the case of Grayson v. Virginia, 3 Dall. 320, and ever since followed. This rule directs, "that when process at common law, or in equity, shall issue against a State, the same shall be served upon the Governor or Chief Executive Magistrate and the Attorney-General of such State."

It is equally well settled, that a mandamus in modern practice is nothing more than an action at law between the parties, and is not now regarded as a prerogative writ. It undoubtedly came into use by virtue of the prerogative power of the English Crown, and was subject to regulations and rules which have long since been disused. But the right to the writ, and the power to issue it, has ceased to depend upon any prerogative power, and it is now regarded as an ordinary process in cases to which it is applicable. It was so held by this court in the cases of Kendall v. United States, 12 Pet., 615; Kendall v. Stokes, 3 How., 100.

So, also, as to the process in the name of the Governor, in his official capacity, in behalf of the State.

In the case of Georgia v. Madrazo, 1 Pet., 110, it was decided, that in a case where the Chief Magistrate of a State is sued, not by his name as an individual, but by his style of office, and the claim made upon him is entirely in his official character, the State itself may be considered a party on the record. This was a case where the State was the defendant; the practice, where it is plaintiff, has been frequently adopted of suing in the name of the Governor in behalf of the State, and was indeed the form originally used, and always recognized as the suit of the State.

Thus, in the first case to be found in our reports, in which a suit was brought by a State, it was entitled, and set forth in the bill, as the suit of "The State of Georgia, by Edward Telfair, Governor of the said State, Complainant, v. Samuel Brailsford et al.;" and the second case, which was so early as 1793, was entitled and set forth in the pleadings as the suit of "His Excellency, Edward Telfair, Esquire, Governor and Commander-in-chief in and over the State of Georgia, in behalf of the said State, Complainant, v. Samuel Brailsford et al., Defendants."

The cases referred to leave no question open to controversy, as to the jurisdiction of the court. They show that it has been the established doctrine upon this subject ever since the Act of 1789, that in all cases where original jurisdiction is given by the Constitution, this court has authority to exercise it without any further Act of Congress to regulate its process or confer jurisdiction; and that the court may regulate and mold the process it uses in such manner as in its judgment will best promote the purposes of justice; and that it has also been settled, that where the State is a party, plaintiff or defendant, the Governor represents the state, and the suit may be, in form, a suit by him as Governor in behalf of the State, where the State is plaintiff, and he must be summoned or notified as the officer representing the State, where the State is defendant. And further, that the writ of mandamus does not issue from or by any prerogative power, and is nothing more than the ordinary process of a court of justice, to which everyone is entitled, where it is the appropriate process for asserting the right he claims.

We may, therefore, dismiss the question of jurisdiction without further comment, as it is very clear, that if the right claimed by Kentucky can be enforced by judicial process, the proceeding by mandamus is the only mode in which the object can be accomplished.

This brings us to the examination of the clause of the Constitution which has given rise to this controversy. It is in the following words:

"A person charged in any State with treason, felony or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime."

Looking to the language of the clause, it is difficult to comprehend how any doubt could have arisen as to its meaning and construction. The words, "treason, felony or other crime," in their plain and obvious import, as well as in their legal and technical sense, embrace every act forbidden and made punishable by a law of the State. The word "crime" of itself includes every offense, from the highest to the lowest in the grade of offenses, and includes what are called "misdemeanors," as well as treason and felony.

4 Bl. Com., 5, 6, and note 3, Wendell's edition.

But as the word "crime" would have included treason and felony, without specially mentioning those offenses, it seems to be supposed that the natural and legal import of the word, by associating it with those offenses, must be restricted and confined to offenses already known to the common law and to the usage of nations, and regarded as offenses in every civilized community, and that they do not extend to acts made offenses by local statutes growing out of local circumstances, nor to offenses against ordinary police regulations. This is one of the grounds upon which the Governor of Ohio refused to deliver Lago, under the advice of the Attorney-General of that State.

But this inference is founded upon an obvious mistake as to the purpose for which the words "treason and felony" were introduced. They were introduced for the purpose of guarding against any restriction of the word "crime," and to prevent this provision from being construed by the rules and usages of independent nations in compacts for delivering up fugitives from justice. According to these usages, even where they admitted the obligation to deliver the fugitive, persons who fled on account of political offenses were almost always excepted, and the nation upon which the demand is made also uniformly claims and exercises a discretion in weighing the evidence of the crime, and the character of the offense. The policy of different nations, in this respect, with the opinions of eminent writers upon public law, are collected in Wheaton on The Law of Nations, 171; Fœlix, 312; and Martin, Verge's edition, 182. And the English Government, from which we have borrowed our general system of law and jurisprudence, has always refused to deliver up political offenders who had sought an asylum within its dominions. And as the States of this Union, although united as one Nation for certain specified purposes, are yet, so far as concerns their internal government, separate sovereignties, independent of each other, it was obviously deemed necessary to show, by the terms used, that this compact was not to be regarded or construed as an ordinary treaty for extradition between nations altogether independent of each other, but was intended to embrace political offenses against the sovereignty of the State, as well as all other crimes. And as treason was also a "felony" (4 Bl. Com., 94), it was necessary to insert those words, to show, in language that could not be mistaken, that political offenders were included in it. For this was not a compact of peace and comity between separate nations who had no claim on each other for mutual support, but a compact binding them to give aid and assistance to each other in executing their laws, and to support each other in preserving order and law within its confines, whenever such aid was needed and required; for it is manifest that the statesmen who framed the Constitution were fully sensible, that from the complex character of the government, it must fail unless the States mutually supported each other and the General Government; and that nothing would be more likely to disturb its peace, and end in discord, than permitting an offender against the laws of a State, by passing over a mathematical line which divides it from another, to defy its process, and stand ready, under the protection of the State, to repeat the offense as soon as another opportunity offered.

Indeed, the necessity of this policy of mutual support, in bringing offenders to justice, without any exception as to the character and nature of the crime, seems to have been first recognized and acted on by the American Colonies; for we find, by Winthrop's History of Massachusetts, Vol. II, pp. 121 and 126, that as early as 1643, by "Articles of Confederation between the plantations under the Government of Massachusetts, the plantation under the Government of New Plymouth, the plantations under the Government of Connecticut, and the Government of New Haven, with the plantations in combination therewith," these plantations pledged themselves to each other, that, upon the escape of any prisoner or fugitive for any criminal cause, whether by breaking prison, or getting from the officer, or otherwise escaping, upon the certificate of two magistrates of the jurisdiction out of which the escape was made, that he was a prisoner or such an offender at the time of the escape, the magistrate, or some of them, of the jurisdiction where, for the present, the said prisoner or fugitive abideth, shall forthwith grant such a warrant as the case will bear, for the apprehending of any such person, and the delivery of him into the hands of the officer or other person who pursueth him; and if there be help required for the safe returning of any such offender, then it shall be granted unto him that craves the same, he paying the charges thereof." It will be seen that this agreement gave no discretion to the magistrate of the government where the offender was found; but he was bound to arrest and deliver, upon the production of the certificate under which he was demanded.

When the Thirteen Colonies formed a confederation for mutual support, a similar provision was introduced, most probably suggested by the advantages which the plantations had derived from their compact with one another. But, as these Colonies had then, by the Declaration of Independence, become separate and independent sovereignties, against which treason might be committed, their compact is carefully worded, so as to include treason and felony—that is, political offenses—as well as crimes of an inferior grade. It is in the following words:

"If any person, guilty of or charged with treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor, in any State, shall flee from justice, and be found in any other of the United States, he shall, upon demand of the governor or executive power of the state from which he fled, be delivered up and removed to the State having jurisdiction of his offense."

And when these Colonies were about to form a still closer union by the present Constitution, but yet preserving their sovereignty, they had learned from experience the necessity of this provision for the internal safety of each of them, and to promote concord and harmony among all their members; and it is introduced in the Constitution substantially in the same words, but substituting the word "crime" for the words "high misdemeanor," and thereby showing the deliberate purpose to include every offense known to the law of the State from which the party charged had fled.

The argument on behalf of the Governor of Ohio, which insists upon excluding from this clause new offenses created by a statute of the State, and growing out of its local institutions, and which are not admitted to be offenses in the State where the fugitive is found, nor so regarded by the general usage or civilized nations, would render the clause useless for any practical purpose. For where can the line of division be drawn with anything like certainty? Who is to mark it? The Governor of the demanding State would probably draw one line, and the Governor of the other State another. And if they differed, who is to decide between them? Under such a vague and indefinite construction, the article would not be a bond of peace and union, but a constant source of controversy and irritating discussion. It would have been far better to omit it altogether, and to have left it to the comity of the States, and their own sense of their respective interests, than to have inserted it as conferring a right, and yet defining that right so loosely as to make it a never failing subject of dispute and ill will.

The clause in question, like the clause in the Confederation, authorizes the demand to be made by the executive authority of the state where the crime was committed, but does not in so many words specify the officer of the State upon whom the demand is to be made, and whose duty it is to have the fugitive delivered and removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime. But, under the Confederation, it is plain that the demand was to be made on the Governor or executive authority of the State, and could be made on no other department or officer; for the confederation was only a league of separate sovereignties, in which each state, within its own limits, held and exercised all the powers of sovereignty; and the Confederation had no officer, either executive, judicial or ministerial, through whom it could exercise an authority within the limits of a State. In the present Constitution, however, these powers, to a limited extent, have been conferred on the General Government within the territories of the several States. But the part of the clause in relation to the mode of demanding and surrendering the fugitive is (with the exception of an unimportant word or two), a literal copy of the Article of the Confederation, and it is plain that the mode of the demand and the official authority by and to whom it was addressed, under the Confederation, must have been in the minds of the members of the convention when this article was introduced, and that, in adopting the same words, they manifestly intended to sanction the mode of proceeding practiced under the Confederation—that is, of demanding the fugitive from the executive authority, and making it his duty to cause him to be delivered up.

Looking, therefore, to the words of the Constitution—to the obvious policy and necessity of this provision to preserve harmony between States, and order and law within their respective borders, and to its early adoption by the colonies, and then by the confederated States, whose mutual interest it was to give each other aid and support whenever it was needed—the conclusion was irresistible, that this compact engrafted in the Constitution included, and was intended to include, every offense made punishable by the law of the state in which it was committed, and that it gives the right to the executive authority of the State to demand the fugitive from the executive authority of the State in which he is found; that the right given to "demand" implies that it is an absolute right; and it follows that there must be a correlative obligation to deliver, without any reference to the character of the crime charged, or to the policy or laws of the State to which the fugitive has fled.

This is evidently the construction put upon this article in the Act of Congress of 1793 (1 Stat. at L., 302), under which the proceedings now before us are instituted. It is, therefore, the construction put upon it almost cotemporaneously with the commencement of the government itself, and when Washington was still at its head, and many of those who had assisted in framing it were members of the Congress which enacted the law.

The Constitution having established the right on one part and the obligation on the other, it became necessary to provide by law the mode of carrying it into execution. The Governor of the State could not, upon a charge made before him, demand the fugitive; for, according to the principles upon which all of our institutions are founded, the Executive Department can act only in subordination to the Judicial Department, where rights of person or property are concerned, and its duty in those cases consists only in aiding to support the judicial process and enforcing its authority, when its interposition for that purpose becomes necessary, and is called for by the Judicial Department. The executive authority of the State, therefore, was not authorized by this article to make the demand unless the party was charged in the regular course of judicial proceedings. And it was equally necessary that the executive authority of the State upon which the demand was made, when called on to render his aid, should be satisfied by competent proof that the party was so charged. This proceeding, when duly authenticated, is his authority for arresting the offender.

This duty, of providing by law the regulations necessary to carry this compact into execution, from the nature of the duty and the object in view, was manifestly devolved upon Congress; for if it was left to the States, each State might require different proof to authenticate the judicial proceeding upon which the demand was founded; and as the duty of the Governor of the State where the fugitive was found is, in such cases, merely ministerial, without the right to exercise either executive or judicial discretion, he could not lawfully issue a warrant to arrest an individual without a law of the State or of Congress to authorize it. These difficul- presented themselves as early as 1791, in a demand made by the Governor of Pennsylvania upon the Governor of Virginia, and both of them admitted the propriety of bringing the subject before the President, who immediately submitted the matter to the consideration of Congress. And this led to the Act of 1793, of which we are now speaking. All difficulty as to the mode of authenticating the judicial proceeding was removed by the article in the Constitution which declares "that full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other State; and the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which acts, records and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof." And without doubt the provision of which we are now speaking—that is, for the delivery of a fugitive, which requires official communications between States, and the authentication of official documents—was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, and had its influence in inducing them to give this power to Congress. And acting upon this authority, and the clause of the Constitution which is the subject of the present controversy, Congress passed the Act of 1793, February 12th (1 Stat. at L., 302), which, as far as relates to this subject, is in the following words:

"Sec. 1. That whenever the executive authority of any state in the Union, or of either of the territories northwest or south of the River Ohio, shall demand any person as a fugitive from justice of the executive authority of any such state or territory to which such person shall have fled, and shall, moreover, produce the copy of an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any state or terrritory as aforesaid, charging the person so demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate of the state or territory from whence the person so charged fled, it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the state or territory to which such person shall have fled, to cause him or her to be arrested and secured, and notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear; but if no such agent shall appear within six months from the time of the arrest, the prisoner may be discharged. And all costs or expenses incurred in the apprehending, securing, and transmitting such fugitive to the state or territory making such demand shall be paid by such state or territory.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any agent, appointed as aforesaid, who shall receive the fugitive into his custody, shall be empowered to transport him or her to the state or territory from which he or she shall have fled; and if any person or persons shall by force set at liberty or rescue the fugitive from such agent while transporting as aforesaid, the person or persons so offending shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding one year."

It will be observed, that the judicial acts which are necessary to authorize the demand are plainly specified in the Act of Congress; and the certificate of the executive authority is made conclusive as to their verity when presented to the executive of the State where the fugitive is found. He has no right to look behind them, or to question them, or to look into the character of the crime specified in this judicial proceeding. The duty which he is to perform is, as we have already said, merely ministerial—that is, to cause the party to be arrested, and delivered to the agent or authority of the State where the crime was committed. It is said in the argument, that the executive officer upon whom this demand is made must have a discretionary executive power, because he must inquire and decide who is the person demanded. But this certainly is not a discretionary duty upon which he is to exercise any judgment, but is a mere ministerial duty—that is, to do the act required to be done by him, and such as every marshal and sheriff must perform when process, either criminal or civil, is placed in his hands to be served on the person named in it. And it never has been supposed that this duty involved any discretionary power, or made him anything more than a mere ministerial officer; and such is the position and character of the Executive of the State under this law, when the demand is made upon him and the requsite evidence produced. The Governor has only to issue his warrant to an agent or officer to arrest the party named in the demand.

The question which remains to be examined is a grave and important one. When the demand was made, the proofs required by the Act of 1793 to support it were exhibited to the Governor of Ohio, duly certified and authenticated; and the objection made to the validity of the indictment is altogether untenable. Kentucky has an undoubted right to regulate the forms of pleading and process in her own courts, in criminal as well as civil cases, and is not bound to conform to those of any other State. And whether the charge against Lago is legally and sufficiently laid in this indictment according to the laws of Kentucky, is a judicial question to be decided by the courts of the State, and not by the executive authority of the State of Ohio.

The demand being thus made, the Act of Congress declares, that "it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the state" to cause the fugitive to be arrested and secured, and delivered to the agent of the demanding State. The words, "it shall be the duty," in ordinary legislation, imply the assertion of the power to command and to coerce obedience. But looking to the subject-matter of this law, and the relations which the United States and the several States bear to each other, the court is of opinion, the words "it shall be the duty" were not used as mandatory and compulsory, but as declaratory of the moral duty which this compact created, when Congress had provided the mode of carrying it into execution. The Act does not provide any means to compel the execution of this duty, nor inflict any punishment for neglect or refusal on the part of the Executive of the State; nor is there any clause or provision in the Constitution which arms the Government of the United States with this power. Indeed, such a power would place every State under the control and dominion of the General Government, even in the administration of its internal concerns and reserved rights. And we think it clear that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no power to impose on a state officer, as such, any duty whatever, and compel him to perform it; for if it possessed this power, it might overload the officer with duties which would fill up all his time, and disable him from performing his obligations to the State, and might impose on him duties of a character incompatible with the rank and dignity to which he was elevated by the State.

It is true that Congress may authorize a particular state officer to perform a particular duty; but if he declines to do so, it does not follow that he may be coerced, or punished for his refusal. And we are very far from supposing, that in using this word "duty," the statesmen who framed and passed the law, or the President who approved and signed it, intended to exercise a coercive power over state officers not warranted by the Constitution. But the General Government having in that law fulfilled the duty devolved upon it, by prescribing the proof and mode of authentication upon which the state authorities were bound to deliver the fugitive, the word "duty" in the law points to the obligation on the State to carry it into execution.

It is true that in the early days of the government, Congress relied with confidence upon the co-operation and support of the States, when exercising the legitimate powers of the General Government, and were accustomed to receive it, upon principles of comity, and from a sense of mutual and common interest, where no such duty was imposed by the Constitution. And laws were passed authorizing state courts to entertain jurisdiction in proceedings by the United States to recover penalties and forfeitures incurred by breaches of their revenue laws, and giving to the state courts the same authority with the District Court of the United States to enforce such penalties and forfeitures, and also the power to hear the allegations of parties, and to take proofs, if an application for a remission of the penalty or forfeiture should be made, according to the provisions of the Acts of Congress. And these powers were for some years exercised by state tribunals, readily, and without objection, until in some of the States it was declined because it interfered with and retarded the performance of duties which properly belonged to them as state courts; and in other States, doubts appear to have arisen as to the power of the courts, acting under the authority of the State, to inflict these penalties and forfeitures for offenses against the General Government, unless especially authorized to do so by the State.

And in these cases the co-operation of the States was a matter of comity, which the several sovereignties extended to one another for their mutual benefit. It was not regarded by either party as an obligation imposed by the Constitution. And the Acts of Congress conferring the jurisdiction merely give the power to the state tribunals, but do not purport to regard it as a duty, and they leave it to the States to exercise it or not, as might best comport with their own sense of justice, and their own interest and convenience.

But the language of the Act of 1793 is very different. It does not purport to give authority to the Executive to arrest and deliver the fugitive, but requires it to be done, and the language of the state law implies an absolute obligation which the state authority is bound to perform. And when it speaks of the duty of the Governor, it evidently points to the duty imposed by the Constitution in the clause we are now considering. The performance of this duty, however, is left to depend on the fidelity of the state executive to the compact entered into with the other States when it adopted the Constitution of the United States, and became a member of the Union. It was so left by the Constitution, and necessarily so left by the Act of 1793.

And it would seem that when the Constitution was framed, and when this law was passed, it was confidently believed that a sense of justice and of mutual interest would insure a faithful execution of this constitutional provision by the Executive of every State, for every State had an equal interest in the execution of a compact absolutely essential to their peace and well being in their internal concerns, as well as members of the Union. Hence, the use of the words ordinarily employed when an undoubted obligation is required to be performed, "it shall be his duty."

But if the Governor of Ohio refuses to discharge this duty, there is no power delegated to the General Government, either through the Judicial Department or any other department, to use any coercive means to compel him.

And upon this ground the motion for the mandamus must be overruled.

THOMAS MEEHAN AND CHARLES BALLANCE, Plffs. in Er.,

v

ROBERT FORSYTH.

(See S. C., 24 How., 175-179.)

Copy of survey, when evidence—Patent from U. S. gives title—Illinois Act of Limitations.

A certified copy of survey in the office of the Surveyor-General, given by that officer, who is required to keep it, is admissible in evidence.

A patent issued to defendant, by which the United States granted to him and his heirs, subject to the rights of any persons claiming under the Act of Congress of 3d March, 1823, is a fee simple title on its face, and is such a title as will afford protection to those claiming under it.

The Act of Limitations of Illinois protects the claim of a person for lands, which have been possessed by actual residence thereon, having a connected title in law or equity, deducible of record from that State or the United States.

Argued Feb. 18, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

This was an action of ejectment, brought by the defendant in error in the court below.

Judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and the defendant brought the case to this court by writ of error.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. C. Ballance, for the plaintiffs in error:

The plaintiffs in error were clearly and incontrovertibly within the Statute and Limitations of 1845 and 1839.

Bryan v. Forsyth, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 334; Wright v. Matteson, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 50; Woodward v. Blanchard, 16 Ill., 431; Ewing v. Burnett, 11 Pet., 41.

Mr. Williams, for defendant in error:

The defendant below held possession of the land subject to the rights of the plaintiff, and consequently his possession was subservient, and not adverse, to the title of the plaintiff.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment commenced in the circuit court, for the recovery of a part of two lots of land in the City of Peoria, by the defendant in error against the plaintiffs in error.

The title of the plaintiff in the circuit court (Forsyth) originated in the claim of Antoine Lapance, an inhabitant within the purview of the Act of Congress, approved March 3d, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), entitled "An Act to confirm certain claims to lots in the Village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois," which was surveyed the first of September, 1840, by the surveyor of public lands, and for which a patent issued on the 1st day of February, 1847. The plaintiff produced from the Surveyor-General's office a certified copy of the survey, according to which the location of the claim was made. This testimony was objected to, but was received by the court, and we think properly. An original of the plan of survey is retained in the office of the Surveyor-General, and a copy given by that officer, who is required to keep it, upon general principles is admissible in evidence. United States v. Percheman, 7 Pet., 51.

It was agreed on the trial, that the defendant, Balance, and those under him, had been in possession of the premises more than ten years before the commencement of the suit. This possession was shown by the facts that he had cultivated a portion of the quarter section described in his patent for more than twenty years, and had resided on the quarter section for twelve years, and had paid taxes on this parcel of land as a part of the said quarter section, but not as a separate subdivision. The plaintiff had not paid any of the taxes during that period. The defendant, Ballance, made an entry of the quarter section, of which the lot in controversy forms a part, in 1837, and a patent issued to him in 1838, by which the United States gave and granted to him and his heirs, subject to the rights of any and all persons claiming under the Act of Congress of 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), before referred to.

The defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they believe from the evidence that said Ballance has had the actual possession by residence on the land in controversy for more than seven years, under the title he has exhibited, the plaintiff cannot recover; and that the words in the patent of Ballance of January 28, 1838, "subject, however, to the rights of all persons claiming under the Act of Congress of March 3d, 1823, entitled 'An Act to confirm certain claims to lots in the Village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois,' cannot operate so as to lessen the estate vested by the granting part of the deed."

The court declined to give these instructions, but charged the jury: "That to constitute an adverse possession against the French claimants by the possession of another portion of the quarter section by the defendant, as his tenant, entry and possession must have been under a claim of title inconsistent with that of the French claimants. If the entry and possession were subject to the rights of the claimants existing under the Acts of Congress, then such possession as stated could not be adverse, so long as that possession did not actually extend to the lot sued for."

The court further instructed the jury: "That when the defendant made application for a preemption, he stated it was made subservient to these French claims; and when the patent was issued by the government to him for this fractional quarter, it was made subject to these claims; therefore, the grant made by the government, as contained in the patent, did not necessarily operate as a conveyance of the entire quarter section to the grantee, but the clause inserted in the patent had the effect of excluding from the operation of the grant that portion of the quarter covered by these French claims; consequently, if at the time of the grant to Ballance there was anyone capable of taking lot 63, under the Acts of Congress of 1820 (3 Stat. at L., 605) and 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), then lot 63 was excluded by law, and by the terms of the grant, and was excepted (in other words, lot 63 was not granted to Ballance), and he took his title subject to such exclusion or exception."

We think that the circuit court erred in its interpretation of this patent. The patent recites that "full payment" had been made by the grantee for the southwest fractional quarter of section nine, in township eight north, of range eight east, containing 147 43-100ths acres, according to the official plat of the survey of said lands returned to the General Land Office by the Surveyor-General; which said tract has been purchased by Charles Ballance. It proceeds to declare that the United States had given and granted the said tract above described, to have and to hold the same to him and his heirs, subject, however, to the rights of any and all of the persons claiming, &c., &c. This saving clause was designed to exonerate the United States from any claim of the patentee, in the event of his ouster by persons claiming under the Acts referred to, and cannot be construed as separating any lots or parcels of land from the operation of the grant, or as affording another confirmation of titles existing under the Acts of Congress described in it. The possession of Ballance, under this patent, was adverse to that of the claimants under the Acts of 1820 (3 Stat at L., 605), and 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), in every case in which their claim was not specifically admitted by him. He was, in no sense, their tenant, nor did the saving in the Act create any fiduciary relation between him and any other person, so as to prevent the operation of the Statutes of Limitations. The patent does not impose upon him any duty to recognize these claims. It only requires him to accept the title of the United States with knowledge that such claims exist, and that they do not intend to deny or to destroy them, nor to defend his title against them.

The case of Bryan v. Forsyth, 19 How., 334, involved a controversy for a lot in the City of Peoria, similarly situated as that which forms the subject of this suit. The court, in that case, said that a patent with a saving like that we are considering was a fee simple title on its face, and is such a title as will afford protection to those claiming under it, either directly or having a title connected with it, with possession for seven years, as required by the Statute of Illinois.

The Act of Limitations of Illinois (Revised Statutes, 349, sec. 8) protects the claim of a person for lands, which has been possessed by actual residence thereon, having a connected title in law or equity, deducible of record from that State or the United States.

The title of the defendant, and the possession which he was admitted to have had, fulfilled the requisitions of the law, and the court should have given the instructions asked for, and erred in giving the instructions submitted to the jury.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

RICHARD GREGG AND CHARLES BALLANCE, Plffs. in Er.,

v

ROBERT FORSYTH.

(See S. C., 24 How., 179-188.)

American State Papers, admissible as evidence—copy deed, evidence—record of suit in partition, evidence—strangers cannot object to—construction of U. S. patent—adverse possession—extent of.

The American State Papers, published by order of the Senate, contain authentic papers which are admissible as testimony without further proof.

A copy of a deed from the public records, the original of which was not in the possession of the plaintiff, is evidence.

A record of a suit of partition under which the plaintiff derived his title as a purchaser should not be excluded because the sale had not been conducted with regularity, and the decree of sale had been rendered against infants, by default, and because it did not prescribe the manner of the sale.

Strangers to these proceedings cannot object to a result of which the parties to the decree have not complained.

A patent from the United States, containing a saving of the rights of any and all persons claiming under the Act of Congress of 3d March, 1823, did not by such saving, create any fiduciary relation between the claimants under such Act of Congress, and the patentee.

Possession under such patent is an adverse possession, and enables the patentee to have the benefit of the Illinois Act of Limitations for seven years.

The residence and possession of land for seven years by a tenant inures to the benefit of the landlord, so as to secure for him the protection of the Act.

This protection is not confined to the particular close upon which the claimant resides, but also extends to the entire parcel of land of which the legal possession has been maintained as a consequence of his actual possession and residence.

Argued Feb. 21, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

This was an action of ejectment, brought in the court below by the present defendant in error.

The trial below resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant brought the case to this court by writ of error.

The facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Charles Ballance, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Archibald Williams, for defendant in error:

Upon the question of the Statute of Limitations, the counsel relied upon the same authorities as in the case af Meehan v. Forsyth.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment for a lot of land in the City of Peoria, in the State of Illinois, commenced by the defendant in error against the plaintiffs in error.

The title of the plaintiff in the circuit court is shown by a patent of the United States in favor of the legal representatives of Antoine Lapance, who was an inhabitant or settler within the purview of the Act of Congress approved 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), entitled "An Act to confirm certain claims to lots in the Village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois," which patent bears date the 1st day of February, 1847, and is founded upon an official survey of the 1st of September, 1840. The plaintiff deraigned his title from the patentees. In tracing his title he read a document relevant to the cause from a volume of American State Papers, Public Lands, selected and edited under the authority of the Senate of the United States, by its secretary, and printed by Duff Green. This was objected to, and the question reserved by the defendants. The volumes of the American State Papers, three of which were published by Duff Green, under the revision of the Secretary of the Senate, by order of the Senate, contain authentic papers which are admissible as testimony without further proof. Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet., 25. The plaintiff read a copy of a deed from the public records, the original of which was not in the possession of the plaintiff, and which, upon inquiry of the persons with whom it had been deposited he was informed had been lost. This testimony authorized the admission of the copy as evidence. The deed in qustion had been regularly recorded. No suspicion attached to the instrument, and there was no reason to suppose that the better testimony was fraudulently withheld or could have been obtained by further inquiry. Minor v. Tillotson, 7 Pet., 99.

He also read in evidence a record of a suit of partition in the Circuit Court of Peoria County, which resulted in a decree of sale of the interests of a number of the parties, under which the plaintiff derived his title as a purchaser. The defendants objected to the record and deed of sale, because the sale had not been conducted with regularity, and the decree of sale had been rendered against infants, by default, and because it did not prescribe the manner of the sale. These, with other objections, were properly overruled by the circuit court. The defendants were strangers to these proceedings; and cannot be allowed to object to a result of which the parties to the decree have not complained.

The title of the defendants consisted of a patent from the United States to the defendant, Ballance, in January, 1838, for a fractional quarter section of land that includes the lot in controversy, and containing a saving of the rights of any and all persons claiming under the Act of Congress of 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), entitled "An Act to confirm certain claims to lots in the Village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois." He made proof that he had resided on this quarter since 1844, and had cultivated portions of it for a long time previously, and had before and since that date let other portions of it to tenants who occupied it under him, and that the particular lot in controversy had been occupied by one of these tenants, who had upon it a distillery. Among other instructions, the defendants requested the court to charge the jury, "that if they should believe from the evidence that said Ballance, being in possession under the title he has exhibited, leased the particular spot of ground in controversy to Almiron S. Cole more than seven years before the commencement of this suit, and that said Cole took possession thereof, and built a steam distillery and other fixtures thereon more than seven years before the commencement of this suit, and that said Cole held possession thereof, and occupied it as a place of business, until he sold said establishment to Sylvanus Thompson, and that Sylvanus Thompson and his son-in-law, Richard Gregg, the defendant, occupied the same until the death of Thompson, and that said Gregg occupied the same until the commencement of this suit, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this suit; that it was not necessary for this defense that either the said Cole, Thompson, or Gregg, should have had his dwelling house on the particular lot; it is sufficient if they lived in the vicinity and occupied the lot in controversy as their place of business." The circuit court refused to give these instructions, but charged the jury, "that if Ballance had his house on one part of the quarter, and his improvement extended over and included the lot in controversy, so as to be connected with his residence, and to form part thereof, or it was used in connection therewith, that would, within the meaning of the law, constitute actual residence. If Ballance built on one part of the quarter, and this lot was left vacant and unoccupied and unimproved, that would not, as to that lot, constitute an actual residence.

"If Ballance, his tenants, or those holding under him, actually resided on a lot adjoining lot 63 for seven years immediately preceding the commencement of this suit, and during all that time occupied lot 63 as a place of business, as part and parcel of the premises so resided on by them, that would constitute an actual residence within the meaning of the law as to this lot in controversy. It is proper for the jury to consider the circumstances of the subdivision of the land into lots and blocks by Ballance, in April, 1846, and whether a severance of the holding as to the particular lots and blocks so subdivided was thereby enacted. When ground is subdivided in that manner under our law, there can be no doubt that different lots and blocks may be so occupied as to constitute an actual residence in them all; but ordinarily, in case of subdivision, the construction of a house on a separate lot or block, and a residence therein, without any connection with adjoining or neighboring lots or blocks, does not constitute an actual residence as to the whole. It is for the jury to determine whether the facts and circumstances stated by the defendant, Ballance, or those claiming under him, made them actual residents of the lot in controversy, for seven years before the commencement of this suit. If they did, then the defendants are within the protection of the statute; otherwise not."

This court, in the cases of Bryan v. Forsyth, 19 How., 334, and again in Meehan v. Forsyth, 24 How., 175, at this term, have decided that the saving in the patent, under which the defendants claim, did not create any fiduciary relation between the claimants under the Act of Congress of 1823 referred to in it, and the patentee; and that the possession of Ballance, under his patent, was an adverse possession, unless another relation had been created by contract between them subsequently in the issuing of the patent. The present inquiry is, by what evidence must the actual residence on the land be supported to enable the patentee to have the benefit of the Act of Limitations for seven years? And it has been generally held, that the residence and possession of land for seven years by a tenant inures to the benefit of the landlord, so as to secure for him the protection of the Act; and that this protection is not confined to the particular close upon which the claimant resides, but also extends to the entire parcel of land of which the legal possession has been maintained as a consequence of his actual possession and residence.

Poage v. Chinn, 4 Dana (Ky.), 50.

The case of Williams v. Ballance, 23 Ill., 198, involved a controversy similar to that before the court.

The inquiry there was as to the validity of the residence and possession of Ballance to support his defense of the Statute of Limitations, it being the residence and possession established by the testimony in this suit. The Supreme Court of Illinois inquires whether Ballance occupied the premises described in the patent since 1844, by actual residence thereon. "The fact," says the court, "is that he did, but he did not reside upon every square yard of the premises, nor upon the particular lot. Nor was this necessary. He resided upon the legal subdivision described in the patent, the evidence of his title, and possessed and occupied it by himself and tenants. We think the laying out the land into town lots did not deprive him of the benefit of the Statute of Limitations of 1835, as to all the fractional quarter, except the particular lot upon which his house stood. He had a right to divide it into as many lots, or portions, or divisions, as he pleased, and put a separate tenant on each, and their occupation would be his possession: and the law only required him to possess and reside upon the premises claimed by his title papers, but the law does not say upon what portion he should reside, and, above all, it does not declare that he should reside upon every portion of it." The instructions of the circuit court are inconsistent with the law as thus laid down by the Supreme Court. In our opinion, the possession established by Ballance in this case was such as placed him under the protection of the statute.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

CHARLES BALLANCE, Appt.,

v.

ROBERT FORSYTH, LUCIENE DUMAIN AND ANTOINE R. BOUIS.

(See S. C., 24 How., 183–185.)

Chancery jurisdiction—objection to evidence, too late, after judgment—jurisdiction of Executive Department

It is not allowable to appeal from the judgment of the circuit court and Supreme Court to a court of chancery upon the relative merits of the legal titles involved in the controversy which they had adjudicated.

Objection to a survey should have been urged upon the trial at law; and it is too late after judgment upon the title to employ it to contest the issuing of the execution.

In the location and survey of claims arising under Acts of Congress like those of May, 1820, and March, 1823, the Executive Department of the Government has, in general, exclusive jurisdiction, and all questions arising upon their location and survey are administrative in their nature, and must be disposed of in the Land Office.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellant, for the purposes stated in the opinion of this court.

Judgment was for the defendant, and the plaintiff took this appeal.

Mr. Charles Ballance, for the appellant.

Mr. Archibald Williams, for the appellee.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill filed by the plaintiff, to enjoin the execution of a judgment in the circuit court, and upon which a writ of error had been taken to this court and affirmed.

The cause in this court was between the same parties, and the decision of the court is reported in 13 How., 19.

The plaintiff sets forth the claims of the respective parties, and insists that his is the superior right, and that he is entitled to have the property. But it is not allowable to him to appeal from the judgment of the circuit court and Supreme Court to a court of chancery upon the relative merit of the legal titles involved in the controversy they had adjudicated.

He further objects to the title of his adversaries. He insists, that in location of their claim under the Acts of May 15th, 1820 (3 Stat. at L., 605), and March 3d, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), referred to in the report of the case as the source of their title, there was an erroneous location and survey, and that a larger extent of ground was conceded to them than they were entitled to; that the plan of survey did not conform to the requirement of Congress, and that their proofs were not filed in time. If either of these objections is of sufficient force to invalidate the title and to render it void, it should have been urged upon the trial at law, and it is too late after judgment upon the title to employ it to contest the issuing of the execution. But if they are mere irregularities, the court of chancery has no jurisdiction to notice them. It is the settled doctrine of this court, that in the location and survey of claims arising under Acts of Congress like those of May 15th, 1820 (3 Stat. at L., 605), and March 3d, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), the Executive Department of the Government has, in general, excluive jurisdiction, and that all questions arising upon their location and survey are administrative in their nature, and must be disposed of in the Land Office.

The plaintiff was aware of the existence of these claims, and of the jurisdiction to which their adjustment was confided.

His patent contains an explicit reservation of the rights of any and all persons claiming under the Act of Congress of 3d March, 1823 (3 Stat. at L., 786), entitled, "An Act to confirm certain claims to lots in the Village of Peoria, in the State of Illinois." If he pretermitted his opposition to their location and survey before the General Land Office, he is concluded by his laches. If his opposition was made unsuccessfully, the decision of that department upon his objections is binding upon him.

Besides these objections, the plaintiff has introduced into the record a claim for the improvements upon the lots recovered by the judgment of the circuit court. It is not at all clear that the amendments to the bill, in which this claim is contained, were filed with leave, and form any part of the bill. It is not charged in them that the plaintiffs in the suits at law have opposed any obstruction to his removal of the improvements, and the entire statement of the bill concerning them is vague and unsatisfactory. We are unable to find in them any ground upon which the suspension of the execution of the judgment can be justified.

The decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

v.

JOSEPH L. PAPIN.

(See S. C., 24 How., 362-364.)

Equitable title, subject to sale under laws of Missouri—subsequent legal title, subject to mortgage of ancestor.

An imperfect Spanish title, claimed by virtue of a concession, was, by the laws of Missouri, subject to sale and assignment, and subject to be mortgaged for a debt.

Where heirs take lands by descent, with the incumbrance of a mortgage attached, they hold them in like manner that their ancestor held.

The subsequent grant of the lands to the heirs, by Act of Congress of 1836, carried the equities of the mortgagee, under a prior mortgage executed by their ancestor, with the legal title of which they took the benefit.

Argued Feb. 26, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri.

This action was commenced by Joseph L. Papin against Samuel Massey and a large number of other defendants, in the Circuit Court of Franklin County, Missouri, by a petition for partition of, and settlement of title to, a certain tract of land. This court rendered a decision determining the respective rights of the parties, and the defendants took the case to the Supreme Court of Missouri.

The judgment of the lower court was there affirmed, and the defendants brought the case to this court by writ of error.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. M. Blair, for plaintiffs in error:

The decision of the court below conflicts with the uniform construction of the law by this court.

See Strother v. Lucas, 6 Pet., 773; 12 Pet., 453; Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 How., 59; Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 370; Burgess v. Gray, 16 How., 62; Morehouse v. Phelps, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 294.

These cases decide,

1st. That such claims prior to confirmation have no standing in a court of law in equity.

2d. That the confirmation inures to the party by whom the claim is presented.

The facts, that Mackay, under whom Le Duc claimed, had presented the claim to the old Board and that the late Board was restricted to the consideration of claims which had been presented to the old Board, is immaterial. In all the cases, the contesting parties claimed under the same person, and the question was whether the confirmation inured to those who had the prior right under the original claimant or to those who presented the claim; and the court decided that those who presented the claim took the title and all others were barred.

Here Mackay's heirs and not his assignee or mortgagee, Le Duc, presented the claim, and Le Duc not only presented no claim himself, but testified for the heirs, thus absolutely precluding the idea that he had any interest in it, unless upon an assumption which would be dishonorable to him, both as a judge and as a man. Nor would such an assumption avail, for this court would not sanction the fraud which it supposes by giving his administrator the land.

Mr. S. T. Glover, for the defendant in error:

The bond made by Mackay was operative to convey an estate in equity to the land in question.

2 Sto. Eq., sec. 175; Newl., Cont., 307.

The confirmation was not to the heirs of James Mackay, but to Mackay or his legal representatives, and inured to Mackay's assignee, legal or equitable.

8 How., 338.

The deeds did not purpose to convey the land of Delassus. They conveyed only the interest of the grantors.

13 Mo., 380; 20 Mo., 81; 3 Wheat., 452.

If the title to fourteen-thirtieths of the land ever vested in Delassus, the defendants are concluded by plaintiffs' chain of title.

The foreclosure was regular, and if it were not, could not be objected to collaterally.

See 27 Mo., 445.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is brought here by writ of error to the Supreme Court of Missouri.

In 1806, James Mackay presented his claim before the Board of Commissioners, sitting at St. Louis, to have confirmed to him 30,000 arpents of land. In 1809, the Board rejected the claim.

In 1819, Mackay gave a bond in the nature of a mortgage on 14,000 arpents of the land to Delassus. Papin claimed as assignee of the mortgage, which he caused to be foreclosed, and purchased in the land, and took a title from the sheriff. Massey and others claim under Mackay's heirs.

The Supreme Court of Missouri decided that Papin, claiming under the mortgage of Mackay to Delassus, had a better title than Massey, who claimed under the heirs. And to reverse this decision, this writ of error is prosecuted.

The Board of Land Commissioners of 1809 refused to confirm the claim; they were acting on the title as between the United States and the claimant. The government had the power to grant the land in fee, regardless of the opinion of the Board. Accordingly, in 1831 (4 Stat. at L., 561), an Act of Congress was passed organizing another Board to examine this description of Spanish claims, which had been rejected by the old Board. The new Board, in October, 1832, recommended the claim for confirmation "to said James Mackay, or his legal representatives." James Mackay had died, and his heirs presented the claim the second time; and it is insisted that the confirmation to them by the Act of 1836 rejected the mortgage of Delassus, and that the heirs took the unincumbered legal title discharged of the mortgage.

An imperfect Spanish title, claimed by virtue of a concession, was, by the laws of Missouri, subject to sale and assignment and, of course, subject to be mortgaged for a debt. The heirs of Mackay took the lands by descent, with the incumbrance attached, and held them in like manner that their ancestor held. The grant of the lands to the heirs by the Act of 1836 carried the equities of the mortgagee with the legal title, of which he took the benefit—a consequence contemplated by the mortgage itself; and if the assignment had been in its form a legal conveyance of the lands, the grantee would have taken a legal title. And to this effect are the cases of Bissell v. Penrose, 8 How., 317, and Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 348.

It is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF KNOX COUNTY, Plff. in Er.,

v.

WILLIAM H. ASPINWALL, JOSEPH W. ALSOP, HENRY CHAUNCEY, CHAS. GOULD AND SAMUEL L. M. BARLOW.

(See S. C., 24 How., 376-386.)

Mandamus—what is—proper remedy for refusal of County Commissioners to levy tax to pay county bonds—circuit court has authority to issue—alternative writ, when not necessary.

The writ of mandamus is a remedy to compel any person, corporation, public functionary or tribunal, to perform some duty required by law, where the party seeking relief has no other legal remedy and the duty sought to be enforced is clear and indisputable.

Assuming that a general law of Indiana permits the public property of a county to be levied on and sold for the ordinary indebtedness of the county, yet, where bonds and coupons of the county were issued, under a special Act which provides that the commissioners of the county shall assess a tax to pay the interest on the coupons, if the commissioners either neglect or refuse to perform this plain duty, imposed on them by law, the only remedy which the injured party can have for such refusal or neglect is the writ of mandamus.

The circuit court had authority to issue the writ of mandamus in such case.

It is no reason for setting it aside, that a previous alternative writ had not issued, where the court gave them an opportunity to comply with the law, and their excuse for not doing so was equivalent to a refusal.

Argued Feb. 28, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This case was formerly before this court (62 U. S., 543), when the judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, in favor of the present defendants in error, in a suit brought by them upon certain coupons of bonds issued by the present plaintiff in error was affirmed. Execution was issued, and on the 8d day of June, 1859, the original plaintiffs, upon their motion, obtained an order that the execution levy should be set aside. A few days before, it had been ordered that a writ of mandamus in the alternative should be forthwith issued commanding the present plaintiff in error, to levy a tax for the payment of the judgment or to show cause, &c. This alternative mandamus was quashed. On the 21st of June, the present defendants in error moved for a peremptory mandamus, to require the plaintiff in error to levy the tax; and the mandamus was awarded against the resistance of the plaintiff in error, who brought this writ in error.

Mr. A. G. Porter, for the plaintiffs in error:

A mandamus was not proper under the circumstances of this case, for the following reasons:

I. For want of jurisdiction.

If the Circuit Court of the United States has power to issue a writ of mandamus to enforce the payment of a judgment at law, it derives that power from the provisions of the 14th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789.

"That all the before mentioned courts of the NOTE.—Mandamus, when will issue. See note to McCluny v. Silliman, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.), 369.

United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law."

The "exercise of jurisdiction" in any sense in which the writ of mandamus could be called in aid of it, was complete in this case upon the rendition of final judgment. To enforce the payment of that judgment by means of this extraordinary writ, would not be "agreeable to the principles and usages of law." This state of facts simply presents the ordinary case of a party holding a debt of record which cannot be realized by process of execution. And I deny that it follows that a writ of mandamus, in such a case, is in any just sense "necessary for the exercise of jurisdiction," or "agreeable to the principles and usages of law."

The duty, imposed by law on the Board of Commissioners of the County of Knox, now sought to be enforced, was a duty to levy a tax for the payment of interest coupons, not judgments of a court of law.

The holders of those coupons had a right to go into the state courts and enforce the levying of the tax for their payment by mandamus; but they elected a different remedy.

They chose to sue in the ordinary form in the circuit court, merged their coupons in a judgment at law, and must rely, for the collection of that judgment, on the ordinary and usual writs in use for that purpose.

If, upon the failure of these, they may resort to the writ of mandamus to compel the payment of their judgments, on the ground that such a writ is necessary to the exercise of jurisdiction, why may it not be used in every case to compel the payment of judgments which cannot be collected in the usual way? The words of the statute, then, instead of being understood as words restraining the power to issue the writ in aid and furtherance of ordinary remedies only, will become a grant to the circuit courts, of the power to employ a new and formidable process, in all cases where the common writs of execution fail.

The defendants in error rely on the case of Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat, 50, to show that the words "necessary for the exercise of jurisdiction" apply to proceedings after judgment as well as before.

This is inapplicable to the case at bar.

The learned counsel for the defendants says in his brief, after quoting from the opinion of the court in Wayman v. Southard: "all that is said above, about writs of execution must be equally applicable to writs of mandamus, when they are necessary to carry a judgment into effect." Granting this, it must appear that in the case at bar a writ of mandamus was necessary to carry the judgment into effect. That is the touchstone proposed by the counsel for the defendant and tried by that very test. The case is, in my opinion, against them.

In this case no obstruction is put in the way of the ordinary writs which, "agreeably to the principles and usages of law," may issue upon judgments at law. All the remedies which any such judgment ordinarily supplies are open to the parties in this case. But they are said to be inadequate; yet it does not appear that ample property could not be found whereon to levy. The parties then propose to seek another remedy—not a means of carrying into effect the judgment already obtained, but a separate and independent proceeding in which they must begin de novo, and conduct a new suit through the several stages of pleadings, hearing and final judgment. The judgment already obtained is not the basis of this new proceeding. The proceedings in mandamus constitute a separate suit in general.

6 Bac. Abr., 453.

Nor, for another reason, had the circuit court jurisdiction to issue the mandamus. That court had no right to interfere with the taxing power of the State of Indiana.

In 7 Humph., 143, it was held that even the domestic tribunals had no such right. It is a part of the political power of the government, according to the opinion of that learned court, with which the judiciary cannot interfere.

II. A mandamus will not be allowed, where there is another adequate and specific legal remedy.

4 Barn. & Ad., 360; 6 Bac. Abr., 431.

In the present case there are two remedies of that character, viz.:

1. By execution. By the law of Indiana a judgment against a county is a lien upon the public property thereof, which may be sold upon execution to satisfy the judgment.

1 R. S., 1852, p. 229, sec. 8.

2. There was a specific and complete remedy by appeal. Where the Board of Commissioners refuse to perform any duty, an appeal may be taken from such refusal, to the circuit court of the county; and the latter is required upon the fact of such duty being ascertained, to perform such duty or to enforce the performance of it by the Board of Commissioners.

1 R. S., pp. 228, 229, sec. 31; see, also, 13 Pet., 279, 404; 6 Bac. Abr., 431, 433; 2 Johns. Cas. 72.

III. The mandamus was not a proper remedy, because by the Act of 1849 the Board was only required to levy a tax to pay the interest as such.

IV. The mandamus in the present case directs that the tax shall be levied forthwith. The Act of 1849 provides that it shall be levied at the time of making the annual levy of county taxes. Under the general Statute of Indiana, 1 R. S., 105, providing for the assessment and collection of taxes, any departure from the precise course of proceeding required by the statute renders sales for non-payment, void.

V. The peremptory mandamus ought not to have been issued because it was not preceded by an alternative writ.

See 6 Bac. Abr., 420, 450, 452; 1 Chit. Pr., 808; 12 Pick. Statutes, 189.

Messrs. S. F. Vinton and Samuel Judah, for defendants in error:

Two inquiries arise in this case:

Does the Constitution confer on Congress the power to authorize the circuit courts to issue the writ of mandamus when necessary for the satisfaction of their judgment?

2. If it does, has Congress conferred on them that authority?

The last clause of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution confers on Congress authority to make all laws which may be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested in the government, or any department or officer thereof, the 11th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, by virtue of this clause, confers upon the circuit courts of the United States, jurisdiction in certain cases where the suit is between a citizen of the State where the suit is brought and a citizen of another State. The circuit court then has conferred upon it by this law, jurisdiction over the controversy between these parties, and that same 8th clause of the Constitution empowers Congress to make all laws which may be necessary and proper for carrying that jurisdiction into full execution and effect. Consequently, if a writ of mandamus be necessary and proper, the circuit court is authorized to issue the writ.

See Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat., 50.

Assuming, then, that Congress has power to make laws for carrying into execution all judgments which the Judicial Department has power to pronounce, we proceed to the second question.

The Judiciary Act of 1789, after having conferred on the several courts of the United States their respective jurisdictions over the subjects subjected to their cognizance and upon which they may pronounce judgment, proceeds, in the 14th section, to provide for carrying them into full and complete execution.

Under this section, the power of the circuit courts and of all other courts of the United States is limited to the issue of writs for the sole purpose or object of exercising their jurisdictions; but for the accomplishment of that object and purpose, the power is given to issue "all writs," whether of mandamus, or any other writ not specially provided for by the statute, which may be necessary and are agreeable to the principles and usages of law.

A construction was given to this 14th section, in respect to the extent of the power conferred by it on the circuit courts to issue writs in the above mentioned case of Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat., 50.

In that case it was insisted by one of the parties that the power conferred by that section was limited to process anterior to the rendition of the judgment.

The court say there is no reason for supposing that the general term "writs" is restrained by the words "which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions to writs of original process," or to process anterior to judgments. The jurisdiction of a court is not exhausted by the rendition of its judgment, but continues until that judgment shall be satisfied. It is, therefore, no unreasonable extension of the words of the Act to suppose an execution necessary for the exercise of jurisdiction."

All that is said above about writs of execution must be equally applicable to writs of mandamus, when they are necessary to carry a judgment into effect.

This decision establishes two propositions, which have an important bearing on the case now before the court—

1st. That the jurisdiction of the circuit court over a case continues until its judgment is satisfied.

2d. That it has power to issue such writs, both before and after judgment, as may be necessary for the exercise of its jurisdiction, and are agreeable to the principles and usages of law.

From these propositions it would seem to follow, as a necessary corollary, that if in any case the writ of mandamus was necessary for the satisfaction of the judgment, the case itself was one where, by the principles and usages of law, the writ would issue, then the 14th section confers on the court power to issue it for that special purpose.

The question of the extent of power given by the circuit courts by this 14th section to issue writs of mandamus first came up for decision in this court in the case of McIntire v. Wood, 7 Cranch, 504.

That was an application to the Circuit Court of the United States in Ohio for a writ of mandamus to compel a register of a land office to issue to the plaintiff a final certificate of purchase of a tract of land. The court laid down the rule that the power of the circuit courts to issue the writs is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction. Now, in the present case, the right of the defendants in error, who are citizens of New York, to sue in the circuit court, arises under the Constitution and the 11th section of the Judiciary Act, and the inference from what is said by the court in the above case is, that the 14th section covers the whole ground of the 11th section and no more, and provides for carrying into execution all the jurisdiction given by the latter section. If this be so, it is plain that the circuit court has jurisdiction and power to issue the writ of mandamus in this case.

See, also, Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet., 615; Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 188; 12 Pet., 621; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316.

The common law writ of mandamus has always been recognized in the Practice Acts of the State of Indiana, and such are substantially the provisions in the revised Statutes of 1843, p. 539.

See, also, Revision of 1852, 2d vol., pp. 197, 198.

We contend, therefore, that by the Act of Congress, by the common law, and by the practice of the courts of Indiana, the Circuit Court for the Indiana District had power to issue a mandamus in this case, because necessary for the exercise of its jurisdiction, to enforce its jurisdiction by the satisfaction of its judgment.

There is no novelty in the fact of this case—a judgment by a court of competent jurisdiction without power of enforcing satisfaction by the ordinary writs of execution. Nor is there any novelty in applying the mandamus as a remedy in the place of the ordinary execution in such case. This thing has been done under precisely such circumstances.

Reg. v. St. Catharine's Dock Co., 1 Nev. & Man., 121; 4 Barn. & Ad., 360; Wormwell v. Hailstone, 6 Bing., 676.

So, if a corporation neglects to raise, by the exercise of its legal power, the assets to satisfy a judgment, the court would compel them by mandamus.

Reg. v. Victoria Park Co., 4 Perry & D., 639; 1 Q. B., 292; King v. Payn, 6 Adol. & E., 404; 1 N. P., 524; King v. London, 5 Barn. & Ad., 233, 237.

So, a peremptory writ may be issued in the first instance as well as in England.

Queen v. Mayor of Rye, 9 Adol. & E., 676; Reg. v. Fox, 2 A. & E. (N. S.), 246.

As under the present Indiana Statute, 2 Rev. Stat., 52, 198, sec. 741.

So in a clear case in Kentucky, 11 B. Mon., 143.

In this case there was no question to examine. The case had been tried and judgment rendered, and the rights of the parties all settled. The duty of the commissioners was declared by law. They had no discretion. There was nothing left to try.

Ang. & Ames, Corp., sec. 729, notes, p. 809.

Mandamus in Indiana is a civil remedy. The use of the name of the King or State is only nominal.

Brown v. O'Brien, 2 Ind., 481.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in error were defendants in a suit by Aspinwall and others, in which a judgment was recovered for interest coupons on bonds issued by the Corporation. The cause was removed to this court, and may be found reported in 21 How., 539. The judgment of the circuit court was affirmed, and the record remitted.

In order to enforce the execution of this judgment, the plaintiffs moved for a mandamus to the commissioners, to compel them to levy a tax to satisfy the judgment. The record shows that the Board of Commissioners appeared in the circuit court and resisted the motion, on several grounds but chiefly that the court had no jurisdiction to issue a mandamus in this case.

The Act of Assembly of Indiana, which authorized the issue of the bonds and coupons which were the subject of the litigation, may be found in the former report of the case. 21 How., 542.

It appears that by the 8d section of this Act it is made the duty of the commissioners, for the purpose of paying the interest due on the bonds, "at the levying of the county taxes for each year, to assess a special tax, sufficient to realize the amount of the interest to be paid for the year."

This the commissioners had not done, and refused to do so, on notice and request of the defendants in error.

Now, it is not alleged nor pretended but that, if this judgment had been obtained against the Corporation in a state court, the remedy now sought could have been obtained; for it must be admitted, that, according to the well established principles and usage of the common law, the writ of mandamus is a remedy to compel any person, corporation, public functionary, or tribunal, to perform some duty required by law, where the party seeking relief has no other legal remedy, and the duty sought to be enforced is clear and indisputable. That this case comes completely within the category is too clear for argument; for, even assuming that a general law of Indiana permits the public property of the county to be levied on and sold for the ordinary indebtedness of the county, it is clear that the bonds and coupons issued under the special provisions of this Act were not left to this uncertain and insufficient remedy. The Act provides a special fund for the payment of these obligations, on the faith and credit of which they were negotiated. It is especially incorporated into the contract, that this Corporation shall assess a tax for the special purpose of paying the interest on these coupons. If the Commissioners either neglect or refuse to perform this plain duty, imposed on them by law, the only remedy which the injured party can have for such refusal or neglect is the writ of mandamus.

Why should not the Circuit Court of the United States be competent to give to suitors this only adequate remedy?

By the common law, the writ of mandamus is granted by the King's Bench, in virtue of its prerogative and supervisory power over inferior courts. The courts of the United States cannot issue this writ by virtue of any supervisory power at common law over inferior state tribunals. They can derive it only from the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The jurisdiction of these courts is, by the Constitution, extended to "controversies between citizens of different states." Congress has authority to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying this jurisdiction into effect. The jurisdiction of the court to give the judgment in this case is not disputed; nor can it be denied, that by the Constitution, Congress has the power to make laws necessary for carrying into execution all its judgments. See Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat., 22. Has it done so?

By the 14th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789 (1 St. at L., 73), it is enacted "that courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the principles of the common law."

Now, the "jurisdiction" is not disputed, and it is "necessary" to an efficient exercise of this jurisdiction, that the court have authority to compel the exercise of a ministerial duty by the Corporation, which by law they are bound to perform, and by the performance of which alone the plaintiff's remedy can be effected. The fund to pay this judgment, by the face of the contract, is a special tax laid and to be collected by defendants. They refuse to perform a plain duty. There is no other writ which can afford the party a remedy, which the court is bound to afford, if within its constitutional powers, except that afforded by this writ of mandamus.

It is "agreeable to the principles of the common law," and, consequently, within the category as defined by the statute.

A court of equity is sometimes resorted to as ancillary to a court of law in obtaining satisfaction of its judgments. But no court, having proper jurisdiction and process to compel the satisfaction of its own judgments, can be justified in turning its suitors over to another tribunal to obtain justice. It is no objection, therefore, to the use of this remedy, that the party might possibly obtain another by commencing a new litigation in another tribunal.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the circuit court had authority to issue the writ of mandamus in this case.

It is no reason for setting it aside, that a previous alternative writ had not issued. The notices served on the Commissioners gave them every opportunity of defense that could have been obtained by an alternative mandamus. There was no dispute about facts which could affect the decision. The court gave them an opportunity to comply with the demand of the plaintiffs; their excuse for not doing so was, palpably, "a mere colorable adjournment or procrastination of the performances of the act, for the purpose of delay." It is equivalent to a refusal. Having refused to perform the duty which the law imposed upon them on the proper day, without even the pretense of a reason for such conduct, the peremptory mandamus was very properly awarded, commanding the duty to be performed "forthwith."

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

Jurisdiction to review state judgments—question decided must appear in pleadings, or exceptions, or by certificate—that state Act was in conflict with state Constitution, furnishes no ground of review.

In order to give jurisdiction under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act, it must appear from the record of the case, either in express terms or by clear and necessary intendment, that one of the questions which this court has jurisdiction to re-examine and decide was actually decided by a state court.

This may be ascertained either from the pleadings, or by bill of exceptions, or by a certificate of the court. But the assignment of errors, or the published opinion of the court, cannot be reviewed for that purpose.

Where it does not appear that there was any complaint tha ta state Act was contrary to the Constitution of the United States, and the only question presented to the court, and decided by them, was, whether the provisions of the state Act were consistent with those of the new state Constitution, this court has no jurisdiction.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio.

This action was commenced by the present plaintiffs in error, in the Court of Common Pleas of Franklin County, Ohio, praying damages for the breach of a certain contract.

Judgment was for the plaintiffs.

The Attorney-General of the State brought error to the Supreme Court, and the judgment of the court of common pleas was reversed.

State v. Medberry, 7 Ohio St., 522.

The present writ of error is brought to review this judgment of reversal.

A motion was made to dismiss the writ of error, as stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. P. Wolcott, Atty-Gen. of Ohio, and E. M. Stanton, for the defendants in error.

Mr. G. E. Pugh, for the plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error moves to dismiss this case for want of jurisdiction, because the record does not present any question which this court has authority to re-examine, by the 25th section of the Judiciary Act (1 Stat. at L., 73).

The construction of this section has been so often before this court, and the cases are so numerous which define and establish the conditions under which we assume jurisdiction, that it would be tedious to notice them, and superfluous to repeat or comment upon them.

For the purposes of this case, it is only necessary to say, "that it must appear from the record of the case, either in express terms or by clear and necessary intendment, that one of the questions which this court has jurisdiction to re-examine and decide was actually decided by the state court."

This may be ascertained either from the pleadings, or by bill of exceptions, or by a certificate of the court. But the assignment of errors, or the published opinion of the court, cannot be reviewed for that purpose. They make no part of the record proper, to which alone we can resort to ascertain the subject-matter of the litigation.

In this case, the declaration counts upon a contract made by the plaintiffs with the Board of Public Works of Ohio, in 1855, for keeping a portion of the canal in repair for five years. It avers performance and readiness to perform, and that those officers, acting under and by authority of an Act of Assembly of Ohio, entitled "An Act making appropriations for the public works for 1857," "in violation and in open disregard of such contract, did wrongfully hinder and prevent," &c.

The Supreme Court gave judgment for the defendants on a demurrer to this declaration.

It is not averred in the pleadings, or anywhere on the record, that this or any statute of Ohio was void, because it impaired the obligation of contracts.

The only legitimate inference to be drawn from the face of this record is, that the Supreme Court decided that the Board of Public Works had no authority to make such contract. If we go out of the record to search for the reasons, we find no evidence that there was any complaint that the Act of 1857 was contrary to the Constitution of the United States, or that the court gave their judgment for the defendant on account of any of its provisions. It is not referred to, except for the purpose of showing that the plaintiffs might bring their suit against the State for damages. The contract declared on was made by virtue of an Act of Assembly of 1845. In 1851, the people of Ohio formed a new Constitution. This contract was made in 1855.

The only question presented to the court, and decided by them, was, whether the provisions of the Act of 1845 were consistent with those of the new Constitution.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of U. S. Supreme Court to declare state law void, as in conflict with state constitution; to revise decrees of state courts as to construction of state laws. Power of state courts to construe their own statutes. See note to Jackson v. Lamphire, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.), 280.

This is a question of which this court has no authority to take judicial cognizance.

The writ of error is, therefore, dismissed.

BUSHROD W. FOLEY.

(See S. C., 24 How., 415-420.)

Where record does not show a question decided by state court, reviewable here, case will be dismissed—whether state Act was within authority of Legislature, not reviewable.

Where the record does not show that any question arose or was decided by the state court, which this court has authority to re-examine by virtue of the 25th section of the Judiciary Act, the writ of error must be dismissed.

Where the only question in the case was, whether an Act of Assembly of Kentucky, authorizing an executor to sell the real estate of minors, was a valid exercise of power by the Legislature, this court has no authority to re-examine the case.

Argued Feb. 25, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals for the State of Kentucky.

This was a petition filed by the plaintiffs in error in the Circuit Court of Kenton County, Kentucky.

The plaintiffs connected themselves with a grant from the Commonwealth of Virginia to James Welsh. The defendant claimed under the same title, but sought to prove title in himself through the Acts of the Legislature of Kentucky, of Nov. 10 and Nov. 26, 1823.

The jury, under the direction of the court, found a verdict for the defendant. The Kentucky Court of Appeals affirmed this judgment, and the original plaintiffs brought the case to this court by writ of error.

A motion was now made to dismiss the case for want of jurisdiction, as stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. James Harlan, D. Mooar, and James O'Hara, for defendants in error.

Mr. N. Headington, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The record of this case does not show that any question arose or was decided by the state court, which this court has authority to re-examine by virtue of the 25th section of the Judiciary Act.

Without entering into a tedious analysis of the case, it is sufficient to state, that the chief or only question in it was, whether an Act of Assembly of Kentucky, authorizing an executor to sell the real estate of minors, was a valid exercise of power by the Legislature.

The counsel for plaintiff objected to the admission of the deed made in pursuance of such authority, "because said Act and supplement were unconstitutional and void."

This objection was very properly construed by the court as having reference to the validity of the Act of the Legislature of Kentucky, not as contrary to any provision of the Constitution of the United States, but as raising the question whether the Legislature had a power under the constitution of that State, by general or special enactment, to authorize the sale of real estate of infants. The court decided that it had such power; and if it had, it is abundantly evident that there is no article nor clause in the Constitution of the United States which could interfere with it.

Let the writ of error be dismissed.

Order affirming refusal of injunction, not final judgment.

Where the circuit court of a State refused an injunction, and from the order of refusal the plaintiff appealed to the state court of appeals, and that court affirmed the order of the circuit court and remanded the case, and from this decision of the state court of appeals, the case is here upon writ of error, the appeal to this court cannot be sustained.

The case is still pending, and there is no final decree; nor is there in the plaintiff's bill any right claimed under the laws of the United States; on the contrary, the claim is against the rights asserted by the United States, and exercised by the agents of the government under its authority.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Maryland.

This was a bill in equity filed by the present plaintiff in error, in the Circuit Court for Montgomery County, Maryland, for certain alleged trespasses, and asking injunction against further trespasses.

The circuit court refused the injunction, as did also the Court of Appeals of Maryland, on appeal.

From the last decision the case was brought to this court on writ of error.

This was a motion to dismiss, under the circumstances stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. S. Tyson and C. F. Mayer, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Atty-Gen. Stanton, for defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to revise the decree of the Court of Appeals in Maryland, affirming a decree of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County, in that state.

This case, as it appears on the record, is this:

The bill in equity of the plaintiff in error, filed in the Circuit Court for Montgomery County, in Maryland, alleges that the defendants have trespassed on land of his in Montgomery County, in Maryland, digging it up and erecting abutments and structures for an aqueduct, and so breaking up and dividing the land as to render it incapable of tillage, and inflicting great and irreparable damage upon the complainant; and that the defendants meditate, for completing the aqueduct, still further damage, of the same aggravated character, to the land, by digging to great depths of twelve to fifteen feet, and at other points raising embankments and building walls, and in conducting through the land a large and constant stream of water, for the sole use of the aqueduct.

NOTE.—What is "final decree" or judgment of state or other court, from which appeal lies. See note to Gibbons v. Ogden, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.), 448.

The bill further states that the defendants claim to thus act under authority of the Executive of the United States, unsanctioned, however, as the bill alleges, by any action of Congress, and for supplying water to the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and under color of an Act of the Legislature of Maryland (session of the year 1853, chapter 179), purporting to authorize the United States "to purchase land in Maryland for so supplying water, through construction of dams, reservoirs, buildings, and other works," and in case of sale not being agreed by owners, to allow the United States to adversely appropriate to herself the land, by condemnation and on valuation, to be effected in manner as provided in case of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company's occasions for land and materials for that company's works.

The bill also avers that no such purchase was authorized by Congress, nor any attempt ever made on behalf of the United States toward an agreement for the purchase of complainant's lands, and insists that these pretented sanctions of the Act of the Maryland Legislature, and of the United States' Executive, are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and of Maryland, and that the land is thus intruded on for no public purpose of Maryland, nor for any connected with the United States as such, and of a federal character, nor even so declared in the Maryland Act of Legislature, or in any action of Congress. And the bill prays injunction, to prevent the trespass and encroachments complained of from being carried on. The circuit court refused the injunction, and from the order of refusal, the plaintiff appealed to the court of appeals. That court affirmed the order of the circuit court and remanded the case.

From this decision of the court of appeals, the case is here upon writ of error.

It is evident, from this statement, that the appeal to this court cannot be sustained. In the first place, the decree of the court of appeals merely affirms the decree of the inferior court, and remands the case. It is, therefore, still pending, and there is no final decree. And although the State of Maryland in her own courts may authorize an appeal from such an interlocutory order, it cannot affect the jurisdiction of this, which is governed by the Act of Congress, and that Act authorizes the writ of error only in cases where there is a final decree or judgment.

In the second place, we do not see in the plaintiff's bill any right claimed under the laws of the United States. On the contrary, the claim is against the rights asserted by the United States, and exercised by the agents of the government under its authority; and even if there had been a final decree by the dismissal of the bill, in addition to the refusal of the injunction, we perceive no ground upon which the writ of error could be maintained under the 25th section of the Act of 1789. 1 Stat. at L., 73.

It is, therefore, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Recovery of land—legal title necessary.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas.

This was an action of trespass brought by the present plaintiff in error, in the court below, to try title to a tract of land.

Defendants pleaded—

1st. The general issue.

2d. Possession under title and color of title.

3d. The plaintiff's title consisted in a location which had been abandoned.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

The point on which the case turned appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. G. Hale and C. Robinson, for the plaintiff in error.

Mr. George W. Paschal, for defendants in error:

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit by the plaintiff to recover a parcel of land in the County of Guadaloupe, in the State of Texas. The title of the plaintiff consists of certain entries of head rights embracing the land in dispute. One of these is in these words: Joseph A. Sheirburn, assignee of Victor Ed. Gaillon, enters one third of a league of land, situated on a noted island, about six miles above the Town of Walnut Springs, and extending on the main land on the northeast side of the Guadaloupe River for quantity; the said location is also a short distance below a very elevated mound on the west of the river. Certificate 222. Harrisburg County, October 16, 1838. In January, 1853, the plaintiff applied to the District Surveyor of Guadaloupe County for the survey of this and other land embraced in the entries, who declined to execute the surveys, but it is admitted that the entries cover the land in controversy. The defendants relied upon a Mexican grant, issued in 1831, in favor of Antonio Maria Esnourizar, for eleven leagues of land, and which embraces the same land. The district court pronounced this grant to be a valid appropriation of the land described in it, and the plaintiff alleges that there is error in that decision.

By a Statute of Texas, "all certificates for head rights, land scrip, bounty warrants, or any other evidence of right to land recognized by the laws of this government, which have been located or surveyed, shall be deemed and held as sufficient title to authorize the maintenance of actions of ejectment, trespass, or any other legal remedy given by law." Hart. Dig., art. 3,230. The testimony adduced by the plaintiff, it would seem, would have authorized a suit in the courts of Texas, where rights, whether legal or equitable, are disposed of in the same suit. But this court has established, after full consideration, that in the courts of the United States suits for the recovery of land can only be maintained upon a legal title. It is not contended in this case that the plaintiff has more than an incipient equity. This question was so fully considered by the court in Fenn v. Holme, 21 How., 481, that a further discussion is unnecessary.

State laws govern as to title and transfer of real property—this court will follow state rule of property, even if contrary to its own opinions.

The cases of Williamson v. Berry, 49 U.S. (8How.), 495, 549; Williamson v. The Irish Presbyterian Church, 49 U. S. (8 How.), 565; and Williamson v. Ball, 49 U. S. (8 How.), 566, examined.

Where the subject of the dispute is real property situated within a State, her laws exclusively govern in respect to the rights of the parties, the modes of the transfer, and the solemnities which should accompany them.

The power to establish federal courts, and to endow them with a jurisdiction, affords no pretext for abrogating any established law of property, or for removing any obligation of her citizens to submit to the rule of the local sovereign.

Where a contrary opinion to that expressed by this court has prevailed in the courts of a State, and become a rule of property there, this court, without re-examining their own opinion, or making any attempt to account for or to reconcile the difference, will apply the rule adopted in such State, to the determination of controversies existing there.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

This was an action of ejectment brought by the present defendants in error in the court below, to test the validity of a deed from Thomas B. Clark to Peter McIntyre, made under and by virtue of certain Acts of the Legislature, and orders of the Court of Chancery of the State of New York.

Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs and the defendants brought the case to this court.

Mr. David Dudley Field, for defendant in error:

It is immaterial whether or not the state courts of New York persist in the adherence to the erroneous decision of Cochran v. Van Surlay, 20 Wend., 365.

If they are not willing to re-examine the grounds of that decision, that is no reason why this court should recede.

The decision here was made after great deliberation with the decision of Cochran v. Van Surlay before it. Property has since been bought and sold on the faith of the opinion here delivered, and the judgment by this court pronounced. Every principle by which our law of precedents is justified, tends against the re-opening of the case in this court.

If the rules of adherence to a decision once delivered is deliberately relaxed in this august tribunal, where shall we find stability in our judicial institutions?

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment in the circuit court, for certain lots of land in the City of New York, by the defendants in error, against the plaintiff in error. The plaintiff in the circuit court claimed, under a devise in the will of Mary Clarke, who died in the year 1802, by which she gave to trustees therein named that part of the farm upon which she resided, and which she owned, called Chelsea, in trust, to receive the rents, issues and profits thereof, and to pay the same to Thomas B. Clarke, during his natural life; and from and after the death of said Thomas B. Clarke, in further trust to convey the same to the lawful issue of the said Thomas B. Clarke, living at his death, in fee. The property in dispute is a portion of this estate. Thomas B. Clarke died in 1826, and the plaintiffs have the title to this property of his three children, who were living at his death.

The defendant's title is deduced from Thomas B. Clarke, who disposed of the property under the authority of certain acts of the Legislature of the State of New York, and orders of the court of chancery of that State.

In March, 1814, T. B. Clarke represented to the Legislature the existence and terms of the will of Mary Clarke, and that the trustees named in the will were consenting to such Acts of the Legislature of the State as it might deem proper to pass for his relief, and also requested, with their sanction, that another trustee might be substituted in their stead; and further represented, that the estate could not be so improved and made productive as to fulfill the object of the testator; that he had married and had a family of five children, and that some other disposition of the estate was essential for the support of his family and himself. The Legislature thereupon passed an Act for the discharge of the trustees named in the will, and empowered the court of chancery to appoint one or more trustees to execute and perform the trusts and duties specified in the will and in their act. The Act authorized the subdivision of a special portion of the farm into city lots, and their sale within a convenient time thereafter, with the assent of said Clarke, and for the investment and application of the income of the proceeds of the sales.

In March, 1815, upon the petition of Thomas B. Clarke, representing that he could not procure a suitable person to execute the trusts of the Act of 1814, and that no other person was interested in the property besides his family and himself, an Act was passed authorizing Clarke to become trustee, in like manner and with like effect that trustees duly appointed under the said Act might have done, and that the said Clarke might apply the whole of the interest and income of the said property to the maintenance and support of his family, and the education of his children; and that no sale should be made until the said Clarke should have procured the assent of the Chancellor of the State to such sale, who shall, at the time of his giving such assent, direct the mode in which the proceeds of sale, or so much thereof as he shall think proper, shall be vested in the said Thomas B. Clarke, as trustee; and further, that it shall be the duty of the said Clarke to render an account annually, to the Chancellor, of the principal, the interest being applicable as the said Clarke might think proper, for his own use and benefit, and the maintenance and support of his children.

After the passing of this Act, the Chancellor, upon the petition of Clarke, made sundry orders for the sale of the lots and the appropriation of the proceeds of sale, under the directions of a master of the court. In one of these orders the Chancellor directed that so much of the net proceeds to arise from the sales be applied, under the direction of one of the masters of the court, for the payment and discharge of the debts now owing by the petitioner, and to be contracted for the necessary purposes of his family.

In March, 1816, the Legislature of New York further enacted that the said Clarke, under the order heretofore granted by the Chancellor, or under any subsequent order, might mortgage or sell the premises which the Chancellor permitted or might permit him to sell as trustee under the will of Mary Clarke, and to apply the money so raised by mortgage or sale to the purposes required or to be required by the Chancellor, under the Acts theretofore passed for his relief.

In March, 1817, the Chancellor authorized Clarke to sell the southern half of the property included in the devise, and to convey any part or parts of the said estate in payment and satisfaction of any debt due and owing from the said Clarke, upon a valuation to be agreed on between him and his respective creditors: provided, nevertheless, that every sale and mortgage, and conveyance in satisfaction, that may be made by the said Thomas Clarke, shall be approved by one of the masters of the court, and that a certificate of approval be indorsed upon every deed or mortgage to be made in the premises; and that the said Clarke be authorized to receive and take the moneys arising from the premises, and apply the same to the payment of his debts; and invest the surplus in such manner as he may deem proper, to yield an income for the maintenance and support of his family.

In October, 1818, Thomas B. Clarke executed a deed to Peter McIntyre for a number of lots, including those described in the declaration, in which he recited that he had been empowered to sell, or mortgage, or convey, in satisfaction of any debt due from him to any person, the property devised by Mary Clarke, as aforesaid; and that Clarke was indebted to McIntyre in a large sum of money; and that in consideration of the premises, and of $3,750, the receipt of which he acknowledged, he granted, &c., &c., in fee simple to McIntyre.

The master in chancery indorsed upon the deed an approval, that "having examined the within the deed, he approved it in manner and form," and contemporaneously conveyed to McIntyre an interest he held as trustee for Clarke.

Upon the trial, it appeared that the sale was made upon the consideration of some debts of Clarke, that McIntyre assumed to pay; of occasional advances of small sums of money to Clarke, and payment of bills, in which the children were interested; of some two or three years' board of Clarke and a portion of his children, and two notes for about fifteen or sixteen hundred dollars. It was shown that others of the children were neglected by Clarke, and subsisted through the bounty of friends and relatives.

The defendant connects himself with the title of McIntyre as a purchaser at a sale of the property, under a decree of foreclosure of his mortgage, in 1844, by the court of chancery in New York.

The plaintiffs impugn the proceeding under which the conveyance to McIntyre was made, and the sufficiency of the consideration to support the conveyance. They contend that every material question in this case is res judicata in this court, having been adjudged in the cases of Williamson v. Berry, 8 How., 495, 549; Williams v. The Irish Presbyterian Church, 8 How., 565; and Williamson v. Ball, 8 How., 566. They insist that it is not material whether the Court of Appeals of New York persist in their adherence to their decision in the case of Cochran v. Van Surlay, 20 Wend., 365. If they are not willing to re-examine the grounds of that decision, that is not a reason why this court should recede. The decision here was made, after great deliberation, with the decision in Cochran v. Van Surlay, before it. Property has since been bought and sold upon the faith of the opinion here delivered, and the judgment by this court pronounced. Every principle by which our law of precedents is justified, tends against the re-opening of the case in this court.

The litigation in respect to the property conveyed by Clarke, under the authority derived from the Acts of the Legislature, and the orders of the Chancellor, commenced before the death of Clarke. Sinclair v. Jackson, 8 Cow., 543.

The case of Clarke v. Van Surlay was tried at the New York Circuit in 1833, and was decided in the Supreme Court in 1836. 15 Wend., 436. It was removed to the court for the correction of errors, and was affirmed in that court, but with much division in the court, in 1838. Cochran v. Van Surlay, 20 Wend., 365.

The decree of foreclosure and sale, under which the defendant claims, was rendered in 1840, and the sale took place in 1844. The purchaser, subsequently to the sale, objected to complying with his purchase, because of a notice from the devisees of Mary Clarke, that they were claimants of the property, and forbade his entering upon the same. The Vice-Chancellor, upon the motion requiring the purchaser to comply, and the Chancellor, upon appeal from his order, compelled the purchaser to complete his purchase. The reasons for this order do not appear. But the Vice-Chancellor and Chancellor might have said, that it had become the settled law of the State that such a title was valid, and could have rested upon the authority of the case of Clarke v. Van Surlay.

In 1851 the case of Towle v. Forney, 4 Duer, 164, came before the Superior Court of the City of New York, and involved the title to one of the lots conveyed to McIntyre by Clarke, and sold under the decree of foreclosure. That case was determined in that court, and its judgment affirming the validity of that title was sanctioned in the Court of Appeals (14 N. Y., 426) subsequently to the decisions reported in 8 Howard in this court. The court of appeals, in answer to the argument derived from the adjudication in this court, say, that perhaps there may be a difference between the cases which were determined in this court in 1851 and that case, but that the more suitable answer is, that as between the judgments of their own courts, and those of the courts of the United States, their own are binding where there is a conflict between them, except in cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, when the judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States are of controlling authority. That court declares that the judgment in Clarke v. Van Surlay is a determination of the court of last resort in this State, not only upon all the questions of law in the case under consideration, but upon the identical title under which the plaintiff in the reported case, and the defendant in the present case, claimed to own the premises in controversy in the respective suits. * * * In such a case, there being no pretense of collusion, and no reason to impute carelessness or inattention to the judges, the determination should be considered final and conclusive upon all persons in interest, or who may become interested in the question, as well as upon the parties to the particular action. Towle v. Forney, 4 Duer, 164; S. C., 14 N. Y., 426; Clarke v. Davenport, 1 Bosw., 96; S. C. affirmed on appeal. And the question is now presented to this court, whether they should adhere to their own opinion as expressed in the cases in 8 Howard, or acknowledge the authority of the courts of New York to settle finally the contest upon this title.

The subject of the dispute is real property situated within the State of New York, and her laws exclusively govern in respect to the rights of the parties, the modes of the transfer, and the solemnities which should accompany them. Communis et recta sententia est, in rebus immobilibus servadum esse jus loci in quo bona sunt sita. Every sovereign has the exclusive right to command within his territory; and the laws which originate rights to real property are commands addressed to the members of the state, requiring them to abstain from any interference with the proprietary right they recognize or establish; and in respect to this subject the sovereignty of New York has not been impaired by her adoption of the Federal Constitution. The power to establish federal courts, and to endow them with a jurisdiction to determine controversies between certain parties, affords no pretext for abrogating any established law of property, or for removing any obligation of her citizens to submit to the rule of the local sovereign. The title of the devisees of Mary Clarke was devested by authority conferred by the Legislature of the State, which was exercised subject to the oversight of her own tribunals. The persons affected by this authority were natives of the State—children under the superintending care of the parental jurisdiction of the State. It was in the constitutional exercise of this supreme and exclusive jurisdiction that this title was disturbed. It behooves every other State to enforce or maintain rights which have thus originated in laws operating within their legitimate sphere, and which defeat no policy of their own; and the jurisprudence of this court attests the care with which this court has observed the general obligation (of which this is a particular instance), in its administration throughout the Union.

In Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat., 162, this court say:

"The inquiry is very much narrowed by applying the rule which has uniformly governed this court, that where any principle of law establishing a rule of real property has been settled in the state courts, the same rule will be applied by this court that would be applied by the state tribunals."

In Beauregard v. New Orleans, 18 How., 497, the court say:

"The judgments of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, upon the validity of the sales impugned in this bill, were given more than twenty years ago. They have formed the foundation upon which the expectations and conduct of the inhabitants of that State have been regulated. They have quieted apprehension and doubt respecting a title to an important portion of a large and growing city. They have invited a multitude of transactions and engagements in which the well-being of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of the citizens of that State depend. In this bill there are several hundreds of defendants. The constitution of this court requires it to follow the laws of the several States wherever they properly apply; and the habit of the court has been to defer to the decisions of their judicial tribunals upon questions arising out of the common law of the State, especially when applied to the title to lands. Upon cases like the present, the relation of the courts of the United States to a State is the same as that of her own tribunals. They administer the laws of the State, and to fulfill that duty they must find them as they exist in the habits of the people, and in the exposition of their constituted authorities. Without this, the peculiar organization of the judicial tribunals of the States and the Union would be productive of the greatest mischief and confusion."

In the case of Arguello v. United States, 18 How., 539, this court determined that the Colonization Regulations of Mexico, of 1824 and 1828, did not prohibit the settlement of the littoral or coast leagues by natives, under the authority of the Governor of California, and without the consent of the Central Government in Mexico. The same question was presented in the case of League v. Egery, 24 How., 264, at this term, from the District Court of the United States in Texas, in reference to the coast leagues in that State. This court found a contrary opinion had prevailed in the courts of that State, and had become a rule of property there, and without re-examining their own opinion, or making any attempt to account for or to reconcile the difference, without any hesitation applied the rule adopted in Texas to the determination of controversies existing there.

The cases reported in 8 Howard, referred to, came before this court upon a division of opinion between the experienced Judges of the Circuit Court of the Southern District of New York. The authority of Clarke v. Van Surlay was thus impugned in that tribunal. The decision in the court of errors was far from being unanimous; nor was the dissent in that tribunal feeble or equivocal.

The majority of this court were convinced that the questions might be examined anew, and that their answers were accordant with the opinion of the minority in the court of errors. But in the present case there is no room for doubt as to what the settled opinion of the courts of New York is in reference to this title and, therefore, no occasion for any hesitation concerning the obligation we have to perform. The circuit court decided adversly to the defendant.

Its judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

JACOB E. CURTIS, Plff.,

v.

THE COUNTY OF BUTLER.

(See S. C., 24 How., 435–450.)

County bonds, when valid—when signed by a majority of the commissioners, are valid.

Power was given in the Pennsylvania Act of the 9th February 1853, and by the agreement of subscription and terms of payment, to the Commissioners of Butler County, to make the County bonds upon which the suit is brought in payment for subscription to capital stock of a Railroad Company, and to bind the County to pay them.

These bonds having been signed by but two of the said commissioners, are binding on the County where the Act declares that two of the commissioners shall form a Board for the transaction of business, and when the Act in terms makes the bonds valid if made by a majority of the commissioners of the respective counties.

Argued Feb. 26, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

ON a certificate of division in opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

This was an action of debt brought in the court below by the plaintiff, Jacob E. Curtis, on certain coupons claimed to have been attached to bonds issued by the County of Butler to the Northwestern Railroad Company, in payment of an alleged subscription of that County to the capital stock of the Railroad Company.

The defendant pleaded nil debet. Upon the trial the plaintiff gave in evidence,

1. The 7th section of the Act of Incorporation of the Railroad Company, the substance of which, so far as it appertains to this case, is stated in the opinion.

2. Bond No. 1, purporting to have been issued by the County of Butler for stock in the Northwestern Railroad Company, signed by two of the Commissioners of Butler County.

3. The petition of the Railroad Company to the Grand Jury and Commissioners of Butler County for the subscription, and the presentment of the grand jury requesting the subscription.

4. The coupons of the bonds.

5. Evidence to show that the coupons were signed by Thomas Robinson, and that he was the clerk of the commissioners at the date of the bond.

It was admitted that the County of Butler was one of the counties through which the railroad was intended to pass, and if ever made, would pass.

The defendant gave in evidence the subscription and agreement between the Commissioners of the County of Butler and the Northwestern Railroad Company, consisting of a resolution passed by the Board of Directors of the Railroad Company, and a subscription on the part of the County, signed by three commissioners. The defendant further gave evidence tending to show that these bonds had been disposed of by the Company at less than their par value, and that the plaintiff had notice of the agreement with the County as to the payment of interest by the Company, &c., and that notice had been given to the plaintiff to show how he came by these instruments.

The jury, under the instructions of the court, found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court as to the legal authority of the commissioners to bind the people of the County of Butler by the securities declared upon. The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that no power was given by the Act of Assembly of February 9th, 1853, or by the agreement of subscription, or terms of payment to the Commissioners, to make the instruments on which the suit is brought and bind the County to pay them, and that if such power was given, it could not be exercised by two of the three commissioners. Upon this question the judges of the circuit court were divided in opinion.

Mr. Edwin M. Stanton for plaintiff:

Two questions are involved in the certificate of division of opinion.

1. Had the Commissioners of Butler County legal authority to issue the bonds given in evidence?

2. If they had, was such power well exercised by two out of the three commissioners?

The first question resolves itself into a construction of the Act of the Pennsylvania General Assembly, for the incorporation of the Northwestern Railroad Company

That the Legislature of Pennsylvania possessed the constitutional authority, at the time of the passage of this Act, to delegate to the County of Butler the power to execute binding securities, has been settled by the Supreme Court of the State.

Sharpless v. Mayor, &c., of Philadelphia, 21 Pa., 147; Commonwealth v. Commissioners of Alleghany Co., 32 Pa., 218.

The very Act in question has been before the Supreme Court of the State, and its validity conceded.

Assuming, therefore, authority on the part of the Legislature to delegate to the County and its proper officers the power to execute and issue such instruments as are the foundation of this suit, we come to the question, whether such a power has been actually conferred in the present instance.

1. It is admitted that Butler County comes within the scope of the Act; it is one of "the counties through parts of which the said railroad may pass."

2. It is admitted that this County, through its officers, "the commissioners, or a majority of them," is authorized to subscribe to the capital stock of the Railroad Company, and "make payment on such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by said Company and the County." It is, however, claimed that the "power" to make such payment on such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by the Company and the proper county, does not necessarily imply that such securities as bonds with coupons attached to them may be given.

An examination of the terms and phraseology of the Act, however, clearly shows that the power to issue bonds was intended to be conveyed. In this very section it is provided that "whenever bonds of the respective counties are given in payment of subscriptions," &c., and that "no bonds shall be given for less than one hundred dollars," &c. Here we have a legislative construction of the Act, showing that the authority to issue bonds in the name of the County was intended to be conferred.

In the actions of all the parties concerned, we find a similar construction put upon the Act. Nobody ever supposed that the County could make payment of her subscription in any other manner than by her credit pledged by her bonds. The same astuteness that we now find employed in the endeavor to repudiate these obligations, was then engaged in advising and procuring their execution. But the defendant's own construction of the law in making these obligations, will now be applied by courts of justice in enforcing their fulfilment. In the Co. of Lawrence v. The Northwestern R. R. Co., 32 Pa., 144, the Supreme Court granted an injunction on terms implying and recognizing the validity of the bonds before that time negotiated by the Company.

Of the "terms and manner of payment agreed upon by the said Company and the proper county," the best, and, to affect the plaintiff, the only evidence is to be found in the bonds themselves. Hence the agreement of 18th August, 1853, put in evidence by the defendant, was superseded by the agreement of the 1st July, 1854, evidenced by the bonds; and any provision of the earlier agreement inconsistent with the terms of the bond cannot avail as a defense against a bona fide bearer of the bonds.

2d. But suppose a fair construction of the terms of the Act of 9th Feb., 1853, shows authority in the County and its proper officers to issue its instruments given in evidence, a second question arises under the facts as stated in the certificate of division of opinion, namely: whether bonds, signed by two of the three commissioners, would be binding.

It has not been seriously contended that the commissioners were not the proper officers to execute the bond.

Act 15th April, 1834, Purdon's Digest, 176.

Now, by the 19th section of the Act of April, 1834, it is enacted as follows: "Two of the commissioners aforesaid shall form a Board for the transaction of business, and when convened in pursuance of notice or according to adjournment, shall be competent to perform all and singular the duties appertaining to the office of county commissioners." See Purdon's Digest, p. 176.

In The Commissioners of Allegheny Co. v. Lecky, 6 S. & R., 166—a case that arose before the Act of 1834 was passed—it was unanimously held that all powers conferred upon the commissioners might be legally executed by two.

8 Watt, 128; 5 Binn, 481.

It may be further remarked that signing the bonds was not a duty of a deliberative nature. It was merely carrying into effect the previous deliberations of the Board and their agreement with the Company.

Mr. J. S. Black, for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

This case has been sent to us upon a certificate of division upon two points, which occurred between the judges upon the trial of it in the court below: 1. Had the commissioners of Butler County legal authority to issue the bonds given in evidence? 2. If they had, was such power or authority well exercised by two out of the three commissioners of the said County, or were the bonds signed by two of them binding?

The Act under which the bonds were issued was passed 9th February, 1853. The 1st section enumerates the persons by name who were to become commissioners to open books, receive subscriptions of stock, and to organize a Company by the name, style and title of the Northwestern Railroad Company, with all the powers, and subject to all the duties, restrictions and regulations, prescribed by an Act regulating railroad companies, approved the 19th of February 1849, "so far as the same are not allowed and supplied by the provisions of this Act."

By the 2nd section of the Act, the capital stock of the Company was to be divided into twenty thousand shares, of $50 each, with the privilege to be increased, if the exigencies of the Company shall require it, to any sum not exceeding $2,000,000, as the president and directors of said Company may deem expedient. By the 3d section the Company have the right to build and construct a railroad from some point on the Pennsylvania or Allegheny railroad, at or west of Johnstown, by the way of Butler to the Pennsylvania and Ohio State Line, at some point on the western boundary line of Lawrence County, &c., &c., to connect with any railroad now or which might be thereafter constructed at either end, or at any intermediate point on the line or route thereof. For doing this, the Company was authorized to borrow money to an amount not exceeding the capital stock of the Company, upon bonds to be issued by it whenever the president and directors might deem it expedient to do so. The rate of interest upon the bonds was not to exceed seven per cent., and they were to be convertible into the stock of the Company, whenever the holders of it and the Company might agree to have that done. The 6th section of the Act we need not speak of, as it relates to matters unconnected with the questions certified, or from which there is not any impeachment of the correct action of the Company.

But the 7th section, the counties through parts of which the railroad may pass, were authorized to subscribe to the capital stock of the Company, "and to make payments on such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by the Company and proper county." But the amount of the subscription of any county was not allowed to exceed ten per cent. of the assessed valuation thereof (for taxes), and before any subscription could be made for any county, the amount of each was to be determined and approved by a grand jury of the county. Upon the report of a grand jury being filed, the county commissioners were to carry it into effect, accordingly. Then, whenever bonds of the respective counties were given in payment of subscriptions, the commissioners were prohibited from selling them at less than par; and such bonds the State exempted from taxation until the clear profit on the business of the railroad amounted to six per cent. on the cost thereof; and it was declared that the subscription of the counties was to be held to be valid when made by a majority of its commissioners. With this analysis of the Act, under which the bonds sued upon were issued, we proceed to consider the points submitted to us.

In the first place, after a careful examination of the Act to which this Act was made subordinate, we do not find that anything was done by the commissioners inconsistent with it, or bearing upon the points certified.

We think that the county commissioners had authority from the Legislature to execute the bonds, and pledge the faith, credit, and property of the County, to pay them. Authority was given by the 7th section of the charter. It declares that the County shall have power to subscribe to the capital stock of the Railroad Company, and to make payment in such manner and upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the County and the Company.

It cannot be denied that this was an authority to the County to make a contract of subscription, and that it contemplates a payment for it prospectively "by bonds which, when made in the name of any county, were to be held valid, if made by a majority of the commissioners of the respective counties." The power to subscribe, the manner of payment, the limitation upon the amount of subscription, the mode of carrying that out through the intervention of a grand jury's approval and report, the allowance of bonds to be given in payment, the restriction of the same upon the Railroad Company to which they were to be transferred, not to sell the bonds at less than par, the hindrance upon the issue of bonds of less than $100, the exemption of them from taxation upon a contingency until the clear profits of the railroad shall amount to six per cent. upon the cost of it, are significant of what was intended. All of those particulars in this section of the statute are to be considered together in the construction of it.

No one questions that the Legislature, then, had the power to incorporate such companies, and to allow the counties of the State to become interested in them upon the faith of county securities, for the transportation of persons and things in all of the vehicles used for commerce and the carrying trade, either by water, or by land upon ordinary artificial roads. And that associations of persons might be incorporated for the construction of the latter, either by money already subscribed, or by money to be raised or borrowed by certificates of indebtedness, with certificates of interest attached, separable from the former, for the payment of interest, payable at particular times.

The objection now, as we understand it, is not that the Legislature had not such a power. But it is said, in the exercise of it, that the Railroad Company, and the counties through which the road might be constructed, had mistaken the terms upon which the counties might subscribe to the capital of the Railroad Company, as to the manner for the payment of the subscription; in other words, that the counties in issuing bonds with coupons had mistaken the special authority given to them by the 7th section of the Act, and had made a different contract, which could not be judicially enforced.

That section is as follows: "That the counties through parts of which said railroad may pass shall be authorized to subscribe to the capital stock of the railroad company, and to make payment on such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by said company and the proper county; provided, that the amount of subscription by said county shall not exceed ten per cent. of the assessed valuation thereof, and that before any such subscription shall be made, that the amount thereof shall be fixed and determined by one grand jury of the proper county, and approved by the same; and that upon the report of such grand jury being filed, the county commissioners may carry the same into effect by making, in the name of the county, the subscription directed by the grand jury: provided, that whenever the bonds of the respective counties are given in payment of subscriptions, that the same shall not be sold by the railroad company at less than par value, and no bonds shall be in less amount than one hundred dollars, and that such bonds shall not be subject to taxation until the clear profits of said railroad company shall amount to six per cent. upon the cost thereof; and that all subscriptions made or to be made in the name of any county shall be held and deemed valid if made by a majority of the commissioners of the respective counties."

Now, we freely subscribe to the rule that neither privileges, powers, nor authorities, can pass by an Act of Incorporation, unless they be given in unambiguous words, and that an Act giving special privileges must be construed strictly. That in such a case, where a sentence is capable of having two distinct meanings, that a construction must be given to it most favorable to the public. But in applying these principles to this case, it must be done with reference to the subject-matter contemplated by the Legislature as a whole, and not allow its manifested intention and design to be defeated by denying to the counties the only means of paying their subscription, by which the main object could be accomplished.

Why was it that the Legislature, in drawing the section, directed that the subscriptions of the counties should be made upon terms and in manner as the railroad and the counties might agree upon; that it limited the amount of subscription upon an assessed valuation of the property of the County; that it contemplated a taxation contingently upon the bonds of the counties, respectively, that they were to be given in payment of subscriptions, unless it had been its clear intention that the subscriptions, were to be paid for by county bonds, when both Company and County should make such a contract?

This, in our view, is not a case of ambiguity in the power given, but one of as clear designation as could have been expressed. Nor was it a case in which the Legislature imposed a public burden. It was no more than giving to the people of the County a right to tax themselves for an anticipated advantage to arise from an expenditure of their own money in the construction of a railroad. It was the concern of the County: the same as it would have been if the County had been legislatively empowered to tax themselves to clear out a river for a better navigation, or for the cutting of a canal. Whether the allowance for the issue of bonds for either of those purposes will be judicious, depends upon the subject and the regulations which the Legislature may impose for their execution.

In our best judgment, applied as it has been to the 7th section of the Act to incorporate the Northwestern Railroad Company, in connection with a full consideration of the rules for the construction of the powers of corporations, we have been unable to find anything in the 7th section equivocal or doubtful as to the power given to the counties to make and to pay for their subscriptions to the Railroad Company, and nothing wrong as to that Company having received them according to its charter.

We therefore answer to the first point certified to this court, "that power was given in the Act of the 9th February, 1853, and by the agreement of subscription and terms of payment, to the Commissioners of Butler County, to make the instruments upon which the suit is brought, and to bind the County to pay them."

We will now proceed to the second point certified to this court: and if any power was given to issue bonds payable to bearer, with coupons attached, it could not be exercised by two out of the three commissioners of the said County; and that these bonds having been signed by but two of the said commissioners are not binding on the county.

We have examined the Acts relating to who are designated to exercise the corporate powers of the County. By the Act of the 15th April, 1834, the commissioners are to do so; and it is now claimed, as there are three, that all of them should have signed the bonds to make them binding upon the County. But by the 19th section of the Act, it is declared that two of the commissioners shall form a Board for the transaction of business, and when convened in pursuance of notice or according to adjournment, shall be competent to perform all and singular the duties appertaining to the office of county commissioners. Purden's Digest, 176.

Before the Act of 1834 was passed, it was held in the case of The Commissioners of Allegheny County v. Lecky, 6 Serg. & R., 166, that all powers conferred upon the commissioners might be legally executed by two, without the concurrence of the third. The same ruling will be found in Cooper & Grove v. Lampter Township, 8 Watts., 128; 5 Binn., 481. But why cite authorities, when the Act in terms makes the bonds valid if made by a majority of the commissioners of the respective counties?

We, therefore, answer the second point certified, that the bonds upon which suit is brought, being signed by two out of the three commissioners, are binding upon the County of Butler.

The jurisdiction which has first attached in the seizure and sale of property will prevail—Marshal's right to hold, is question for federal court, not for state court—equity action in federal court, to restrain suit at law in same court, is not an original action and is maintained without reference to residence of the parties.

In the case of conflicting authorities under a state and federal process, on which property has been seized, the question as to which authority shall for the time prevail, does not depend upon the rights of the respective parties to the property seized, but upon the question, which jurisdiction had first attached by the seizure and custody of the property under its process.

This rule applies to an attachment issued by the U. S. Circuit Court.

Where property has been seized under the process of attachment, from the U. S. Circuit Court and is in the custody of the Marshal, the right to hold it is a question belonging to the federal court, under whose process it was seized, to determine, and there is no authority, under the process of the state court, to interfere with it.

It belongs to the federal courts to determine the question of their own jurisdiction, the ultimate arbiter being the supreme judicial tribunal of the nation.

A bill filed on the equity side of a federal court to restrain or regulate judgments or suits at law in the same court, and thereby prevent injustice, or an inequitable advantage under mesne or final process, is not an original suit, but ancillary and dependent, supplementary merely to the original suit out of which it has arisen, and is maintained without reference to the citizenship or residence of the parties.

Mr. Henry C. Hutchins, for defendant in error:

Replevin was properly brought in this case. The attachment made by the Marshal was a collateral proceeding, to secure payment of the judgment that might be recovered in the suit wherein the attachment was made. He was directed by his writ to attach property of the defendant named in the writ, and his writ only afforded him a justification for attaching such property, and he took the property of a stranger—that is, of the defendants in error. The defendants in error had no remedy except in the state court. They must bring their suit there or not at all. They were citizens of Massachusetts, as was also the Marshal, and the property replevied was there situated. There was no conflict of jurisdiction, and none could possibly arise.

This was not a proceeding in rem, nor like the case where a marshal has a prisoner in his custody. In those cases the custody of the thing or of the prisoner lies at the very foundation of the jurisdiction in the suit and, therefore, to take from his custody, by process from a state court, the thing or the prisoner, would be to deprive the United States Court of its jurisdiction, and to draw in question the validity of the authority exercised under the United States.

But this suit, in which the Marshal attached these cars, was brought to recover a debt, and no question could possibly arise in that suit whether the property attached by the Marshal belonged to the defendant therein or not; no form of pleading could bring this question before the court, and the suit would and did proceed to judgment independently of the fact whether property was attached or not. The only question in that suit was, whether the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff as alleged therein.

The case of Taylor v. Carryl, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 588, is not in point. The opinion of the majority of the court in that case proceeded upon the ground that the process from the state court and that from the United States Court were both proceedings in rem, and of course that which was prior in time had precedence, and the property could not be taken from the possession of the state court, because possession of the property was essential to its jurisdiction.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The case was this: Selden F. White, of the State of New Hampshire, in 1856 instituted a suit in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts against the Vermont and Massachusetts Railroad Company, a Corporation under the laws of Massachusetts, to recover certain demands claimed against the defendants. The suit was commenced in the usual way, by process of attachment and summons. Freeman, the Marshal, and plaintiff in error, to whom the processes were delivered, attached a number of railroad cars, which, according to the practice of the court, were seized and held as a security for the satisfaction of the demand in suit in case a judgment was recovered. After the seizure, and while the cars were in the custody of the Marshal, they were taken out of his possession by the Sheriff of the County of Middlesex, under a writ of replevin in favor of Howe and others, the defendants in error, issued from a state court. The plaintiffs in the replevin suit were mortgagees of the Vermont and Massachusetts Railroad Company, including the cars in question, in trust for the bondholders, to secure the payment of a large sum of money which remained due and unpaid.

The defendant, Freeman, in the replevin suit, set up, by way of defense, the authority by which he held the property under the Circuit Court of the United States, which was overruled by the court below, and judgment rendered for the plaintiffs. The case is now before us on a writ of error.

I. The suit in this case has been instituted and carried on to judgment in the court below under a misapprehension, of the settled course of decision in this court in respect to the case of conflicting processes and authorities, between the federal and state courts; and also in respect to the appropriate remedy of the plaintiffs for the grievances complained of.

As it respects the effect to be given to the processes of the courts, whether state or federal, the subject was so fully and satisfactorily examined in the case of Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How., 583, the last of the series on the subject, we need only refer to it, as all the previous cases will there be found.

The main point there decided was, that the property seized by the sheriff, under the process of attachment from the state court, and while in the custody of the officer, could not be seized or taken from him by a process from the District Court of the United States, and that the attempt to seize it by the Marshal, by a notice or otherwise, was a nullity, and gave the court no jurisdiction over it, inasmuch as, to give jurisdiction to the district court in a proceeding in rem, there must be a valid seizure and an actual control of the res under the process.

In order to avoid the effect of this case, it has been assumed that the question was not one of conflict between the state and federal authorities, but a question merely upon the relative powers of a court of admiralty and a court of common law in the case of an admitted maritime lien. But no such question was discussed by Mr. Justice Campbell, who delivered the opinion of the majority of the court, except to show that the process of the district court in admiralty was entitled to no precedence over the process of any other court, dealing with property that was, in common, subject to the jurisdiction of each. On the contrary, he observed, at the close of the opinion, that the view taken of the case rendered it unnecessary "to consider any question relative to the respective liens of attaching creditors, and of seamen for wages, or as to the effect of the sale of the property as chargeable, or as perishable, upon them."

The minority of the court took a different view of the question supposed to be involved in the case. It is succinctly stated by the Chief Justice, at the commencement of his dissenting opinion. He observes: "The opinion of the court treats this controversy as a conflict between the jurisdiction and rights of a state court and the jurisdiction and rights of a court of the United States, as a conflict between sovereignties, both acting by their own officers within the sphere of their acknowledged powers. In my judgment, this is a mistaken view of the question presented by the record. It is not a question between the relative powers of a State and the United States, acting through their judicial tribunals, but merely upon the relative powers and duties of a court of admiralty and a court of common law in the case of an admitted maritime lien;" and hence the conclusion was arrived at, that the power of the admiralty was paramount. The majority of the court were of opinion that, according to the course of decision in the case of conflicting authorities under a state and federal process, and in order to avoid unseemly collision between them, the question as to which authority should, for the time, prevail, did not depend upon the rights of the respective parties to the property seized, whether the one was paramount to the other, but upon the question, which jurisdiction had first attached by the seizure and custody of the property under its process.

Another distinction is attempted by the defendants in error. It is admitted that in the case of a proceeding in rem, the property seized and in the custody of the officer is protected from any interference by state process. But it is claimed that the process of attachment issued by a common law court stands upon a different footing, and the reasons assigned for the distinction are, that in the one case the property seized is the subject of legal inquiry in the court, the matter to be tried and adjudicated upon, and which, in the language of the counsel, lies at the foundation of the jurisdiction of the court; but that, in the other, the property seized, namely: under the attachment, is not the subject-matter to be tried, like the property which is the subject of a libel in rem, as the process is, simply, for the recovery of a debt, without any lien or charge upon the property, except that resulting from the attachment to secure the debt, and that the question of lien upon the property is a collateral one, which the federal court could not hear and decide in the action before it; and further, that the question of liability of the Railroad Company was upon certain bonds, the trial and judgment upon which would not be affected by the possession or want of possession of the property seized by the Marshal.

The idea which seems to prevail in the mind of the learned counsel on the part of the defendant in error is, that there is something peculiar and extraordinary in a proceeding in rem in admiralty, and in the lien upon which it is founded, that invests them with a power far above the proceedings or liens at common law, or by statute; and that, while the seizure of the property in the one case, by the Marshal, protects it from all interference by state process, in the other no such protection exists.

The court is not aware of any such distinction. In the case of a proceeding in rem in admiralty, the lien or charge, which gives the right to seize the property, results from the principles of the maritime law. In the proceeding by attachment in a court of common law, the lien results from statute or common law; and in both cases, unless the party instituting the proceedings sustains his demand to secure which the lien is claimed, the property is discharged. In both, the property is held contingently, dependent upon the result of the litigation. In the admiralty, in the case of collision, upon a bill of lading, or charter-party, for salvage, &c., &c., the main questions litigated are not the questions of lien, but fault or not in the collision, the fulfillment or not of the contract in the bill of lading, or charter-party, or the right to salvage.

The same observations are alike applicable to all cases of attachment in courts of common law, where the lien is given by statute.

It is true, in a proceeding in rem, any person claiming an interest in the property paramount to that of the libelant, may intervene by way of defense for the protection of his interest; but the same is equally true in the case of a proceeding by attachment in a court of common law, as will be shown in another branch of this opinion.

Some stress has also been placed upon the idea, that the forcible dispossession of the Marshal, of the property under the attachment, would not effect the jurisdiction of the court, or interrupt the proceedings in the suit; but the same is equally true as respects the proceedings in rem in the admiralty. The forcible dispossession of the Marshal, of the property once seized, would not affect the jurisdiction, or prevent a decree in the case.

Another and main ground relied on by the defendants in error is, that the process in the present instance was directed against the property of the Railroad Company, and conferred no authority upon the Marshal to take the property of the plaintiffs in the replevin suit. But this involves a question of right and title to the property under the federal process, and which it belongs to the federal, not the state courts, to determine. This is now admitted; for though a point is made in the brief by the counsel for the defendant in error, that this court had no jurisdiction of the case, it was given up on the argument. And in the condition of the present case more than this is involved; for the property having been seized under the process of attachment, and in the custody of the Marshal, and the right to hold it being a question belonging to the federal court, under whose process it was seized, to determine, there was no authority, as we have seen, under the process of the state court, to interfere with it. We agree with Mr. Justice Grier, in Peck v. Jenness, 7 How., 624, 625. "It is a doctrine of law too long established to require citation of authorities, that where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause: and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, till reversed, is regarded as binding in every court; and that where the jurisdiction of a court, and the right of a plaintiff to prosecute his suit in it, have once attached, that right cannot be arrested or taken away by proceedings in another court." "Neither can one take the property from the custody of the other by replevin, or any other process; for this would produce a conflict extremely embarrassing to the administration of justice."

The case of Slocum v. Mayberry, 2 Wheat., 2, has been referred to as holding a different doctrine from that maintained by the plaintiff in error in the present case.

We have examined the case attentively, and are satisfied that this is a misapprehension. There was no interference there with goods seized under the process of a federal court, and in the custody of the Marshal, nor any attempt to draw questions involved in a suit instituted in a federal court into a state court for decision. It is quite apparent, from the opinion of the court, if this had been the question before it, what would have been its decision.

Chief Justice Marshall observed: "Any intervention of a state authority which, by taking the thing seized out of the possession of the officer of the United States, might obstruct the exercise of this jurisdiction, would, unquestionably, be a violation of the Act; and the federal court having cognizance of the seizure, might enforce a redelivery of the thing by attachment or other summary process against the parties who should devest such a possession. The party supposing himself aggrieved by a seizure cannot, because he considers it tortious, replevy the property out of the custody of the seizing officers, or of the court having cognizance of the cause." The reason why the replevin of the cargo in the state court was maintained was, that the vessel only was seized by the officer, and not the cargo, and the latter was not, therefore, within the protection of the principle announced.

Reference was made, also, on the argument in the present case, to an opinion expressed by Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, Vol. I., p. 410, as follows: "If the officer of the United States who seizes, or the court which awards the process to seize, has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, then the inquiry into the validity of the seizure belongs exclusively to the federal courts. But if there be no jurisdiction in the instance in which it is asserted, as if a Marshal of the United States, under an execution in favor of the United States against A, should seize the person or property of B, then the state courts have jurisdiction to protect the person and the property so illegally invaded."

The error into which the learned Chancellor fell, from not being practically familiar with the jurisdiction of the federal courts, arose from not appreciating, for the moment, the effect of transferring from the jurisdiction of the federal court to that of the State the decision of the question in the example given; for it is quite clear, upon the principle stated, that the jurisdiction of the former, and the validity and effect of its process, would not be what the federal, but what the state court, might determine. No doubt, if the federal court had no jurisdiction of the case, the process would be invalid, and the seizure of the property illegal, for which the aggrieved party is entitled to his remedy. But the question is, which tribunal, the Federal or State, possesses the power to determine the question of jurisdiction or validity of the process? The effect of the principle stated by the Chancellor, if admitted, would be most deep and extensive in its operation upon the jurisdiction of the federal court, as a moment's consideration will show. It would draw after it into the state courts, not only all questions of the liability of property seized upon mesne and final process issued under the authority of the federal courts, including the admiralty, for this court can be no exception, for the purposes for which it was seized, but also the arrests upon mesne, and imprisonment upon final process of the person in both civil and criminal cases, for in every case the question of jurisdiction could be made; and until the power was assumed by the state court, and the question of jurisdiction of the federal court was heard and determined by it, it could not be known whether in the given case it existed or not. We need scarcely remark that no government could maintain the administration or execution of its laws, civil or criminal, if the jurisdiction of its judicial tribunals were subject to the determination of another. But we shall not pursue this branch of the case further. We regard the question as settled, at least as early as United States v. Peters, 5 Cranch, 115, familiarly known as The Olmstead case, and which is historical, that it belongs to the federal courts to determine the question of their own jurisdiction, the ultimate arbiter, the supreme judicial tribunal of the nation, and which has been recently reaffirmed, after the most careful and deliberate consideration, in the opinion of the present Chief Justice, in the case of The United States v. Booth, 21 How., 506.

II. Another misapprehension, under which the counsel for the defendant in error labors, and in which the court below fell, was in respect to the appropriate remedy of the plaintiffs in the replevin suit for the grievance complained of. It was supposed that they were utterly remediless in the federal courts, inasmuch as both parties were citizens of Massachusetts. But those familiar with the practice of the federal courts have found no difficulty in applying a remedy, and one much more effectual than the replevin, and more consistent with the order and harmony of judicial proceedings, as may be seen by reference to the following cases: Pennock v. Coe, 23 How., 117; Gue v. Tide Water Canal Co., 24 How., 257, decided this term; Clarke v. Mathewson, 12 Pet., 164; Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Pet., 1; 5 Cranch, 288.

The principle is, that a bill filed on the equity side of the court to restrain or regulate judgments or suits at law in the same court, and thereby prevent injustice, or an inequitable advantage under mesne or final process, is not an original suit, but ancillary and dependent, supplementary merely to the original suit, out of which it had arisen, and is maintained without reference to the citizenship or residence of the parties.

The case in 8 Pet., 1, which was among the first that came before the court, deserves, perhaps, a word of explanation. It would seem from a remark in the opinion, that the power of the court upon the bill was limited to a case between the parties to the original suit. This was probably not intended, as any party may file the bill whose interests are affected by the suit at law.

In the case of Pennock v. Coe, 24 How., 257, the bill was filed by the mortgagee of the Railroad Company, in trust for the bondholders, answering to the position of the plaintiffs in the replevin suit in the case before us. Gue v. Tide Water Canal Company, decided at this term, is an instructive case upon this subject, in which the Chief Justice suggests the difficulties of a court of law dealing with this description of property, with a proper regard to the rights of all concerned.

In that case the bill was filed on the equity side of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, to restrain a sale of the defendant's property on execution. Gue, the judgment creditor, was a resident of Pennsylvania.

We shall not look into the questions raised upon the mortgage, whether executed by the proper authority, or if it was, whether it covered after acquired property, as not material to the case before us. The latter question was fully examined in this court in the case above referred to, of Pennock v. Coe.

Neither shall we inquire into the questions raised under the attachment laws of Massachusetts, as they are unimportant in our view of the case.

Upon the whole, after the fullest consideration of the case, and utmost respect for the learning and ability of the court below, we are constrained to differ from it, and reverse the judgment.

THACKER B. HOWARD, Plff. in Er.,

v.

FRANCIS BUGBEE.

(See S. C., 24 How., 461-465.)

State law, for redemption from mortgage sale, is void as to prior mortgage.

A law of a State authorizing a judgment creditor of a mortgagor at any time within two years after the sale under a mortgage, to redeem the land from the purchase, on paying the purchase money, with interest, and charges, as to a mortgage executed before the passage of the law providing for the redemption, is inoperative and void, as impairing the obligation of the contract.

Bronson v. Kinzie, 43 U. S., 311; affirmed, 43 U.S., 612; 44 U. S., 716.

Argued Feb. 26, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama.

This bill was filed in the court of chancery in Alabama, by Bugbee, present defendant in error, under the circumstances stated in the opinion.

On the first hearing of the bill, it was dismissed by the Chancellor. This decree, on appeal, was reversed by the Supreme Court of the State. A second decree was rendered by the court of chancery in conformity with the opinion of the Supreme Court. This decree was affirmed on appeal by the Supreme Court of Alabama, and from this decree of affirmance Howard now prosecutes his writ of error.

Mr. P. Phillips, for the plaintiff in error.

The Statute of Alabama, approved Jan. 1, 1842, Clay's Dig., 502, authorizes a redemption in two years after the sale, under the decree by bona fide creditors of defendant.

The Supreme Court of Alabama has decided that this statute applies to sales under mortgages executed prior to the passage of the Act, and the question is, whether this statute thus construed impairs the obligation of a contract within the meaning of the Constitution. The lex loci contractus at the time of the execution of the mortgage is a part of the contract.

Sto. Com., ch. 34, sec. 1378.

By the terms of the mortgage, the estate became absolute on default of payment; yet the mortgagor had the right to redeem after default, because such was the law at date of the contract. So, for the same reason, the mortgagee had the right, after default and in the absence of the offer to redeem, to have the premises sold absolutely, to pay the debt. The statute in question provides for a sale subject to redemption in two years. The mortgage in effect stipulates for an absolute sale after default. The statute, therefore, does not merely change the remedy, but impairs the obligation of the contract.

Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How., 816.

The right of the Legislature to exempt certain articles of necessity from execution, is stated in this case to be "considered as properly belonging to the remedy." This, however, has been denied by very high authority.

Quackenbush v. Danks, 1 Den., 28; 3 Den., 594; 1 Com., 129; Thorne v. San Francisco, 4 Cal., 131.

The statute under consideration is, in all respects, like that which in Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How., 316, was held to be unconstitutional. There the question was, whether the mortgagee was not entitled to an absolute sale, regardless of the statute. Here the question is, whether the purchaser under such a sale can be deprived of his right to the fee simple, by virtue of the redemption provided by the statute.

The case of Gantly v. Ewing, 3 How., 716, in which the statute was determined to be unconstitutional, was, as in this, a contest with the purchaser, and only differs from it in the fact that the obnoxious statute was passed after the decree, but before the sale, while in this case it was passed before the decree.

See, also, McCracken v. Haywar, 2 How., 612.

Mr. C. C. Clay, Jr., for defendant in error:

The case presents the constitutionality of the Act of the Alabama Legislature, approved January 1, 1842, so far as the same affects mortgages previously executed. The argument of the appellant is: the Redemption Statute of Alabama, if applied to pre-existing contracts, is a law impairing the obligation of contracts.

The distinction between rights and remedies, between those statutes which confer a right and those which furnish a remedy for the enforcement of that right, is well marked. The one inheres in and follows the contract, wherever it may go; the other is dependent on the local legislation of the place where the parties seek to enforce the right.

People v. Tibbets, 4 Cow., 384; Baugher v. Nelson, 9 Gill., 299; U. S. Bank v. Longworth, 1 McL., 35; Pratt v. Jones, 25 Verm., 303; Searcy v. Stubbs, 12 Ga., 437; Paschal v. Perez, 7 Tex., 384; Hope v. Johnson, 2 Yerg., 125; Maltby v. Cooper, 1 Morr. Ia., 59; West v.

Creditors, 1 La. Ann., 365; Newton v. Tibbatts, 2 Eng. (Ark.), 150; Rockwell v. Hubbell, 2 Doug. Mich., 197.

It is also well drawn in the able dissenting opinion of Justice McLean, in the case of Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How., 311, 322.

The Statute of 1842 takes away no right. It leaves the debt unimpaired—leaves the debtor's property subject to the debt, and only modifies the form of enforcing the decree.

The obligations of the present contract were:

1st. The promise to pay the debt.

2d. The pledge of lands as security.

It was no part of the contract that the law for the collection of that debt should continue as it then was. This was a question of legislative discretion, not within the control of the debtor. The terms of the contract neither expressed nor implied that the remedy should not be changed. The most that can be affirmed on this head is, that the parties impliedly stipulated that the mortgagee should be armed with the legal process in force, when he should invoke it to enforce the collection of his demand. This was not one of the obligations of the contract, but an incident which the law imparted to it.

To hold otherwise would be to cramp the Legislature and lead to the most embarrassing results. Counsel argued against adhering to the case of Bronson v. Kinzie. He contended, however, that there was a distinction between that case and the one at bar, and in support of that position, quoted, at some length, from the opinion of the Supreme Court of Alabama in the present case.

The argument of appellant is, that by the Act of 1842, two years are added to the time within which the mortgagee can obtain complete satisfaction of his demand. In the first place I deny this. The policy and tendency of redemption statutes are to enlarge the chances of collection. But conceding this to be so, does the fact that, in the change of judicial proceedings, a remedy less summary has been provided, impair the obligation of the contract? What additional length of time will have this effect? If two years' delay will violate the Constitution, will two months do the same?

The form of the remedy is no part of the binding stipulations of the contract, and will be changed at the will of the Legislature, provided that under the pretense of modifying the remedy, all substantial remedy be not taken away.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama.

The case was this:

Enoch Parsons executed a mortgage of the premises in controversy, on the 9th December, 1836, to Sarah Tait, to secure the payment of $13,246.66. The last installment fell due in January, 1841. In March, 1846, proceedings were instituted in the court of chancery to foreclose the mortgage for default in payment; and in September, 1848, Howard, the appellant, became the purchaser of the premises, under the decree of foreclosure, and held a deed of the same duly executed by the proper officer.

In January, 1842, the Legislature of the State of Alabama passed an Act authorizing a judgment creditor of the mortgagor, or of his estate, at any time within two years after the sale under a mortgage, to redeem the land from the purchase on paying the purchase money, with a certain per cent. interest, besides charges.

Bugbee, the appellee, and plaintiff in the court below, having recovered a judgment against the estate of Parsons in 1843, tendered within the two years the purchase money, interest and charges, to Howard, and also a deed of the premises to be executed; all of which were refused. This bill was filed in the court of chancery in Alabama by Bugbee to compel Howard to receive the money in redemption of the sale and execute the deed.

The main ground of the defense in that suit was, that the mortgage from Parsons under which the defendant derived title, having been executed before the passage of the Act providing for the redemption, the Act, as respected this debt, was inoperative and void, as impairing the obligation of the contract.

The court of chancery so held and dismissed the bill. But on appeal to the Supreme Court, that court reversed the decree below, and entered a decree for the complainant. The case is now here on a writ of error to the Supreme Court.

The only question involved in this case was decided in Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How., 311. It was there held, after a very and careful extended examination by the court, through the Chief Justice, that the state law impaired the obligation of the mortgage contract, and was forbidden by the Constitution. This decision has since been repeatedly affirmed. 2 How., 612; 3 How., 716.

It is due to the judges of the court below to say, that they felt bound by a decision of their predecessors, which they admitted to be in direct conflict with the case of Bronson v. Kinzie, and that the two decisions could not be reconciled.

We are entirely satisfied with the soundness of the decision in the above case, and with the grounds and reasons upon which it is placed, and shall simply refer to them as governing the present case.

Decree below, reversed. Case remitted with directions to enter decree for the plaintiff in error.

WM. A. LINN.

(See S. C., 24 How., 506-526.)

Acts, of tribunal or officer having jurisdiction, are binding—question of power in the officer, or fraud, may be raised—duties—appraisers—export duty, when added to invoice price, to determine value—misdescription may be corrected or disregarded—detention of goods necessary to appraisal—no allowance for leakage or deterioration.

NOTE.—Ambiguity in written instrument, when explainable by parol. Its effect upon the instrument. See note to Atkinson v. Cummins, 50 U. S. (9 How.), 479.

When power or jurisdiction is delegated to any public officer or tribunal over a subject-matter, and its exercise is confided to his or its discretion, the acts so done are, in general, binding and valid as to the subject-matter.

The only questions which can arise between an individual and the public, or any person, denying their validity, are as to power in the officer and fraud in the party.

Payment of duties cannot be avoided because the importation is misdescribed either in the invoice or the entry, or in both, at the same time.

Appraisers are required to appraise, estimate and ascertain the true market value of the importation, no matter what name may be affixed to it by the importer.

Where green sugar was subject to the export duty, but molasses was not, if the importations ought to have been classed with the former, then the importer ought to have paid the export duty, and the determination of the appraisers was not an unreasonable one that, where no export duty had been paid, it was necessary to add a sum to the invoice valuation equal to the export duty to which it would have been subjected, if it had been correctly invoiced, in order to bring the dutiable value up to the actual market value or wholesale price in the foreign market.

It was competent for the appraisers to correct a misdescription in the invoice and entry, or disregard it, so as to perform their duty as required by law.

Any dispute as to the nature of the produce imported, and its consequent classification in the invoice and entry, were questions of fact within the jurisdiction of the appraisers, and their decision is final and conclusive.

Appraisement of the goods is required by law, and as the detention of the goods is the necessary consequence of that requirement, it cannot be held that it affords any ground of action.

Duties are required by law to be assessed on the goods, and the assessment is uniformly made on the quantity entered at the custom-house, without any allowance whatever for ordinary leakage and deterioration.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri.

This was an action of assumpsit, commenced by the present plaintiffs in error in the court below, against William A. Linn, Collector of the port of St. Louis, to recover an alleged excess of duties which had been paid, under protest, on six cargoes of sugar, or concentrated molasses, imported from Cuba and entered at New Orleans in May and June, 1853. The court charged the jury, that upon the whole evidence in the case, the plaintiffs could not recover. Verdict and judgment were, therefore, entered for the defendant, and the plaintiffs brought the case to this court by writ of error.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. P. Phillips and Reverdy Johnson, for the plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. J. S. Black and E. M. Stanton, for the defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri. The suit was commenced on the 16th day of September, 1854. It was an action of assumpsit, and the declaration contained a count for money had and received, together with three special counts, which are set forth at large in the transcript. Plaintiffs were merchants residing at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, and the defendant was the surveyor of that port, appointed under the Act of March 2d, 1831 (4 Stat. at L., 480), upon whom, by that law, were devolved the duties of collector, and the suit was instituted by the present plaintiffs against the defendant as such collector, to recover an alleged excess of duties which they had previously paid under protest on six cargoes of merchandise invoiced, among other things, as concentrated molasses. Other causes of action were also set forth in some of the special counts, to which reference will hereafter be made. Defendant pleaded that he never undertook and promised in manner and form as the plaintiffs had declared against him, and upon that issue the parties went to trial. All of the merchandise on which the duties were exacted and paid was imported from Matanzas, in the Island of Cuba, and was consigned to the plaintiffs, who were doing business at St. Louis. Under the laws of the United States, merchandise cannot be imported direct from a foreign port to the port of St. Louis, but all such importations are required to be first entered at the custom-house in New Orleans. Some brief reference to the usual course of proceeding in such cases, as required by law and the regulations of the Treasury Department, becomes indispensable, in order that the precise nature of the controversy may be fully understood. Upon the arrival, at New Orleans, of a vessel from a foreign port, having on board merchandise exported from a foreign port, and consigned to a merchant at St. Louis, it is required, if the mercandise is subject to an import duty under the laws of the United States, that an entry of the same shall be made at the custom-house in New Orleans, in the same manner as required in case of entry for consumption, and the officers of the customs at that port then proceed to ascertain and assess the duties to be paid to the United States, precisely in the same way as if the merchandise had been destined for that market; whereupon a bond, called a transportation bond, is given by the importer or his agent to the United States, conditioned that the packages described in the invoice, with marks corresponding thereto, shall, within a specified time, be delivered to the Surveyor and acting Collector of the port of St. Louis. Notice of the proceedings ought then to be given by the collector of the port where the duties were ascertained and assessed to the acting collector of the port to which the merchandise is destined; and when the packages are received at the port of destination, they are placed in the custody of the acting collector of that port, who receives the duties, giving notice of that fact to the collector of the port where they were ascertained and assessed, and the collector of the latter port is then authorized by law to cancel the transportation bond given by the importer. Six vessels arrived at New Orleans, from Matanzas, in May and June, 1853, having on board merchandise shipped from the latter port, and consigned to the plaintiffs, and it appeared that certain portions of their respective cargoes were invoiced as concentrated molasses. Pursuant to the usual course of proceedings in such cases, the plaintiffs, on the arrival of the vessels at New Orleans, made separate entries of the respective cargoes, as required by law, at the custom-house of that port, in order that the duties due to the United States might be ascertained and assessed. In making the entries, however, they followed the invoice, describing the merchandise in question as concentrated molasses, and carrying out the dutiable value accordingly, without making any addition in the entry to the cost and value of the article on account of its peculiar character. One of the entries was made on the 10th day of May, 1853, and the last two were made on the 6th day of June, in the same year. Conforming to the requirements of law, the collector of the port submitted the matter to the local appraisers to appraise, estimate, and ascertain, the dutiable value of the merchandise, and they added one half real per arroba, equal to six and one fourth cents for every twenty five pounds Spanish weight, to the invoice valuation of the merchandise. From that decision the plaintiffs appealed, and called for an appraisal of the actual value of the goods in the foreign market by merchant appraisers. They, the plaintiffs, informed the collector on the 11th day of June, 1853, that they should appeal, and on the 14th day of the same month the collector notified them that the appeal was allowed, but stated that he should not appoint appraisers until he heard from the Department, as he desired the aid of a general appraiser. Considerable delay ensued; but on the 28th day of September, of the same year, the collector, acting under the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the plaintiffs, entered into a written agreement, to the effect that they would substitute samples in the place of the merchandise, and submit the matters in dispute in all the cases to the determination of the Board of General Appraisers to be convened at the City of New York as soon as practicable, stipulating, at the same time, to abide by the appraisement of the board "in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if it had been made by merchant appraisers regularly appointed according to law." Accordingly, the general appraisers heard the several appeals, and on the 19th day of October, 1853, made a report in writing. Concentrated molasses constituted a portion of the cargo in five of the cases appealed, and it appeared by the report of the general appraisers that in all those cases they made an addition to the invoice value of that portion of the merchandise embraced in the entry. Of the five, it will be sufficient to give one as an example of the rest. It is as follows: "To add export duty on 522,338 lbs., at 87½ cts. per 500 lbs." Their reasons for making the addition are fully stated in their report. After stating that they had examined the samples, they say: "The Board assume that both the concentrated melada and concentrated molasses are sugar in a green state, and they are borne out in this view of the case by the invoices themselves, the concentrated molasses in every case being invoiced per arroba as sugar, and not per keg as molasses; the casks are also charged as sugar casks. The concentrated molasses is not susceptible of being guaged, which is another evidence that its proper classification is sugar."

Plaintiffs proved that the goods were assessed at New Orleans, according to that appraisement, and that they afterwards paid the duties under protest, to the defendant at St. Louis. They protested against the including in the computation of the dutiable value of the goods any sum whatever for export duty, averring in the protest that no such duty was paid by them, or demanded by the authorities at the place of exportation. Testimony was also introduced by the plaintiffs tending to show that concentrated molasses was well known in the foreign market; that it was not at that time regarded as sugar; that it was not subject to the sugar duty; that no such duty was demanded or paid; and that the invoice price represented the fair market value. Their witnesses were cross-examined by the defendant, and from the cross-examination it appeared that the plaintiffs, in 1852, set up a sugar boiling establishment at Matanzas, and that among the products manufactured by them was the article invoiced as concentrated molasses, which it seems is melada, or syrup boiled down to a denser consistency, and is manufactured by boiling the melada, and thus evaporating the watery portions until the point of crystallization is reached. Concentrated molasses, as the witnesses state, is a recent manufacture, and was unknown in the foreign market until about the time plaintiffs commenced to produce it from their establishment. When the article first appeared, the authorities, for a short time, allowed it to be exported without exacting any duty; but it was soon classed with green sugars, and charged with an export duty of eighty-seven and a half cents for every twenty arrobas of twenty-five pounds Spanish weight. Like sugar, it is sold, invoiced, and valued by weight, and not by measure, like the ordinary article of molasses. On the other hand, the defendant called and examined one of the general appraisers. Among other things, he testified that—

"The Board did make alterations from the invoice price or value by adding eighty-seven and a half cents for each five hundred pounds, invoice weight, and two reals or twenty-five cents to each barrel, in order to raise the same to the actual market value, or wholesale price, at the period of exportation in the principal markets of the country from which the same had been imported.

"The sums in figures set out opposite these several entries were additions made by the board to the invoice value of the merchandise. The 87½ cents for each 500 pounds was added to make the market value of the sugars called 'concentrated molasses,' and 25 cents to each barrel was added to make the market value of of the barrel.

"The term, 'to add export duty on,' was used as expressive of the principle upon which this sum was added, and not as conveying the supposition or belief that an export duty had been paid by the importers, or even that such an export duty was legally due to the Cuban Government; but it was added upon the principle that if the sum of 87½ cents per each 500 pounds was not payable for export duty, the value of the merchandise was thereby increased just that sum in the foreign market. Sugars being the basis of the appraisement, and 87½ cents per each 500 pounds being the export duty on the same, that sum was added to make the true foreign market value at the period of exportation."

To all this testimony the plaintiffs objected, but it was admitted by the court, and the plaintiffs excepted.

Thirteen points were then presented by the plaintiffs for instruction to the jury, all of which the court refused to give, and on the prayer of the defendant the jury were instructed, that "on the whole evidence the plaintiffs cannot recover." Under the rulings and instructions of the court the jury returned their verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs excepted to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as requested, and to the instructions given, that they, the plaintiffs, were not entitled to recover. On this branch of the case two questions are presented for decision: 1. Whether the addition was lawfully made to the invoice valuation of the merchandise described in the entry as concentrated molasses. 2. Whether the testimony of the general appraiser, as to the action of the Board in making the appraisement, was properly admitted.

1. It is provided by the Act of the 3d of March, 1851, to the effect that the collector, in all importations subject to an ad valorem duty, shall cause the actual market value or wholesale price of the importation at the period and place of exportation to be appraised, estimated and ascertained, and to such value or price shall be added all costs and charges, except insurance, including in every case a charge for commissions at the usual rates; and by the true construction of the Act, and, indeed, by its very words, that appraisement, estimation and ascertainment, when regularly made, becomes and is the true value of the importation at the place where the same was entered, "upon which the duties shall be assessed." By the 8th section of the Act of July 30th, 1846 (9 Stat. at L., 42), it is also provided, that it shall be the duty of the collector, within whose district dutiable goods may be imported or entered, to cause the duitable value of such imports to be appraised, estimated and ascertained, in accordance with the provisions of existing laws, and if the appraised value thereof shall exceed ten per cent. or more the value declared on the entry, then, in addition to the duties imposed by law on the same, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem on such appraised value. But a proviso is added, that under no circumstances shall the duty be assessed upon an amount less than the invoice value; any law of Congress to the contrary, notwithstanding. Importers are required to make an entry of their respective importations, which should always be accompanied by the invoice; and when the invoice is received, the packages for appraisement are designated on the invoice by the collector, who orders one in ten of them to the public store for the purposes of the appraisal. Examination of the selected packages is then made by the local appraisers; and if, in their opinion, the invoice value is too low, they increase it, and notify their doings to the collector; and if no appeal is taken from their appraisement by the importer, their decision in the premises is final and conclusive as to the dutiable value of the importation. Every importer, however, under those circumstances, has the right to appeal to merchant appraisers. Merchant appraisers formerly consisted of two merchants, one chosen by the importer and one by the collector; but under existing provisions of law, the collector may select a government appraiser, so that in the larger ports the Board usually consists of a merchant selected by the importer, and a permanent appraiser selected by the collector. 9 Stat. at L., 630. On the appeal, the merchant appraisers, so called, examine the packages ordered to the public store, appraise, estimate and ascertain the actual market value or wholesale value thereof, at the period of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the goods were imported, and certify the value so appraised, estimated and ascertained, to the collector; and in the absence of fraud, their decision is final and conclusive, and their appraisement in contemplation of law becomes, for the purposes of calculating and assessing the duties due to the United States, the true dutiable value of the importation. Act August 30, 1842, sec. 17, 5 Stat. at L., 564; Appraisement Act, March 3, 1851, sec. 1, 9 Stat. at L., 631. As was said by this court, in Bartlett v. Kane, 16 How., 272, the appraisers are appointed with powers, by all reasonable ways and means, to appraise, estimate and ascertain the true and actual market value and wholesale price of the importation. The exercise of these powers involves knowledge, judgment and discretion. We hold, as was held in that case, that when power or jurisdiction is delegated to any public officer or tribunal over a subject-matter, and its exercise is confided to his or their discretion, the acts so done are, in general, binding and valid as to the subject matter. The only questions which can arise between an individual and the public, or any person, denying their validity, are power in the officer and fraud in the party. All other questions are settled by the decision made or the act done by the tribunal or officer, whether executive, legislative, judicial, or special, unless an appeal or other revision is provided for by some appellate or supervisory tribunal prescribed by law. United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 691; Rankin v. Hoyt, 4 How., 327; Stairs v. Peaslee, 18 How., 524. One of the questions presented in the case last cited was, whether, in estimating the dutiable value of a certain article called cutch, the appraisers should have taken the value at the market of Calcutta, or London and Liverpool, or Halifax, at the period of exportation from the latter port; and the Chief Justice, speaking for the whole court, held, that in estimating the value of the cutch, it was the duty of the appraiser to determine what were the principal markets of the country from which it was exported into the United States, and that their decision that London and Liverpool were the principal markets for the article, was conclusive. Applying these principles to the present case, it follows, we think, wholly irrespective of the parol testimony, that the value of the importations certified to the collector constituted the true and actual dutiable value of the merchandise embraced in the respective entries made by the importers, and there is nothing in the statement accompanying the report, when considered in connection with the report itself, that is in any manner inconsistent with the view here taken as to the legal effect of their actton in the premises. On the contrary, it is difficult to misconstrue their report. They determine, in the first place, that the article described in the invoice and entry as concentrated molasses, was, in point of fact, a species of green sugar, and that the invoice and entry were erroneous, not only with respect to the value affixed to the article, but also as to its description. Payment of duties cannot be avoided because the importation is misdescribed either in the invoice or the entry, or in both, at the same time. Appraisers are required to appraise, estimate and ascertain the true market value of the importation, no matter what name may be affixed to it by the importer, and he cannot be benefited in the estimation of the duties here by the fact that, by accident or otherwise, he succeeded in exporting the packages from the foreign country without being subjected to the usual and lawful exactions there imposed. New manufactures naturally and constantly give rise to new questions in regard to revenue; but it cannot operate to benefit the plaintiffs in this controversy, that the subordinate authorities, at the place of exportation, were for a time misled or deceived as to the real character of the product in question, or that they mistook the true nature of their duty. Green sugar was subject to the export duty, but molasses was not; still, if the importations in question ought, in fact, to have been classed with the former, then it is clear that the importer, as matter of legal obligation, ought to have paid the export duty, and the determination of the appraisers was not an unreasonable one; that it was necessary to add a sum to the invoice valuation equal to the export duty to which it would have been subjected, if it had been correctly invoiced, in order to bring the dutiable value up to the actual market value or wholesale price in the foreign market. Both the report and the statement annexed to it must be taken in pari materia, and considered together; and when so construed, they do not appear to differ in any respect from the explanations given of them in the testimony of the general appraiser. Without regard to that testimony, it is not possible to hold that the Board added the export duty to the several importations, regarding the article as molasses, because they expressly state in the outset that they assume that concentrated molasses is sugar in a green state, and proceed to give their reasons for the conclusion, deducing the reasons given from the various invoices, which, as they affirm, bear them out in that view of the case. It is clear, therefore, that the appraisers did not add the eighty-seven and a half cents to the invoice valuation as an export duty on molasses, and it is conceded that sugar in a green state was by law subject to the export duty; so that putting the parol testimony in question out of the case, still the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover.

2. But suppose it to be otherwise, and that the words, "to add export duty on," as contained in the statement annexed to the report, are to be separately considered; still, it is difficult to see how the admission can be of any service to the plaintiffs. They must still maintain that the importations were, in fact, molasses, and that the export duty was added by the appraisers to the invoice valuation of molasses, as such, else they have no standing in court, for they do not deny that if the produce in question was really sugar in a green state, that it was competent for the appraisers to correct the misdescription in the invoice and entry, or disregard it, so as to perform their duty as required by law. Unless they have that right, then the grossest frauds may be committed by an importer with perfect impunity; and if they have that right, as clearly they must, then it follows that any dispute as to the nature of the produce imported, and its consequent classification in the invoice and entry, were questions of fact within the jurisdiction of the appraisers, and their decision is final and conclusive. On the other hand, if it be admitted that the words "to add export duty on" are ambiguous and of doubtful signification, then the case would be one where parol testimony would be admissible to explain the ambiguity, by showing what was done by the appraisers, and the manner in which the value of the importations was appraised, estimated and ascertained. U. S. v. Southmayd, 9 How., 638; Greely v. Thompson, 10 How., 228; Greely v. Burgess, 18 How., 413; Sampson v. Peaslee, 20 How., 574; Rankin v. Hoyt, 4 How., 335.

3. Plaintiffs also claimed, in some of the counts of the declaration, to recover back certain duties alleged to have been illegally exacted of them by the defendant, on certain barrels exported empty by them from the United States to Matanzas, and brought back filled with concentrated molasses. That claim, however, is not pressed in the case, because the same claim is embraced in another case, which is also before the court.

4. Another claim is to recover damage on account of the delay which ensued in completing the appraisement, and the consequent leakage and loss of the concentrated molasses; but we are not able to see any just ground for the claim, on the facts disclosed in the record. Appraisement of the goods is required by law, and as the detention of the goods is the necessary consequence of that requirement, it cannot be held, under the circumstances of this case, that it affords any ground of action against the defendant. Duties are required by law to be assessed on the goods, and the assessment is uniformly made on the quantity entered at the custom-house, without any allowance whatever for ordinary leakage and deterioration. Marriott v. Brune, 9 How., 619; Lawrence v. Caswell, 13 How., 488.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that there is no error in the record, and the judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

WILLIAM H. BELCHER AND CHARLES BELCHER, Plffs. in Er.,
v.
WM. A. LINN.

(See S. C., 24 How., 533-535.)

Barrels, manufactured in and exported from U. S., and brought back filled with molasses, are liable to duty.

Molasses barrels, manufactured here and exported to a foreign port, and there filled with molasses, and then imported with their contents to this country, were not brought back in the same condition as when exported, within the true intent and meaning of the Act of Congress.

The words "the same condition" mean not only that the identity of the article exported is preserved, but that its utility for its original purpose is unchanged.

Barrels filled with molasses and imported here formed a part of the charges of importation, and the value of the same should be added to the wholesale price of the importation, in order to ascertain the true basis on which to assess the duty.

Argued Mar. 8, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri.

This action was commenced by the present plaintiffs in error, in the court below, to recover of the defendant, Collector of the Port of St. Louis, an alleged excess of duties upon certain barrels. Verdict and judgment were for the defendant, under the direction of the court, and the plaintiffs brought the case to this court by writ of error.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

It was argued by the same counsel and at the same time as the preceding case, between the same parties.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri. The suit in the court below was brought by the present plaintiffs against the defendant as the Surveyor and acting Collector of the Customs of St. Louis, to recover the amount of certain duties alleged to have been illegally exacted of the plaintiff, and paid by him to the defendant under protest. As alleged in the declaration, the duties were assessed on the value of a large number of barrels, manufactured by the plaintiffs in the United States, exported empty to Matanzas, in the Island of Cuba, and brought back in 1853, filled with concentrated molasses or sugar. It was an action of assumpsit, and the declaration contained the usual counts for money had and received, together with a special count detailing all the circumstances on which the claim was founded. Defendant appeared, and the parties went to trial upon the general issue. At the close of the evidence, five prayers for instructions to the jury were presented by the plaintiffs, but the court refused to give any one of them; and at the request of the defendant, instructed the jury that, on the whole evidence in the case, the plaintiffs could not recover against the defendant. Whereupon the jury returned their verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs excepted, and sued out this writ of error to reverse the judgment rendered on the verdict. Under the circumstances of this case, as exhibited in the transcript, it will not be necessary to refer with much particularity to the evidence, as the sole question raised in the record is, whether the duties imposed upon the barrels by the appraisers were lawfully exacted. Satisfactory proof was introduced by the plaintiffs, showing that all the barrels were manufactured by the plaintiffs in the United States, and that they were exported empty to the foreign market, and there filled with concentrated molasses, or sugar in a green state, which was destined for the market of St. Louis. One of the plaintiffs' witnesses testified that the barrels, when they were received at the sugar boiling factory of the plaintiffs in Matanzas, were empty, but when sent from thence to the United States, they were filled with the different products of that establishment. Such of the barrels as were designated to receive molasses were filled at the bung without being unheaded, but it was necessary to take out one head from those which were to be filled with concentrated molasses, and all such of course had to be recoopered. And the same witness states, that in some instances it was necessary, after the barrels were placed in the sugar boiling factory, to add new hoops, but in all other respects the barrels were filled and sent back in the same condition in which they were received. Unless the barrels were brought back in the same condition in which they were when exported, then it is clear that they could not be admitted to entry free of duty; and so, if the value of the barrel in which a dutiable article or product is imported is one of the proper charges which are required by law to be added to the actual market value or wholesale price of the importation, then it is equally clear that the same conclusion must follow. In the case of James Knight et al. v. Augustus Schell (next case), decided at the present term, both of those questions were determined against the plaintiffs in this suit. That case was determined upon full consideration, and we are all satisfied that the decision of the question was correct, and that the reasons given for the decision are all applicable to this case and, therefore, they need not be repeated. It is impossible to hold that molasses barrels, manufactured here and exported to a foreign port, and there filled with molasses, whether it be the ordinary article or that denominated concentrated, and then reimported with their contents to this country, were brought back in the same condition as when exported, within the true intent and meaning of the Acts of Congress. Contrary to the views of the plaintiffs, we think the words, "the same condition," mean not only that the identity of the article exported is preserved, but that its utility for its original purpose is unchanged. On this point, we adopt the view taken by the defendant, because it appears to be more consonant with the language of the provision under consideration, and with the obvious intent of Congress in passing it. Suppose it be so; then it almost necessarily follows, even within the principle assumed by the plaintiffs, that barrels filled with molasses and imported here formed a part of the charges of importation. They admit that such is the general rule, but seek to establish an exception which would include the present case. Now, unless the barrels were brought back in the same condition as when exported, then the reason on which the supposed exception is founded fails; and it is difficult to see why the present case does not fall within the admitted general rule. Outside packages belonging to the merchant were required to be estimated and their value added to the actual cost of importation at a very early period; and without referring to the subsequent Acts of Congress and the regulations of the department, which were cited in the briefs of the counsel, the better opinion is, we think, that charges include, in general, the value of the sack, package, box, crate, barrel, hogshead, bale, cask, all outside coverings belonging to the merchant, or, so to speak, the integument of the importation; and that the value of the same, to be estimated at the usual cost to the importer, should properly be added to the actual market value or wholesale price of the importation, in order to ascertain the true basis on which to assess the duty.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the rulings and instruction of the circuit court were correct and the judgment is, accordingly, affirmed, with costs.

JAMES KNIGHT, JAS. H. WEST AND ROBERT SARGEANT, Piffs,

v.

AUGUSTUS SCHELL.

(See S. C., 24 How., 526-533.)

Barrels manufactured in and exported from U. S., and brought back filled with molasses, are liable to duty.

Barrels manufactured in the United States, and exported empty, and afterwards brought back to the United States filled with molasses purchased in Cuba, were not brought back "in the same condition as when exported," according to the true intent and meaning of the Acts of Congress.

Casks, including barrels, as well as hogsheads, exported from the United States empty, and returned filled, have almost invariably, since the passage of the Tariff Act of the 20th of July, 1846, been included among the dutiable articles, although of American manufacture.

Submitted Mar. 8, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

ON a certificate of division in opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

This was an action brought by Knight and others, merchants and partners in business, residing in the City of New York, in the court below, against Augustus Schell, Collector of of the Port of New York, to recover back a sum of money paid by the plaintiffs as duty upon a quantity of barrels manufactured by them in the City of New York, and sent by them from the port of New York to Cuba, and there filled with molasses, and brought back to New York thus filled. No change was, made in the barrels, except such as implied by their having been filled with molasses. On the return of the barrels, the collectors claimed that the barrels were dutiable, and declined to allow them to be entered duty free, insisting that the filling of them with molasses changed their condition within the meaning of the Act of July 30, 1846, and the Act of March 3, 1857. He exacted duties on the barrels at the rate of 24 per centum upon their value at Cuba, which was paid by the plaintiffs under protest. The plaintiffs having complied with the provisions of section 5 of the last mentioned Act, brought this action to recover back the money so paid within the time limited by said section. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and the action was brought to trial at the April Term, 1860. The judges of the circuit court were divided in opinion upon the question whether the barrels were, under the above circumstances, entitled to entry duty free.

Mr. J. T. Williams, for the plaintiffs:

The Acts of Congress of July 30, 1846, and March 3, 1857, provide that goods, wares and merchandise, the growth, product or manufacture of the United States, exported to a foreign country, and brought back to the United States in the same condition as when exported, shall be exempted from duty.

The question is, did the filling of the barrels with molasses change their condition? The object of the Tariff Law in question is obviously the protection of home industry. There were but two classes of articles that could reasonably have been referred to; first, articles of personal apparel, toilet furniture, books for personal reading, tools and implements of mechanical art; second, articles as boxes, barrels, bags, &c., taken out to be filled and brought back.

The first class was not the one referred to in the provision under consideration, because it was already exempted from duty by the Act of 1799, and as to such articles it is of no importance of what growth or where manufactured. The provision in question, then, was intended to apply to the class of articles to which the barrels in controversy belong.

It remains to inquire, then, did Congress contemplate that the articles of this class should be brought back in the same empty condition in which they were exported? Did Congress intend to say to the manufacturer, that, for the purpose of encouraging you to manufacture at home, we provide that in case you so manufacture them here and carry them to Cuba empty and bring them back in the same empty condition, they shall, on their return, be entered duty free; but if you fill them with molasses at Cuba, you shall pay duty upon them at 24 per cent. of their value at Cuba?

It is not easy to see how it can be said that that the condition of a barrel is changed by filling it with molasses. It is true that they are besmeared with their contents; some of it has penetrated the seams of the wood; they are more or less worn; but this results, inevitably, from the use to which they are put. Anything carried out for any purpose must suffer similar change from being applied to the purpose for which it was sent out. The sending out and bringing back would be an idle expense unless the articles were put to some use, and even if put to no use whatever, the articles must, by the very voyage, be more or less worn, and in that respect their condition is changed.

Mr. Edwin M. Stanton, Atty-Gen., for the defendant:

There are two answers to the claim for the plaintiffs.

First. The Act of 1799 contemplates, and the Act of 1857 expressly declares, that the barrels or casks brought back must be in the same condition as when exported, and not in the condition of vessels containing (and only used and imported as and for containing) another and a dutiable commodity. The declaration itself avers that the casks were brought back in the same condition as when exported, although it adds the words "with their contents."

Second. The Act requiring all charges to be added, specially enumerating "putting up and packing," makes no exception of charges for barrels manufactured in this country, as distinguished from barrels manufactured abroad.

See Act of 1823, secs. 4, 7; 3 Stat., 729.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court on a certificate of division of opinion from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. It was an action of assumpsit, brought by the present plaintiffs against the defendant, as the Collector of the Port of New York, to recover back certain duties paid by the plaintiffs under protest, upon certain barrels, in which molasses was imported into the United States from Matanzas.

It was proved, on the trial, that the plaintiffs, in the year 1859, imported from Matanzas 728 barrels of molasses by the brig Irene, 801 barrels of molasses by a vessel called The Yumuri, and 120 barrels of molasses by a vessel called The Trovatore; that the barrels containing the molasses were manufactured by the plaintiffs at Newburg, in the State of New York, and shipped from the port of New York empty to Matanzas, where they were filled with molasses, and returned in the three vessels above named to the port of New York; that the barrels were made up and completed in every respect before they were shipped to Cuba. They were returned, most of them, in the same vessels that carried them out from New York, and all of them in the same condition in which they were shipped or carried out from New York, except being filled with molasses.

They were filled with molasses at Cuba. When the barrels were brought back from Cuba filled with molasses, in the vessels above referred to, the collector claimed that the barrels themselves were dutiable, and that they were not entitled to entry duty free. He claimed a duty upon them at the rate of 24 per centum of their value at Cuba, and refused to allow them to be entered, unless such duty was paid; that the plaintiffs paid to the defendant that portion of the duties which was upon the separate value of the barrels under protest, claiming that the barrels were not legally subject to the payment of any duty, but were exempt from duty by virtue of the provisions of the 47th section of the Act of Congress of March 2, 1799, 1 Stat. at L., 627, and of schedule I of the existing tariff.

The plaintiffs thereupon, having complied in all respects with the provisions of section 5th of the Act of March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. at L., 199), entitled "An Act reducing the duties on imports, and for other purposes," brought this action to recover back the sum so paid under protest, as duties upon the separate value of the barrels, within the time prescribed in said Act for bringing the same.

Upon the foregoing facts, the question arose whether barrels manufactured in the United States and exported empty, and afterwards brought back to the United States filled with molasses, purchased in Cuba, were brought back "in the same condition as when exported," according to the true intent and meaning of the Acts of Congress in that behalf; and the opinion of the judges being opposed on that question, it was certified to this court for decision. By the Act of the 2d of March, 1799, it is provided, that on any goods, wares or merchandise, of the growth or manufacture of the United States, which may have been exported to some foreign port or place, and brought back to the United States, and upon which no drawback bounty or allowance has been made, no duty shall be demanded. 1 Stat. at Large, 662. Among other things, the 9th section of the Act of the 30th of August, 1842 (5 Stat at L., 560), provides that all goods, wares and merchandise, the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States, exported to a foreign country, and brought back to the United States, shall be exempt from duty. Dutiable articles, and those exempt from duty, are arranged in schedules by the Act of the 30th of July, 1846 (9 Stat. at L., 49), and the schedule of the latter class embraces goods, wares and merchandise, the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States, exported to a foreign country, and brought back to the United States in the same condition as when exported. To entitle the article to entry free of duty, it must also appear that it is one on which no drawback or bounty has been allowed. It will be observed, that the prior Acts of Congress did not require that the goods should be brought back in the same condition as when exported, in order to entitle the importer to claim that they should be admitted to entry as included in the free list. That language is retained in the Act of March 3d, 1857 (11 Stat. at L., 199), without any alteration or amendment; so that although it may appear that the goods were the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States; that they were exported to a foreign country, and brought back to the United States; still, unless it also appears they were so brought back in the same condition as when exported, the collector of the port is not authorized to admit them to entry, free of duty.

Molasses barrels exported empty, when new, to Matanzas, and there filled and, with their contents, brought back to the United States, cannot truly be said to be in the same condition as when they were exported. Oftentimes, when emptied of their contents, they are unfit for a second voyage, and seldom or never afterwards have the same market value as when they were new. When filled in the foreign port, the barrels have been applied to the commercial use for which they were manufactured; and when shipped with their contents, brought back to the United States, and are offered with their contents by the importer for entry at the custom-house, they have then, in respect to the revenue laws of the United States, acquired a new character. For all the purposes of appraisement, with a view to ascertain the dutiable value of the importation, the barrels, if filled, are regarded, with their contents, as packages; and it is the duty of the collector, by the express words of the statute, to order one in ten of the packages to the public store. Examination of the selected packages is then made by the local appraisers; and in case of appeal, the same packages are required to remain in the public store, and frequently constitute the only attainable basis of the subsequent adjudication by the merchant appraiser. Such packages are ordered to the public store in the same condition as when imported, and it is not possible to doubt that Congress intended to include, in the words "one in ten of the packages", the covering of the importations, if belonging to the merchant, as well as the contents within it. Confirmation of these views, if any be needed, may be found in the almost unbroken practice of the Treasury Department. Take, for example, the Treasury Circular of the 26th of November, 1846, and it will be found that it fully justifies the conclusion to which we have come.

By that circular the several collectors were informed that—

"The principle upon which the appraisement is based is this: that the actual value of articles on shipboard at the last place of shipment to the United States, including all preceding expenses, duties, costs, charges and transporation, is the foreign value upon which the duty is to be assessed. The costs and charges that are to be embraced in fixing the valuation, over and above the value of the article at the place of growth, production or manufacture, are—

"The transporation, shipment and tranship-ment, with all the expenses included, from the place of growth, production or manufacture, whether by land or water carriage, to the vessel in which shipment is made to the United States. Included in these estimates is the value of the sack, package, box, crate, hogshead, barrel, bale, cask, can, and covering of all kinds, bottles, jars, vessels and demijohns." Mayo, Comp., 850, 851.

Casks, including barrels, as well as hogsheads, exported from the United States empty, and returned filled, have almost invariably, since the passage of the Tariff Act of the 20th of July, 1846, been included among the dutiable charges, although of American manufacture, on the ground that, when so filled and brought back, they were not in the same condition as when exported, within the meaning of the provision of that Act. Mayo, Comp., 407. That construction has been affirmed by the Treasury Department, since the passage of the Appraisement Act of March 3d, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 629), as will appear by reference to the Treasury Circular adopted shortly after its passage. By that circular the Department declares that—"The law enjoins that there shall be added 'all costs and charges, except insurance, and including, in every case, a charge for commissions at the usual rates.' These charges are as follows, to wit:

"They must include 'purchasing, carriages, dyeing, bleaching, dressing, finishing, putting up and packing,' together with the value of the sack, package, box, crate, hogshead, barrel, bale, cask, can, and covering of all kinds, bottles, jars, vessels, and demijohns."

Without pursuing the discussion further, suffice it to say, that we are all of the opinion that the question under consideration must be answered in the negative, and we accordingly direct that it be certified to the court below, as the opinion of this court, that barrels manufactured in the United States, and exported empty to Cuba, and afterwards brought back to the United States filled with molasses purchased in Cuba, were not brought back "in the same condition as when exported," within the true intent and meaning of the Acts of Congress in that behalf.

ORDER.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, and on the point or question upon which the judges of the said circuit court were opposed in opinion, and which was certified to this court for its opinion, agreeably to the Act of Congress in such case made and provided, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is the opinion of this court that barrels, manufactured in the United States and exported empty to Cuba and afterwards brought back to the United States filled with molasses purchased in Cuba, are not brought back in the same condition as when exported, according to the true intent and meaning of the Acts of Congress in that behalf. Whereupon, it is now here ordered by the court that it be so certified to the said circuit court.

v.

EDWARD GOLDSMITH.

(See S. C., 24 How., 536-544.)

Partnership, what is—participation in profits—servant or special agent is not partner, although paid from profits—one employed to negotiate sales, not a partner.

Partnership is a voluntary contract between two or more competent persons, to place their money, effects, labor and skill, or some one or all of them, in lawful commerce or business, with the understanding that there shall be a communion of the profits thereof between them.

While every partnership is founded on a community of interest, every community of interest does not constitute a partnership.

Whenever there is a community of interest in the capital stock, and also a community of interest in the profit and loss, then the case is one of actual partnership.

It is seldom or never essential that both of these ingredients should concur in the case in order to establish that relation.

Participation in the profits will not alone create a partnership between the parties themselves as to the property, contrary to their intention.

Actual participation in the profits as principal creates a partnership as between the parties and third persons, whatever may be their intention in that behalf, and notwithstanding the dormant partner was not expected to participate in the loss beyond the amount of the profits.

Actual partnership, as between a creditor and the dormant partner, is considered by the law to subsist where there has been a participation in the profits, although the participant may have expressly stipulated with his associates against all the usual incidents to that relation.

That rule, however, has no application whatever to a case of service or special agency, where the employé has no power as a partner in the firm and no interest in the profits, as property, but is simply employed as a servant or special agent, and is to receive a given sum out of the profits, or a proportion of the same, as compensation for his services.

Unless the supposed dormant partner is in some way interested in the profits of the business, as principal, he cannot bring suit as a partner.

Where one employed by a partnership to negotiate sales had no interest in the property, and it was to remain for sale in the custody and control of commission merchants who stood responsible for the proceeds, and he did not rely upon the profits for his compensation, although he was to have one half the profits with a guaranty of $1,800 a year, he was not a partner.

Argued Feb. 28, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought in the court bellow by Goldsmith, the present defendant in error.

Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendants brought the case to this court by writ of error.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. M. Blair, for the plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Badger & Carlisle, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri. The declaration in this case was filed on the 2d day of September, 1858, by the present defendant, who was the plaintiff in the court below. It was an action of assumpsit, and the declaration contained five counts. Without attempting to give any very precise analysis of the declaration, it will be sufficient to say that the plaintiff alleged, that on the 29th day of August, 1857, at the special instance and request of the defendants, he sent and consigned to them sundry cases and boxes of cigars of great value, in order that they might sell and dispose of the same for him, on their guaranty of sales, for a certain commission or reward, and that the defendants, in consideration thereof, undertook, and then and there promised, to sell and dispose of the cigars on his account, and to be answerable to him for the due payment of the sums for which the same should be sold, and pay over the proceeds to him. And the complaint is, that they not only neglected and refused to perform their promises in that behalf, but that they disposed of the consignment to their own use. Defendants appeared and demurred to the declaration, but the court overruled the demurrer, and the parties subsequently went to trial upon the general issue. Testimony was introduced on both sides, and after the arguments were closed, the defendants presented to the court certain prayers for instruction, which were refused. And under the instructions given by the court, the jury returned their verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $3,000. Exceptions were duly taken by the defendants, not only to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as requested, but also to the instructions given, and the question to be decided is, whether, upon the facts disclosed in the record, there was any error in the action of the court. It appears from the evidence that the plaintiff was a merchant, residing at Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, and that the defendants were commission merchants, doing business at St. Louis in the State of Missouri. For the purposes of this investigation, it is conceded that the cigars were sent by the plaintiff, and that they were duly received by the defendants, and there is no dispute as to the quantity or their value. Some of the cigars were forwarded by railroad, but the largest invoice was shipped, in bond, with the understanding that the defendants would make the necessary advances for the duties and other charges. Accordingly, they received the cases and boxes containing the cigars at the custom-house, and paid the duties and freight. All of the cigars were sent and received under the terms and conditions specified in a certain letter from the plaintiff to the defendants, to which more particular reference will presently be made. Prior to the date of that letter, it had been agreed between the plaintiff and one H. F. Hook, that the latter should go to St. Louis, and if practicable, make an arrangement there with some responsible commission house to accept consignments of cigars from the plaintiff, and sell and dispose of them on his account. It seems that Hook wanted employment, and the plaintiff wanted to extend his business. They accordingly agreed to make an effort of that kind, and if successful, that Hook should have half the profits, with a guaranty from the plaintiff that his compensation should amount to $1,800. Pursuant to that understanding, Hook went to St. Louis and made an arrangement with the defendants, and communicated the terms and conditions of it to the plaintiff. By the terms of this arrangement, the defendants were to sell for a commission of two and a half per cent., and were to guaranty the sales for a like commission. They were to receive the goods in bond, at the custom-house, make the necessary advances for duties and charges, and accept drafts drawn by the plaintiff against the consignments. Having learned the nature of the proffered terms, the plaintiff, on the 28th day of August, 1857, wrote to the defendants, the letter to which reference has already been made. Referring in express terms to that arrangement, he informed the defendants by that letter that he had consigned to them an invoice of cigars, and requested them to render to him, when the cigars were sold, an account of the sales; and what is more, he therein stated to the defendants that if they were willing to make advances on such goods, he would consign to them, in a short time, additional invoices to a large amount; and in conclusion, employed the following language: "All shipped to your house by me; I will hold you responsible." Full proof is exhibited in the record, that all the cigars in controversy were sent and received under the arrangement referred to in that letter, and the person who made the arrangement with the defendants testified that it was never changed. He remained in St. Louis to negotiate sales, and he also testified that he managed the whole business and conducted the correspondence with the plaintiff. Defendants dissolved their partnership on the 1st day of January, 1858, so that it became desirable for them to get rid of their consignments; and on the 15th day of the same month, all of the cigars not previously sold were turned over to another firm, pursuant to an order drawn on them by the person who negotiated the arrangement. That step was taken without consulting the plaintiff, and without his knowledge, and ten days later the defendants wrote to the plaintiff and declined to render an account of sales, affirming that they had made none, and assuming, in effect, that the person who negotiated the arrangement was the general agent of the plaintiff with respect to the cigars; and they informed the plaintiff, in the same letter, that he, the supposed agent, on withdrawing the consignment, had paid back to them what money they had advanced on the same. Much other testimony was introduced on the one side or the other, but the statement already given exhibits the material facts necessary to be considered in this stage of the investigation.

Two theories were assumed by the defendants at the trial, and the prayers for instruction were all based upon the one or the other of those theories. It was insisted, in the first place, that the person who negotiated the arrangement and finally withdrew the consignment, was a partner with the plaintiff in the whole transaction; and if not, then, second, that he was the agent of the plaintiff and, as such, had authority to withdraw the consignment and acquit the defendants from all further responsibility. But the presiding justices instructed the jury, in substance and effect, that the defendants were responsible for the cigars consigned under the letter of instructions, whether sold directly by themselves as factors of the plaintiff, or by Hook, as authorized to negotiate sales, provided the cigars were received into their possession; that the defendants were authorized by the letter to sell the cigars in the usual course of business, and if they found that Hook was also authorized to negotiate sales, then the sales by him in the usual way were also valid, and that the defendants, by the letter, were to make the advances, have two and a half per cent. commissions on sales, and two and a half per cent. on guaranty of sales, and were to account to the plaintiff. Among other things, they also instructed the jury, that there was no evidence to show any authority from the plaintiff to turn the cigars over to an auctioneer to be sold, and that the plaintiff, therefore, was entitled to recover the net proceeds of the cigars sold, either by the defendant or Hook, if the latter was authorized to negotiate sales, and the market value at St. Louis of the residue, less the charges paid for freight, storage, insurance, drayage and duties. Both of the defenses set up in the court below are still insisted upon in this court, but we think neither of them can be sustained, and that the instructions given to the jury were correct.

1. Partnership is usually defined to be a voluntary contract between two or more competent persons, to place their money, effects, labor and skill, or some one or all of them, in lawful commerce or business, with the understanding that there shall be a communion of the profits thereof between them. But partnership and community of interest, independently considered, are not always the same thing; for the first, as between the partners themselves, is founded upon the copartnership agreement which prescribes the relation they bear to each other, and of itself creates the community of interest; but the last may exist, notwithstanding there has been no agreement between the parties. Part owners of a ship, for example, are uniformly treated as tenants in common, and not as partners, although it cannot be denied that there is a community of interest between them in every part of the vessel, and each is entitled to a share of her earnings in proportion to his undivided interest, and must also share the loss. Joint owners of merchandise may consign it for sale abroad to the same consignee; and if each gives separate instructions for his own share, it is well settled law that these interests are several, and that they are not to be treated as partners in the adventure. Numerous illustrations of the principle are to be found in the decisions of the courts, of which we will give but one more at the present time. Where a broker or other agent purchases goods for several persons, each agreeing to take a certain portion of the entire parcel, it is clear, if there is no arrangement that the goods shall be sold on joint account, that the transaction does not amount to a partnership although there is, undeniably, a community of interest in the goods so purchased. These examples will be sufficient to show that while every partnership is founded on a community of interest, it is, nevertheless, incorrect to suppose that every community of interest necessarily constitutes the relation of partnership within the meaning of the commercial law. Whenever it appears that there is a community of interest in the capital stock, and also a community of interest in the profit and loss, then it is clear that the case is one of actual partnership between the parties themselves and, of course, it is so as to third persons. All of the decided cases, however, agree that it is seldom or never essential that both of these ingredients should concur in the case in order to establish that relation. Cases occur, undoubtedly, where a community of interest in the property, without any regard to the profits, will almost necessarily lead to the conclusion that the relation between the parties was that of partnership; and, under some circumstances, that conclusion will follow, although the sale of the property for the joint interest may not be contemplated by the parties. On the other hand, it is equally clear that there may be such a community of interest in the profits, without regard to loss, and without any community of interest whatever in the property, as will establish that relation. Participation in the profits, however, will not alone create a partnership between the parties themselves as to the property, contrary to their intention. But merchants and traders are often justly held to be partners as to third persons, where they are not to be deemed such, expressly or impliedly, as between themselves. Judge Story distributes the cases in which a liability exists as to third persons into five classes, and it is obvious that the present case does not fall within any principle of that classification. Story, Part., sec. 542; Greenl. Ev., sec. 483. He admits, however, that the pressure of the general doctrine is most severely felt in that class of cases where all the parties charged, as partners, are to share the profits between them, but the losses are to be borne exclusively by one of their number. Actual participation in the profits as principal, we think, creates a partnership as between the parties and third persons, whatever may be their intentions in that behalf, and notwithstanding the dormant partner was not expected to participate in the loss beyond the amount of the profits. Every man who has a share of the profits of a trade or business ought also to bear his share of the loss, for the reason, that in taking a part of the profits, he takes a part of the fund of the trade on which the creditor relies for payment. Grace v. Smith, 2 W. Bl., 998; Waugh v.

Carver, 2 H. Bl., 235. Actual partnership, as between a creditor and the dormant partner, is considered by the law to subsist where there has been a participation in the profits, although the participant may have expressly stipulated with his associates against all the usual incidents to that relation. Bond v. Pittard, 3 Mees. & W., 357. That rule, however, has no application whatever to a case of service or special agency, where the employé has no power as a partner in the firm and no interest in the profits, as property, but is simply employed as a servant or special agent, and is to receive a given sum out of the profits, or a proportion of the same, as a compensation for his services.

Merchants are obliged to have clerks, and oftentimes find it necessary to employ brokers or special agents to effect sales, and it is no more detrimental to their creditors that such employés should be paid out of the profits of their trade than from any other source of income within their disposal. Unless the supposed dormant partner is in some way interested in the profits of the business, as principal, it is plain that he cannot bring suit as a partner, and go into equity and compel an account; nor can it be held that he has any such lien on the profits as a court of equity may enforce; and if not, then his condition is the same as that of an ordinary creditor, and he must pursue his remedy against his employer. Denny et al. v. Cabot et al., 6 Met., 90; Vanderburgh v. Hull, 20 Wend., 70. Repeated decisions have recognized this distinction, and although it may happen, as heretofore, that cases will arise on the one side or the other of the line, approaching in their facts so near to each other that the difference between them may appear to be unsubstantial, yet the distinction itself, we think, is well founded in reason, and that the only difficulty is in the application of the principle on which it rests. Hallet v. Desban, 14 La. Ann., 535.

No such difficulty, however, arises in this case. Defendants knew the exact relation which Hook sustained to them and to the plaintiff, and they had the letter of the plaintiff in their possession, informing them that he should hold them responsible for the cigars. They knew what the arrangement was, and that the goods had been sent by the plaintiff and received by them, on the terms and conditions specified in that letter. Irrespective of the guaranty, it is difficult to see how Hook could have any interest in the profits as a partner with the plaintiff. He had no interest in the property, and by the arrangement which he himself negotiated, the cigars were to remain for sale in the custody and control of the defendants, as commission merchants, and they stood responsible to the plaintiff for the proceeds. But he did not rely upon the profits for his compensation, for unless one half the profits exceeded $1,800 a year, he would neither be benefited nor injured by the success or failure of the adventure, except so far as the latter result might have a tendency to induce his employer to dispense with his services. Little or nothing was ever realized from the enterprise and, of course, no excess of profits over the amount of the guaranty was ever earned. It is quite obvious, therefore, that the theory of the defendants on this branch of the case cannot be sustained.

2. It is insisted by the defendants that Hook was the agent of the plaintiff and, as such, that he had authority to withdraw the cigars from their custody and control, and turn them over to the other firm. On that point, the presiding justice instructed the jury that there was no evidence in the case to support that theory, and, after a careful examination of the evidence exhibited in the transcript, we entirely concur in that view of the case; and the judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

ANDREW J. NESBITT, JEROME CARDING, FREDERICK BINKLEY, JAMES D. TRIMBLE, WILSON J. MATHIS AND ROBERT McNEELY.

Proof necessary in action for malicious prosecution—charge unfounded—want of probable cause—malice—may be proved by circumstances—onus probandi is on plaintiff—what is probable cause—question of fact—detention of plaintiff in prison, which is result of his own request for delay, and of his neglect to give security, is no ground of complaint.

To support an action for a malicious criminal prosecution the plaintiff must prove, in the first place, the fact of prosecution, and that the defendant was himself the prosecutor, or that he instigated its commencement, and that it finally terminated in acquittal.

He must also prove that the charge preferred against him was unfounded, and that it was made without reasonable or probable cause, and that the defendant, in making or instigating it, was actuated by malice.

The burden of proof in the first instance is upon the plaintiff to make out his case, and if he fails to do so in any one of these particulars, the defendant has no occasion to offer any evidence in his defense.

Malice alone is not sufficient to sustain the action; because a person actuated by the plainest malice may, nevertheless, prefer a well-founded accusation, and have a justifiable reason for the prosecution of the charge.

Want of reasonable and probable cause is as much an element in the action as the evil motive, and though the averment is a negative one it must be proved by the plaintiff by some affirmative evidence, unless the defendant dispenses with such proof by pleading singly the truth of the several facts involved in the charge.

Either of these allegations may be proved by circumstances.

NOTE.—Malicious prosecution—action for causing a criminal prosecution.

An action on the case lies for a false and malicious prosecution for any crime, whether capital or not, by which the party may be put in peril of his life, suffer in his liberty, reputation or property; whether the prosecutor proceed so far as actually to exhibit an indictment on which the party was acquitted, or not. Roll. Abr., 112; Churchill v. Siggers, 3 El. & B., 937.

It must appear that the motive for prosecuting the original action, whether civil or criminal, was malicious, and the action without probable cause. Cro. Eliz., 70, 134; Leon., 107; Kelw., 81; Moo., 600;

Want of probable cause is evidence of malice, but it is not the same thing; and unless it is shown that both concurred in the prosecution, or that the one was combined with the other in making or instigating the charge, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in an action of this description.

The plaintiff must show that the defendant acted from malicious motives in prosecuting him, and that he had no sufficient reason to believe him to be guilty. If either of these be wanting, the action must fail.

Want of probable cause is evidence of malice for the consideration of the jury; but the converse of the proposition cannot be sustained.

The onus probandi is upon the plaintiff to prove affirmatively, by circumstances or otherwise, as he may be able, that the defendant had no reasonable ground for commencing the prosecution.

Probable cause is the existence of such facts and circumstances as would excite the belief, in a reasonable mind, acting on the facts within the knowledge of the prosecutor, that the person charged was guilty of the crime for which he was prosecuted.

Whether the prosecution was or was not commenced from malicious motives, is a question of facts, and it is for the jury to determine whether the inference of malice is a reasonable one from the facts assumed in the instruction.

If there was probable cause for the arrest of the defendant, he can be lawfully detained a reasonable time till the warrant was issued and executed.

Where plaintiff was detained in prison for the space of seven days, as the necessary consequence of his own request for delay, and the neglect on his part to offer any satisfactory security for his appearance at the time appointed for the examination; held, no ground of complaint.

Argued Feb. 25, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee.

This was an action of trespass on the case commenced by Wheeler, the present plaintiff in error, in the court below, against the present defendants in error, for false imprisonment.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff brought the case to this court by writ of error.

It appears that the plaintiff was arrested on a charge of horse stealing; that the only grounds of suspicion against him were that he, in company with two companions, Irishmen, were found to have in their possession four fine horses; that both he and his companions were indifferently clad, and were all strangers in that locality. The fact was that these horses belonged to Wheeler, and that he merely permitted the two Irishmen to ride one each, as they happened to be going in the same direction as himself.

The case further appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. W. L. Underwood, for plaintiff in error:

The gravamen of the plaintiff's complaint against the defendants, is, first, that they conspired; second, in a malicious prosecution; third, whereby he was falsely imprisoned.

As to the first point, counsel cited Bouv. L. Dict., tit. Conspiracy; Rex v. Rispal, 3 Burr., 1320; Chit. Cr. L., 1142; 2 Stark. Ev., 401, 403; 3 Chit. Cr. L., 1139, 1143.

2. The gravamen of the action is, that the plaintiff has improperly been made the subject of legal process, to his damage.

2 Greenl. Ev., 99.

There are two grounds necessary to support an action for malicious prosecution—malice and the want of probable cause. The latter is the gist of the action.

Morgan v. Hughes, 2 T. R., 225.

Malice is not to be considered in the sense of hate or spite against an individual. Want of caution, in occasioning injury to others, is sufficient.

See 2 Greenl. Ev., 453; Brooks v. Warwick, 2 Stark.; Bouv. L. Dic., tit. Malice; 1 Camp., 200, note a; Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R., 493.

Acquittal by the magistrate is prima facie evidence of want of probable cause.

Suspicion and conjecture do not amount to probable cause.

Stone v. Stevens, 12 Conn., 219; Holburn v. Neal, 4 Dana, 128.

The charge of the court below was erroneous under the above authorities.

Mr. P. Phillips, for the defendant in error.

The plaintiff must show that the defendant acted from malicious motives, and that he had no sufficient reason to believe him to be guilty. If either be wanting, the action must fail.

It must also appear, in every case, that the original suit is ended, and that it terminated in favor of the defendant in the original suit, either by acquittal, abandonment or final judgment in his favor, before the commencement of the action for malicious prosecution; otherwise the point would come to be tried too soon and disorderly. A nolle prosequi by the Attorney-General is not such a termination of a criminal suit as will authorize an action. An acquittal must be shown. Finding of an indictment is some evidence of probable cause. 6 Mod., 261; 10 Mod., 219; Gilb. Cas., 185; Cardival v. Smith, 109 Mass., 158; Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush., 217; Parker v. Where the complainant withdraws the prosecution, and the accused is thereupon discharged, or the magistrate discharges on examination, or the grand jury fail to find an indictment, or the prosecuting attorney discharges without the action of the grand jury, it is equivalent to an acquittal; and is a sufficient termination of the suit. Williams v. Norwood, 2 Yerg., 329; Johnson v. Martin, 3 Munf., 346; Sayles v. Briggs, 4 Met., 421; Cardival v. Smith, 109 Mass., 158; S. C., 12 Am. Rep., 682; Brown v. Randall, 36 Conn., 56; 4 Am. Williams, 11 M. & W., 205; Bacon v. Waters, 2 Allen, 400; Schoonover v. Myers, 28 Ill., 308.

It has been held that a verdict on the merits is not necessary; a dismissal or abandonment of a criminal prosecution before trial is a sufficient terminaerhoff. 8 Watts, 241: Ewing v. Sanford, 19 Ala., 615.

Probable cause is a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the accused is guilty of the offense with which he is charged.

Munns v. Dupont, 3 Wash., C. C., 31; Foshay v. Ferguson, 2 Den., 617.

So that, although the plaintiff is entirely innocent, if the defendant shows that he has reasonable grounds for believing him guilty at the time the charge was made, the action cannot be sustained.

While malice in this form of action is not to be limited to "spite or hatred," it must consist in the "malus animus" as denoting that the party is actuated by improper and indirect motives.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee. John J. Wheeler, the plaintiff in error, complained in the court below against the present defendants, in a plea of trespass on the case, as will more fully appear by reference to the declaration which is set forth at large in the transcript. It alleged three distinct causes of action, and each cause of action was set forth in two separate counts. All of the counts, however, were founded upon the same transaction, so that a brief reference to the first, third and fifth of the series will be sufficient to exhibit the substance of the declaration, and the nature of the supposed grievances for which the suit was instituted. First, the plaintiff alleged that the defendants, falsely and maliciously contriving and intending to injure him in his good name and reputation, on the 18th day of September, 1856, at a certain place within the jurisdiction of the court below, went before a certain justice of the peace for that county, and falsely and maliciously, and without any reasonable or probable cause, charged the plaintiff with having feloniously stolen four horses, which he then and there had in his possession, and caused and procured the magistrate to grant a warrant, under his hand and seal, for the apprehension of the plaintiff, upon that false, malicious and groundless charge; and that he, the plaintiff, was accordingly arrested by virtue of the warrant so procured, and falsely and maliciously, and without any reasonable or probable cause, imprisoned in the prison house of the State there situate, for the space of seven days; and that at the expiration of that period he was fully acquitted and discharged of the supposed offense, and that the prosecution for the same was wholly ended and determined. Second, the plaintiff alleged that the defendants, on the same day and at the same place, with force and arms assaulted him, the plaintiff, and forced and compelled him to go to the prison house of the State there situate, and then and there falsely and maliciously, and without any reasonable or probable cause, imprisoned him for the space of seven days, contrary to the laws and customs of the State. Third, the plaintiff alleged that the defendants, on the same day and at the same place, did unlawfully and falsely conspire, combine and agree among themselves and with others, that the first named defendant, with a view to procure a warrant for the arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff, should go before a certain magistrate of the county, and make oath, according to law, that he, the complainant, verily believed that the plaintiff, with two other persons, had committed the aforesaid offense, and that the other defendants in this suit should attend the preliminary examination of the plaintiff before the magistrate, and then and there aid abet, and assist the complainant, by their testimony, influence and advice, in prosecuting the charge; and the plaintiff averred that the defendants so far carried their corrupt and evil conspiracy and agreement into effect, that they procured the warrant from the magistrate by the means contemplated, and that he, the tion of the prosecution (Kelley v. Sage, 12 Kan., 109; McWilliams v. Hoban, 42 Md., 56; Gilbert v. Emmons, 42 Ill., 143; Fay v. O'Neill, 36 N. Y., 11; Leever v. Hamill, 57 Ind., 423); so is the quashing of an indictment and discharge of defendant. Hays v. Blizzard, 30 Ind., 457; discharge on habeas corpus, after commitment by justice, is not. Walker v. Martin, 43 Ill., 508; Swartwout v. Dickelman, 12 Hun, 358.

The insufficiency of the indictment is no defense, nor its rejection by the grand jury. Stancliff v. Palmeter, 18 Ind., 321; Jones v. Gwin, 10 Mod., 148, 214; Pippet v. Hearn, 5 Barn. & A., 634; Shaul v. Brown, 28 Iowa, 37; Chambers v. Robinson, 2 Str., 691; Wicks v. Fentham, 4 Term, 247.

The action lies if some of the charges in the indictment are maliciously preferred, though others are not. Reed v. Taylor, 4 Taunt., 616.

The action lies for knowingly procuring the indictment of a person for an act not a crime (Dennis v. Ryan, 5 Lans., 350; 63 Barb., 145; 65 N. Y., 385); or falsely and maliciously accusing of, and procuring arrest and indictment of another for, an act believed to be a crime (Shaul v. Brown, 28 Iowa, 37; 1 Am. Lead. Cas., 281; Anderson v. Buchanan, Wright, 725; Farlie v. Danks, 2 Eng. L. & E., 115; Streight v. Bell, 37 Ind., 550; Collins v. Love, 7 Blackf., 416; Barton v. Kavanaugh, 12 La. Ann., 332); or falsely and maliciously prosecuting before a court which has no jurisdiction of the crime. Morris v. Scott, 21 Wend., 281; Sweet v. Negus, 30 Mich., 406; Stone v. Stevens, 12 Conn., 219; Hays v. Youngiove, 7 B. Mon., 545; contra, Painter v. Ives, 4 Neb., 122; Turpin v. Remy, 3 Blackf., 210.

Making a true statement in good faith, through which a person is prosecuted or indicted, will not support an action for malicious prosecution, although the facts stated constitute no crime. Dennis v. Ryan, 65 N. Y., 385; Bennett v. Black, 1 Stew., 494; Wyatt v. White, 5 H. & N., 371; McNeely v. Driskill, 2 Blackf., 259; Leigh v. Webb, 3 Esp., 165.

In case of a conviction, the action will not lie, unless the conviction was procured unfairly. Whitney v. Peckham, 15 Mass., 243; Com. v. Davis, 11 Pick., 343; Miller v. Deere, 2 Abb. Pr., 1; Monroe v. Maples, 1 Root., 554; Cloon v. Gerry, 13 Gray, 201; Rosenstein v. Brown, 7 Phil., 144; Basher v. Matthews, L. R. 2 C. P., 684; Hibbing v. Hyde, 50 Cal., 206; Griffis v. Sellars, 2 Dev. & Bat., 492; Palmer v. Avery, 41 Barb., 290; Witham v. Gowen, 14 Me., 362; Payson v. Caswell, 22 Me., 226; Burt v. Place, 4 Wend., 591.

An action will lie for procuring another to bring a malicious criminal prosecution, or voluntarily participating in such a prosecution, or for commencing one in good faith, and prosecuting after positive knowledge of innocence. Mowry v. Miller, 3 Leigh, 561; Perdu v. Connerly, 1 Rice, 49; Stanburry v. Fogle, 37 Md., 369; Fitzjohn v. Mackinder, 9 C. B., N. S., 505; 30 L. J., C. P., 264.

plaintiff, was then and there arrested by virtue of the same, and imprisoned upon that false, malicious, and groundless accusation, for the space of seven days, and that at the expiration of that period he was fully acquitted and discharged of the supposed offense. Such is the substance of the declaration, so far as it is deemed material to reproduce it at the present time. Testimony was introduced by the plaintiff tending to show that he was the lawful owner of the four horses described in the warrant on which he was arrested; and he also proved, without objection, that he had always sustained a good character in the neighborhood where he resided. He also introduced a duly certified copy of the complaint made against him by the first named defendant, and a duly certified copy of the warrant issued by the magistrate. Those copies show that the complainant, on the 18th day of August, 1856, made the accusation under oath, as required by the law of the the State, and that the magistrate thereupon granted the warrant for the apprehension of the plaintiff, together with two other persons, who were jointly accused with him of the same offense. Both the complaint and warrant were in regular form, and the latter contained the usual directions, that the persons accused should forthwith be brought before the magistrate who issued it, or some other justice of the peace for the county, to answer to the charge, and be dealt with as the law directed. Whether the officer made any formal return on the precept or not does not appear; but it is stated in the bill of exceptions, that the warrant was placed in the hands of the sheriff, and that the persons accused of the offense, including the plaintiff, were on the same day brought before the magistrate for trial. When brought into court they were not prepared for the examination, and at their request the trial was postponed for twelve days, or until they should have sufficient time to procure the attendance of certain witnesses, whose testimony was necessary, as they represented, to establish their defense; and the minutes of the proceedings before the magistrate, state, in effect, that the acccused, "not being able to give any security for their appearance" at the time appointed for the trial, "or not offering to give any, the sheriff was directed to hold them in custody to answer to the charge." Pursuant to that order the plaintiff, as well as the other persons accused, remained in the custody of the sheriff, and were kept by him in the prison house of the State there situate until the witnesses of the plaintiff appeared; and on the 25th day of September, 1856, there were again brought before the magistrate, and after the witnesses on both sides were examined, all of the accused were fully acquitted and discharged of the alleged offense. To show that the prosecution was groundless, and without any reasonable or probable cause, the plaintiff examined several witnesses, to prove the circumstances under which he was arrested, and the substance of the evidence adduced against him at the trial before the magistrate. One of the defendants is the magistrate who granted the warrant, and the other defendants were witnesses for the State in the criminal prosecution. All of the defendants were citizens of the State of Tennessee, and the plaintiff was a citizen of the State of Kentucky, and it did not appear that the parties had any acquaintance with each other prior to this transaction. No attempt was made on the part of the plaintiff to prove express malice, and there was no direct evidence of any kind to support the allegation of conspiracy. On the other hand, the defendants insisted that there was no evidence to support the charge of conspiracy or of false imprisonment, and that the prosecution was instituted in good faith, and conducted throughout upon reasonable and probable cause; and to establish that defense they called and examined several witnesses to prove what the evidence was which was given against the plaintiff at the trial before the magistrate. Without entering into particulars, it will be sufficient to say, that the evidence adduced by the defendants had some tendency to maintain the defense. Under the rulings and instructions of the court the jury returned their verdict in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff excepted to the charge of the court. Unaided by the assignment of errors, it would be difficult to ascertain, with any degree of certainty, to what particular part of the charge of the court the exceptions were intended to apply. But that difficulty is so far obviated by the specifications contained in the printed argument filed for the plaintiff, that, with some hesitation, we have concluded that the case, as presented in the transcript, is one which may be re-examined in this court.

1. Among other things, the presiding justice instructed the jury, that in order to excuse the defendants on the first two counts in the declaration, it must appear that they had probable cause for the prosecution of the plaintiff for the offense described in the complaint and warrant, or that they acted bona fide without malice. Objection is made by the counsel of the plaintiff to this part of the charge of the court; but we think it was quite as favorable to him as the well settled rules of law upon the subject would possibly allow. To support an action for a malicious criminal prosecution, the plaintiff must prove, in the first place, the fact of prosecution, and that the defendant was himself the prosecutor, or that he instigated its commencement, and that it finally terminated in his acquittal. He must also prove that the charge preferred against him was unfounded, and that it was made without reasonable or probable cause, and that the defendant in making or instigating it was actuated by malice. Proof of these several facts is indispensable to support the declaration, and clearly the burden of proof, in the first instance, is upon the plaintiff to make out his case, and if he fails to do so in any one of these particulars, the defendant has no occasion to offer any evidence in his defense. Undoubtedly, every person who puts the criminal law in force maliciously, and without any reasonable or probable cause, commits a wrongful act; and if the accused is thereby prejudiced, either in his person or property, the injury and loss so sustained constitute the proper foundation of an action to recover compensation. Malice alone, however, is not sufficient to sustain the action, because a person actuated by the plainest malice may, nevertheless, prefer a well found ed accusation, and have a justifiable reason for the prosecution of the charge. Want of reasonable and probable cause is as much an element in the action for a malicious criminal prosecution as the evil motive which prompted the prosecutor to make the accusation; and though the averment is a negative one in its form and character, it is, nevertheless, a material element of the action, and must be proved by the plaintiff by some affirmative evidence, unless the defendant dispenses with such proof by pleading singly the truth of the several facts involved in the charge. Morris v. Corson, 7 Cow., 281. Either of these allegations may be proved by circumstances, and it is unquestionably true that want of probable cause is evidence of malice, but it is not the same thing; and unless it is shown that both concurred in the prosecution, or that the one was combined with the other in making or instigating the charge, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in an action of this description. Accordingly, it was held in Foshay v. Ferguson, 2 Den., 619, that even proof of express malice was not enough without showing, also, the want of probable cause; and the court go on to say, that however innocent the plaintiff may have been of the crime laid to his charge, it is enough for the defendant to show that he had reasonable grounds for believing him guilty at the time the charge was made. Similar views were also expressed in Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick., 88. There are two things, say the court in that case, which are not only indispensable to the support of the action, but lie at the foundation of it. The plaintiff must show that the defendant acted from malicious motives in prosecuting him, and that he had no sufficient reason to believe him to be guilty. If either of these be wanting, the action must fail; and so are all the authorities from a very early period to the present time. Golding v. Crowle, Sayer, 1; Farmer v. Darling, 4 Burr., 1,974; 1 Hillard on T., 460.

It is true, as before remarked, that want of probable cause is evidence of malice for the consideration of the jury; but the converse of the proposition cannot be sustained. Nothing will meet the exigencies of the case, so far as respects the allegation that probable cause was wanting, except proof of the fact; and the onus probandi, as was well remarked in the case last referred to, is upon the plaintiff to prove affirmatively, by circumstances or otherwise, as he may be able, that the defendant had no reasonable ground for commencing the prosecution. Purcell v. McNamara, 9 East, 361; Willans v. Taylor, 6 Bing., 184; Johnstone v. Sutton, 1 Term, 544; Turner v. Ambler, 10 Q. B., 257.

Applying these principles to the present case, it necessarily follows that so much of the charge of the court as is now under consideration; furnishes no just ground of complaint on the part of the plaintiff. On the contrary, it is quite obvious that unless it was accompained by prior explanations, not stated in the bill of exceptions, it was even more favorable to the plaintiff than he had a right to expect. He was bound to make out his case; and if it did not appear that the prosecution had been commenced with malicious motives, and without reasonable and probable cause, then the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict. Mitchel v. Jenkins, 5 Barn. & Ad., 594.

2. With these remarks as to the first ground of complaint, we will proceed to the examination of the second, which is also based upon a detached portion of the charge of the court. After stating the alternative proposition already recited, the presiding justice proceeded to define the term "probable cause." He substantially told the jury that probable cause was the existence of such facts and circumstances as would excite the belief, in a reasonable mind, acting on the facts within the knowledge of the prosecutor, that the person charged was guilty of the crime for which he was prosecuted.

Having thus defined the meaning of the term "probable cause", he then proceeded to say, that the want of probable cause afforded a presumption of malice, but that such presumption might be rebutted by other evidence, showing that the party acted bona fide, and in the honest discharge of what he believed to be his duty; and then gave the instruction to which the second objection applies. It is as follows: "If, however, the jury find that the arrest was wanton and reckless, and that no circumstances existed to induce a reasonable, dispassionate man to believe that the defendant was guilty of having stolen the horses he had in his possession, then the jury ought to infer malice." Clearly, this part of the charge must be taken in connection with what preceded it, and when so read and understood, it is impossible to hold that it is incorrect, except, perhaps, the closing paragraph is put rather strongly in favor of the plaintiff. Whether the prosecution was or was not commenced from malicious motives, was a question of fact, and it was for the jury to determine whether the inference of malice was a reasonable one from the facts assumed in the instruction. Be that as it may, it is quite certain that it furnishes no ground of exception to the plaintiff, and in all other respects we hold the instruction to be correct.

3. One other objection only remains to be considered. After stating the fact that the magistrate who issued the warrant was sued as a joint defendant, the presiding justice told the jury that the warrant, as given in evidence, was in due form, and that the presumption was, from the statements found therein, that there was sufficient evidence before the magistrate to authorize him to issue it; and then follows that portion of the instructions to which the third objection applies. He then told the jury that if there was probable cause for the arrest of the defendant, he could be lawfully detained a reasonable time till the warrant was issued and executed. It is insisted by the plaintiff that this instruction was both abstract and misleading. But that theory is wholly without support, from anything that appears in the record, and, in point of fact, is directly contradicted by what does appear. To sustain that remark it is only necessary to refer to the declaration, where it is alleged that the plaintiff was detained in prison for the space of seven days, and the minutes of the proceedings before the magistrate show that he was so detained as the necessary consequence of his own request for delay, and the neglect on his part to offer any satisfactory security for his appearance at the time appointed for the examination. Those minutes were introduced by the plaintiff; and in the absence of any proof to the contrary, it must be assumed that they speak the truth. In view of the whole case, we think the charge of the court to the jury was correct, and that there was no error in the record.

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

MYRA CLARK GAINES, Appt.,

v.

DUNCAN N. HENNEN.

(See S. C., 24 How., 553–631.)

When will is lost or destroyed, it may be admitted to probate, on secondary proof in Louisiana—what proof necessary to admit parol evidence—immaterial objections—posterior will—what is interruption of prescription—executor's statement—res adjudicata—criminal proceedings for bigamy, when inadmissible as evidence—bastard may be devisee or legatee—adulterine child may be legitimated in Louisiana—in what manner—when confession of bigamist admissible to prove bigamy—access between man and wife, and legitimacy of child, presumed—effect of judicial invalidation of marriage.

In Louisiana, where a will has been destroyed, secondary proof is admissible to prove its contents, and to carry it to probate.

If a will, duly executed and not revoked, is lost, destroyed or mislaid, either in the lifetime of the testator, without his knowledge, or after his death, it may be admitted to probate upon satisfactory proof being given of its having been so lost, destroyed or mislaid, and also of its contents.

To entitle a party to give parol evidence of a will having been destroyed, where there is not conclusive evidence of its absolute destruction, he must show that he had made diligent search and inquiry after the will in those places where it would most probably be found, if in existence.

That this case was not one for equity jurisdiction, that certain persons should have been made parties, that the sources of title had not been set out in the bill, that the probate proceedings in the court of New Orleans are yet pending and that the same court has exclusive jurisdiction; held, immaterial objections.

Courts of probate may, for cause, recall or annul testamentary letters, but they can neither destroy nor revoke wills.

Such courts may and often have declared that a posterior will of a testator shall be recognized in the place of a prior will which had been proved when it was not known to the court that the testator had revoked it.

Plaintiff's claim is not barred by prescription; the prescription of twenty years does not exist; for she did not attain her majority until 1828, and her suit for the probate of the will was instituted in 1834.

The complainant claimed the inheritance as early as that date, and the prescription which had begun to run had been legally interrupted on the 28th July, 1836, the date of her first bill.

By Louisiana Code, 3484, a legal interruption of a prescription takes place where the possessor has been called to appear before a court of justice, either on account of the property or the possession, and the prescription is interrupted by such demand, whether the suit has been brought before a court of competent jurisdiction or not.

That article of the Code contemplates a voluntary, intentional and active abandonment of the suit, in order to restore the running of a right of prescription.

The mere absence of herself and counsel at a term of the court when her case was called is insufficient, without other evidence, to convict her of having abandoned her demand.

After the interruption of the prescription by the filing of the bill by the complainant, the defendants could no longer claim to be in possession in good faith, as that is defined in the Civil Code.

By the decisions of Louisiana, an extrajudicial statement by an executor, that he believes the debt to be due by the estate, does not bind the heir, nor is the heir bound by the approval of a court as to such a claim, if it be made ex parte.

The suit was not res adjudicata by this court in its judgment in the case of Gaines v. Relf and Chew, 53 U. S., 506.

This court having decided, in 47 U. S., that there had been a lawful marriage between the complainant's father and mother, and that Mrs. Gaines was the lawful and only issue of the marriage, the decision made in the case in 53 U. S., was not intended to reverse the decree in 47 U. S., and it cannot be so applied as res judicata to this case.

In the first suit her demand was for one half and four fifths of another half of the property owned by her father when he died, which she then claimed as the donee of her mother to the one half, and as forced heir of her father to four fifths of another half of his estate, and now she claims in this suit as universal legatee and legitimate child of her father, under his will of the 13th July, 1813, which has been admitted to probate by the Supreme Court of Louisiana. The law of Louisiana will not permit the decision in the first to be pleaded against her in this case as a res judicata.

The case in 53 U. S., and that now under our consideration are dissimilar as to parties and things sued for, or what is called "the object of the judgment," and the demand now made is not between the same parties or formed against each in the same quality.

Criminal proceedings instituted for bigamy by the canonical presbyter of the Holy Cathedral Church of New Orleans, introduced by the defendants as a part of their evidence in this case is inadmissible as such, and all which it contains must be disregarded.

A bastard in esse, whether born or unborn, is competent to be a devisee or legatee of real or personal estate.

If the complainant was the offspring of an illicit intercourse she would still be in the condition, from her father's testamentary declaration of her legitimacy, to take as his universal legatee.

In Louisiana, though a child may be adulterine in fact, it may be legitimated for all the purposes of inheriting from its parents, if one or either of them intermarried in good faith.

On such a question good faith is first to be presumed; and, as to what constitutes good faith, it is adjudged in that State that to marry a second time, supposing the previous marriage invalid, is one of the cases of good faith.

The testamentary recognition of a child as legitimate is of the highest legal authority. All presumptions are to be taken in favor of such a declaration.

In Louisiana, although a putative marriage be adulterine in fact, yet if it was contracted in good faith by the parties, or by either of them, their children are legitimated to inherit from their parents, either in a case of intestacy or to take by testament.

In the latter case, a declaration, by either father or mother, that they are their children, without the addition that they are natural children, will make them legitimate, and no other proof can be demanded of them to enable them to enjoy all the rights of legitimate children.

A charge of bigamy in a criminal prosecution cannot be proved by any reputation of marriage; there must be proof of actual marriage before the accused can be convicted.

But in a civil suit the confession of a bigamist will be sufficient, when made under circumstances from which no objection to it as a confession can be implied.

Access between man and wife is always presumed until otherwise plainly proved, and nothing is allowed to impugn the legitimacy of a child short of proofs by facts showing it to be impossible that the husband could have been the father of it.

A judicial invalidation of marriage at any time for the bigamy of a party to it relates back to the time of the marriage, and places the deceived in a free condition to marry again, or to do any other act as an unmarried woman, without any sentence of the nullity of the marriage.

(Mr. Justice CAMPBELL, having been of counsel, did not sit in this case.)

Argued Feb. 14, 1861. Decided Mar. 14, 1861.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

The case is fully stated by the court.

Messrs. James M. Smiley, F. Perin, C. Cushing, and Chilton & Magruder, for the appellant:

Mr. Duncan N. Hennen, in person.

Mr. Louis Janin, in behalf of the City of New Orleans.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

We will first give some of the facts of this case, that the litigation which has grown out of the wills of Daniel Clark may be correctly understood. Without them it could not be.

They have been the subject of five appeals to this court. This is the sixth. It presents the controversy differently from what it has been before. It also presents points for decision which were not raised in either of the preceding cases. Some of those that were, however, will necessarily be mentioned in this opinion, to illustrate their connection with this case. They may be so considered without our coming at all into conflict with any judgment heretofore given concerning the rights of the parties in any antecedent appeal. Our conclusion will differ from one of them on account of testimony in this case which was not in that, but they will not be contradictory; and because we have information in this, concerning a piece of testimony then relied upon, which we shall exclude in this, as inadmissible for any purpose.

Four of the five appeals were decided by this court substantially in favor of Mrs. Gaines. The fifth was adverse, not in anywise excluding the re-examination of the only point then ruled by the use of the same testimony, and that which is new. Considered in connection, both have impressed us with a different impression of the status of Mrs. Gaines' legitimacy from that which this court did not then think was sufficiently proved, as we now think it has been. Now, she is here with a support which her cases have not had before. She comes with a decision of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, directing, upon her application, that the will of Daniel Clark, dated at New Orleans, July 13, 1813, as set forth in her petition, should be recognized as his last will and testament, and that it should be recorded and executed as such. In that will her father acknowledges that his beloved Myra, then living in the family of Samuel B. Davis, is his legitimate and only daughter, and bequeaths to her all the estate, real and personal, of which he might die possessed, subject only to the payment of certain legacies named in the will.

Her petition for the probate of that will was first addressed to the Second District Court of New Orleans, in which Judge J. N. Lea presided.

After asserting that such a will had been made by her father, its contents were set out as they were recollected by witnesses who had read it, and by other persons to whom it had been shown by the testator, with whom he spoke of it in the last moment of his life, as his last will and testament, in favor of his legitimate daughter, Myra, charging them to take care of it, and telling them it would be found locked up in a trunk, describing it, which he had placed in a certain room in his house.

The will is then stated in the petition to have been olographic; that is, altogether written and signed in her father's handwriting, with his seal attached to the same; that immediately after his death diligent searches were made for it; that it could not be found; that it has not been since, and that it had been mislaid, lost or destroyed.

She then declares, that when her father died she was a minor, absent from New Orleans, and living with Samuel B. Davis, to whom and whose lady she had been confided in the year 1812. Judge Lea took cognizance of her petition, proceeded throughout its pendency with great judicial exactness and caution, and, as the whole record shows, with official liberality to every one concerned in resisting the application, without in any particular having denied to the petitioner her rights.

The judge, however, finally decided against the sufficiency of the proof to establish the will according to the requirements of the Civil Code of Louisiana, but without prejudice to the right of the petitioner to renew her application, with such proofs as might be sufficient to establish an olographic will. She applied for a new trial, and upon that being denied, solicited an appeal to the Supreme Court, and that was allowed.

The Supreme Court tried the case. It differed with Judge Lea as to the proof which was required by the Code to establish a lost or destroyed olographic will. It reversed the judgment of the court below, and decreed that the will of Daniel Clark, dated on the 13th July, 1813, should be recognized as his last will and testament, and ordered it to be recorded and to be executed as such, it being posterior to the will of May, 1811, which Relf and Chew had presented for probate, under which they had taken possession of the property of Daniel Clark, and had disposed of it to the entire exclusion of Mrs. Gaines from any part of it—an estate shown by the proof in the cause introduced by the defendants, which had been registered or inventoried a short time before Clark's death, at more than $700,000, in which Clark and Coxe were interested, and an estate exclusively belonging to Clark of $296,000.

But to return to the decree of the Supreme Court establishing the will of 1813; it must be understood, that its admission of the will to probate does not exclude anyone who may desire to contest the will with Mrs. Gaines from doing it in a direct proceeding, or from using any means of defense by way of answer or exception, whenever she shall use the probate as a muniment of title. And the probate does not conclude Relf and Chew, or any other parties having any interest to do so, to oppose the will, when it shall be set up against them, by such defenses as the law will permit in like cases. It was with those qualifications of the probate of the will of 1813 that the case was tried in the court below, and they have been constantly in our minds in the trial of the appeal here.

Upon the rendition of the probate by the Supreme Court, Mrs. Gaines filed her bill in this case. It shall be fully stated hereafter, with the defenses made against it.

Before doing so, it is due to the merits of the controversy to advert to the decisions of the Probate Court of the Second District of New Orleans, and to that of the Supreme Court reversing it, more minutely than has been done. Especially, too, as they are coincident with our conclusions upon the testimony regarding the execution by Mr. Clark of his olographic will of 1813, and of the concealment or destruction of it after his death.

The Supreme Court adopts the prepared statement of the facts of the case as it was made by Judge Lea in the court below. Its accuracy has never been denied by any one of the parties interested in this suit, nor by anyone else.

It is as follows: "The petitioner alleges, that on the 16th of August, 1813, the late Daniel Clark, her father, departed this life, having previously, on the 13th of July, executed an olographic will and testament, by which he recognized her as his legitimate and only daughter, and constituted her universal legatee. That the will was wholly written, dated, and signed, in the handwriting of the testator, and was left among his papers at his residence; that after his death search had been made for it, but that it was not found, and it had been mislaid, lost or destroyed."

The learned judge then proceeds: "To entitle the petitioner to a judgment recognizing the existence and validity of the will, it is necessary that she should establish affirmatively, by such testimony as the law deems requisite, that Daniel Clark did execute a last will containing testamentary dispositions as set forth in the petition, and that he died without having destroyed or revoked it." "That looking for the testimony which might solve the question, whether such a will had ever been executed or not, a reasonable inquirer would naturally turn for information to those who were most intimate with the deceased in the latter part of his life, and especially, if they could be found, to those who were with him in the last moments of his existence, when the hand of death was upon him, if they had no interest in directing his property into any particular channel, as they might be considered as the best and most reliable witnesses that could be produced; and it appears to be precisely testimony of that character that the petitioner presents in support of her application." Judge Lea then says: "Boisfontaine had business relations with the deceased which brought them into frequent intercourse; and that for the 'two last' days of his life, up to the moment of his death, he was with him. That De la Croix and Bellechasse were intimate personal friends of Clark, and were with him shortly before his death. All of these witnesses concur in stating that Clark said he had made a will posterior to that of 1811, and De la Croix says, that Clark presented to him in his cabinet a sealed parcel, which he declared to be his last will, and that it would be found in a small black trunk. De la Croix also had sworn, shortly after Relf had presented the will of 1811 for probate, that Clark had made a will posterior to that; that the existence of it was known to several persons, and he applied for an order of the court and obtained it, commanding every notary in New Orleans to report if such a document had not been deposited with one of them. Bellechasse and Mrs. Harper swore that they had read the will. The judge then expresses his conclusion to be, that the legal presumption of the existence of such a paper had been made out, and that its having been destroyed or revoked by the testator had been satisfactorily rebutted, and that there was nothing in the record to impeach the credibility of Bellechasse or Mrs. Harper. In these rulings of the district judge of the Supreme Court concurred, and then said, in delivering its opining, all they had to do was to inquire whether the will of 1813 had been proved in conformity with the article No. 169 of the old Code or 1648 of the new."

Those articles require the testimony of two witnesses when the will shall be presented for probate, who shall declare their recognition of it as having been written wholly by the testator, that it had been signed and sealed by him, and their declaration that they had often seen him write and sign in his lifetime. It was from such a requirement of proof, rejecting secondary testimony altogether, that the district court refused the petition for a probate of the will. Upon such refusal Mrs. Gaines appealed to the Supreme Court.

That court said: "That the question of the alleged insufficiency of the proof in the case could only be determined by an inquiry, whether the article was to be pursued at all times and in all cases, or whether they were not merely directions when the will itself was presented for probate, and were inapplicable to restrain the court in certain cases, when by reason of the loss or destruction of such an instrument, from taking secondary proof of its contents, as the best which the nature of the case was susceptible."

The court then, by a course of reasoning, supported by several cases from the Louisiana Reports, determined that in the event of a will having been destroyed, secondary proof is admissible in Louisiana to prove its contents, and to carry it to probate; that the articles 169 and 1648 contemplate that the will itself should be presented, with the proofs of its execution, to the judge of probate when that can be done; that no one would seriously contend that the calamity of its destruction should deprive the legatee of the right to establish it by secondary evidence; "for was such the law, a reward would be offered to villainy, and it would always be in the power of an unscrupulous heir to prevent the execution of a will." It then meets the assertion directly, that articles 1648 and 1649 of the Code require the production of the will in order that it might be indentified by witnesses who recognize it; denies that position, and affirms that in the absence of such witnesses the evidence concerning an unproduced, destroyed olographic will might be complete. The articles are not negative laws, declaring that no other kind of proof shall be admitted. "And it is doubted very much if an olographic will made here had by some accident been destroyed before being legally proved, whether a copy of it, identified by two witnesses, who were able to swear to the genuineness of the original in the manner pointed out by law, would not be considered a sufficient compliance with the provisions of the code." Such, in fact, was the petioner's case they were considering. Such is the law in analogous cases. The law cannot have been intended to require an impossibility, and to leave a party so circumstanced without a remedy.

The doctrine of the common law is in accordance with the view taken by the Supreme Court of Louisiana concerning lost deeds and wills. It has been judicially acted upon in English and American cases. It was so in the case of Dan v. Brown, 4 Cow., 488. That was a suit upon a lost will devising real estate. By the Statute of New York it was necessary to prove the will by three credible witnesses. The will of Brown, as to its execution, was proved by one of the subscribing witnesses. He stated it was executed in the presence of himself, James Mallory, and another person whose name he did not remember, but that he had no doubt of his being a credible witness. That, the court said, was all the evidence which could be expected under the circumstances. There are several other cases to the same effect in our American Reports. Jarman, on the Probate of Wills, 1 vol., Perkins' edition, p. 228, says, upon the authority of many cases, note 4: "that if a will, duly executed and not revoked, is lost, destroyed or mislaid, either in the lifetime of the testator, without his knowledge, or after his death, it may be admitted to probate upon satisfactory proof being given of its having been so lost, destroyed or mislaid, and also of its contents." But to entitle a party to give parol evidence of a will alleged to be destroyed, where there is not conclusive evidence of its absolute destruction, the party must show that he has made diligent search and inquiry after the will in those places where it would most probably be found, if in existence. Under its reasoning, the Supreme Court of Louisiana, sustained by the authorities in England and in the United States, admitted the olographic will of 1813 of Daniel Clark to probate, declaring ,also, such was the law in Louisiana, and reversed the judgment of the lower court dismissing the petition of Mrs. Gaines.

In virtue of that decision of the Supreme Court, Mrs. Gaines presents herself to this court, declared by her father to be his legitimate and only daughter, and universal legatee. We will, in another part of this opinion, show the legal effect of her father's testamentary declaration.

We will now state, as briefly as it may be done in such a case, the essential allegations of the bill; the responses of the defendants and their averments; the proofs in support of the complainant's rights, and such of them as are relied upon to defeat them; the legal issues made by the bill and answers, and the points relied upon by both parties in their arguments in this case.

The bill was brought against several defendants, Duncan N Hennen being one of them. They separated in their answers. Hennen, after giving the claim of title to the property for which he is sued, admits that it was a part of the estate of Daniel Clark, and adopts the answers filed by the other defendants as a part of his defense. The cause was tried with respect to him only, and the bill was dismissed by the court below. From that decree Mrs. Gaines appealed to this court.

After specific declarations as to the character in which she sues, and her legal right to do so as the legitimate child of her father and his universal legatee, she acknowledges that he had made a provisional will in the year 1811. That he then made his mother, Mary Clark, his universal legatee, and named Richard Relf and Beverly Chew his executors. That they had presented it to the court for probate, that it had been allowed, and that they, as executors, had taken possession of the entire separate estate of Daniel Clark, and of all such as he claimed in his life in copartnership with Daniel W. Coxe. It is then assumed that the will of 1811 had been revoked by the will of the 13th July, 1813. That Chew was dead; that all the legal power which the probate of the will of 1811 had given to Relf and Chew had expired; that Mary Clark was dead, and that her heirs and legatees reside beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

Mrs. Gaines then states, in the language of equity pleading, the pretenses of the defendants in opposition to her claims—such as, that Relf and Chew sold them the property as testamentary executors of Daniel Clark under the will of 1811; that they bought for a full consideration, without any notice of the revocation of the will of 1811, or that any other person was interested in the property than Mary Clark; that the titles they had from Relf and Chew could not be invalidated by the revocation of that will, and that the right of action against them for the property in their possession, if complainant had ever had any, were barred by prescription—that is, by the Acts of Limitation of Louisiana. It is then charged by the complainant that Relf and Chew had no authority to sell the property of Daniel Clark when the sales were made by them. That they had never made an inventory of the decedent's property for the probate court before the sales were made; that the sales were made without any legal notice, and for an inadequate consideration. That if Relf and Chew had sold under a power of attorney from Mary Clark, and not as executors, that Mary Clark's power was insufficient in its terms for such purpose; that she had no power or rights in the estate of Daniel Clark to give such a power, and that Relf and Chew had not caused themselves to be recognized in a proper court as Mary Clark's attorneys, as they ought to have done, before they could acquire any right to sell any part of the estate of Clark. She then charges that the defendants knew, when they bought the property sued for, that she had applied as early as in the year 1834 to have her father's olographic will of 1813 probated by the proper court at New Orleans; that the defendants knew of all the irregular proceedings and assumptions of Chew and Relf in respect to the estate of her father, and of their sales of it without authority; that the defendants knew, when they bought, of the suits which she had brought to recover her rights in her father's estate; and that her present suit was brought under the probate of the will of 1813 by the Supreme Court of Louisiana.

Hennen, the defendant, answers for himself, and adopting the answers of the other defendants, states that the property for which he was sued is designated according to a plan made in 1844, as lots 9, 10, 11, on the square comprised between Phillippi, Circus, and Poydras streets; each lot, by English measure, containing 23 feet 11 inches and 2 lines between parallel lines.

The answers of the other defendants make the same admissions as to their titles having been derived from or through Relf and Chew and Mary Clark; admit the property separately claimed by them to have been a part of the estate of Clark; and finally make an averment that Mrs. Gaines has not that civil status by her birth which, under the law of Louisiana, can entitle her to take the property of her father under the will of 1813, though it had been admitted to probate, and that she had been declared in it his legitimate and only daughter. In other words, the defendants have declared that she is an adulterous bastard.

It is proper to state the books and documents which are in evidence in this case.

1. The present record of Gaines v. Hennen.

2. The printed record of the suit No. 188, of December Term, 1851, in this court, Gaines v. Relf and Chew, 12 How., 472.

3. The proceedings in the courts of probate entitled Probate Record.

4. The commercial account books kept by Relf and Chew, professing to relate to their transactions concerning the estate of Daniel Clark.

This testimony, as it has been enumerated, was brought into the case by agreement of the parties for as much as it might be worth, subject to exceptions by both sides as to its admissibility upon the trial of the cause.

Several immaterial or formal points were made in the argument to defeat the claims set out in this bill—such as, that the case was not one for equity jurisdiction, but was ratione materiæ, exclusively cognizable before the Probate Court of the Second District of New Orleans. Next, that Chew and Relf, and Mary Clark, or her heirs should have been made parties; that the sources of Daniel Clark's title to the property sued for had not been set out in the bill in addition to the manner it had been enumerated. Again: that the probate proceedings in the Second District Court of New Orleans in 1856 are yet pending and undetermined, and on that account the same court has exclusive jurisdiction over the estate of Daniel Clark. We have examined these formal objections, and find them to be unsustained by the cases cited in support of them. They are inapplicable to the actual state of the case, and are insufficient to arrest the trial of it upon its merits. The same objections were also urged in the Circuit Court, but were disregarded, we presume, by the judge as unsubstantial points of defense. As to the objection that Relf and Chew and the heirs of Mary Clark had not been made parties to the bill, we observe it was not necessary to make either of them so. The present is a suit for the recovery of property admitted by the defendants to have been a part of the estate of Daniel Clark. Nothing is sought to be recovered from Chew and Relf. Their executorial functions under the will of 1811 have long since been at an end. Had the bill involved directly their transactions as executors with the complainant, as universal legatee, upon a proper showing of that, with a prayer to be made parties, the court might have allowed it. But not having done that, the defendants cannot urge, because Relf and Chew have not been made defendants with them, that they should escape from a trial on the rightfulness of their possession of a part of the estate of Clark, as they have admitted it to be; or that they have not acquired it under circumstances from which the law presumes that they had notice of the irregularity of the sale as it was made by Relf and Chew. Nor was it necessary for the heirs of Mary Clark to be made parties; for Mary Clark herself never had any pecuniary responsibilities for the sales of the property of the estate of her son by Relf and Chew, as her power of attorney to them upon its face was irregularly executed, and was of itself notice to the defendants that when they bought, the sales had not been made in conformity with the law of Louisiana regulating the sales of the property of a testamentary decedent.

But it was also said in the argument that no claim could be set up by Mrs. Gaines under the will of 1813 until the will of 1811 shall be set aside. Neither the language used by this court in 2 How., 651, nor in the decision in 12 How., 472, will bear such an interpretation, or admit of such a conclusion. The rulings of courts must be considered always in reference to the subject-matter of litigation and the attitude of parties in relation to the point under discussion. And it will often be the case, as it is now, that counsel will use an illustration for a judicial ruling, or words correctly used when they were written as applicable to a different state of things. When this court said, in 12 How., 651, that the will of 1813 cannot be set up without the destruction of the will of 1811, it was with reference to the existing fact that the latter had been duly proved, and that it stood as a title to the succession of the estate of Daniel Clark, and that the will of 1813 had not then been proved before a court of probate, and on that account could not be set up in chancery as an inconsistent and opposing succession to the estate while the probate of the will of 1811 was standing in full force. And when Mr. Justice McLean, speaking for the court, 2 How., 647, says, "she (meaning Mrs. Gaines, then the complainant) must ask for the probate of the will of 1813, and a revocation of the other will of 1811," adding "for no probate can stand while a previous one is unrevoked," it is plain that the meaning was, as we now say it is, when a court recalls the probate of a will, substituting the probate of another will by the same testator made posterior to the first, that the former becomes inoperative, and that the second is that under which the estate is to be administered, without any formal declaration by the court that the first was annulled, and it makes no difference that a part of the estate has been administered under the first probate. The unadministered must be done under the second. Courts of probate may for cause recall or annul testamentary letters, but they can neither destroy nor revoke wills, though they may and often have declared that a posterior will of a testator shall be recognized in the place of a prior will which had been proved, when it was not known to the court that the testator had revoked it. Such is exactly this case. The Supreme Court decreed that the will of Daniel Clark, dated New Orleans, July 13, 1813, as set forth in the plaintiff's petition, should be recognized as his last will and testament, and the same was ordered to be recorded and executed as such, with the declaration, that admitting the will to probate does not conclude anyone who may desire to contest the will with the applicant in a direct action. The decree of the court in that particular is the law of the case.

It was also urged that the defendant and those under whom he claims were purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice, and are therefore in equity protected against the claims of the complainant. It is a good defense when it shall be proved as a matter of fact. But in this instance it is not only disproved by testimony introduced by the defendants, but by admissions in their answers, as shall be shown hereafter in this opinion. In our opinion the objection has no standing in this case, though the argument from which the counsel admitted he had borrowed it is a very good one in its proper place.

We shall now examine the case upon the more serious points made in opposition to Mrs. Gaines by the learned counsel, Mr. Janin.

The first was, that her claim was barred by prescription. The prescription relied upon by the defendants is that of ten years against one claiming a vacant estate, twenty years to prescribe a title, and thirty years to bar the faculty of accepting a succession or the estate of a deceased person. There being no vacant succession in this case, the ten years' prescription does not apply, and the prescription of twenty years does not exist; for Mrs. Gaines did not attain her majority until June or July, 1826, and her suit for the probate of the will made by her father on the 13th of July, 1813, was instituted in 1834. When her petition for that purpose was dismissed in 1836, her first bill was filed in a month or two afterwards. From that time there was a legal interruption of the prescription of twenty years, which the defendants have pleaded and now rely upon. In fact, they recognize the interruption in their answers. In their averment of their having had peaceable possession of the property sued for since they bought it, they add, "that they had never been disturbed in respect to it," except by an abortive attempt of the complainant and her husband to recover it by their bill filed in 1836. New Record, 47. We find them also in their answer (New Record, 54) admitting that such a suit as complainant refers to in her present bill had been instituted by her and her husband in 1836, and that the object of it was the recovery of the "identical property" now in controversy. New Record, 56, 57. It is also admitted in the answer, that the suit of the complainant in the probate court to annul the probate of the will of 1811, and to set up that of 1813, was brought on the 18th June, 1834. These admissions are decisive that the complainant claimed the inheritance as early as that date, and that the prescription which had begun to run had been legally interrupted on the 28th July, 1836, the date of her first bill.

By the article of the Code, 3484, a legal interruption of a prescription takes place where the possessor has been called to appear before a court of justice, either on account of the property or the possession, and the prescription is interrupted by such demand, whether the suit has been brought before a court of competent jurisdiction or not.

The weight of authority upon the construction of that article of the Code is, that it contemplates a voluntary, intentional and active abandonment of the suit, in order to restore the running of a right of prescription. In the case of Wilson v. Marshall, 10 La. Ann., 331, the court said the plaintiff did not dismiss the suit, or consent to the dismissal. She lived in a remote part of the State, and the mere absence of herself and counsel at a term of the court when her case was called is insufficient, without other evidence, to convict her of having abandoned her demand.

Prall v. Peet's Curator, 8 La., 282; Dunn v. Kenney, 11 Rob. La., 250; Norwood v. Devall, 7 La. Ann., 528; Mechanic & Traders' Bank v. Theall, 8 La. Ann., 469.

After the interruption of the prescription by the filing of the bill by the complainant, the defendants could no longer claim to be in possession in good faith, as that is defined in the Civil Code. In article 3415 the possessor in bad faith is he who possesses as master, but who assumes this quality when he well knows that he has no title to the thing, or that his title is vicious and defective. The possessor must not only not be in bad faith, but in the positive belief that he is the true owner, and if he doubts the validity of his title, his possession is not the basis of prescription. Troplong, Prescription, Vol. II., p. 451, No. 927; Ib., p. 444, No. 918; Ib., p. 442, No. 915. The plea of prescription is not available in this case.

But the defendants go further, and insinuate that their possession of the property, though beginning with the executors, Relf and Chew, continued afterwards under Mary Clark, whose power of attorney to them authorized them to sell the estate of Clark.

When Relf and Chew proved the will of 1811, they received the estate of Clark as executors, with a right of detainer for one year, and for as long afterwards as the court of probate might permit upon their application, showing cause for the delay or the extension of a longer time. They did receive such an extension for three years, upon their representation that the nature of the estate, the difficulty of the time, and the ample sufficiency of the estate to pay all of its debts, would enable them by the delay to accomplish that result. The creditors were called upon to meet to consider the proposition. They assented to it. But the executors never fulfilled the arrangement, either for the benefit of the creditors or for the legatees under the will of 1811. Nor did they ever make any return to the court of probates of their transactions relative to Clark's estate, until 1836, after the complainant had sued them, and then without vouchers to homologate their receipts, expenditures and payments, except for a small part. Shortly after the application for an extension of time, in the year 1813, they applied for a power of attorney, from Mary Clark, who had been named in the will of 1811 as universal legatee, to authorize them to sell the estate in her behalf. The power was given; and under it, without any notice to the court of probate, which ought to have been given, and the power filed in it, they continued, as the testimony in this case shows, to act as executors, and to dispose of the estate of Clark, both real and personal, property in copartnership, and other property separately belonging to Clark, without ever having received any permission to do so from the court of probate; and that should have been obtained, as Mary Clark had not been acknowledged by that court as the universal legatee of Clark. It may be that they mistook their powers in doing so; but they received the estate of Clark in a fiduciary character, to be accounted for to the legatees and creditors, according to their rights under the law of Louisiana, and for that they are responsible. Besides, the power from Mary Clark was given to them as executors, that she might have the benefit of those responsibilities for the faithful execution of the trust that they were under by the law of Louisiana as executors. They paid debts, received moneys, sold property, and acted throughout as if they were not responsible to the court from which they derived their testamentary letters, or to Mary Clark, and, as the record in this case shows, without sustaining their transactions by vouchers of any kind.

Nothing is better settled by the decisions of its courts in Louisiana, than "that an extra judicial statement by an executor, that he believes the debt to be due by the estate, does not bind the heir, nor is the heir bound by the approval of a court as to such a claim, if it be made ex parte." 4 La., 382. Again: that the admission of the genuineness of the signature to vouchers, filed by the curator of a succession, in support of his account, dispenses with any other proof of the payment claimed; but when such payments are made without an order of the court, the curator must show that the debts were really due by the succession, or he will not be entitled to credit for the amounts so paid. Miller v. Miller, 12 Rob. (La.), 88. A receipt given to an administrator for the payment of an account is not evidence that the account was due, if the fact of being due is disputed. Moore v. Thebadeaux, 4 La. Ann., 74. So an administrator who renders an account is bound to establish the items of it by evidence, and may be held to strict proof by the parties interested, without a formal opposition on their part. Succession of Lee, 4 La. Ann., 579. The accounts of Relf and Chew were put in evidence by the defendants, and they were used to show, among other things, that they were authorized to sell the estate of Clark as they did, and that they were auxiliary for the establishment of the defendant's plea of prescription. Such, however, is not our opinion, and but for the use made of them, we should not have noticed them at all, not thinking that they are put in issue by the bill of the complainant, or the answer of the defendants, particularly as Relf and Chew are not parties to this proceeding.

We will now proceed to the consideration of that point made in the argument by the counsel of the defendant, but more particularly representing the City of New Orleans, as he said he did.

It was, that complainant's suit could not be maintained, because it was res adjudicata by this court in its judgment in the case of at Gaines v. Relf, in 12 How., 506.

We do not think so. That case is misunderstood by the learned counsel. Then the parties went to trial upon the demand of Mrs. Gaines for one half of her father's estate, as the donee of her mother, his widow, and as forced heir of her father by the law of Louisiana for four fifths of another half of his estate.

Her bill then was brought in consequence of this court having decided, in 6 How., 550, that there had been a lawful marriage solemnized in good faith between them in Philadelphia. That case was tried upon the same evidence upon which the appeal was determined in 12 Howard, with the exception of what is miscalled an ecclesiastical record from the Cathedral Church in New Orleans, of which we shall have much to say hereafter. Besides having decided, in 6 Howard, that there had been a lawful marriage between the complainant's father and mother, this court decreed that Mrs. Gaines was the lawful and only issue of the marriage; that at the time of her father's death she was his only legitimate child, and was exclusively invested with the character of his forced heir, and as such was entitled to its rights in his estate.

The judgment in that case has never been overruled or impaired by this court. It certainly was not intended to be by the case in 12 Howard, for the report in that such shows, from the number of the justices who sat upon its trial, and their decision as to the judgment then to be rendered, that the majority of them did not intend to overrule the decree in 6 Howard. It was recognized again as still in force by a majority of the judges who sat in this case in our consultation. The defendant in the case of 1851, 12 How., 537, admitted that such a decree was rendered, denying, however, that it was conclusive upon or that it ought to affect their right; and if it could do so, it ought not to have such an effect in that instance, averring the same as a matter of defense, that the decree was brought about and procured by imposition combination, and fraud, between the complainants and Charles Patterson. That it should not be regarded in a court of justice for any purpose whatever, and that it had been consentend to by Patterson to enable the complainant to plead the same as res judicata upon points in litigation not honestly contested. Mr. Janin was mistaken when he said that the decree in 6 How., 588, had been reviewed in the case of 12 How., 537, meaning thereby that it had been overruled. It was not only not so, but one of the justices who assented to the judgment in 6 Howard, which declares that there had been a valid marriage between Daniel Clark and Zulime Carrière, and that she was the legitimate child of that marriage, would not assent to its being done when he concurred in the decree in 12 Howard.

The decision in 12 Howard does not, either in terms or inferentially, assert that no marriage had ever taken place between Daniel Clark and the complainant's mother. The issue in that case was, that at the time of the complainant's birth, her mother was the lawful wife of another man, namely, of Jerome Des Grange.

It was, therefore, essential to the defendants to get rid of the decree which had affirmed the legitimacy of Mrs. Gaines and of the marriage of her father and mother, and it was attempted by a contrivance as extraordinary in its beginning as it was abortive in its result. We will show what it was from the record, not only on account of its anomalous character, but because it is unexampled in jurisprudence.

After having asserted that the decree in 6 Howard had been obtained by the fraud of Patterson and General Gaines, thus impeaching the credibility of Patterson in advance, the defendants, Relf and Chew, introduced him as their witness (Old Record, pp. 590–594), and he was examined by their counsel, first as to a suit in which Mrs. Gaines had recovered a house and lot from him. After stating his age to be about seventy, his answer was: "It was for a house and lot on which I resided when the suit was brought; I still reside in that house and lot, and have done so ever since the suit was brought. Mrs. Gaines succeeded in the suit, according to the judgment of the court. That house and lot belongs to her, but they told me they would not take it from me. General Gaines and his wife gave me in writing, under their hands, that they would not take the property from me; that he would make my title good. The property has always been assessed as mine, and I have always paid the taxes on it. I paid most of the costs, but they paid me again —that is, General and Mrs. Gaines. There was an understanding between us that they would pay the costs, even should the suit be decided against me. They made the same offer to Judge Martin." In his cross-examination, witness said he had made the best effort in his power, with the aid of able counsel, to defeat Mrs. Gaines in her suit. The cross-examination was resumed the next day, 20th June, 1849. Patterson was asked to look upon a document marked A, and to state if he knew the handwriting of the late General Gaines; whether the signature to it was not his; whether he had received that, or a communication of which that was a copy, prior to withdrawing his dilatory pleading in the case of Gaines v. Relf and Chew, and filing your answer to the merits of that case. The defendants, by counsel, protested against the paper being put into the record, on the ground that it contained false, malicious and gratuitous imputations against parties in nowise connected with the suit. Witness then answered, that was the signature of General Gaines; he had often received letters from him, and seen him write, and that he had received two or three communications, of which that was a copy, before he withdrew his dilatory pleadings in that case, and answering to the merits. A letter was then handed to witness, marked B. He answered, the body of it was the handwriting of General Gaines; was present when he wrote it, and saw both General and Mrs. Gaines sign it. Then the following question was put to the witness: "At the trial of your cause with Gaines and wife, did not your counsel make a request of the counsel of Mrs. Gaines to be permitted to introduce the record from the Probate Court of New Orleans, of all the proceedings of Mrs. Gaines in the prosecution of her rights in that court?" Witness answers: "Yes, sir; her counsel objected to that, and I applied to General and Mrs. Gaines to introduce the record. They replied to me to get all the evidence possible, the stronger the better. General Gaines remarked, it would be more glorious to have it as strong as possible. I then caused it to be introduced." Here the cross-examination of the witness was closed. The counsel for the defendants objected to the foregoing testimony, and especially to that part which relates the conversations of the complainants with the witness, and that part which details what was done in a judicial proceeding, on the grounds, among others, that it is incompetent for the complainants to make evidence for themselves, and that what had been done in judicial proceedings should be shown by the record. And from that gentleman's accurate knowledge of his profession, indicated as it has been by the two lines just underscored, may we not say in the zeal of professional advocacy, that the best of us may forget it? For what has been his interrogation of Patterson but an attempt to invalidate a judgment against him by the testimony of the most interested party to have it annulled, without having made any appeal to the record of that judgment? And Patterson was the defendant's witness.

But we have not yet done with this attempt to prejudice the rights of Mrs. Gaines by suggestions that her suit with Patterson was pretensive and fraudulent, and to extract from him some proof or confession of his own infamy.

After the examination in chief and the cross-examination had been completed and signed by the witness, and both counsel had announced that they had concluded their examination, the counsel for the defendant made another objection to the cross-examination of Mr. Patterson, insisting that it should be considered as his examination in chief by the complainant, to which the defendants had the right of cross-examination; and the witness was recalled on the following day for that purpose. Every effort was then made by many questions to extract from him some inconsistency with his first examination, without success. But fortunately for his own character, he removes the imputation of fraud and combination between himself and General Gaines, to give to the latter the benefit of a collusive judgment in the circuit court against himself, by having, in his answer to one of the questions, alluded again to the documents A and B, which are now presented as conclusive against the charge that there was ever any combination between them, by trick or by contrivance, or by any deceitful agreement or compact, for a suit to be brought by one against the other to defraud any third person of his right. See Old Record, pages 1018 for Document A, and 819 for letter B. And when the witness was asked if he had not been particularly requested by the General and Mrs. Gaines to use his best exertions, with the aid of the best counsel he could employ, to make every defense in his power to this suit of which it was susceptible, he answered: Yes, and I did so; and I considered the agreement with General and Mrs. Gaines as an act of liberality on their part, growing out of a desire to come to a speedy trial with some one or more of the defendants on the merits of the case.

It was an indiscreet arrangement between General Gaines and Mr. Patterson, not to be tolerated in a court of justice, but not one of intentional deception in contemplation of any undue advantage. And it would never have been made by Relf and Chew, in their answer to the subsequent bill of the complainant against them, had they not been erroneously advised that the decree in 6th Howard, establishing the marriage of Clark and Zulime Carrière, and the legitimacy of Mrs. Gaines, might be used as res judicata against the defendants in the suit of the 20th January, 1849, and as they now attempt to make the decision in that case a res judicata against the claims of Mrs. Gaines in this which we are now deciding.

But what was decided in the case in 12 Howard? It is stated, in the language of the decision, "that the first and most important of the issues presented is that of the legitimacy of Mrs. Gaines." Then are stated the pleadings under which the issue was made. It shall be given in the language of the decision: "She (Mrs. Gaines) alleges that her father, Daniel Clark, was married to Zulime née Carrière, in the City of Philadelphia, in the year 1802 or 1803, and that she is the legitimate and only legitimate offspring of that marriage. The defendants deny that Daniel Clark was married to Zulime at the time and place alleged, or at any other time and place. And they further aver that, at the time the marriage is alleged to have taken place, the said Zulime was the lawful wife of one Jerome des Grange. If the mother of the complainant was the lawful wife of Jerome des Grange at the time Zulime is alleged to have married with Clark, then the marriage is merely void, and it is immaterial whether it did or did not take place. And the first question we propose to examine is, as to the fact whether Zulime was Des Grange's lawful wife in 1802 or 1803." Then follows the recital of the marriage between Des Grange and Zulime, with the record of it, on the 2d December, 1794, admitted on the part of Mrs. Gaines. To rebut and overcome the established and admitted fact of that marriage, the complainant introduced witnesses to prove, "that previous to Des Grange's marriage with Zulime he had lawfully married another woman, who was living when he married Zulime, and was still his wife and, therefore, the second marriage was void, and this issue we are called on to try."

Then it is said that "the marriage with Des Grange having been proved, it was established as prima facie true that Zulime was not the lawful wife of Clark, and the onus of proving that Des Grange had a former wife living when he married Zulime was imposed on the complainant; she was bound to prove the affirmative fact that Des Grange had committed bigamy." Then follows the recital of the testimony of the complainant to prove that Des Grange became a bigamist by his marriage with her mother. And then, to "meet and rebut this evidence, the defendants introduced from the records of the Cathedral Church of the diocese, to which New Orleans belonged at that period, an ecclesiastical proceeding against Des Grange for bigamy, which respondents insist is the same to which complainants refer." It is set out in full in the decision, beginning at page 513 in 12 Howard, extending to 519, inclusive. Then the rebutting testimony of Daniel W. Coxe, for a long time a copartner in business with Clark, was introduced. He states an antecedent connection between Clark and Zulime to the time of their alleged marriage, with a confidential letter to him, which was delivered by Zulime, in which it was stated that she was pregnant, and that he, Clark, was the father of the child; further requesting that he would put her under the care of a respectable physician, and furnish her with money during her confinement and stay in Philadelphia; and further, that she gave birth to a child, who was Caroline Barnes, who before her marriage went by the name of Caroline Clark, and that what has been related happened in 1802; and he further states that Clark was not in Philadelphia in 1803, having gone to Europe in August, 1802, and having returned to New Orleans early in 1803. A letter from Des Grange was introduced, dated at Bordeaux, July, 1801; also a suit for alimony brought by Zulime against Des Grange in 1805, which will be further noticed in the opinion. Then it is said: "This is substantially the evidence on both sides on which the question depends, whether Des Grange was or was not guilty of bigamy in marrying Maria Julia nee Carriere, in 1794. Objections are taken to several portions of this evidence, and especially as respects the record of the suit against Des Grange for bigamy in the ecclesiastical court." And though this is followed in the decision by a suggestive, able and searching commentary upon the objections made to the testimony of the defendants, and upon that of the complainant, by connection and comparison of the two, and upon what was deemed the law of the case, all of it relates exclusively to disprove that Des Grange was married, and had a wife alive when he married Zulime.

The announced conclusions in that case, which were seven in number (12 How., 529), show it to have been so. It was "the question decided," and was said "concludes this controversy." The factum of marriage between Clark and Zulime, and the legitimacy of Mrs. Gaines, as both had been decreed by this court, were not then disaffirmed, either directly or inferentially, and all that was said about it is, "that the decree of this court in Patterson's case does not affect these defendants, for two reasons: 1. Because they were no parties to it; and 2d, because it was no earnest controversy."

It is our opinion that the decision made in the case in 12 Howard was not intended to reverse the decree in 6 Howard, and that it cannot be so applied as res judicata to the case we are now trying.

We will now show the difference as to the character in which Mrs. Gaines then sued and that in which she now does, in connection with the law of Louisiana, as to what constitues a res adjudicata, and what does not.

In the first, her demand was for one half and four fifths of another half of the property owned by her father when he died. She then claimed as the donee of her mother to the one half, and as forced heir of her father to four fifths of another half of his estate. Now she claims as universal legatee and legitimate child of her father, under his will of the 18th July, 1813, which has been admitted to probate by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, and ordered to be executed as such.

The difference between the two cases is just that which the law of Louisiana will not permit the decision in the first to be pleaded against her in this case as a res judicata.

It is declared in the article 2265 of the Louisiana Code, "that the authority of the thing adjudged takes place only with respect to what was the object of the judgment. The thing demanded must be the same; the demand must be founded on the same cause of action; the demand must be made between the same parties, and formed by them against each other in the same quality."

The case in 12 Howard and that now under our consideration are dissimilar as to parties and things sued for, or what is called "the object of the judgement." The suit now is not between Mrs. Gaines and Relf and Chew, but between herself as complainant, and Duncan N. Hennen as defendant. Nothing was said in the first suit of the claim of Mrs. Gaines under the will upon which she now sues, as in every particular detailed in the article 2265. There are differences between her present cause of action and that formerly made, and the demand now made is not between the same parties, or formed against each in the same quality. And therefore, upon well settled principles coincident with the article 2265, and also independent of it, nothing that was said or done in the case in 12 Howard can prejudice her claim as she now makes it. We give the authorities for that position, that they may be consulted, without being able, for want of time, to show their application by extracts.

And the precise point was ruled in Burt v. Sternburgh, 4 Cow., 563, 564, "that the defendant might have shown, if he could, that he had acquired a title since the former trial, or any title other than that which had been passed upon in the former trial."

We are fully satisfied from the article 2265, and the cases cited from the Louisiana courts, and from the English and American reports, that the objection of res judicata, as made against the recovery of the complainant in this case, is without any foundation in law.

We have now reached the last and most important objection made against the complainant's recovery. But before discussing it directly, we must dispose of the ecclesiastical record, which was much relied upon in the argument to repel the evidence of her legitimacy, and to establish the fact that the marriage between her father and mother was unlawful, from her having been then the lawful wife of Jerome Des Grange; in other words, that Des Grange did not commit bigamy when he married her, by which she was not released from her conjugal relations with him, and had not the right to marry any other man who was free to contract marriage.

We have seen that exceptions were taken to the admissibility of that record as evidence when it was first presented by the defendant's counsel in the case before the circuit court. They were renewed upon the appeal here. They were continued when the defendants introduced it again in to this case, and it is necessarily before us to be determined as a question of law, whatever may have been thought of it heretofore, either by judges or by counsel.

Our first remark concerning it is, admitting that the canon law, as sanctioned by the Church of Rome, was in force in Louisiana at the time of this procedure, it was a mere assumption, without authority in its beginning, tyrannous against the object of it, and irregular in its action. It was a nullity, coram non judice, before the canon who issued it. The presbyter canon who assumed to do so was not Vicar-General or Governor of the Bishoprick of Louisiana and the two Floridas. He was only the presbyter canon of a vacant see, without delegation by commission or deputation from a bishop to represent him in his spiritual offices and powers. He had no canonical power in his pastoral charge of a particular church and congregation to originate a prosecution for bigamy. Nor would either archbishop or bishop, had there been either then in Louisiana, have ventured to do so in the condition at that time of the ecclesiastical practice and royal ordinances of Spain especially in their application to its foreign possessions. And such a procedure was a direct violation of the Instituciones de derecho canonico Americano por El Rev. Sr. D. Justo Donoso.

The inquisition, as it had existed for more than a hundred years in France and Italy, was introduced into Spain by Gregory IX., about the middle of the 13th century. It encountered no opposition there. It at first attained a prevalence and extension of power larger than it had exercised before, and was on the increase when Spain became an united kingdom under Ferdinand and Isabella. They were authorized by the bull of Sextus IV. to establish the inquisition in their States. And then it was invested with jurisdiction of heresies of all kinds, and also of sorcery, Judaism, Mahomedanism, offenses against nature, and polygamy, with power to punish them, from temporary confinement and severe penanances to the san benito and the auto de fé. Before that time the inquisition had exercised a capricious jurisdiction, both as two persons and creeds. Encyclopædia Britannica, 8 edition, 11th vol., art. Inqui., page 386. In its new form it met with opposition. Attempts were made in Castile and Arragon to repulse its authority and to restrain the holy office, as it encroached upon government and deprived the people of many of their ancient rights and privileges. Its power, however, became triumphant, and so aggressive upon royal authority that it was resisted by the Kings of Spain, as well in the kingdom as in its foreign possessions.

It cannot be expected that we shall enter chronologically into such a detail. We will verify what has just been said by distinct citations from the laws of Spain and royal ordinances.

The first of these ordinances which we shall cite is that of Charles I. of Spain (5 of Germany), issued at Madrid on the 21st September, 1530; Leyes de Indias, tom. 1, livre 1, titulo 10, page 48.

Charles had been about twelve years in Spain. The mines of the West had begun to throw their treasures into Spain. They were essential to the accomplishment of the political and military designs of the King, and to his necessities also. Complaints were constantly being made of the rigors of the inquisition upon the Indians in his western dominions, and upon his subjects who had emigrated to them in large numbers in pursuit of gold. It was said but for such causes that the yield of gold would have been larger. The King determined to restrain the holy office in its jurisdiction, and issued his decree of September 21, 1530. We give Judge Foulhouse's translation of it: "We order the attorneys, police officers, sheriffs, and other ministerial officers of the prelates and ecclesiastical judges of our West Indies, Islands, and continents along the ocean, not to arrest any layman, or issue any execution against him or his property, for any reason whatever; and we order all clerks and notaries not to sign, seal or take any deposition with regard to the same, or for any reason thereto relating; and whenever ecclesiastical judges shall judge necessary to have a person imprisoned or an execution issued, they shall pray for the royal aid of our secular justices, who shall grant it according to law. And all vicars and ecclesiastical judges shall observe this order and comply with it, as is prescribed by this law, under penalty of losing the status and privileges which they enjoy in the Indies, and of being there held as foreigners and strangers to the same. And any of said attorneys, police officers, sheriffs, clerks and notaries, and any other who do the contrary, shall be forever exiled from all of our Indies, and all of their goods shall be confiscated for the profit of our royal treasures; and we hereby direct and empower all of our justices, and all of our subjects and settlers, not to consent thereto and let the attorneys or executing officers do so, too; and we order that this ordinance be observed, any contrary custom notwithstanding.

The ordinance of Charles was followed by another of his son, Philip II., which declared, "that whenever in our royal courts of the Indies the aid of the secular arm shall be asked by the prelates and ecclesiastical judges, either for an arrest or for execution, the demand shall be by petition, and not by requisition." These royal ordinances will be found in the Recopilacion in the Indies. They were declared by a law of Don Carlos II., one hundred and thirty years after they were promulgated, to be existing laws, on the 18th May, 1680. See the law to that effect preceding the Titulo Primero in Libro Primero, fol. 1, Recopilacion Leyes de Indies. They have had their places in every edition of the Recopilacion since. Indeed, they were never abrogated, and were in practical operation in all of the dominions of Spain in America until she lost them.

They establish satisfactorily that the presbyter canon, Hasset, when he issued his prosecution against Jerome Des Grange for bigamy and imprisioned him, that he did so contrary to law, and that his whole proceeding in the matter was a nullity, and, as such, inadmissible as record evidence in a secular or ecclesiastical court. Recopilacion Leyes de los reynos de las Indies; En Madrid, por Andres Ortega, ano. de 1774; Tercera Edicion, page 48.

But there are other royal ordinances establishing what has just been said in respect to the nullity of that procedure, because they bear directly upon the incapacity of the ecclesiastical power to originate a prosecution for bigamy.

The first of them which we shall cite is a çedule of March 19, 1754, in which it was declared that polygamy was a crime of a mixed nature, in which the royal tribunals may take cognizance in the first instance, with this qualification, that if the inquisition wishes to punish the accused for suspicion of heresy, he shall be remitted to it after having suffered the legal penalties. Leyes de Indies, ch. 1, tit. 19, note 2.

But this cedule was modified in 1761 by Charles III. leaving to the inquisition cognizance of this crime, and reserving only to the secular courts the power to take informations, and to arrest the accused in order to deliver him to the inquisition. This concession was made by the King, who ascended the throne at a period peculiarly critical, requiring the conciliation of every agency in his new kingdom to meet the pressure of political difficulties, and to allay discontents and suspicions against himself, which subsequently became a revolt. He was charged with being opposed to the inquisition, from having been on the throne of Naples for several years, where it had never been introduced, the people having always resisted its establishment over them.

But the prudence of the King did not restrain the inquisition from the assertion of its jurisdiction in that and in other particulars offensively to the ancient usuages and rights of Spain. In its eagerness to extend its power, it invaded the royal authority, and stretched its jurisdiction to every cause in the slightest degree connected with ecclesiastical discipline or punishment. The King resisted it, and he was soon furnished with a cause for doing so. The inquisition having taken from the auditor of the army a process instituted against an old veteran who was accused of bigamy, the jealousy which the King in fact entertained against the inquisition was revived. His vigilant minister, d'Aranda, used it to obtain a royal decree, ordering the process against bigamy to be restored to the civil or secular courts. It also enjoined upon the inquisition to abstain from interfering with the proceedings of the secular courts; required it to confine itself to its proper functions in the prosecution of apostacy and heresy; forbade it to "defame with imprisonment his vassals before they were previously and publicly convicted," and commands the inquisitor-general to require the inquisitors to observe the laws of the kingdom in cases of that kind; and further, all the King's royal tribunals, judges, and justices, were ordered to keep and obey the decree, and to punish those who should violate it in any manner whatever. This was the decree of Charles III., of the 5th of February, 1770, cited by Judge Foulhouse in his opinion upon the nullity of the proceedings against Jerome Des Grange, by the assumption of the Presbyter Canon, Hasset, of the Cathedral Church of New Orleans. For the royal decree of the 5th February, 1770, see original, the Novissima Recopilacion, Vol. V., p. 425; Coxe's Memoirs of the Kings of Spain, 3d vol., ch. 57, page 367.

Thus stood the jurisdiction of the inquisition in respect to the crime of bigamy restrained by royal authority for six years. Complaints were then made of the uncertainty of the royal cedule of the 5th February, 1770, especially in respect to the extent of its interference with the power of the holy office to inquire for discipline and for punishment into cases of polygamy. The King was induced to call a toro or council, to discuss the different relations and boundaries between the secular and ecclesiastical cognizances of the crime of bigamy. The result of that council was communicated to the King on the 6th September, 1777. It was that a majority of it had come to a conclusion, that by the act of marrying a second time whilst the first wife was alive, the person who does so violates the faith due to the marriage contract; that he deceives the second wife and wrongs the first; inverts the order of succession, and of the legitimacy established by the laws, inasmuch as his fraud makes the children of the second matrimony, though truly adulterine, legitimate, and capable to inherit from their parents on account of the good faith of their mother in contracting that marriage; further, that the kingdoms of Spain assembled in cortes had established penalties against the crime of bigamy, cammanding that they should be imposed by the royal courts, and declaring that they should not be embarrassed in their cognizance of the offense; also, that he who marries a second time, his first wife being living, offends the ordinary jurisdiction in maliciously deceiving the curate to assist at a null marriage, and that on that account there is ecclesiastical jurisdiction to inquire into the validity or nullity of marriages; but that it was to be done without embarrassing the royal courts in their cognizance of the offense. It was then said that such persons may also incur the crime of a false profession of the sacraments, which was exclusively within the jurisdiction of the holy office; which was, however, to be exercised reciprocally by it and the secular courts, to prevent the repetition of the offense by the imposition of penalties which belong to each, and by the delivery of prisoners from one to the other to be tried. Upon the foregoing report being made to the King, he gave a royal order to be communicated to the inquisitor-general, that by his cedule of the 5th February, 1770, the holy office was not impeded in the cognizance of the crimes of heresy and apostacy, and of persons declared subject to suspicion of bad conscience by the violation of apostolic bulls which had been received and enforced in Spain with royal consent, in those cases in which the jurisdiction of them was in the holy office. This royal resolution was followed by another decree, remitted to the alcaldro and to the chancery and audiences of the kingdom on the 20th February, 1782. Novissima Recopilacion, page 425 of Vol. V. ley. 10, note 1, Tercera Edicion, Madrid, por Andres, Ortega. 1774.

The result of the council, however, of which we have just given the particulars, did not satisfy the grand inquisitor. Attempts were made to reassert his assumed jurisdiction in all its plenitude, both in Spain and its foreign dominions. The holy office was on its decline. This was its last great struggle for existence. The King had long resided in Naples, where the inquisition was regarded with the same horror as among Protestants. Though partaking of the same feeling, he was too prudent to trample on the prejudices and opinions of his Spanish subjects, or to make a direct attack against the great engine of ecclesiastical authority. He had witnessed the danger of precipitate reforms and of shocking national prejudices in matters however beneficial. He adopted in his long reign the only maxim which could be pursued with safety, and perhaps the only means to produce the intended effect. He endeavored to check the oppressions, to soften the rigors, and to circumscribe the authority of the inquisition, and thus prepared the way for time and circumstances to produce its total obolition. In the pursuit of this design he was seconded by the energy and liberal principles of his minister, Florida Blanca. The principal restrictions of de Aranda were gradually revived; and in 1784 the celebrated decree was issued, which partially subjected the proceedings of the holy office to the cognizance of the sovereign. It was ordered that no grandee, minister, or any person in civil or military service of the Crown, should be subjected to a process without the approbation of the King. Thenceforth this formidable tribunal became feeble in its operations, and was suffered only to give such displays of its authority as were calculated to weaken the public veneration. Coxe's Memoirs of the Kings of Spain, Vol. III., pages 526, 527, &c. Under the reign of the son of Charles, the Prince of Asturias, his successor in Spain and the Indies, "the inquisition received a still heavier shock, and before the late revolution it had become a mere tribunal of police, to arrest the progress of political, rather than of religious heresy." It was finally abolished in Spain in 1808.

It appears, then, from the royal ordinances which have been cited, that from the time of the introduction of the inquisition into Spain the extent and manner for the exercise of its jurisdiction were subject to the regulations of royal ordinances; that it had been so restrained in polygamous cases, its jurisdiction in them having been confined to inquiries connected with the validity or nullity of marriages, and to the infliction of penances for the violation of the ecclesiastical law in respect to them. It had not the power to initiate a process in a case of bigamy for the punishment of it but in subjection to the royal ordinances, or to institute in the Indies, after those ordinances were passed, an inquisitorial tribunal concerning it before the accused had been convicted in the secular courts.

Such was the law of Spain in respect to prosecution for bigamy, and the sunken condition of the inquisition, when no ecclesiastic, however high may have been his dignity, would have ventured to make such a decree as was issued by the Presbyter Canon of the Cathedral Church of New Orleans against Jerome Des Grange for bigamy. It had all the form and more than the vigor of the holy office. It was entitled "Criminal proceedings instituted against Geronimo Des Grange, for bigamy, by the Vicar-General and Governor of the Bishoprick of this Province, and attested by the notary, Franco Bermudez." The canon subsequently styles himself Canonical Presbyter of this Holy Cathedral Church, which he was;

but adds that he was provisory Vicar-General and Governor of the Bishoprick of the Province, which he was not. This assumption was either ignorance, or was intended to give consideration to himself or to the prosecution. He was neither provisor nor Vicar-General. For the manner in which those functions were deputed by the bishop, we refer to the 8d volume of the Inituciones de Derecho Canonico Americano, Appendice Primero, pages 894, 395, 396, 398. The decree purports to have been issued on the 4th of September, 1802. It begins by saying that it had been publicly stated in this city that Geronimo Des Grange, who had been married in 1794 to Maria Julia Carrière, was at that time married before the Church to Barbara Jeanbelle, and is so now, who has just arrived; and also, that Des Grange, having just arrived from France a few months since, has caused another woman to come here, whose name will be obtained. It is also reported in all the city, publicly and notoriously, that Des Grange has three wives, and not being able to keep it a secret, &c., &c., His Excellency has ordered, in order to proceed in the investigation and the infliction of the corresponding penalty, that testimony be produced to substantiate his being a single man, which Des Grange presented in order to consummate the marriage, and that all should appear who can give any information in the matter, &c., &c. And as it has been ascertained that Des Grange is about to leave the city with the last of his three wives, let him be placed in the public prison during these proceedings, with the aid of one of the alcaldes, this decree serving as an order, which His Excellency has approved, and as such it is signed by me, notary. Before me, FRANCO BERMUDEZ.

(Signed) THOMAS HASSETT.

It is not necessary to cite any of the proceedings upon that paper, or to speak of the frequently occurring notarial certificates of Francisco Bermudez. The whole of it, however, shows that what was done was so under his contrivance and auspices. The canon, Hassett, is made to begin as an ecclesiastic in authority, and signs the decree, but places the execution of it and the imprisonment of Des Grange upon an order of His Excellency. It is twice referred to in the paper as a part of it. It should have been produced with the other proceedings. Without that being done, no part of it can be received in evidence as the record of an authentic judicial tribunal. The whole paper is a novelty in the proceeding of an ecclesiastical court. His Excellency means the chief alcalde of the city, who had no legal authority under the law of Spain to sanction such a prosecution, or to order the execution of it, either by the introduction of testimony or the imprisonment of the accused. The paper signed by Franco Cassiergues is insufficient for that purpose.

The procedure of the holy office in such cases will be found in the article Inquisition, in the 8th edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. XII., page 389. It establishes the fact that the cannon, Hassett, and Bermudez, intended to proceed against Des Grange according to the forms of the holy office, and that at a time when its functions in such particulars had ceased in Spain and in the Indies. Those who are curious may also find directions for such a procedure in Burns' Ecclesiastical Law, and in Ougton's Ordo Judiciorum sive Methodus Procedendo in Negotiis et Litibus in foro Ecclesiastico Civili Britannico et Hibernico, 2d volume. Mr. Bentham, also, in his Rationale of Judicial Evidence, specially applied to English Practice, Vol. II, book 8, ch. 17, pages 380 to 403, exposes with cogent reasoning and admirable satire the artifices of the early English ecclesiastics, and their success in getting up a similar initiation of a prosecution in contravention of English statutes.

Before leaving the paper we have been examining, it is proper for us to allude to the testimony of Judge Foulhouse given in this case, and to his opinion given afterwards in confirmation of its invalidity.

When he was examined as a witness, it was distinctly understood between the parties, and agreed to, that the defendants might make a motion to suppress his testimony. That was not done. We cannot infer from it that the counsel of the defendants acquiesced in the witness's conclusion that the paper from the Cathedral Church was inadmissible as evidence, but it is certainly good cause for the reliance placed by counsel in their argument of the cause upon the learned judge's declarations, and his support of them by his researches. He cites from the Partida, 7 tit., law 16; Novisima Recopilacion, book 12, tit. 28, law 16; Novissima R., book 12, tit. 28, law 10; the last being the cedule of Charles III. in a case of imputed bigamy, ordering the inquisitor-general to direct the inquisitors to take cognizance of the crimes of heresy and apostacy, bigamy being considered by the canon law as a kind of heresy, without assuming to do so "by defaming the accused with imprisonment before they had been previously and publicly convicted."

For the reasons given, supported by the royal ordinances of Spain, we have been brought to the conclusion that the paper from the Cathedral Church of New Orleans, introduced by the defendants as a part of their evidence in this case, is inadmissible as such, and that all which it contains must be disregarded by us in the judgment we shall give.

We finally remark, that our extended examination of that paper has not been made because of its essential bearing upon the merits of the case of the complainant. It was to disabuse the record of what did not legally belong to it, and to correct misapprehensions which might arise unless its character and import had been legally shown. Give to it, however, the fullest credence, and it will be seen that it can have no effect upon the law of adulterine bastardy, upon which this case must be decided, which we are now to consider.

This brings us to the chief objection which was made in the argument, and most relied upon to defeat the recovery of the complainant. It is that her status of adulterine illegitimacy incapacitates her from taking as legatee under the olographic will of her father, though admitted to probate, as it has been, by the Supreme Court of Louisiana.

It is an averment of the defendant in his answer to the complainant's bill, but not in response to any allegation in it. It changes the attitude of the litigants from what it was in the case of Gaines v. Relf and Chew, in 12 How., 472. Then Mrs. Gaines had the burden of proof to establish affirmatively the fact, that she was the forced heir of her father, and the donee of her mother, his widow. This court at that time did not think that had been satisfactorily done, and dismissed her suit, without affirming for or against the factum of marriage between her father and mother. Indeed, such a point could not have been made, or be supposed to have been intended to be decided by the court in the case then in hand, without expressly overruling its decision in 6 Howard, that there had been a lawful marriage between Daniel Clark and Zulime Carriere, her father and mother, and that Mrs. Gaines was their lawful child. To get rid of the force and effect of that decision, the defendants, having only charged before that she was the offspring of an illicit intercourse between her father and mother, invoked the church papers of which we have spoken so much, in the hope of establishing from it that she was an adulterous bastard. And again, with the aid of that which is not evidence in the case, and with much that is so, they now rely to establish that charge. Mrs. Gaines meets the charge with new evidence, relying upon the old also, and with the declaration of her father in his last will, that "I do hereby acknowledge that my beloved Myra, who is now living in the family of Samuel B. Davis, is my legitimate and only daughter, and that I leave and bequeath unto her, the said Myra, all the estate, whether real or personal, of which I may die possessed, subject only to the payment of certain legacies, hereinafter named." And with this presentation of herself, of which she had never had the proof before, asked that the case might be judged according to the evidence and the laws applicable to it. What that proof is will be arrayed hereafter in its proper place. Now, we only remark, that the burden of proof is upon the defendant, and that the law applicable to such a declaration in a will, concerning a child, requires that there shall be full proof to the contrary of it, and will not be satisfied with semi plena probatio.

But the law regulating the sufficiency of proof for the disaffirmance of such a declaration in a will cannot be fully understood and appreciated, unless our recollection shall be revived of the differences made by the ecclesiastical law and that of Louisiana as to the kinds of illegitimacy, and the disabilities and privileges attending them. In fact and in law they differ. The rights and capacities of illegitimates depend upon the distinctions being preserved.

If one be a bastard, from having been born, as the code expresses it in article 27, of an illicit connection, though they cannot claim the rights of legitimate children, yet if they have been duly acknowledged by their fathers and mothers, leaving no lawful children or descendants, they, as natural children, will be called to the legal estate or succession of the mother, to the exclusion of her father and mother, and other ascendants and collaterals of lawful kindred. And in the case of their father's succession or estate, they may be called to the inheritence of it when he has acknowledged them, and has left no descendants, no ascendant, no colleral relations nor surviving wife, and to the exclusion only of the state. But though natural children, and known to be so, they can take by testament or will from their father, if born before their father's will were made. And here we have the reason, in the differences of their right of succession to their fathers and mothers, why Clark made his olographic will in favor of his legitimate daughter Myra; fearing from the clandestinity of his marriage, and other circumstances attending it, that her legitimacy would be denied, notwithstanding his habitual and daily acknowledgement of it, unless it was proclaimed and avowed in his will. They take or inherit by wills of their fathers, if born before the wills were made. As of a devise that B shall stand seised of land to the use of Jane, his daughter. This would be a good devise to her, if she were reputed to be so, though she were a bastard, and not so called in the will. Dyer, 328, pl. 29; S. C., Jenk, p. 239; 41 E., 3-13. But this does not extend to a bastard born after will made.

Sid., 149; 39 E., 3-24; 3 Leon, 48; River's case 1 Atk., 410; Hardin v. Staden, 2 Ves., Jr., 589; 2 Blodwell v. Edwards, Cro. Eliz., 509, 510; Coke Litt., 123, B; Ex parte Wallop, 4 Brown, C. C., 90; Kennell v. Abbott, 4 Ves., 502.

A bastard in esse, whether born or unborn, is competent to be a devisee or legatee of real or personal estate. The only question in such a case is, whether, when in esse, the bastard is sufficiently designated as the object of the bequest.

Gordon v. Gordon, 1 Mer., 141; Bayley v. Snelham, 1 Sim. & Stu., 78; 2 Pow., Dev., by Jarm., p. 260; Co. Litt., 3-6, and note 1; Dyer, 313; Noy, 35; Park, 26; 3 Leon, 48, 49.

But we ought to mention in this connection whether a gift can be made to a bastard not procreated is vexata questio. The early authorities certainly lean to the negative. The reason assigned is, "that the law does not favor such a generation, nor expect that such shall be." Blodwell v. Edwards, Cro. Eliz., 509; Co. Litt., 3-6.

So that we see by the foregoing authorities, had it been proved in this case or in any of the cases which the complainant has brought for her rights in her father's estate, that she was the offspring of an illicit intercourse, which we affirm it never has been, she would now be in the condition, from her father's testamentary declaration of her legitimacy, to take as his universal legatee. And if the case was made to turn upon that now, the complainant would be entitled to a decree; but it does not.

It is said, as an adulterous bastard, produced by an unlawful connection between two persons, who at the time when the child was conceived were either of them or both connected by marriage with some other person, the complainant cannot take under the olographic will of her father, because the Code forbids it. The articles 217, 222, do forbid the legitimation or acknowledgment by their fathers and mothers of adulterine children. The article, 914, does say that in no case can adulterine children inherit the estates of their fathers and mothers—that is, as acknowledged natural children may do, by the articles 912 and 913 of the Code. And it is declared by the 1475 article of the Code, "that natural fathers and mothers can in no case dispose of property in favor of their adulterine or incestuous children, unless to the mere amount of what is necessary to their sustenance, or to procure them an occupation or possession by which to support themselves." This is the prohibition upon which the defendants rely to defeat the complainant.

The application of it, however, to the case in hand, was not as fully considered by the learned counsel for the defendant as it might have been. We will make it, with a decided Louisiana case, for everything that shall be said, and by authorities for every general proposition cited, akin to the subject-matter.

The article containing the prohibition necessarily intends that the relation of the parties shall be such as it mentions, before it can have an effect upon either of them.

Now, we say, first, that the legal relations of adulterous bastardy do not arise in this case; for, independently of the declaration of the will, that the complainant is the legitimate child of Daniel Clark, this court having decided in 6th Howard that the marriage of Clark to Zulime was valid by reason of the invalidity of her previous marriage with Jerome Des Grange, that of course makes the complainant legitimate. But if it be assumed, as it was in the argument, that by the decision in 12 Howard, the marriage of Clark to Zulime was invalid on account of the validity of her marriage with Des Grange, then still Myra is legitimate by the law, as the offspring of a putative marriage.

The cases from the Louisiana Reports are conclusive. The articles in the old code, 119, 120, are to this effect, that if both parents, or either of them, contracted the second marriage in good faith, the issue of it will be legitimate. So it was ruled in the case of Clendening v. Clendening, 3 Mart. N. S., 538. The language of that case is, "that the plaintiff resists the claim on the succession of his father by a woman he married in the lifetime of his wife, the plaintiff's mother, and of the children, if born of that woman. The defendants contend that notwithstanding the plaintiff's father had a lawful wife at the time of his second marriage, that as the woman he last married was in good faith at the time of the marriage, and ever since, at least till after the birth of the last child she had by him, her marriage has its civil effects; and that she and her children, the present defendants, are entitled to all the advantages the law gives to a lawful wife and children. There seems to be no dispute on the question of law. The woman who was deceived by a man who represents himself single, and the children begot while the deception lasted, are bona fide wife and children, and as such are entitled to all the rights of a legitimate wife and issue." The plaintiff then urged, that four of the children were born after the good faith of the woman ceased, as she had been advised of the illegality of her marriage by a communication made to her that her husband had another wife living in Tennessee. The court, however, said the proof of this knowledge was insufficient to deprive herself and her children of their rights, though one witness swore he communicated that fact to her.

The next case come up before the new court organized in Louisiana under the Constitution of 1845. It is that of Patton v. Philadelphia and New Orleans, 1 La. Ann., 100. The facts were, that in 1799 A. Morehouse married Abigail Townes in the State of New York, and had two children by her. He subsequently came to the Spanish colony of Louisiana, and gave out that he was a widower, and married Elenore Hook. In the act of marriage, he declared himself the widower of Abigail Townes. By the second wife he had children, and both wives survived him. It was said, "the decision of the late Supreme Court in the case of Clendening v. Clendening et al., 3 Mart. N. S., 538, in relation to the good faith of the second wife, is a correct application of the Spanish law, which regulated the subject-matter at the time of the marriage of the plaintiff's ancestor. By the law, 1 title, 13, part 4, it is ordained, that if, after both parties know with certainty the existence of the impediment to the marriage, they beget children, these children will not be legitimate; yet, if, during the existence of such impediment, and while one or both of them was ignorant of it, they should be accused before the judges of Holy Church, and before the impediment, as proved in the sentence pronounced, they should have children, those begotten during the existence of the doubt will all be legitimate. We agree with the plaintiff's counsel, that the second wife, and all the children conceived during her good faith, have all the rights which a lawful marriage gives." In this case, also, it was said that the second wife was informed of the existence of her husband's first wife; "but the court answered, the evidence establishes nothing more than the existence of a doubt."

We now give the case of Abston v. Abston, 14 La. Ann., 137, decided in 1860, by the Supreme Court of Louisiana. Its ruling is coincident with the two previous cases cited, upon a statement of facts concurring with them, but more particular in detail.

Olive Abston sued to have herself recognized as the lawful surviving wife of John Abston, deceased, late of the parish of Carroll, claiming she was entitled to a portion of the property of his succession. Her son, John N. Abston, the issue of her marriage with John Abston, deceased, joined in the action, for the purpose of having himself recognized as the legitimate son and lawful heir to the estate of his deceased father. John N. Abston is the exact case of Mrs. Gaines. The suit is against Rebecca Wright, the third wife of John Abston, deceased, and the administrator of his succession or estate. He intervened in his capacity of tutor of Nancy Nix Abston, the minor child of the defendant, the issue of her marriage with the deceased, claiming in behalf of the minor the rights of legitimate and forced heir in the succession of John Abston, her father. Rebecca Wright pleads in general denial, and avers that she was lawfully married to John Abston, deceased, in Warren county, in the State of Mississippi, and that if the plaintiff's alleged prior marriage was ever consecrated, it was unknown to her, and to all other persons residing in the State of Mississippi. She filed, also, a supplemental answer, averring that her husband, John Abston, had made in the State of Mississippi his will, leaving to her his whole estate, after the payment of his debts, and that the will had been admitted to probate in the parish of Carroll, in Louisiana.

The facts of the case were these: John Abston married with Olive Hart, his first wife, and plaintiff in this suit, in the State of Alabama. John N. Abston, the co-plaintiff in the suit, and other children, were the issue of that marriage. John Abston abandoned his family in the State of Alabama, without having been divorced, a vinculo matrimonii, from his first wife, contracted a second marriage with one Susan Bell, and she died. After her death, and being still undivorced from his first wife, he intermarried in Mississippi with Rebecca Wright. In a short time after this last marriage he removed from Mississippi into Carroll County, in the State of Louisiana, where he acquired a new domicil, and where he died, in which was situated the whole property of his succession, movable and immovable at the time of his death.

This narrative, and the relations as they had been given of the parties to the suit, raised two questions, which it became necessary for the court to decide before it gave its opinion upon the question of the legitimacy of the two sets of children of John Abston, the bigamist, and father of them, and the rights of his two wives in his estate: First, as to the effect of the probate of the will, it being contended, as that had been done by a court of competent jurisdiction, that it could not be questioned collaterally, nor its validity be inquired into in the suit. The court declared that the decree of a probate court ordering a will to be executed does not amount to a judgment binding on those who are not concerned in it, and that when the will is offered as the title in virtue of which property is claimed or withheld, that its validity may be inquired into. Sophie v. Duplessies, 2 La. Ann., 724; Succession of Dupuy, 4 La Ann., 570. The other question raised was, whether the rights of the parties in the suit should be determined by the law of Mississippi, where the marriage of the defendant and the deceased had been contracted, or by the law of Louisiana, where John Abston had his domicil at the time of his death, where his succession was opened, and where all his property was situated. The answer to that question was, that the laws of Louisiana which regulate the right of succession make no distinction between persons who have contracted marriage in or out of the State, nor the issue of such marriages, whether born in or out of the State. If they have the qualities required by the law in matters of inheritance, they will be recognized as legal heirs without regard to the places of marriage or birth.

The court, then, with a proper regard to the fact that the will which had been made by John Abston was invalid on account of its not having been attested by three witnesses, and that the succession was an intestacy, determines that it could not be regulated by the law of Mississippi, as the plaintiff contended it should be, the basis of which is the common law, but that it must be by the law of Louisiana. We prefer to cite its own language as to the similitude and the differences between them: "The prior marriage of the deceased with the plaintiff, which remained undissolved, was a legal disability under the common law, which made the marriage with the defendant, Rebecca Wright, not merely voidable, but void ab initio, and made their issue illegitimate, and incapable of succeeding by inheritance to the estate of any one. By the law of this State, the disability of a prior marriage, undissolved, also renders the second marriage null and void; but the legal consequences of a marriage void ab initio under our law are very different from those under the common law. The Civil Code declares, that "the marriage which has been null nevertheless has its civil effects in respect to the parties and their children, if it has been contracted in good faith. If only one of the parties acted in good faith, the marriage produces its civil effects only in his or her favor, and in favor of the children born of the marriage." "In two cases, somewhat similar to the present, it has been held that each wife was entitled at the death of the husband to one half, as the community property, after the payment of debts; and this rule will govern our decision in this case." Patton v. Philadelphia, 1 La. Ann., 98; Hubbell v. Inkstein, 7, La. Ann., 252. The mandate of the court was accordingly given, with this further decree, that John N. Abston, the co-plaintiff, and that Nancy Nix Abston, the minor, represented by the intervenor, are entitled as heirs at law to the separate property or estate of their deceased father, John Abston, and the costs of the appeal were directed to be paid, one half by the plaintiff, Olive Abston, and the other half by Rebecca Wright, the defendant.

But in further confirmation of what has been the Spanish law, and, of course, that of Louisiana, in legitimating the children of those who marry in good faith, believing, upon good ground, that there was not a precedent marriage to prevent it, we cite from the Novissima Recopilacion, 5th vol., 425, N. Ley., 10, what was said in the Council allowed to be held by Charles III., King of Spain, in the year 1777, for the purpose of giving to the inquisitor-general a better understanding than he professed to have concerning the King's royal ordinance of 1770, concerning the jurisdiction of the holy office in bigamy and polygamous cases generally.

The result of that council, and so recognized by the King, was: "That by the act of marrying a second time, whilst the first wife was alive, the person who does so violates the faith due to the marriage contract; that he deceives the second wife and wrongs the first; inverts the order of succession and of the legitimacy established by the laws inasmuch as his fraud makes the children of the second marriage, though truly adulterine, legitimate, and capable to inherit from their parents on account of the good faith of their mother in contracting that marriage."

To the same effect is the Code Napoleon. C. Cer., art. 201, 202. The law of France was so before the code. Pothier, Contrat du Mariage, Vol. III, pp. 172, 107; Toullier, tome 1,598; Marcadi Explication du Code, tome 1,520; Law of Spain, Partida, 4 Lex, tit. 13. Vol. 1; Dalton's Dic., tome 2,372, tit. Mariage, 372.

Thus we see, though a child may be adulterine in fact, it may be legitimate for all the purposes of inheriting from its parents, if one or either of them intermarried in good faith.

Such is the law for others in Louisiana, and it must be administered accordingly for the complainant, if she stands in the position, by the evidence which the law requires and has determined to be sufficient to establish a marriage in good faith between her father and mother, or as to either of them, to entitle her to inherit from either or both of them as legitimate by the law.

On such a question good faith is first to be presumed. Marcadi Explication, tom. 1, pp. 522, 698. As to what constitutes good faith, it is adjudged that to marry a second time, supposing the previous marriage invalid, is one of the cases of good faith. Dalton's Dic., tom. 2, p. 371; Tit. Spain, No. 578. The last two citations have been given to show the inaccuracy of the conclusion of the learned counsel of defendant, that if the invalidity of the marriage between Des Grange and the complainant's mother was not proved, that she was necessarily an adulterine illegitimate.

She was heir at law if procreated by Clark in good faith, or if conceived by her mother in good faith—that is, she supposing her capacity to become the wife of the former.

Nor was a sentence of the nullity of the marriage between Des Grange and the complainant's mother necessary to protect the legitimacy of the offspring. Marcadi Explication, tome 1, p. 495; Ibid. p. 519; 2 Phillimore's Report, 16; Shelford on Marriage, Law Library, Vol. XXXI, p. 275.

The good faith of Clark and Zulime is proved by the evidence of Madame Despau (Old Rec., 580), and Madame Calliant (Old Rec., 309), and by the contemporaneous facts relating to the marriage, as well as by the testimony of Caviliere (Old Rec., 546) as to the bigamy of Des Grange, by the testimony of Bellechasse, by that of Madame Benguerel. Old Rec., p. 349. The good faith of Clark in marrying is proved by his own declarations in the last years of his life. By Bellechasse's testimony, Probate Record, 173; Boisfontaine, Ibid, 162; Mrs. Symth's, Ibid, 152. Again: the good faith of the marriage is proved by the authentic declaration of Clark in his will that the complainant was his legitimate daughter and only child. See, also, the opinion of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, Clark Succession, 11 La. Ann., 124.

But we now say, if we are to consider the question of adulterine bastardy to be properly before us in this case, it cannot affect the rights of the complainant under the will of Clark of 1818. If the complainant, by reason of the matrimonial character of her mother, shall be deemed adulterine on that side, she is not so on the side of her father, he having been as a single man free to marry; and if he did marry in good faith, she is not incapacitated, as respects him, to be, under his will, his universal legatee. Journal du Palais, Vol. LX. p. 45, January 7, 1852.

There is no pretense that Clark was incapable to contract marriage; and it matters not whether, as to the mother of the complainant, any impediment existed under the Spanish law; the complainant stands as the declared issue of her father by a woman to whom he supposed himself lawfully married. Not only the bill itself, but the evidence upon which it is established, shows that Daniel Clark had no other legitimate issue. No one exists who has any right to contest his acknowledgment of the legitimacy of his child, or to set up the adulterous source of her origin. See C. N., art. 335, 2 Marcadi, pp. 51, 81, 52. Nos. 60–62; Journal du Palais, Vol. LX, p. 45; Jobert v. Pilot, 4 La. Ann., 305; Judge Foulhouse's Opin., 57. 58, 2 Toulliers, 960.

The testamentary recognition of a child as legitimate is of the highest legal authority. All presumptions are to be taken in favor of such a declaration. Matthews on Pres. Ev., pp. 284, 286; Gaines v. Chew, 12 How, 593; Miller v. Andrus, 2 L. Ann., 767; Jarman, Wills, Vol. I., p. 188; 5th Phillip's Note, 284, 287. And authorities cited. 1 Greenl. Ev., 134. And we now cite, in confirmation of all that has been said upon this point, the 117 Nouvelle of Justinian. It gives the rule of evidence in such cases, and it prevails in every ecclesiastical court in Europe, where the Roman law is the basis of its jurisprudence, in respect to the legitimacy of persons. It is, also, in cases of that kind, the law of Louisiana.

We give it in the orignal Latin: "Ad hoc autem et illud sancire perspeximus, ut si quis filium aut filiam habens de libera muliere cum qua nuptiæ consistere possunt, dicat in instrumento, sive publica, sive manu conscripto et habente subscriptionem trium testium fide dignorum, sive in testamento, sive in gestis monumentorum, hunc aut hanc filium suum esse, et non adjecerit naturalem, hujusmodi filios, esse legitimos, et nullam aliam probationem ab iis quæri, sed omni frui eos ure quod legitimis filu nostræ conferunt leges." Translation: "We have determined to ordain, that if any one having a son or daughter of a free woman, with whom he might have been married, shall say in a written act, either before a public officer or under his own hand, sustained by three credible witnesses, or in his last will, or in public act, that this son or this daughter is his child, and that he does not call them natural children, they shall be reputed legitimate, and no other proof shall be demanded of them, and they shall enjoy the rights of legitimate children." This Nouvelle has been the subject of much criticism and learned interpretation by the most distinguished civilians. By no one more so than the Chancellor d' Aguesseau, in his declaration or ordinance of 1736, which had for its object, as he himself says, to explain and affirm the proofs of the legal condition of men. The declaration consists of forty-two articles. Severel of them relate to the form in which baptismal acts ought to be registered to give verity to legitimates; but whether they are so or not, this ordinance of Justinan secures to children legitimacy if they shall be placed by their fathers or mothers within its predicament. And we may add, that the interpretation of it by all who have been skilled in the civil law is, that it attaches legitimacy to the son or daughter of a man and woman who are both free, but that it does not demand that the word legitimate should be applied to them to make them so. On the contrary, the Nouvelle means that if the child is not called a natural child, he is of right to be reputed legitimate, and the commentator's remark is: "Mark well, that this is not a Roman law made when paganism reigned in Rome, but a law made by a Christian Emperor." Bruxelles, 1827; Question d'Etat; On la previe testimoniale ne fut point admise, tome 8; Causes Celèbres Filiation Reclamee, Sans acte de baptime, sans une Veritable Possession d'Etat sur le fondement de plusieurs forte consectures; tome 19, Causes Celèbres, 204.

Such as we have stated it to be is the law relating to the children of a putative marriage, though it be adulterine in fact, if it was contracted in good faith by the parties, or by either of them. Their children are legitimated to inherit from their parents, either in a case of intestacy or to take by testament. In the latter, a declaration by either father or mother that they are their children, without the addition that they are natural children, will make them legitimate, and no other proof can be demanded of them to enable them to enjoy all the rights of legitimate children. But the case in hand is even stronger than that, for here the father in his will "acknowledges his beloved Myra to be his legitimate and only daughter," and makes her the universal legatee of his estate after the payment of certain legacies.

But the defendants aver that the connection between her father and mother was adulterine, even though they may have been married, and on that account that she is barred from taking as legatee under her father's will.

We will now give the proofs upon which they rely to substantiate their allegation, in connection with the voluntary rebutting testimony of the complainant, as we find it in the record.

The paper from the Cathedral Church in New Orleans is first invoked by the defendants. Now, though that paper has been shown to be an unauthorized attempt by a canonical prebendary, without jurisdiction of any kind in such a matter, upon a public report, to try Des Granger for bigamy, for having three wives at the same time, and to make him answer by imprisonment, whether such an irresponsible accusation was true or not true, the defendants, in our consideration of their averment, shall have the full benefit of that paper as evidence, though we have declared it to be inadmissible as such.

Des Grange, it appears from the paper, was put in the public prison and kept their until the canon, Hassett, after having examined several witnesses, decreed: that not being able to prove the public report, he directed the proceeding to be suspended, to be resumed thereafter if it should become necessary, and that Des Grange should be set at large, on condition that he paid the costs. This he did, and fled from New Orleans, without ever again having again any conjugal relations with the mother of the complainant, though as it will directly appear from the paper that he was indebted to her for his enlargement from the canon's usurped authority. Nor did Des Grange reappear in New Orleans until after the cession of Louisiana to the United States.

In the course of the proceedings against Des Grange, both himself and the complainant's mother were examined as witnesses. Both of them reply to questions concerning his bigamy in respect to his marriage in 1794 with her; acknowledged that they were aware of the report prevailing against him in that regard; and she says that about a year since (in 1801) it was stated in the city that her husband had been married at the North, and wishing to ascertain whether it was true or not, that she had gone to Philadelphia and New York, where she used every exertion to find out the truth of the report, and that she learned only that he had courted a woman, whose father not consenting to the match it did not take place, and she married another man shortly afterwards; and she adds, that she had recently heard that her husband was married to three women, but she did not believe it, nor had she any doubt about the matter which rendered her unquiet or unhappy. All of this Des Grange confirms; for being asked why his wife, Maria Julia Carrière, went to the North last year, he answers: "That the principal reason was, that a report had been circulated in this city that he was married to another woman; she wished to ascertain whether it was true, and she went."

Thus the defendants, by the introduction of the paper from the Cathedral, show the existence and currency of the report of Des Grange's guilt of bigamy in marrying the mother of the complainant, and the aggravation of it in the public mind by the prosecution of him, and from the canon not having dismissed it altogether, but having retained it for further inquiry. Upon his enlargement, as has been proved by unimpeachable testimony, Des Grange fled.

Now, in this connection, it is appropriate to state the evidence which the law will receive and pronounce to be sufficient to determine that he did commit bigamy when he married the mother of the complainant. It so happens, excluding all admission of it to the family of the mother of the complainant, the fact is proved by a witness, the truthfulness of whose testimony has not been assailed, and could not have been.

Madame Benguerel has no connection with the family of the complainant, and her standing and character were such that the defendants could not impeach her credit by even an insinuation against either; but she was subjected to their cross-interrogation. It brought out neither difference nor contradiction of herself, nor was there anything in the way in which she gave her testimony to subject her to any suspicion of friendship to the complainant, or of any want of memory or uncertainty in her narrative.

Madame Benguerel says: "My husband and myself were very intimate with Des Grange, and when we reproached him for his baseness in imposing himself upon Zulime, he endeavored to excuse himself by saying, that at the time he married her he had abandoned his lawful wife, and never intended to see her again." In answer to a cross-interrogatory put upon the point, she says: "I am not related to the defendants, nor with either of them, nor am I with the mother of Myra; nor am I at all interested in this suit." She adds: "It will be seen by my answers how I know the facts; I was well acquainted with Des Grange, and I know the lawful wife of Des Grange, who he married before imposing himself in marriage upon Zulime."

The paper then discloses the following facts: That Des Grange was notoriously charged with bigmay in marrying Zulime; that she left New Orleans " for the North " in 1801 to get proof of it; that he says that her principal reason for going was for that purpose; that he was prosecuted for bigamy by the canon in 1802, and was temporarily released from prison after Zulime had sworn that she did not believe the report about him. It is in proof, also, that he then fled from New Orleans, and did not return to it until the year 1805. Her interference or testimony befor the canon negatives every suspicion that she had any agency in instigating the prosecution against him. His own oath upon the occasion confirms it, for he speaks of his wife being satisfied with his innocence, and there is not a word in the paper nor in any of the evidence to show that her friends had provoked or abetted in any way the public accusation of his bigamy. Nor is Clark, the father of the complainant, at all associated with that procedure. Indeed, he was in Europe at that time. With all these facts and obvious inferences from them, taken in connection with the testimony of Madame Benguerel, the only question concerning the bigamy of Des Grange in marrying the mother of the complainant when he did, is whether the law determines the evidence to be sufficient in a civil suit to establish the fact.

We think that the law requires us to pronounce that it is sufficient.

A charge of bigamy in a criminal prosecution cannot be proved by any reputation of marriage. There must be proof of actual marriage before the accused can be convicted. But in a civil suit the confession of a bigamist will be sufficient, when made under circumstances from which no objection to it as a confession can be implied. There are none such in this case. The first legal consequence of such a state of the evidence is, that it released the mother of the complainant from all conjugal obligations with Des Grange, making her free to contract marriage with any other man who was free to intermarry with her. But that conclusion is not the purpose for which we have used, as the defendant wishes it, what the church paper discloses. The object has been to show that the defendants have introduced that paper in support of the charge of adulterine bastardy, when in fact it discloses a condition of things from which it may well be inferred that both the father and mother of Mrs. Gaines intermarried in good faith. It is far short of the evidence in the record to prove that they did so, which will be seen presently. Then the next testimony which the defendants rely upon to aid in proving the adulterine status of the complainant is that of Daniel W. Coxe, the friend and copartner in business with Daniel Clark. His testimony was originally taken in a previous case to invalidate the marriage between Clark and the mother of the complainant. In 12 Howard, as it was in this case, it was associated with the church paper to sustain the objection we are now considering. In the argument, it was said that the two were sufficient to prove it. But take the testimony of Mr. Coxe as a whole, or in its particulars, and no part of it has the slightest bearing upon the canon's prosecution of Des Grange, or upon the objection that the complainant was the offspring of an adulterous intercourse. Mr. Coxe begins with the history of Caroline Barnes, giving an account of the preparations which he had made at the solicitation of Daniel Clark for the confinement of her mother, and then states it to be his belief that Clark had never married her. Beyond this, in regard to the marriage, he does not speak, except in his offers to the success of his effort to dissuade her from attempting to prove it, and that he did not believe that Daniel Clark was in Philadelphia in the year 1803, when it is alleged that he married there the mother of the complainant. Many other circumstances are narrated by Mr. Coxe in connection with the affairs of Mr. Clark, and of his acknowledgment of Caroline Barnes as his illegitimate child. But after the closest examination of them in connection with the point of adulterous bastardy, and that Clark and Zulime, after the birth of Caroline, were married in good faith, there is not a word in Coxe's testimony to impeach the fact of marriage, or the fidelity of the parties in entering into it.

The defendant also gave in evidence a letter written by Bellechasse, from Matanzas, to Coxe, in reply to one from the latter. Coxe had written to Bellechasse at the instigation of Mr. Relf, requiring him to dispose of fifty-one lots in favor of Caroline Barnes, to the exclusion of the complainant, for whom they were confided by Clark to him for her benefit. This Bellechasse refused to do. He then states what had previously passed between Relf and himself concerning these lots. He had before given to Relf his renunciation of any ownership of them, with directions to dispose of them for Myra, stating what had passed between himself and Clark upon the subject, as he has related it in his testimony. Probate Record, pages 173 to 182, inclusive, answer to 18th interrogatory. This letter does not relate in any way to the marriage between Clark and the complainant's mother, or to their alleged adulterous intercourse. It, however, confirms the honorable character of Bellechasse, and strenghtens all that he had said of Clark's declarations to him of the legitimacy of his daughter Myra, and of his intentions to make her the heiress of his estate. This letter seems to us to have been introduced into this case by the defendants, with some expectation that it might serve to make Bellechasse's testimony equivocal, and also to associate both Myra and Caroline as the adulterine offspring of Clark and Zulime. The attempt, in our view, is a failure as to both. The complainant's status depends upon the evidence in this case. That of Caroline Barnes, notwithstanding the declarations of Coxe that she is the natural child of Clark by Zulime, must be determined by the law as to what were the relations between her mother and Des Grange when she was conceived and born. The witness, Madame Despau, says that she was at the birth of Caroline, and that it took place in 1801. Mr. Coxe says, to the best of his belief, that she was born in the year 1802, but without any of those attendant circumstances which give even a coloring to the correctness of his chronology as to the event of which he was speaking, and with one proceeding from himself, which shows how little reliance can be put upon the accuracy of his memory, either as to the time when he says Mrs. Des Grange presented to him Clark's letter to have her taken care of in her confinement, as she was with child by him, or as to the time of the birth of Caroline, or as to Clark's visits to Philadelphia immediately preceding his departure for Europe in the year 1802. In Mr. Coxe's second examination, he states it had been disclosed to him by his correspondence with Clark that the latter had been in Philadelphia from late in 1801 to the last of April, 1802, all of which time Zulime was there; that it was in April that Clark returned to New Orleans, and afterwards that he had revisited Philadelphia in July, 1802, on his way to Europe; thus confirming the statement of Madame Despau in those particulars. In the absence of all contrary proof, either by circumstance or deposition, the declaration of Madame Despau as to the time when Caroline Barnes was born must be received to establish that fact. And that being in the year 1801, however much it may be suspected that she was the child of Clark, and even that he supposed her to be so, she must be considered in law to be the child of Des Grange, the gestation of her mother and the birth of the child being within the time before any interruption had taken place of their conjugal relations. That is proved by evidence introduced into the case by the defendants. The first is the power of attorney of the 26th of March, 1801, given by Mesdames Caillavet, Lasabe, and Despau, authorizing Des Grange, their brother-in-law, to proceed to Bordeaux, in France, to recover property of which they were co-heiresses of their father and mother. Next, by a general power of attorney, which Des Grange at the same time gave to Zulime to act for him in all affairs during his absence. She did so in several particulars, styling herself the legitimate wife and general attorney of Don Geronimo Des Grange. Des Grange accepted the power given to him, sailed for France in April, and on the 1st July, 1801, wrote from Bordeaux to Clark to aid his wife with his advice, should she be embarrassed in any respect, and expressed his uneasiness that he had not yet heard from her; saying, also, that he was then engaged in a "lawsuit for the purpose of recovering an estate belonging to my wife and family." Now, under such a chronology of circumstances and of conjugal amity, we need not say that as access between man and wife is always presumed until otherwise plainly proved, and that nothing is allowed to impugn the legitimacy of a child short of proof by facts showing it to be impossible that the husband could have been the father of it, the law, then, establishes the relation between Des Grange and Caroline as having been that of father and legitimate child, and that she was not the offspring of an adulterous commerce between Clark and Zulime; though Coxe says she was, and reaffirmed substantially in his letter to Bellechasse, as we gather from his answer in his refusal to turn over property to Caroline which was received by him from her father for Mrs. Gaines. See letter in page 896 of Record of Gaines v. Hennen.

The defendants also gave in evidence an authenticated record from the County Court of New Orleans. It was introduced by them, and declared by them, in their answers to the complainant's bill, to be a petition by her mother, Zulime née Carriere, wife of the said Des Grange, to a competent judicial tribunal in New Orleans, praying for a divorce and dissolution of the bonds of matrimony existing between her and Des Grange, which was subsequently decreed after the birth of the complainant. But they now urge and declare that such record and decree prove nothing in the case. In our opinion it proves much, though differently from what it was introduced for. Their counsel now says, that the record was deficient in the petition and, therefore, that it does not appear that its object was the annulment of the marriage between Zulime and Des Grange on account of his bigamy. The petition is wanting; and why, has not been satisfactorily shown by the defendants. They knew it to be wanting when they introduced the record of evidence, and on that account cannot now repudiate it for what it contains, because that is against the purpose for which it was introduced. It shows that a petition was filed; that a curator was appointed for Des Grange; that he was summoned to answer for Des Grange; that he appeared and demurred to the jurisdiction of the court in cases of divorce, and on that account that the court could not pronounce a judgment therein, and that the damages prayed for in the petition could not be assessed until after the court had rendered judgment touching the validity of the marriage. There was a joinder in demurrer, which, however, was withdrawn, and the curator filed the general issue. The docket entries in the suit, kept by the clerk, are in conformity with the Act of April 10th, 1805, section 11. They are as follows: Petition filed June 24, 1806. Debt or damages, $100. Plea filed 1st July, 1806. Answer filed July 24, 1806. Set for trial 24th July. The witnesses are stated, and the costs given. And then follows judgment for plaintiff, damages $100, July 24, 1806. Now this extract, of so many particulars, makes out as well as it could be done the purpose of the petition, and establishes consistently, as it is required to be done, by the rules of evidence for such a case, that the marriage between Jerome Des Grange and Zulime, or, as otherwise named, Marie Julia, née Carriere, was thereby declared null and void. But the defendant's counsel says, that the record is inoperative for any purpose, inasmuch as it was a proceeding at the instance of Zulime in her maiden name, three years after her alleged marriage with Clark. It is forgotten that a judicial invalidation of marriage at any time, for the bigamy of a party to it, relates back to the time of the marriage, and places the deceived in a free condition to marry again, or to do any other act as an unmarried woman, without any sentence of the nullity of the marriage. The evidence, too, shows that the procedure by Zulime against Des Grange originated in her anxiety to place herself in that condition in respect to her marriage with Clark, which he had enjoined upon her to keep secret until a sentence of the nullity of her marriage with Des Grange had been obtained. She could not, under such circumstances, use Clark's name in such a suit; she could not have sued in Des Grange's when disclaiming the validity of her marriage with him; and therefore her counsel in filing her petition used her maiden name, as it was proper and professional in them to do. One thing is certain, that the record from the County Court of New Orleans does not in any way sustain the charge against this complainant of adulterine bastardy, but adds another circumstance to the many which exist in proof of the marriage between her father and mother, and of the good faith with which they entered into it.

To confirm what has just been said, we will now cite the evidences of it:

"Madame Despau testifies that she was at the marriage of Zulime and Clark in 1802 or 1803; that it took place in Philadelphia, and the ceremoney was performed by a Catholic priest, in the presence of other witnesses as well as of herself She states that she was present when her sister gave birth to Mrs. Gaines; that Clark claimed and acknowledged her to be his child, and that she was born in 1806. That the circumstances of her marriage with Daniel Clark were these: Several years after her marriage with Des Grange, she heard he had a living wife. Our family charged him with the crime of bigamy in marrying Zulime. He at first denied it, but afterward admitted it, and fled from the country. These circumstances became public, and Mr. Clark made proposals of marriage to my sister, with the knowledge of all our family." The witness then continues her narrative, that it was considered essential, before the marriage should take place, that proof should be obtained from the Catholic church in New York of Des Grange's bigamy, it being there that his prior marriage had taken place. They went there; found that the registry of marriages had been destroyed. Clark followed them, and having heard that a Mr. Gardette in Philadelphia had been one of the witnesses of the prior marriage of Des Grange, and he told them that he had been present at the prior marriage of Des Grange; that he knew him and his wife; that the wife had sailed for France. Clark then said, "you have no reason any longer to refuse to marry me; it will be necessary, however, to keep our marriage secret until I have obtained judicial proof of the nullity of your marriage with Des Grange." They were then married.

Such judicial proof was subsequently obtained, as has already been shown. Another witness, Madame Caillavet, confirms the statement that Clark made proposals of marriage for Zulime to her family, after her withdrawal from Des Grange, on account of her having heard that he was the husband of another woman then alive. She also swears that Clark admitted the marriage to her, and that so did Zulime. Clark also made an acknowledgment of it to other witnesses, with simultaneous declarations to them of the legitimacy of Myra; and his paternal treatment of her from her birth to his death impressed them with the full belief of the fact and of the sincerity of the purposes for which he made such declarations. Mrs. Harper, who nursed Myra, not as a hireling, but as the friend of Clark, says that he made to her, at different times, declarations of the child's legitimacy and of his marriage with her mother. He admitted it also to Boisfontaine, and added that he would have avowed the marriage but for her subsequent marriage to Gardette. Pressed upon by such proofs, every effort was made by the most searching and repeated cross-examination to lessen the force of them, without success. Failing in this, a direct attempt was made to discredit their veracity by an impeachment of their characters. It was a signal failure. Forty years of their lives were canvassed to bring upon them some reproach. The proofs to the contrary were decisive. They, too, had had their misfortunes; but their lives had been passed in the different places where they had lived, not only without censure, but altogether free from suspicion. Their testimony was also put in comparison with that of Mr. Coxe. They do differ in immaterial circumstances, but in nothing concerning the marriage between Clark and Zulime. All that Coxe had been able to say about that was, that he did not believe it. That conclusion, too, he came to by inferences from his own narrative concerning the time of the birth of Caroline Barnes; that he withdrew afterwards, as to the time of its occurrence, and also as to his declaration, that Clark had not been in Philadelphia in the year 1801, extending his sojourn there for more than four months, whilst Zulime and her aunt were in search of proofs of the bigamy of Des Grange. The evidence also shows that Clark aided their inquiries for that purpose. Besides the want of memory of Mr. Coxe, his narrative shows so strong a bias against the marriage that we must receive it with many grains of allowance. After Zulime had obtained a sentence of the nullity of her marriage with Des Grange, she went to Philadelphia to learn the truth of reports which were in circulation concerning the fidelity of Clark to herself. She had an interview with Coxe; told him her purpose, and her intention to proclaim her marriage with Clark, unless she became satisfied upon that subject. He told her that she could not prove the marriage, and afterwards advised her to take counsel of a lawyer. He, of course, dissuaded her from any attempt to do so. At the same time Coxe aggravated her distress and hopelessness by telling her that Clark was then engaged to marry a lady of distinction in Maryland, which, whether true in the particulars of his narative of it, or as a general report, there is no proof in this record; but it served his purpose in disuniting Zulime and Clark forever. Clark was then in the height of his popularity and distinction in the Congress of the United States. His friend sheltered him from the disclosure. Mrs. Harper, as a witness to Clark's admission to her repeatedly of the marriage, was cross-examined severely, but without any effect, to diminish the weight of her testimony in chief. Bellechasse and Boisfontaine, in their subsequent examinations, adhered to what they had at first sworn, and their characters forbade even a suspicion of its not being true.

Failing in every attempt to lessen the proof of the marriage, it was suggested that all of these witnesses were in combination to establish it by perjury. The defendant's counsel had himself extracted from their answers that they had no interest of any kind in the result of the suit. They are protected by the rules of evidence from any such imputation. There was no foundation for it.

The marriage, then, having been proved, the only point remaining is, whether it was contracted in good faith by the parties to it. We see no cause for thinking that it was not entered into in good faith. Supposing it, however, not to have been so by Zulime, on account of her not having sincerely believed in the invalidity of her marriage with Des Grange, that could not take away the complainant's right to inherit her father's estate under his olographic will of 1813, if it has not been fully proved, as the rules of evidence in such cases require it to be done, that he did not marry in good faith. The doubts, which may be indulged in respect to Zulime's sincerity, cannot apply to him. He was an unmarried man, never had been married, when he united himself to Zulime, and the weight of testimony in the case is, that he did marry her in good faith. His conduct to his child from her birth to his death, his frequent declarations of his marriage to her mother, and of her legitimacy, and his avowal of it in his last will, are conclusive of his having married in good faith. The law applicable to such cases requires us to say so.

We have not thought it necessary to give all the evidence in this case in detail, but have accurately done so as to all of it bearing in any way upon the points in controversy, and especially as to that having any connection with the charge of adulterine bastardy. Those who may have any curiosity to read the testimony in full, will find it in what is called the Probate Record; also in the cases as they are reported in 6 and 12 Howard, particularly in the old record of the last case.

Our judgment is, that by the law of Louisiana Mrs Gaines is entitled to a legal filiation as the child of Daniel Clark and Marie Julia Carrière, begotten in lawful wedlock; that she was made by her father in his last will his universal legatee; and that the Civil Code of Louisiana, and the decisions and judgments given upon the same by the Supreme Court of that State, entitle her to her father's succession, subject to the payment of legacies mentioned in the record. We shall direct a mandate to be issued accordingly, with a reversal of the decree of the court below, and directing such a decree to be made by that court in the premises as it ought to have done. Thus, after a litigation of thirty years, has this court adjudicated the principles applicable to her rights in her father's estate. They are now finally settled.

When, hereafter, some distinguished American lawyer shall retire from his practice to write the history of his country's jurisprudence, this case will be registered by him as the most remarkable in the records of its courts.

DECREE OF THE COURT.

This appeal having been heard by this court upon the transcript of the record from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, and upon the arguments of counsel, as well for the appellant as for the appellees, this court, upon consideration of the premises, doth now here adjudge, order and decree, that the decree of the said circuit court be, and the same is hereby reversed, with costs; and that such other decree in the premises be passed as is hereinafter ordered and decreed.

And this court, thereupon proceeding to pass such decree in this cause as the said circuit court ought to have passed, doth now here order, adjudge and decree, that it be adjudged and decreed and is hereby adjudged and decreed upon the evidence in this cause, that Myra Clark Gaines, complainant in the same, is the only legitimate child of Daniel Clark in the said bill and proceedings mentioned, and as such was exclusively invested with the character of such legitimate child, and entitled to all the rights of the same; and that under and by virtue of the last will and testament of the said Daniel Clark, the said Myra Clark Gaines is the universal legatee of the said Daniel Clark, and as such entitled to all the estate, whether real or personal, of which he, the said Daniel Clark, died possessed; subject only to the payment of certain legacies therein named.

And this court doth further order, adjudge and decree, that all property described and claimed by the defendant, Duncan N. Hennen, in his answer and exhibits thereto annexed, is part and parcel of the property composing the succession of the said Daniel Clark, to wit: the same which Richard Relf and Beverly Chew, under pretended authority of testamentary executors of the said Daniel Clark and of attorneys in fact of Mary Clark, by act of sale, dated December 28, 1820, conveyed to Azelic Lavigne: which the said Azelic Lavigne, by act of sale of the 29th of February, 1836, conveyed to J. Hiddleston, and which the said J. Hiddleston by Act of the 27th May, 1836, conveyed to the New Orleans and Carrolton Railroad Company, and which the said Company, by act of sale on the 13th of May, 1844, conveyed to the said Duncan N. Hennen, the defendant in this cause; that the said Richard Relf and Beverly Chew, at the time and times when, under the pretended authority aforesaid, they caused the property so described and claimed by the defendant, Hennen, to be set up and sold by public auction on the 19th day of December, 1820, and when they executed their act of sale aforesaid of the 28th of December, 1820, to the said Azelic Lavigne, had no legal right or authority whatever so to sell and dispose of the same, or in any manner to alienate the same; that the said sale at auction, and the said act of sale to Azelic Lavigne in confirmation thereof, were wholly unauthorized and illegal, and are utterly null and void; and the defendant Hennen, at the time when he purchased the property so described and claimed by him as aforesaid, was bound to take notice of the circumstances which rendered the actings and doings of the said Beverly Chew and Richard Relf, in the premises, illegal, null and void; and that he, the said Hennen, ought to be deemed and held, and is hereby deemed and held, to have purchased the property in question, with full notice that the said sale at auction, under the pretended authority of the said Richard Relf and Beverly Chew, and their said act of sale to said Azelic Lavigne, were illegal, null and void, and in fraud of the rights of the person or persons entitled to the succession of the said Daniel Clark.

And this court doth further order, adjudge and decree, that all the property claimed and held by the defendant, Hennen, as aforesaid, now remains unclaimed and undisposed of as part and parcel of the succession of the said Daniel Clark, notwithstanding such sale at auction and act of sale in the pretended right or under the pretended authority of the said Richard Relf and Beverly Chew.

And the court doth further order, adjudge and decree, that the complainant, Myra Clark Gaines, is the legitimate and only child of the said Daniel Clark, and universal legatee under his last will and testament, is justly and lawfully entitled to the property aforesaid, so claimed and held by the defendant, Hennen, together with all the yearly rents and profits accruing from the same since the same came into the said defendant's possession, to wit: on the 18th of May, 1844, and for which the said defendant is hereby adjudged, ordered and decreed, to account to the said Myra Clark Gaines.

And the court doth now here remand this cause to the said circuit court for such further proceedings as may be proper and necessary to carry into effect the following directions; that is to say:

1. To cause the said defendant, Hennen, forthwith to surrender all the property so claimed and held by him as aforesaid into the hands of the said Myra Clark Gaines, as a part of the succession of the said Daniel Clark.

2. To cause an account to be taken by the proper officers of the court, and under the authority and direction of the court, of the yearly rents and profits accrued and accruing from the said property since the 18th of May, 1844, when it came into the possession of the defendant, Hennen, and to cause the same to be accounted and paid to the said Myra Clark Gaines; the account to be taken, subject to the laws of Louisiana in cases of such recovery as is now decreed in favor of the said complainant.

3. To give such directions and make such orders from time to time as may be proper and necessary for carrying into effect the foregoing directions, and for enforcing the due observance of the same by all parties and by the officers of the court.

Mr. Justice Catron, dissenting:

A principal question in this case is, how far it is affected by the decree in the case of Gaines and Wife v. Chew, Relf, and others, reported in 12 Howard.

In that case the complainant sought to recover: first, four fifths of the real estate of Daniel Clark, alleged to be vested in the complainant, Mrs. Gaines, as heir of Daniel Clark; and second, the undivided moiety of the real estate owned by Daniel Clark at his death, being the community interest taken by his widow, the mother of the complainant, Myra, from whom she obtained a conveyance for said moiety in 1844. In the former case this court found that Mrs. Gardette, the mother of Mrs. Gaines, was the wife of Jerome Des Grange (in 1802 or 1803), when the bill alleged she intermarried with Daniel Clark, and was, therefore, not the widow of Clark; and this moiety of the estate claimed by the bill was rejected.

2. It appeared in the former case, by the evidence furnished by the record in that suit, that Caroline Clark was the sister of Mrs. Gaines, born before the father and mother intermarried, as is alleged by the former bill; but she was fully recognized by the father as his illegitimate daughter, and was supported by him during his lifetime, and after his death by his friends. The deposition of Mr. Coxe proves these facts very fully.

Conceding the fact that the parents intermarried after Caroline's birth, then that marriage made Caroline a legitimate child of the marriage, and equal heir with Myra; such being the law of Louisiana. Nor could the father, by the laws of that State, take from his legitimate child more than one fifth part of his estate by devise. Civil Code of 1808, ch. 3, sec. 1. And therefore Caroline and Myra each took as heir four fifths of their father's estate, less the mother's moiety; that is, four shares each of twenty parts. On these portions the will of 1813 did not operate; the children holding the estate as heirs. It operated only on the two twentieth parts which Daniel Clark had the power to devise by his will. Civil Code, 232, sec. 3; 234, sec. 4.

Caroline, who intermarried with Doctor Barnes, was a party respondent to the former suit, and answered the bill. She has since died beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and is not a party to this controversy; still, the interest of her absent heirs is entitled to protection. Nor can Mrs. Gaines set up any claim to that interest.

As respects the claim to one tenth part, the next question is, whether the fact found in the former case, that the complainant was the daughter of Des Grange's wife, establishes the status of Mrs. Gaines, so that she is excluded from taking as devisee of Daniel Clark.

According to the provisions of the Code of 1808, this court held that Mrs. Gaines could not take as heir of her father; nor could she take her mother's grant by the deed of 1844.

By the laws of Louisiana, as they stood in 1813, the complainant was an adulterous bastard, and could not inherit from her father (Code of 1808, p. 156, art. 46), which declares, that "bastard, adulterous, or incestuous children, even duly acknowledged, shall not enjoy the right of inheriting from their natural father or mother." And article 15, page 212, declares, that "natural fathers or mothers can in no case dispose of property in favor of their adulterine children, even acknowledged, unless to the mere amount of what is necessary to their sustenance, or to procure them an occupation or profession by which to support themselves."

The only issue decided in the former suit was, whether the complainant's mother, for years before, and at the time of Myra's birth, was the lawful wife of Jerome Des Grange. The court so found and based its decree, dismissing the bill, on that fact. The fact being established, carried with it all the legal consequences that result from the fact. 1st Stark. Ev., 182, sec. 57. One of these consequences is, that Mrs. Gaines was an adulterine bastard, according to the laws of Louisiana, and incapable of taking by the will of her father.

But suppose this consequence does not follow; then how does the matter of estoppel stand? The complainant, Mrs. Gaines, by her amended bill, filed in 1848, renounced all claim that she had to the property sued for by her original bill (including the same sued for now), as instituted heir of Daniel Clark, by the will of 1813, and asserted a right to four fifths of said property as legal or forced heir and only legitimate child of Daniel Clark, and declared she would not rely on said will of 1813. O. R., p. 85,

She also virtually renounced as heir one moiety of the estate Daniel Clark died possessed of, and set up a deed from her mother for the moiety as lawful widow of said Clark; this being her community interest by the laws of Louisiana. Old R., p. 32.

That the widow was entitled to a moiety as her share in the community, is alleged and relied on by the foregoing amendment; and the complainant being the party who made the avowal, is irrevocably bound by it. Such is the statute law of Louisiana, declared by the Code of 1808 (p. 314), and the Code of 1825 (Vol. II, p. 355).

In the former case the avowal was matter of title, and in this case it is conclusive evidence of the fact avowed as against the complainant. The law of Louisiana binds the federal courts in like manner that it is binding on the state courts. So this court has uniformly held. 1 Stat. at L., 92; note (a) to 34th sec. of Judiciary Act of 1789.

If the mother was lawful widow of Clark, then her right to the moiety was undoubted, as the parties resided in Louisiana, and it is alleged the property was acquired during the coverture. Mrs. Gaines must abide by her allegations in the former suit, as on them the issues were formed, and on which the decree in that suit proceeded

Nine of ten parts of Clark's estate was sued for by the former bill. The decree rejected, on a direct issue, five ninths claimed to have been acquired by deed from said mother, on the ground that she was the wife of Des Grange, when, as is alleged, she intermarried with Clark, and when the complainant was born. This was the precise issue made, and found by the court, and is undoubtedly res judicata as respects the mother's moiety. As to the other five tenths, Mrs. Gaines, by her amended bill of 1848, in express terms renounced one fifth to the purchasers, under Daniel Clark's will of 1811. To the extent of one fifth, the validity of that will was recognized. The complainant cannot be allowed to split up her claim and sue for portions by several suits.

The remaining four fifths of the moiety Mrs. Gaines claimed to recover as legal or forced heir. Heir, or no heir, was the issue tried. This court found that she was Clark's daughter by Des Grange's wife, and not Clark's lawful heir, and therefore dismissed her bill. It follows, that as to the four fifths of one half, the complainant stands barred as heir by the decree. She is also estopped by the former proceedings to sue a second time for the moiety derived from her mother, and thirdly, is estopped to set up a claim to the one tenth part she renounced and abandoned.

An objection is raised that the parties in this cause are not the same who were sued in the former case. The bill alleges that they are the same; and so they are, except that Mr. Hennen claims under the railroad company, by a conveyance of the land in dispute, made pending the former suit, which, if it had been decided against the railroad company, would have bound Hennen, and being decided in favor of the company, have bound the complainant.

The rule in chancery proceedings is, that where there are contesting parties in each suit, as between these parties, a decree is res judicata. It was also held by this court at the present term in the case of Thompson v. Roberts, 24 How., 233. (ante, 648.) Sixty defendants were sued by the former bill; they all, as joint respondents, got a decree against the complainant on her common title set up against them all. The estoppel operated against her for each defendant; and in this second contestation of the same title any one respondent to the former suit can set up the estoppel in his favor.

The laws of Louisiana are confidently relied on as prescribing the true rule of estoppel. In this English bill in equity, resorted to here, as a remedy, the rule is, that the same subject-matter cannot be litigated twice between the same parties on evidence brought forward or left out of the first case. Here the will of 1813 is introduced, and could just as well have been introduced in the former suit. The difficulty was, that it had not been proved and recorded in the probate court. But it might have been proved just as well forty years before the time it was admitted of record as now. If a title deed could not be read on the hearing for want of being recorded, the complainant might fail to recover. This is of constant occurrence; still, the judgment or decree would be as conclusive as if the deed had been authenticated and recorded. It was simply a neglect of the complainant to produce her proof in legal form; a matter with which the defendants had no concern. Holding back an existing will and making an experiment on the issue of heirship, requiring the same proof, and, in case of failure, to bring a second suit on the established will, is a mere contrivance and an evasion of the due administration of justice, which cannot be allowed. On the will of 1813 the present bill is founded. By that will Daniel Clark declares the complainant, Myra, to be his only legitimate and lawful heir, and devises to her all his estate. She must, therefore, have been his daughter, born in wedlock. Conceding this to be true, and it follows as a consequence that the complainant took as heir, and not as devisee, to the extent of four fifths. As to four fifths of a moiety, we are by this bill called on to try the precise issue of heir, or no heir, that we tried in the former suit.

If the decision reported in 12 How. be overthrown, ruin must be the consequence to very many who have confided in its soundness. In a rapidly growing city like New Orleans, much of the property supposed to be protected by our former decree must have changed hands. Large improvements must have been made in the nine years since that suit was decided. It covered all Daniel Clark's estate as it existed at his death, and had over sixty defendants to it. If the twenty odd defendants to this bill can be recovered against, so can the others who were parties to the first suit.

It is most manifest from this record that the fragment of a cause brought here by Mrs. Gaines and Mr. Hennen by stipulation, will, in effect, decide, and was intended to decide, the cause of the other defendants sued jointly with Mr. Hennen, and who are standing helpless, awaiting their fate at the hands of this court.

It is insisted by counsel, that Clark, being a free man, could lawfully devise to his daughter; and that the laws of Louisiana did not apply to the case of a single and free man bequeathing to his child by a married woman, as was done here. Such a construction would evade the Code to a great extent. Its terms are too plain for controversy, and so the courts of Louisiana have held. Jung v. Doriocourt, 4 La., 178.

According to this assumption, slaves might be devisees, if the evasion was used to suppress the fact that the mother was a slave. As in case of other conveyances, wills must have a grantee capable to take by the devise; and it is undoubtedly true that the heir at law, or a devisee, holding under a former will, can plead and prove the facts of incapacity by parol evidence, and thereby defeat the last will, and of course alienees, in the condition these respondents are, can do the same. The case above cited (4 La., 178) is directly to this point, and to the same effect it was held in Robinett v. Verdun, 14 La., 542. There, the court declared that a disguised donation to a slave child, under the forms of a sale, was absolutely null.

But the right and justice of this cause depends on the defense of the plea of bona fide purchaser set up by the answer. The bill in chancery is a remedy peculiar in its character, when resorted to in the federal court held in the State of Louisiana. In the state courts there, this defense is unknown. But when a complainant resorts to it to enforce rights to lands in the federal court, the respondent can defend himself, as an innocent purchaser, if he pleads, and can show that he acquired by purchase at a fair price, and got an apparent legal title, without notice of an outstanding better title, the purchaser believing that he acquired full property in the land; and the question is, has the respondent here made out such a defense? The purchase was made from Mary Clark, in 1820, by her legally constituted attorneys in fact, Chew & Relf. She claimed to be the true owner by a will made to in her favor as instituted heir. It is an olographic will, in due form, fully proved, and regularly recorded. This will, from the time it was probated in 1813, stood as the true succession of Daniel Clark for more than forty years. An immense estate in lands and personal property has been acquired under it, by all classes of innocent purchasers, without any suspicion of the fact that any other and better title existed. It is admitted on behalf of the respondents, by stipulation in this cause, that each purchaser who bought in 1820, and every subsequent purchaser under the first one, bought for a full price, paid the purchase money, and got a regular conveyance for the land purchased. This title, tested by itself, was a perfectly fair, legal title, according to the laws of Louisiana. Duplesse v. White, 6 La. Ann., 514. If Mary Clark sold the estate without an authorization from the court of probate, by that Act she rendered herself liable to pay the testator's debts; but this did not affect the purchaser. He was not bound to know that any debts existed, nor to see to the application of the purchase money. The present bill does not allege that there were any debts owing by Daniel Clark at the time of his death; on the contrary, the complainant sues for the lands, and the rents and profits of them, without any reductions. Finding Daniel Clark's estate to be insolvent on the accounts exhibited, General and Mrs. Gaines, by their amendment of 1844, declare that they do not require of said Chew & Relf any account, and that they "discontinue their prayer to that end."

The complainant admits the existence and probate of the will of 1811, but denies, in general terms, that the sales were lawfully made. For more than forty years the respondents and their alienors had a regular legal title, traceable to the only then existing succession of Daniel Clark; they could sue for and recover the land by force of that title. They knew nothing of the existence of Myra. She was born in New Orleans in 1804 or 1805, and immediately after her birth was taken from her mother by Daniel Clark, her reputed father, and put into the charge of Col. and Mrs. Davis. In her childhood she was carried to the State of Pennsylvania, raised up and resided there till 1832, when she intermarried with William W. Whitney, under the name of Myra Davis; during all which time she was ignorant of her true name, history and rights. She so states in her first bill, filed in 1836, put in evidence in this suit. Of course the purchasers of the lands sued for could have no knowledge of the complainant's existence when they paid their money and took title, in 1820.

But the respondents would have been bona fide purchasers had the will of 1811 never existed. Mary Clark was the apparent legal heir of her son in the ascending line. Daniel Clark was known and recognized in New Orleans as an unmarried man; he had resided there from his youth, and was extensively and uncommonly well known, having represented the Territory of Orleans in Congress. A number of witnesses prove, and most conclusively, that he was deemed and recognized universally as a man who had never been married up to the time of his death. His father was then dead, and Mary Clark, his mother, recognized as his undoubted heir. He addressed and made propositions of marriage to ladies of his own rank, after it is pretended he had married Madame Des Grange. Those who purchased in 1820, including judges of the highest rank residing on the spot, could not doubt the validity of Mary Clark's title, and power to sell the lands they bought and paid for.

In the printed argument submitted to us on behalf of the complainant, and again on the oral argument delivered before us in this court, the answer to this apparently complete defense was, that Mary Clark was dead in 1820, when her attorneys made the sales, and conveyed in her name.

The bill alleges no such fact, nor does the answer refer to it. But the complainant, by her bill of 1848, in evidence here, states that Mary Clark died in June or July, 1823, leaving a will, alleging who the legatees were (of which the complainant was one); and some of these legatees are made defendants to that bill. Daniel W. Coxe proves the circumstances connected with making the will of Mary Clark, and says she died in 1823, in which year her will was duly proved and recorded in Philadelphia County, Pennsylvania.

It is also relied on that Mary Clark did not accept the succession by taking possession of the estate in legal form. She made her power to sell, and did sell, and gave possession to the purchasers, and they have held actual adverse possession under their conveyances since 1820. This is admitted of record; and it is now too late, after the lapse of thirty-five years before they were sued, to set up this technical objection. The presumption in favor of regularity in the proceeding is too clear to admit of controversy.

Another objection is made to this plea of bona fide purchaser, namely: that Chew & Relf had no authority from the probate court to sell, and that they joined with Mary Clark in the conveyance. The conveyance of Mary Clark was valid, notwithstanding this circumstance, as the Supreme Court of Louisiana held in Duplessis v. White, 6 La. Ann., 514. She held the actual legal title. The will operated as a conveyance in the same manner that a private act of sale would have done. It is proved that the sales of the estate were made at auction, and had the form of sales made by authorization of the court; this is the fair presumption; nor can the complainant at this late day have a decree against these respondents. Presumption that the executors were duly authorized to make sales for payment of debts comes instead of proof. This bill was filed more than thirty years after Mrs. Gaines became of age, and thirty-six years after the first vendor purchased and took title, in 1820; and it must be presumed that the proper orders of the probate court were granted. The presumption arises from possession and lapse of time. Possession of itself is, in the nature of men and things, an indicium of ownership. If all persons acquiesce in the possession, the acquiescence tends to prove property in the possessor; and after the lapse of thirty years the probabilities so increase, that courts of justice, for the safety of society, hold an adverse claim to be without foundation. He who thirty years ago may have been abundantly able to show regularity of proceedings and evidence of ownership, may be unable to do so now. His witnesses may be dead, as is emphatically the case here. His title papers may be destroyed or lost; and a court of equity must say, as the Supreme Court of New York did in the case of McDonald v. McCall, 19 Johns., 380, "The fact is presumed for the purpose and from a principle of quieting men's possessions, and not because the court really think a grant has been made." Or, as the Supreme Court of Tennessee said in the case of Hanes v. Peck, Mart. & Yerg., 236, "In such case, length of possession supplies the place of testimony; presumption is substituted for belief; we believe when the fact is proved; we presume in the absence of proof."

Had Mary Clark's devisees sued this purchaser, he could have relied on presumption to supply proof of regular orders from the probate court to authorize the executors to sell, or that Mary Clark regularly accepted the succession; and the same presumption must prevail against this complainant.

It is provided by the 7th section of the Act of March 25, 1810, that contracts of sale of real property in Louisiana shall be recorded in the office of the parish judge where the property is situated; and if not so recorded, the contract shall be void. It is admitted in this case that both the power of attorney from Mary Clark, and the deeds to purchasers made under that power were not recorded in the office of the probate judge, but that they were recorded in a notary's office in New Orleans; and it is assumed, and the cause is made to depend mainly on the fact, that the sales of Chew & Relf, as attorneys of Mary Clark, are null as to third persons for this reason. This is an entire mistake. The Act of 1810, section 7, never had any application to the Parish of Orleans, where the land in dispute lies. It "had reference to those parishes where the office of parish judge was established, combining with the judicial powers of the officer those of notary and recorder of mortgages," &c. "These powers were not possessed by the judge of the Parish and City of New Orleans. The law is not applicable to this parish, and has been so considered ever since its enactment." Morris v. Crocker, 4 La., 149. It is further held, that the notarial offices of the city were the proper offices in which the record was to be made. Ib. In this, and all other respects Mary Clark's conveyance was regular.

The evidence shows, that as against the respondents to this bill, the claim set up is grossly unjust. Clark's failure was very large; his estate was wholly insolvent. The purchasers have, in fact, paid his debts to a large amount. Many of them are yet unpaid. The purchasers have built houses and raised families on the property now sought to be recovered. A city has been built upon it. It has probably increased in value five hundred fold since 1820; much of it certainly has.

That the respondents have been harassed with a previous lawsuit for the same property, in which the complainant claimed as heir, and was defeated, neither helps her case nor lessens the hardships imposed on the respondents.

At the argument, conclusions of law and of fact were relied on as having been established by the case of Patterson v. Gaines, reported in 6 How., 556. That was a false and fictitious case made up by Gaines and wife, with the assent of Patterson, they having relinquished to him the property sued for. The object of that suit was to circumvent this court by a fraudulent contrivance to obtain an opinion here, to the end of governing the rights of the other defendants sued jointly with Patterson. And in this, General and Mrs. Gaines seemingly succeeded. They obtained both the opinion and decree they sought; but when the other defendants came to a hearing, they examined Patterson as a witness, and proved and exposed by his testimony the contrivance and fraud practiced; and for us now to declare that so gross a contempt to this court, and the practice of a fraud so disgraceful to the administratton of justice, established any matter of fact or any binding principle of law, would be to sanction and uphold that proceeding, and to invite its repetition. That case should be disregarded, as it was disregarded, when the cause of which it was part was fully and fairly heard in 1852, and which is reported in Howard vol. 12.[1]

By an amendment to their bill made in 1849 (12 How., 587), General and Mrs. Gaines had the boldness to allege and claim that the decree in Patterson's fictitious case was res judicata, and an estoppel to the other defendants to that suit; and to that end relied on the decree on the final hearing in 1852, thereby avow-

1.—The case of Lord v. Veazie, 8 How., 253, is full to the point, that a fictitious proceeding is void because there is no contest. Patterson did not act in the matter at all, further than to lend his name to General and Mrs. Gaines. They made up the case by filing the answer to their own bill—filing such evidence as suited their purposes; and bringing up the appeal to this court in Patterson's name.

ing the fraudulent object of obtaining that decree.

A question not directly decided in the case reported in 12 How., was whether Daniel Clark married Mrs. Des Grange. Madame Despau swore that she was present as the marriage in Philadelphia, and that several others were present. Her integrity and credit as a witness were so directly overthrown in the former case by the deposition of Daniel W. Coxe, and by many circumstances, as to leave her evidence of no value. She swore that she went to Philadelphia with her sister to procure evidence of Des Grange's marriage previous to marrying her sister. Coxe proved beyond doubt that the two women came there for the sole purpose of concealing the birth of a child, of which Mrs. Des Grange was pregnant, and of which she was very soon delivered, and it was secreted and raised to womanhood near Philadelphia. This was Caroline, afterwards Mrs. Barnes. And as soon as Mrs. Des Grange was able to travel, the two women returned to New Orleans. Me. Despau also swore in several depositions that this was Des Grange's child. At the time of its birth he had been absent in France for than a year. Clark sent Mrs. Des Grange to Mr. Coxe with a letter, saying the child was Clark's, and to provide for the mother, and take charge of the child, which Coxe did. It was suggested at the argument that Coxe was not a competent witness, and not altogether entitled to credit. Clark's estate owed Coxe largely and if Mrs. Gaines recovered, then Coxe expected to be benefited by the recovery. So that he was interested to uphold Mrs. Gaines' claim; nor has the deposition of Mr. Coxe been objected to; on the contrary, it is admitted by stipulation. R., 93.

Mr. Coxe's character for integrity is prominently manifest by sustaining facts.

Clark never admitted the marriage to any one entitled to credit, or who could be believed, when swearing to what a dead man had said.

He proposed to marry another lady in 1808, and Mrs. Des Grange and Madame Despau came to Philadelphia, and sent for Mr. Coxe, then in partnership with Mr. Clark in large mercantile transactions, and inquired of him whether the fact was true. Coxe assented. Mrs. Des Grange said that Clark had promised to marry her, and that she then felt at liberty to marry herself; and soon after, she was married to M. Gardette, a dentist of Philadelphia.

In 1805 Des Grange returned to New Orleans, and was sued by his wife for alimony. She recovered, and had a decree against him for $500 per annum. Mrs. Des Grange never assumed that Clark was her husband, so far as we are informed from any reliable source. She resided in Louisiana for many years, and until these proceedings had progressed for fifteen years and more and could have deposed to the fact of marriage, had her daughter seen proper to examine her as a witness; but this was not done.

It is altogether immaterial, however, whether Clark did or did not marry Des Grange's wife, as it could be of no value to the complainant if he did. Clark must have been an innocent and deluded party to give Mrs. Gaines the benefit proposed by the will of 1818—as in the case of an adventurer from abroad, marrying an innocent single woman, leaving a wife behind him. There, the children of the second marriage cannot be disinherited and condemned; they can take as bastards from the mother. So the courts of Louisiana hold. But what are the facts here? Clark acted in concert with Mrs. Des Grange and her sisters in sending Des Grange to France, as agent of his wife's family, to settle up the affairs of an estate of theirs at Bordeaux. Des Grange was absent about fifteen months, and in the mean time, and shortly before the expiration of the time, Mrs. Des Grange was delivered of the child Caroline at Philadelphia, which Clark admitted at all times before his death was his child. This is an undisputed fact. Clark acted as the friend of Des Grange, and corresponded with him during his absence, and aided his wife. The criminal connection that was exposed by the birth of the child had obviously existed before Des Grange was sent to France; and in the transaction of sending him away, and of prosecuting him on his return, Mrs. Des Grange, her two sisters, and Clark, were undoubtedly acting in conjunction. Madame Caillavet swears that she set on foot the prosecution against Des Grange. 12 How., 509, 510.

That Des Grange had a wife living when he married the complainant's mother, was a mere pretense to cover a nefarious transaction, as is abundantly established by the facts appearing in the case reported in 12 Howard. The idea, therefore, that Clark was an innocent, a deluded party, is wholly inadmissible, and must be rejected as the least sustained part of this remarkable case.

I am of the opinion that the decree of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

Mr. Justice Grier, dissenting:

I wholly dissent from the opinion of the majority of the court in this case, both as to the law and the facts. But I do not think it necessary to vindicate my opinion by again presenting to the public view a history of the scandalous gossip which has been buried under the dust of half a century, and which a proper feeling of delicacy should have suffered to remain so; I, therefore, dismiss the case, as I hope, for the last time, with the single remark, that if it be the law of Louisiana that a will can be established by the dim recollections, imaginations, or inventions of anile gossips, after forty-five years, to disturb the titles and possessions of bona fide purchasers, without notice, of an apparently indefeasible legal title, "Haud equidem invideo, miror magis."

Also dissenting, Mr. Chief Justice Taney.

THOMAS J. DAVIDSON, Plff. in Er.,
v.
WILLIAM L. LANIER, Curator of JOHN J. McMANN, Deceased.

Practice on motion to dismiss—what notice to be given to plaintiff in error or appellant.

It is the practice of this court to hear motions to dismiss, on the day assigned for business of that description, before the case is reached in the regular call on the docket.

Notice on the motion must be given to the plaintiff in error or appellant, long enough before the motion is heard to give him opportunity to contest the motion.

The length of notice must depend upon the distance of the counsel or party from the place of holding the court, and must be long enough to enable him to arrange his business and reach the court.

Distant counsel cannot be expected to attend the court merely to guard against the possibility of a motion to dismiss.

Where there is no proof of the actual service of the notice, and the case is so late on the docket that it could not be reached during the term, the motion will be continued to the next term, then to be heard on thirty days' notice, where the counsel reside in Mississippi.

Motion filed Feb. 15, 1861. Continued Mar. 14, 1861.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Mississippi.

The question involved is stated by the court.

Mr. Brent, for defendant in error.

Mr. Davis, Attorney of Record, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

A motion has been made in each of these cases to dismiss it for want of jurisdiction, on account of certain defects, as it is alleged in the process and proceedings made necessary by the Act of Congress, in order to bring it before this court.

It is the practice of this court to receive and hear motions of this kind on the day assigned for business of that description, before the case is reached in the regular call of the docket. And the rule has been adopted, because it would be unjust to the parties to delay the decision until the case is called for trial, if the court are satisfied that they have not jurisdiction, and that the case must be ultimately dismissed without deciding any of the matters in controversy between the parties.

But in order to prevent surprise upon the plaintiff in error or appellant, the court have always, where the motion is made in advance of the regular call, directed notice to be given to him or his counsel, and required proof that it was served long enough before the motion was heard to give him an opportunity of contesting the motion if he desires to do so. And the time required must depend upon the distance of the counsel or the party from the place of holding the court, and must be sufficient not only to enable him to make the journey, but to arrange business in which he may be engaged when he receives the notice. For when a case stands so late upon the docket of this court as to give no reasonable proof of reaching it during the term, it cannot be expected that distant counsel will leave their usual place of business and attend here to guard against the possibility of a motion to dismiss.

The motions, in these two cases, were made about three weeks before the close of the term but as soon as could be conveniently, after they were docketed, and the court directed the usual notice to be given. We are satisfied that the counsel for the defendant in error has used every means in his power to comply with the order. But he has no proof that it was actually served. The counsel and the client both reside in Mississippi, and the cases stand so late on the docket that a trial could not be expected at this term. Nor could they anticipate that there would be any reason for their attendance. Under these circumstances the court order that the motions be continued, to be heard on the first Friday in next term, provided notice of the motion and the day of hearing be served on the party or his counsel, thirty days before the commencement of the term.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

APPENDIX.

THESE actions were brought to obtain injunctions prohibiting the erection of bridges over the Passaic River, which were authorized by the Legislature of New Jersey. The complainants were owners of vessels The circuit court dismissed the bills. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the decree of the circuit court was affirmed of necessity, the court being equally divided. No opinion of this court was, therefore, written. Since these causes were thus disposed of, however, the remarkable development of the great commercial interests of the country would seem to have rendered the report of the able argument of the eminent counsel engaged, as well as the exhaustive treatment of the principles involved by His Honor, Mr. Justice Grier, of too great practical value to excuse its omission from these reports.—ED.

THE NEW JERSEY RAILROAD AND TRANSPORTATION COMPANY, AND THE PROPRIETORS OF THE BRIDGES OVER THE RIVERS PASSAIC AND HACKENSACK.

DAVID BIGELOW, Appt.,

v.

THE NEW JERSEY RAILROAD AND TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

CHARLES E. MILNOR, Appt.,

v.

THE NEWARK PLANK ROAD AND FERRY COMPANY, AND THE PROPRIETORS OF THE BRIDGES OVER THE RIVERS PASSAIC AND HACKENSACK.

(Not found to have been hitherto reported.)

Every bridge may be said to be an obstruction on the channel of a river; but it is not, necessarily, a nuisance.

The court has no power to arrest the course of public improvements, on account of their effects on the value of property, appreciating it in one place, and depreciating it in another.

If special damage occurs to an individual, the law gives him a remedy.

But he cannot recover in a court of law or equity, special damage, as for a common nuisance, if the erection complained of be not a nuisance.

A bridge authorized by a State cannot be treated as a nuisance under the laws of that State.

The police power of a State includes the regulation of highways and bridges within its boundaries.

Congress has never assumed the exercise of such a power, nor has it, by any legislative Act, conferred this power on the courts.

The United States has no common law offences, and has passed no statute declaring such an erection a nuisance.

A court cannot, by arbitrary decree, restrain the erection of a bridge, or define its form and proportions. These are subjects of legislative, not judicial, discretion.

It is a power which has always heretofore been exercised by State Legislatures over rivers wholly within their jurisdiction.

The case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 54 U. S., 579, considered.

The question, whether the power to regulate bridges over navigable rivers wholly within the bounds of a State, could be exercised by it below a port of entry, and whether the establishment of such a port did, ipso facto, devest the State of such a power, was not in the Wheeling Bridge case, and therefore, not decided.

Congress has the exclusive power to regulate commerce, but that has never been construed to include the means by which commerce is carried on within a State.

Congress has never attempted to regulate canals, turnpikes, bridges and railroads.

When a city is made a port of entry, Congress does not, thereby, assume to regulate its harbor or detract from the sovereign rights before exercised by each State over its own public rivers.

Congress may establish postoffices and post-roads, but this does not affect or control the absolute power of the State over highways and bridges.

Congress, by conferring the privilege of a port of entry upon a town or city, does not come in conflict with the police power of a State exercised in bridging her own rivers below such port.

The police power to make bridges over its public rivers, is as absolutely vested in a State as the commercial power is in Congress.

The court has jurisdiction to administer the relief sought here, if complainants have shown themselves entitled to it.

History of the legislative and other transactions connected with the right of the "Proprietors of the Bridges over the Rivers Passaic and Hackensack," given.

The "Proprietors of Bridges," &c., have no monopoly for building bridges within the boundaries specified in the New Jersey Act.

If the proprietors had the sole right to build bridges and take tolls, their whole franchise might have been condemned by the Legislature, under their right of eminent domain.

The Railroad Company has not covenanted or agreed with the complainants, or those under whom they claim, that the railroad bridge over the Passaic shall be forever fixed at Center Street.

Argued Dec. 5, 6, 7, 10 & 11, 1860. Cur. ad. vult, Mch. 14, 1861. Decided Jan. 27, 1862.

APPEALS from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey.

The above three cases involved the same questions and were argued and decided at the same time in this court. The cases are stated with sufficient fullness in the opinion of Mr. Justice Grier, delivered in the court below, and in the following brief for the appellants.

Messrs. George Harding and Cortland Parker, for appellants:

The complainants pray injunctions against two bridges, as proposed to be built on the River Passaic, one by the New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company, the other by the New York Plank Road and Ferry Company, upon three distinct grounds, all applying to the railroad bridge, two of them to the plank road bridge.

I. The complainants are owners of vessels, duly enrolled and licensed in the coasting trade, accustomed to pass the site of the proposed bridges, up and down the Passaic, a navigable river, wherein the tide and ebbs and flows, to and from Newark, which is a port of entry. They are also owners of docks above such sites, and which will be depreciated by the bridges. They assert that these bridges will be a nuisance to navigation and, therefore, ought to be enjoined.

II. The complainant, Charles E. Milnor, is one of "the Proprietors of the bridges over the Rivers Passaic and Hackensack," and entitled to the benefit of a contract made by the State of New Jersey with him and his associates, that no other bridge than theirs, commonly called the turnpike bridge, should be erected within certain limits. These bridges are to be within those limits. He has protested against any such erection, and he insists that they cannot be legally built.

III. The New Jersey Railroad Company in 1832 was about to locate its route and bridge at Commercial Dock, the site now in dispute. They were opposed; a legal controversy was begun in Chancery of New Jersey, which was compromised by their adopting the bridge and route now used by them, more than twenty years, across the Passaic River. This, the complainants assert, was a binding agreement for lawful consideration, to the benefit of which they, as owners of real estate which will be affected, and depreciated by the change, and otherwise are entitled, and they seek legal remedy against its infraction. This cause of complaint applies only to the railroad bridge.

The River Passaic is a public navigable river, bounding the coasts of the United States, and Congress, by virtue of its power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," has asserted a certain jurisdiction in itself, and a certain right of navigation, or jus publicum, in the citizens of the United States in this and similar navigable rivers, and has regulated commerce thereon:

1. By establishing ports of entry and delivery for the citizens of the United States and other nations. Congress has designated the ports on the coast or navigable rivers from or to which vessels engaged in certain branches of commerce may sail; and incidentally Congress has indicated the waters which may be used by the citizens of the United States or other nations in going to or from the designated ports.

1 U. S. Statutes at Large, 632; 4 U. S. Statutes at Large, 715; Hale de Portibus Maris, 46, 50, 52, 53, 72, 84; Blundell v. Catterall, 5 B. & Ald., 268; Penna. v. Wheeling Bridge, 18 How., 435; Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C., 371.

2. Congress has divided the "coast" of the United States into collection districts, of which one comprehends "the waters of New Jersey, heretofore within the jurisdiction of New Jersey," and has subsequently included the River Passaic by name.

Act of 1789, 1 Stat. at L., 32, 147; Act of 1832, 4 Stat. at L., 715.

3. Congress has granted coasting licenses, and attached certain privileges and duties thereto, which involve the use of navigable rivers extending from the ports to the open sea.

Act of 1793, 3 Stat. at L., 305, secs. 4, 14–18; Act of 1819, 3 Stat. at L., 492; sec. 1; Act of 1822, 3 Stat. at L., 685; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 212.

4. Congress has included in the designation "coast of the United States," expressly, shores of "navigable rivers," as well as "sea coast," thus defining the term "coast."

Act 1819, 3 Stat. at L., 492, sec. 1; 3 Stat. at L., 685; 1 Stat. at L., 309, secs. 14–18.

5. Congress has attached certain duties and privileges to foreign vessels and to vessels trading with foreign countries, or in foreign articles, by treaty and by legislation. Act 1793, 1 Stat. at L., 309, sections 14 and 18; Act 1799, secs. 50–53, 92, 104.

6. Congress has expended money in surveying, sounding and charting navigable rivers extending from the sea to ports of entry.

Act 1807, 2 Stat. at L., 418; see Synoptical Index of U. S. Stat. at L., pp. 100, 101.

7. Congress has expended money in clearing out and improving the channels of rivers between the sea and ports of entry, by constructing breakwaters, buoys in the channels to guide the mariner by day, and light-houses to guide him by night.

Act of 1804, 2 Stat. at L., 300; see List of Appropriations in Synoptical Index of U. S. Stat. at L., pp. 62, 70, 75 to 89; Vols. X. and XI., Stat. at L.

8. Congress has established custom-houses, warehouses, scales, etc., at ports of entry, and established collectors, surveyors, appraisers, and other officers thereat.

Act 1799, 1 Stat. at L., 642, sec. 21; Tremlett v. Adams, 13 How., 304.

9. Congress, in establishing these places as ports, constituted them sea marts, at which trade between foreign nations and other States should be carried on; and this was done with a view to the best interests of the citizens of the whole of the United States, not of the citizens of the particular State or town.

Passenger Cases, 7 How., 450, Mr. Justice Catron's opinion; Mr. Justice Grier's opinion; Hale de Portibus Maris, 72.

10. Lastly, Congress has regulated navigation on the Passaic, by willing that "Commerce shall be free," and by its negative action in not imposing restraints, or authorizing the several States to do so.

Passenger Cases, Mr. Justice McLean's opinson, 7 How., 399, Mr. Justice Grier's opinion; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 209.

11. The "navigable rivers" in which the tide ebbs and flows, which connect the ocean with the ports of the United States, were held to be arms of the sea, both by the common law and by the international law, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; and to such rivers, therefore, the jus publicum of the United States was attached, by reason of this fact, in the same manner as it attached to the high sea.

Angell, Waters, pp. 73, 75, 80; Hale de Portibus Maris, pp. 10, 12, 35; Davies, 149; Commissioners v. Hemphill, 26 Wend. N. Y., 404; 2 Conn., 48; 7 Conn., 186; 8 Conn., 221; 9 Conn., 38; 3 Black, Ind., 193; 3 Scam. Ill., 500.

In this particular the Ohio River differed at law, and hence the Act of Virginia, providing for the erection of Kentucky into a State, of 1789. The effect of the compact between Virginia and Kentucky was to place the Ohio on the same footing as the tidal rivers of the old States.

2 Conn., 48; 7 Conn., 186; 9 Conn., 38; Commissioners v. Hemphill, 26 Wend. N. Y., 404; City of Mobile v. Eslava, 16 Pet., 255; Pollards v. Hagan, 3 How., 229; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge, 13 How., 585, per Mr. Chief Justice Taney; Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 455.

The commerce which begins or ends at the United States ports located on these arms of the sea, or navigable rivers, and which is carried on between foreign nations and the several States, is wholly independent of state jurisdictional lines.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 194; Passenger Cases, per Mr. Justice Wayne, 7 How., 414; per Mr. Justice Catron, 445; per Mr. Justice Grier, 462.

IV. In view of the foregoing Congressional action, no State can interfere with the free navigation of any "navigable river," or arm of the sea, leading from the high sea to any declared port of the United States, by interfering with either of the essentials required in navigating said waters, viz.: the vessel, the impelling agent, the water, or the navigators.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat.; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge, 13 How., 518; Devoe v. Penrose Ferry Bridge, 3 Am. Law Reg., 80; Passenger Cases, per Mr. Justice Catron, 7 How., 450.

V. The citizens of the United States, and of foreign nations, having thus, under the Constitution and Acts of Congress, acquired a right to navigate the River Passaic to and from the port of the Town of Newark, an obstruction to such navigation, under the Act of State Legislature, is unconstitutional and a public nuisance that may be enjoined or abated on complaint of an injured party.

Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How; Devoe v. Penrose Ferry Co., 3 Law Reg., 80; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1; Brown v. State of Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419; Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C., 379.

VI. It is immaterial whether the building of a bridge across a navigable river, in pursuance of state legislation, is appropriately denominated a municipal regulation, a police regulation, or a regulation of commerce. The only question now to be discussed is, whether the bridge so built, under authority of a State Legislature, would, as a matter of fact, interfere with the exercise of a jus publicum recognized in a citizen of the United States by Congress, or any jurisdiction that has been assumed or asserted by Congress over such a navigable river of the United States, or any regulation of commerce in reference thereto.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 210; Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C., 379; Quarantine Regulation, 1 U. S. Stat., 619.

VII. The equitable powers of the courts of the United States are adequate to grant relief, either by injunction or decree in abatement, at the suit of an injured party.

Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How., 518; Devoe v. Penrose Ferry Bridge Co., 3 Law Reg., 80.

VIII. That the courts of the United States in exercising this power, may enjoin absolutely against the erection of any bridge across "a navigable river," or decree absolute an abatement, or may grant a conditional injunction against particular form or extent of construction; that courts of the United States can take cognizance of, and determine the alleged fact and extent of nuisance, or can refer the same to a master or to a jury.

Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How., 518; Devoe v. Penrose Ferry Bridge Co., 3 Law Reg., 80.

The present case is within the principle decided in the case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge, and unlike The Black Bird Creek case.

State of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge, 13 How., 518; Devoe v. Penrose Ferry Bridge Co., 3 Law Reg., 80; Wilson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet.; Angell on Tide Waters, 89; King v. Montague, 4 B. & C., 58; 10 Eng. Com. Law, 413; Rowe v. Granite Bridge Co., 21 Pick., 344.

IX. In exercising this power the court will consider the requisites of the commerce carried on upon the river; the position and size of the draws; and the facility and expense of enlarging the same.

Penna. v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How., 518; New Jersey Laws, 1855, 374; 6 McLean, 517.

Messrs. J. P. Bradley, A. O. Zabriskie, W. H. Seward, W. L. Dayton and D. H. Hayes, for appellees:

I. The federal courts have no jurisdiction. The Federal Government has the exclusive power to regulate commerce between the States, and as a necessary incident thereto, the vessels and vehicles which are the instruments of that commerce, and which pass from one State to or through another; but it has not the right to regulate or change the surface or physical face of the country or land within the bounds of a State over which such vessels or vehicles pass. That power is wholly in the States, who alone can construct roads, canals, docks, ferries, &c., level or tunnel mountains, erect embankments, wharves, &c.

1. This power is nowhere delegated by the Constitution.

The Federalist, No. 45, cited 11 Pet., 133, says: "The powers reserved to the several States ..... extend to the internal order, improvement and prosperity of the States."

Roads, ferries, &c., have been repeatedly declared to be exclusively within the powers reserved to the States.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 403; New York v. Miln, 11 Pet., 133; Veazie v. Moor, 14 How., 574; Withers v. Buckley, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 92, secs. 93 and 94.

2. All agree that Congress cannot construct a bridge or railroad, canal or ferry, in the interior of a State, although commerce between two other States, may, nay must, be carried on over them.

The power to regulate commerce among the States clearly includes commerce not carried on by water; as by far the greatest extent of boundary lines between the old thirteen States was on land, and the first commerce among nations was by land, by caravans and camels.

9 Wheat., 196, Gibbons v. Ogden; License Cases, 5 How., 508.

The regulation of the channels of communication was not included with the reasons urged for giving the regulation of this commerce to Congress. Federalist, No. 42, 45, and 7. A direct grant of this power would not have been tolerated.

8. Bridges across streams are but a continuation of a road over water, and when wholly within a State, can be erected and authorized not only by the State but by Congress.

This is conceded when the stream is not navigable.

Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Company, 2 Pet., 245; People v. Railroad Company, 15 Wend., 113; U. S. v. Railroad Bridge Co., 6 McLean, 52; Commonwealth v. Breed, 4 Pick., 460; Veazie v. Moor, 13 How., 547.

Wharves are erected in navigable waters at New York, Charleston and New Orleans, without authority from the Federal Government. They interfere with navigation.

4. The jurisdiction of the States over the channels of communication across their territory is the same, whether those channels consist of water or land, are natural or artificial.

No foreign State or subject has a right to pass over these natural channels of commerce, navigable rivers, without the consent of the State within whose bounds they are.

In this respect the publicists all agree.

Grotius, lib. 2, ch. 2, secs. 12–14; Grotius, lib. 2, ch. 3, secs. 7–12; Phil. on International Law, 16, 17, ch. 5, sec. 155; In re Twee Geb., 2 Rob. Ad., 338, Wheeling Bridge case, 18 How., 582, Ch. J. Taney.

5. If a state in the exercise of any power clearly reserved to it, pass laws which are not laws directly regulating commerce, but which incidentally affect it, by obstructing or promoting it, such legislation is not unconstitutional.

This is the point of the decision in the License Cases, 5 How., 584; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419; New York v. Miln, 11 Pet., 130; Ins. Co. v. Curtenius, 6 McLean, 215.

6. The right to regulate, construct, and maintain roads and bridges is in the States, as clearly as the power to protect health by health laws, to regulate the sale of liquor by license laws, or to provide for protection against paupers, and to tax goods, when imported, for support of government. And when so exercised as not to regulate the commerce or trade upon them directly by the provisions of the law, but only indirectly, as by its consequences, it is not in conflict with the Constitution.

7. The license of a vessel to trade from one port to another does not affect this power in the State. Congress may regulate and license drovers from Ohio to New York, or Yankee peddlers and their wagons from Connecticut to Georgia, and in this protect the States from incendiary documents and underground railways. Yet Pennsylvania, through which these licensed drovers and peddlers might pass, could still regulate her own roads, narrow or widen them, improve or increase their grades, intersect them by canals and railroads, even if the draw bridges on the canals and the trains on the railroads would necessarily sometimes delay a licensed drover or peddler, break a wheel, or destroy or drown a few cattle or hogs.

II. But if the Federal Government has the right to control the physical condition of the territory of the States, it is an extreme power and to be exercised with great delicacy and caution. It must be a power in which the States participate, and in which their action is supreme, until interfered with by federal legislation; and Congress has never regulated the bridging of rivers in New Jersey.

The federal courts have no common law jurisdiction over nuisances.

13 How., 580.

Congress could by enactment have declared such erections nuisances. Congress has not done so.

If the power thus to set aside state legislation does not exist in the federal courts, it is so extreme a power, that many of the federal judges have hesitated to exercise it.

Chief Justice Taney, opinion in State of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How., 587.

The same hesitation existed with Justices Woodbury and Daniel; Chief Justice Marshall, in The Blackbird Creek case, 2 Pet., 245. The Chancellor of New Jersey held like views in Grover v. Alexander, Law Reg. of April, 1855.

III. The federal courts will never exercise the right of preventing those erections on the navigable rivers which the sovereignty of a State has declared requisite and proper, unless it clearly appears that the rights of the public commerce are irreconcilable with the existence of such erection.

These principles are brought out in The Wheeling Bridge case, 13 How., 577; Works v. Junction Railroad, 5 McLean, 438; Devoe v. Penrose Ferry Bridge Co., Law Reg. of December, 1854, p. 88; Columbus Ins. Co. v. Peoria Bridge Co., 6 McLean, 73.

IV. If this power of reversing state legislation is to be exercised by the federal courts, we have no apprehension from it in the present case, if it is exercised with the caution and under the restrictions indicated.

In this case the comparative unimportance of the river, and the trifling obstruction proposed, are such that no considerable injury will be done to public commerce and the Federal Government is not called upon to question the judgment or to nullify the enactments of the State.

Congress has no power to enable it, in ordinary cases, to interfere with the State's right to erect a bridge over such a river as the Passaic.

It is not necessary for carrying into execution the power to regulate commerce.

There are doubtless many incidental powers which are thus necessary; for example—the power to regulate ships and vessels, and seamen—the power to regulate the system of lighthouses, beacons and buoys—the power to make public piers at the entrance of harbors; along the coast of the sea and lakes, and other works of national and not local importance, where a single State is not alone interested, and could not alone compass the improvement desired; the power to improve the navigation of common rivers, bounded by two or more States and not subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of either. But no such necessity exists with regard to the internal rivers of a State flowing only in and through a single State. Rivers are necessary to commerce; but not more so than roads, wharves and storehouses.

The necessities of the case are the other way. It is necessary for the preservation of the public order that the States should have jurisdiction over their own rivers.

It cannot be denied that the general good often requires bridges to be built over navigable rivers. But Congress cannot build them. It has no power. The State alone can do it, or authorize it to be done.

Injuries to the navigation are indictable.

Wharton's Precedents of Indict., 416–418; Wharton's Am. Crim. Law, 806, 807 (8 ed.); 1 Barr. Pa., 105; Com. v. Church; Caldwell's case—Wharf, 1 Dall., 150; Com. v. Wright, Thatcher's Cr. Cas., 211.

Has Congress the power to take from New Jersey its jurisdiction over such cases? Congress cannot punish them by indictment, any more than it can punish, by indictment, nuisances to common highways.

The State Legislature alone has the true local knowledge of the wants of the State, including its rivers as well as the other portions of its territory, to legislate properly with regard to it.

These considerations disaffirm the power of Congress to assume a superintending control over state rivers, as well as a general and exhaustive control.

These considerations also show that no regulation of commerce, as such, can interfere with the power of the State to regulate and control the physical features of its lands and waters. The power to regulate commerce is a paramount power, but it is not in the nature of the power to interfere with this state power. Congressional regulations of commerce are to be made, and are necessarily to be made in reference to the existing state of things in the territorial condition of the States, their lands, waters, roads, towns, wharves, storehouses, &c., whether that state of things is the effect of natural or municipal causes.

The case of a postoffice is analogous. The State is not deprived of its power to change roads because they have been made post-roads, nor because they lead to a postoffice.

The principle involved in these views is supported by Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 203, Ch. J. Marshall; Passenger case, New York v. Miln, 11 Pet., 102; Norris v. Boston, Passenger Case, 7 How., 288.

If any necessity exists that Congress should exercise jurisdiction over the surface or physical aspects of our internal rivers, such jurisdiction must be limited by the extent of the necessity. At most, it can be only a jurisdiction to preserve a right of way for commercial transportation. All other jurisdiction over the river itself must be deemed to be retained by the State. And rivers being part of the State's territory and domain, all State Acts undertaken in respect of them, short of obstructing such right of way, must be deemed valid; and the necessity for such Acts must be deemed settled by the legislative action of the State. If a bridge is erected by state authority, provided with a draw for the passage of vessels, the courts will deem such means of passage sufficient, unless Congress interferes to declare the contrary.

The history of the events which resulted in the formation of the Constitution does not call for such a construction of the commercial power, as would invest the Federal Government with a control over the internal rivers of the State.

The decree of the court below, in each of these cases, dismissing the complainant's bill, was affirmed by a divided court.

The following is the opinion of Mr. Justice Grier, delivered in the Circuit Court at Trenton, September 22d, 1857, in the three above cases and in the two cases of William L. Shardlow against the same respondents.

OPINION OF GRIER, J., in CIRCUIT COURT.

The object of these five several bills is to obtain injunctions prohibiting the erection of certain bridges over the Passaic River. One of these proposed to be erected at a point called the Commercial Dock, in the City of Newark, by the New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company. The other by the Newark Plank Road Company, near the mouth of the Passaic River, and some two and a half miles below the wharves of the port of Newark. The erection of these bridges is authorized by the Legislature of New Jersey. They are required to have pivot draws leaving two passages of sixty-five feet each, for the passage of vessels navigating the river or harbor. The first of these bridges is required in order to avoid the certain curves in the railroad where it passes through Newark, and to make it straight. The other to accommodate the large and increasing commerce between the cities of New York and Newark, on the plank road connecting the lower end of Newark with Jersey City.

It will not be necessary to a proper consideration of these several questions affecting the decision of these cases, to give an abstract either of the pleadings or of the testimony. Where opinions are received in evidence there can be no restraint as to quantity. Such testimony is always affected by the feelings, prejudices and interests of the witnesses, and is of course contradictory. A skipper will pronounce every bridge a nuisance, while travelers on plank or railroads will not think it proper that their persons or property should be subject to delay or risk of destruction, to avoid an inconvenience or slight impediment to sloops or schooners; owners of wharves or docks who may apprehend that their interests may be affected by a change of location of a bridge, are unanimous in their opinion that public improvement had better be arrested than that their own interests should be affected. In this conflict of testimony and discordant opinion, we shall not stop to make any invidious comparison as to the credibility of the witnesses, but assume such facts as we believe to be proven, without attempting to vindicate the propriety of our assertions.

I. The first of the three great questions so ably discussed by the learned counsel in these cases, is briefly and lucidly stated in the following propositions, which complainants have endeavored to establish:

1st. "That the Passaic River is a public highway of commerce, which, under the Constitution of the United States, has been regulated by Congress."

2d. "That the free navigation of the Passaic River as a common highway having been established by regulation of Congress, and by compact between the States, it cannot lawfully be obstructed by force of any state authority or legislation."

3d. "The bridges proposed to be erected by the New Jersey Railroad Company and Plank Road Company, will be each an obstruction to the free navigation of the Passaic River and public nuisances."

"Consequently this court will enjoin their erection on complaint of any injured party."

So far as these propositions involve the facts of the case, we find them to be as follows:

The Passaic is a river having its springs and its outlet wholly within the State of New Jersey.

Though a small and narrow river it is navigable for sloops and the smaller class of steamboats as far as the tide flows, some miles above Newark. At the upper end and above this city, there are several bridges with small draws and difficult to pass. These were all erected by authority of the State, and one of them more than fifty years ago. The City of Newark has been made a port of entry by an Act of Congress, has some little foreign commerce, and some with ports of other States. Being, in fact, but a manufacturing suburb of New York, much the largest portion of its commerce is with that city, and carried on the rail and plank roads connecting them.

That the proposed bridges will, in some measure, cause an obstruction to the navigation of the river, and some inconvienence to vessels passing the draws, is certainly true. Every bridge may be said to be an obstruction on the channel of a river, but it is not necessarily a nuisance. Bridges are highways as necessary to the commerce and intercourse of the public as rivers. That which the public convenience imperatively demands, cannot be called a public nuisance because it causes some inconvenience or affects the private interests of a few individuals.

Now, if every bridge over a navigable river be not necessarily a nuisance, but may be erected for the public benefit, without being considered in law or in fact a nuisance though certainly an inconvenience affecting the navigation of the river, the question recurs, who is to judge of this necessity? Who shall say what shall be the height of a pier, the width of a draw, and how it shall be erected, managed and controlled? Is this a matter of judicial discretion or legislative enactment? Can that be a nuisance which is authorized by law? Does a State lose the great police power of regulating its own highways and bridges over its own rivers, because the tide may flow therein, or as soon as they become a highway, to a port of entry within its own borders? In the course of seventy years' practical construction of the Constitution, no Act of Congress is to be found regulating such erections, or assuming to license a bridge over such a river wholly within the jurisdiction of a State (if we except the doubtful precedent of the Cumberland road), and during all this time States have assumed and exercised this power. If we now deny it to the States, where do we find any authority in the Constitution or Acts of Congress for assuming it ourselves?

These are questions which must be resolved before this court can constitute itself "arbiter pontium," and assume the power of deciding where and when public necessity demands a bridge, what is a sufficient draw, or how much inconvenience to navigation will constitute a nuisance.

The complainants, in these several bills, in order to show jurisdiction in the court, have stated themselves to be citizens of the State of New York. Their right to a remedy in the courts of the United States is not asserted on account of the subject-matter of the controversy, nor do they allege any peculiar jurisdiction as given to us by any Act of Congress; but rest upon their personal right as citizens of another State to sue in this tribunal. It is very apparent also that the complainants, if not introduced as mere John Does, or nominal parties (while those really contending are used as witnesses), are at least volunteers in the controversy, "post litem motum," who have bought the right to an expected injury for the luxury of the litigation.

Without stopping to laud this exhibition of public spirit by citizens of a neighboring State, it is plain, by their own showing, that they can demand no other remedy from this court than would be administered by the tribunals of the State of New Jersey in a suit between its own citizens. A citizen of New York who purchases wharves in Newark or owns a vessel navigating to that port, has no greater right than the citizens of New Jersey. A Court of Chancery in New Jersey would not interfere with the course of public improvements authorized by that State at the instance of a wharf owner on the suggestion that a change in the location of a bridge would cause a depreciation in the value of his property. This is not a result for which (if the court can give any remedy at all) it will interfere by injunction. The court has no power to arrest the course of public improvements, on account of their effects upon the value of property, appreciating it in one place and depreciating it in another. If special damage occurs to an individual, the law gives him a remedy. But he cannot recover either in a court of law or equity special damage as for a common nuisance, if the erection complained of be not a nuisance. A bridge authorized by the State of New Jersey cannot be treated as a nuisance, under the laws of New Jersey. That the police power of a State includes the regulation of highways and bridges within its boundaries, has never been questioned. If the Legislature have declared that bridges erected with draws of certain dimensions will not impede the commerce of the river, as to be injurious or become a public nuisance, where can the courts of New Jersey find any authority for overruling, reversing or nullifying legislative Acts on a subject-matter over which it has exclusive jurisdiction? Admitting, for the sake of argument, that Congress, in the exercise of the commercial power, may regulate the height of bridges on a public river in a State below a port of entry, or may forbid their erection altogether, they have never yet assumed the exercise of such a power, nor have they by any legislative act conferred this power on the courts. The bridges will not be nuisances by the law of New Jersey. The United States has no common law offenses, and has passed no statute declaring such an erection a nuisance. If so, a court cannot interfere, by arbitrary decree, either to restrain the erection of a bridge or to define its form and proportions. It is plain that these are subjects of legislative, not judicial, discretion. It is a power which has always heretofore been exercised by State Legislatures over rivers wholly within their jurisdiction, and where the rights of citizens of other States to navigate the river are not injured, for the sake of some special benefit to the citizens of the State exercising the power.

But it has been contended, on the authority of a dictum of my own, in Devoe v. The Penrose Ferry Company, "that the Supreme Court have decided in the case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge, 18 How., 579, that, although the courts of the United States cannot punish by indictment, the erection of a nuisance on our public rivers, erected by authority of a State, yet that as courts of chancery they may interefere at the instance of an individual or corporation who are likely to suffer some special injury, and prohibit by injunction the erection of nuisances to the navigation of the great navigable rivers leading to the ports of entry within a State."

3 Am. Law. Reg., p. 88.

It is true that this doctrine was enunciated as a corollary from The Wheeling Bridge case, on a motion for an interlocutory injunction against a bridge over a stream wholly within the territory and jurisdiction of Pennsylvania. On such motions I have always refused to hear and and definitively decide the great points of a case. If there be a prima facie or even doubtful case shown, it is the interest of both parties that the interlocutory injunction should issue, and that the defendants should not expend large sums in erections which may possibly be treated hereafter by the courts as nuisances. In the cases now before us the same course was pursued; but after the full argument of this question on final hearing, and a most careful consideration of it, I feel bound to acknowledge that the dictum I have just quoted from the report of the case of The Penrose Ferry Bridge Company is not supported by the decision of the Supreme Court in The Wheeling Bridge case. It is true that such an inference might be drawn from a hasty or superficial examination of the opinion of the court as delivered in that case. But the point now to be considered, was not in that case, and could not, therefore, have been decided. No judge, in vindicating the judgment of the court, can deliver maxims of universal application, in every sentence, or oracles which may be read in two ways, one applicable to the case before him, and the other not. To sever the arguments of a judge from the facts of the case to which he refers, will often lead to very erroneous conclusions. The fact that Pittsburg has been made a port of entry may have been mentioned as an additional or cumulative reason why Virginia should not be allowed to license a nuisance on the Ohio below that city. But the question whether the power to regulate bridges over navigable rivers wholly within the bounds of a State, could be exercised by it below a port of entry, and whether the establishment of such a port, did, ipso facto, devest the State of such a power, was not in the case and, therefore, not decided. This assertion will be fully vindicated by a careful examination of the record in that case.

1st. It must be noted as a circumstance of that case, that although the State of Pennsylvania in its corporate capacity was complainant, and "propter dignitatum," entitled to sue in the Supreme Court of the United States; yet that when the bill was filed, the same complaint might have been sustained in the Circuit Court of the United States, or the bridge might have been prostrated as a nuisance by indictment in the proper State Court of Virginia. The bill charged that the bridge proposed to be erected was in utter disregard of the license granted by its charter, which carefully forbids the least interference with the navigation of the Ohio. On the facts charged and proved, a court of chancery of Virginia would have been bound to enjoin the erection of so palpable a nuisance to the navigation. The case, therefore, presented every fact necessary to give the court jurisdiction—a party having a right to sue in the court—a nuisance proposed to be erected within the sanction either of Virginia or the United States, and great special damage to the plaintiff.

2d. During the pendency of this suit, the Legislature of Virginia saw proper to come to the assistance of its corporation in the unequal contest, and at its suggestion enacted that the bridge proposed to be built contrary to the license granted to the corporation, was according to it, and not, therefore, to be considered as a nuisance by the laws of Virginia—notwithstanding that the bridge was without a draw and for many days in the year would wholly obstruct the passage of steamboats.

3d. This legislation of Virginia being pleaded as a bar to the further action of the court in the case, necessarily raised these questions:

Could Virginia license or authorize a nuisance on a public river, which rose in Pennsylvania and passed along the border of Virginia, and which by compact between the States was declared to be "free and common to all the citizens of the United States?" If Virginia could authorize any obstruction at all to the channel navigation, it could stop it altogether and divert the whole commerce of that great river from the State of Pennsylvania and compel it to seek its outlet by the railroads and other public improvements of Virginia. If it had the sovereign right over this boundary river claimed by it, there could be no measure to its power. It would have the same right to stop its navigation altogether as to stop it ten days in a year. If the plea was admitted, Virginia could make Wheeling the head of navigation on the Ohio, and Kentucky might do the same at Louisville, having the same right over the whole river which Virginia can claim. This plea, therefore, presented not only a great question of international law, but whether rights secured to the people of the United States, by compact made before the Constitution, were held at the mercy or caprice of every or any of the States to which the river was a boundary. The decision of the court denied this right. The plea being insufficient as a defense, of course the complainant was entitled to a decree prostrating the bridge, which had been erected pendente lite. But to mitigate the apparent hardship of such a decree, if executed unconditionally, the court, in the exercise of a merciful discretion, granted a stay of execution, on condition that the bridge should be raised to a certain height, or have a draw put in it, which would permit boats to pass at all stages of the navigation. From this modification of the decree no inference can be drawn, that the courts of the United States claim authority to regulate bridges below the ports of entry, and treat all state legislation in such cases as unconstitutional and void.

It is abundantly evident from this statement, that the Supreme Court, in denying the right of Virginia to exercise this absolute control over the Ohio River, and in deciding that as a riparian proprietor it was not entitled, either by the compact, or by constitutional law, to obstruct the commerce of a supra-riparian State, had before them questions not involved in these cases, and which cannot affect their decision. The Passaic River, though navigable for a few miles within the State of New Jersey and, therefore, a public river, belongs wholly to that State; it is no highway to other States, no commerce passes thereon from States below the bridges to States above. Being the property of the State, and no other State having the title to interfere with its absolute dominion, it alone can regulate the harbors, wharves, ferries or bridges in or over it. Congress has the exclusive power to regulate commerce, but that has never been construed to include the means by which commerce is carried on within a State. Canals, turnpikes, bridges and railroads are as necessary to the commerce between and through the several States as rivers. Yet Congress has never attempted to regulate them. When a city is made a port of entry, Congress does not thereby assume to regulate its harbor, or detract from the sovereign rights before exercised by each State over its own public rivers. Congress may establish postoffices and post-roads; but this does not affect or control the absolute power of the State over highways and bridges. If a State does not desire the accommodation of mails at certain places, and will not make roads and bridges, on which to transport them, Congress cannot compel it to do so, or require it to receive favors by compulsion. Constituting a town or city a port of entry, is an act of convenience and benefit, of such place; but for the sake of this benefit the Constitution does not require the State to surrender its control over the harbor, or the highways leading to it, either by land or water, provided all citizens of the United States enjoy the same privileges which are enjoyed by its own.

Whether a bridge over the Passaic will injuriously affect the harbor of Newark, is a question which the people of New Jersey can best determine, and have a right to determine for themselves. If the bridges be an inconvenience to sloops and schooners navigating their port, it is no more so to others than to them. I see no reason why the State of New Jersey, in the exercise of its absolute sovereignty over the river, may not stop it up altogether, and establish the harbor and wharves of Newark at the mouth of the river. It would affect the rights of no other States. It would still be a port of entry if Congress chose to continue it so. Such action would not be in conflict with any power vested in Congress. A State may, in the exercise of its reserved powers, incidentally affect subjects intrusted to Congress, without any necessary collision. All railroads, canals, harbors or bridges necessarily affect not only the commerce within a State but between the States. Congress, by conferring the privilege of a port of entry, upon a town or city does not come in conflict with the police power of a State exercised in bridging its own rivers below such port. If the power to make a town a port of entry includes the right to regulate the means by which its commerce is carried on, why does it not extend to its turnpikes, railroads and canals, to land as well as water? Assuming the right (which I neither deny or affirm) of Congress to regulate bridges over navigable rivers below ports of entry, yet not having done so, the courts cannot assume to themselves such a power. There is no Act of Congress or rule of law which courts could apply to such a case. It is possible that courts might exercise this discretionary power as judiciously as a legislative body, yet the praise of being a "good judge" could hardly be given to one who would endeavor to "enlarge his jurisdiction," by the assumption, or rather usurpation, of such an undefined and discretionary power.

The police power to make bridges over its public rivers is as absolutely vested in a State, as the commercial power is in Congress; and no question can arise as to which is bound to give way, when exercised over the same subject-matter till a case of actual collision occurs. This is all that was decided in the case of Wilson v. The Black Bird Creek, &c., 2 Pet., 257. That case has been the subject of much comment and some misconstruction. It was never intended as a retraction or modification of anything decided by Gibbons v. Ogden, as to the exclusive power of Congress to regulate commerce. Nor does The Wheeling Bridge case at all conflict with either. The case of Wilson v. The Black Bird Creek, &c., governs this—while it has nothing in common with that of The Wheeling Bridge.

The view taken by the court of this point dispenses with the necessity of an expression of opinion on the questions on which so much testimony has been accumulated: what is the proper width of draws on bridges over the Passaic? How far the public necessity requires them. What is the comparative value of the commerce passing over or under them? What the amount of inconvenience such draws may be to the navigation, and whether it is for the public interest that this should be encountered rather than the great one consequent on the want of such bridges. And finally, the comparative merits of curved and straight lines in the construction of railroads. These questions have all been ruled by the Legislature of New Jersey, having, as we believe, the sole jurisdiction in the matter. It has used its discretion in a matter properly submitted to it, and this court has neither the power to decide, nor the disposition to say, that it has been injudiciously exercised.

II. The second great question in this case is not affected by the conditions of the first. The court has undoubted jurisdiction to administer the relief here sought, if the complainants have shown themselves entitled to it.

It is charged that the Corporation called the "Proprietors of the bridges over the river Passaic and Hackensack," have a right to bridge these rivers, "exclusive of all other persons whatsoever, in such manner as that no other bridge can be erected within said limits, until the expiration of ninety-nine years from the date of said original Act (1790), without the consent of said proprietors." It is contended, also, that a majority of the stockholders cannot, by law, surrender or release this exclusive privilege or franchise, and that any law assuming to take away or authorizing any invasion of such franchise, impairs the obligation of the original and fundamental contract with and between the stockholders, and is, therefore, unconstitutional and void: and as a consequence, this court, having jurisdiction of the parties, is bound to protect their franchise from invasion, on the complaint of any individual stockholder.

In order to a clear understanding of this point, it will be necessary to give a brief, but nevertheless, a somewhat tedious history of the legislative and other transactions connected with it.

Previous to the year 1790, the Passaic and Hackensack rivers have been crossed by means of ferries only. In that year the Legislature of New Jersey passed an Act "for building bridges over the Passaic, Hackensack," &c. As this Act is somewhat anomalous in its provisions and subject to misconstruction, it will be necessary to notice some of its provisions. The 1st section nominates certain commissioners, "who are authorized to put in execution the several services intended by this Act." They are required to view the ground from Newark to Powle's Hook, and fix upon the most suitable and convenient site for a bridge, and are authorized to erect or cause to be erected, a bridge over each of these rivers. The bridges must each have a draw of twenty four feet, lamps, &c. After having agreed upon the sites of the bridges, they are required to lay out the roads to them. If the bridge be fixed at the ferry, commissioners were to pay for the ferry rights; they were also authorized, at their discretion, to contract and agree with any person or persons who would undertake to build such bridges for the tolls allowed by the Act; and for so many years and upon such conditions, as, in the discretion of the commissioners, should seem expedient. This agreement must be reduced to writing, signed and sealed by the parties thereto, and recorded, "and to be binding on the parties contracting, as well as the State of New Jersey, and as effectual as if the same and every part, covenant and condition thereof, had been particularly and expressly set forth and enacted in this law."

The 15th section enacts, "that it shall not be lawful for any person, whatsoever, to erect or cause to be erected, any other bridge, or bridges over or across the said River Passaic, between its mouth and second river, &c."

In February, 1793, these commissioners entered into a contract, by indenture with some thirty-seven gentlemen, reciting their powers under the above Act. By this deed, they "demised, granted and to farm, let" the said bridges, to be erected, "as hereinafter declared, over said rivers, together with the tolls appertaining thereto." "To have and to hold the said bridges, with their respective tolls and profits, hereinbefore mentioned, &c.," for a term of ninety-seven years. In 1794, the stockholders in this Company are constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of the "Proprietors of the bridges over the rivers Passaic and Hackensack."

In 1832 "the Act to incorporate the New Jersey Railroad Company" was passed.

As the proprietors of the bridges had claimed the sole right to build bridges over the Passaic and Hackensack on the proposed route of the railroad, the Legislature, with a laudable regard for private rights, authorized the Railroad Company to purchase turnpike roads and bridges on the route or any or all the shares of the capital stock of such roads and bridges. The stockholders were to be paid the value of their stock, or have railroad stock to the same amount. The Act did not make it compulsory on the stockholders to accept their value of their stock in money, or railroad stock, but left it to the two Corporations to arrange the matter between themselves. No difficulty appears to have been apprehended, as the railroad was authorized to purchase the stock, and thereby control the other Corporation. The Act, while it contemplated that the Railroad Corporation should have the control of both the turnpikes and bridges, did not permit the smaller corporations to be absorbed or annihilated by the greater, but ordained that the roads and bridges should be preserved and governed by the provisions of their respective charters.

Accordingly, in November, 1832, the Railroad Corporation entered into an agreement with the "proprietors of the bridges," reciting the authority conferred on the railroad, and that the parties had agreed upon the terms of sale of the stock of the Bridge Company; and stipulating that the Railroad Company pay to the stockholders of the Bridge Company $150 for every share of their stock. It provided that the stockholders electing to receive payment for their stock according to this agreement, should show their assent before the 1st of January following, and might elect to receive money or railroad stock to the same amount, reserving their "franchise privileges" as before held, and reserving also all grants or privileges theretofore made by way of commutation.

The reservations were made to meet the exigency of the proviso to the 10th section of the Act of Incorporation of the Railroad Company. "That nothing herein contained shall be so constructed as to impair any reversionary interest or vested rights which the State or any incorporated company or individual may possess in virtue of an Act for building bridges, &c., passed in 1790," by way, &c.

By this agreement the railroad is permitted either to use the old bridge or erect another alongside, but so as not to obstruct, hinder or interrupt the travel over the old bridge.

In pursuance of their Act of Incorporation and of their agreement, the railroad brought some nine hundred and thirty of the one thousand shares into which the stock of the "proprietors of the bridges," etc., was divided, at the price of $150 for each share of $100. They erected a bridge at the end of Center Street, which has been used for upwards of twenty years. As a new bridge is now found necessary, and as the position of the old one requires sharp curves of the railroad through the streets of the city, which are not only inconvenient but dangerous, a suplement to the Act incorporating the railroad was passed on the 8d April, 1855, authorizing the construction of the bridge at Commercial Dock, and the removal of the old one at Center Street, and of the railroad track connected therewith. It requires the new bridge to have two draws, each at least sixty-five feet wide, on which a light must be kept at night, and a careful person to open the draws for free passage of vessels, with the same provision as to reversionary interests as is found in the 10th section of the original Act. It requires also the consent of the "Proprietors of the Bridges, &c.," in writing under the corporate seal, and that the giving of such consent shall not, except as to the bridge so consented to, be constructed, held or deemed in any manner to strengthen or impair any rights or privileges which the said "proprietors may possess."

It is not worth while, for the purposes of this case, to inquire whether the "proprietors of the bridges," &c., can claim any franchise of greater exent than that contained and accurately defined in their written agreement with the Commissioners. It clearly does not confer on them a right to build any other bridges than the two described and specified, or take tolls therefrom. They cannot be said, therefore, to have a monopoly for building of bridges within the boundaries specified in the Act. The instrument called a lease of agreement defines the rights and the extent of the franchise granted to the Company; and it may well be doubted whether the provisions of the 15th section, which are wholly omitted from their charter, can be invoked as any portion of their franchise. Nevertheless, as the Legislature of New Jersey seem to have treated this section as in the nature of a covenant by the State not to permit other bridges to be erected which might injure the value of the franchise conferred on the "proprietors," by the commissioners without the consent of the Corporation, we shall treat it as such—at best it is no more.

If the proprietors had the sole right to build bridges and take tolls, their whole franchise might have been condemned by the Legislature under their right of eminent domain. A title to a franchise is of no higher quality than a title to land. Such indiscreet contracts by a Legislature cannot paralyze the arm of government and stop the progress of improvement for a century. The Legislature, without attempting to define its rights of compelling them to renounce them for a proper consideration, has merely suggested a very easy mode for getting over the difficulty. The railroad is authorized to purchase out the whole stock and franchise of the Bridge Company by paying the full value thereof. Those stockholders who did not choose to accept such terms, knew well the purpose and object of this transaction was to give to the Railroad Corporation the control of this claim to a monopoly, whatever might be its validity or extent without a destruction of the other corporate privileges and faculties.

An acquiescence for more than twenty years in the exercise of this right by the railroad will hardly leave room to question it now, even if a majority of the stockholders should be disposed to do so. But the parties now objecting do not seem absolutely to deny the right of the Railroad Company to have a bridge over the Passaic somewhere, provided it be built so as to suit the private interest of certain wharf owners. Their franchise to receive tolls and pass free on their own bridge, will not be impaired by the change." Nor is there any evidence that the value of the bridge stock will be in any manner affected thereby. When the Legislature has decided that the public interests require the change of location of the track of a railroad, or a bridge connected with it, a court cannot be called upon to enjoin such a change, because it will cause a depreciation of property adjoining it, nor can members of the Bridge Corporation in this case call for the intervention of the court to protect them against the acts of the majority of the corporators, unless for some abuse of power to the injury of the corporate privileges or property of the minority. It is no part of the corporate franchise of the proprietors, &c., that any of its stockholders who may chance to be wharf owners, shall wield their corporate privileges to enhance the value of their wharves.

This change of the position of the railroad bridge is authorized by law. It has the consent of the "proprietors" given in the manner pointed out by the law, under the seal of the Corporation. In giving this assent the Corporation was acting within the scope of its powers, and in a case where the will of the majority must necessarily govern when lawfully expressed. This is not a case where a majority of the stockholders are employing the common fund for the accomplishment of a purpose not within the scope of the institution. The majority must decide what is proper compensation for any real or suposed injury to their franchise of toll, which may result from the change of position of this railroad bridge.

If it be part of their franchise to license other bridges, such a franchise can only be exercised by the Corporation under their common seal, and at the will of a majority. But it is plain that another bridge erected without legislative authority might have been treated as a nuisance, for whatever may have been considered the nature of the supposed monopoly, neither the law nor their own lease, authorized them to build another bridge, or to give a valid license to others. The Legislature admits that it is bound by contract not to authorize another bridge; but on the principle of "volenti non fit injuria," they have directed the railroad to obtain the consent of the Corporation with which this contract was made; whether this covenant was made with them originally as partners or corporators, can make no difference in the case. In neither case can a single individual, by his negative vote, control the majority of the body, or compel it to give or refuse its consent, as may suit the interest of an individual or a minority.

This supposed franchise of forbidding the Legislature from licensing a bridge over these rivers, seems to have been a puzzle for the learned lawyers of the State for half a century past; and as it is claimed by a large number of highly respectable, influential and wealthy men, it has been treated with great reverence by the Legislature, and the more so, as the lawyers could not agree in defining what it was. Some have fancied it an incorporeal hereditament in each stockholder, which cannot be affected by the act of another, having the quality of a polypus; and though divided into one thousand parts or pieces, each one became a unit or a distinct whole; others have treated it as a right of common, in which "quilibet totum habet et nihil habet," an indivisible unit of which, if the man has not the whole, has nothing—and consequently a majority cannot dispose of it. But we do not think it necessary to search the lumber garret of obsolete law, in order to give a show of profound legal learning to an absurd conclusion. The provisos in the different Acts of the Legislature, which have been invoked as conferring their power of obstruction on each one of a thousand partners or stockholders, make no new grant of a power or franchise, and clearly refer to other valuable privileges, without being open to such misconstruction.

Having, then, such evidence of the consent of the Corporation as is required by law, we cannot say it is insufficient. The allegations in the bill, of irregularity or fraud in the election of the officers of the Corporation, and obtaining the Act giving such consent, even if sufficiently pleaded, have not yet been proved, and require no further notice.

I am of opinion, therefore, on this point of the case, that the complainants have shown no legal rights as stockholders of the Corporation of "proprietors," &c., to interfere and overrule the Act of Incorporation.

Nor have they alleged or shown such an improper use of the common property of the Corporation, or such deviation from its original purpose, or abuse of the trusts confided to it, as will entitle them to the interference of a court of equity.

III. The last and third question for consideration, is, whether the Railroad Company has, by any valid contract, covenanted or agreed with the complainants, or those under whom they claim as assignees, that the railroad bridge over the Passaic shall be forever fixed at Center Street, so that the Company cannot, even with the consent of the Legislature, and for its own and the public benefit, change the location of the bridge, shorten their road, and avoid difficult and dangerous curves.

As we have already seen, the question of the expediency or necessity for this change of route on the road, is not submitted to the decision or discretion of the court. If the Legislature has authorized it, the railroad has a right to protect, unless bound by contract to maintain its bridge where it at present stands.

The answer denies the existence of any such contract.

Assuming that a contract, which is to have the effect of forever restraining the improvement of this road at this point, can be proved by parol, those who aver it must be held to clear, consistent and undoubted evidence, as to the parties, the consideration, and the precise terms of such contract. Have we such proof?

Without wishing to make any remarks which may appear offensive to any of the highly respectable witnesses who have given such contradictory accounts of the transaction, it is too plain to be overlooked, that much of this conflict arises from the examination of persons as witnesses who are the real parties in interest.

The transfer made post litem motam in order to constitute the complainant a party to the suit, is a veil too transparent to conceal the real parties to the litigation.

But waiving this objection to the testimony of certain witnesses, as also any invidious comparison of the credibility of very respectable men, I must say that there is not such clear evidence of a contract, its consideration, its parties, or its terms, as would justify a court in decreeing its specific execution.

It appears that originally the Railroad Company had purchased the commercial dock property, with the view of erecting its bridge there. As the Town of Newark was then built, the railroad would pass along its lower boundary. At this time railroads were an untried experiment. It was a popular notion that it would be of great advantage to a town or city to have a railroad pass through its most frequented streets—that it would advance the value of property on the streets through which it passed, and increase their commerce; and that curves in a railroad were preferable to straight lines, being much more graceful and no less useful.

From the prevalence of these notions, the popular feeling became much excited; and the more so, that certain individuals of wealth and influence, who owned wharves on the river, had shrewdly discovered that it would add considerably to the value of their property if the railroad, instead of crossing below it, could be bent round behind it, and crossing above, create an obstruction to the navigation of the river above their wharves. Public meetings were held, exhorting, entreating and advising the railroad directors. Suits were brought by lot owners in the name of the Attorney-General, threatening them with injunctions. Some wanted one thing, some another, and the result is, perhaps, best described in the graphic language of one of the witnesses:

"I can only say, that according to my recollection now, there was much confusion and conflict of wishes among all the parties, and I don't know how many parties I could count up. I know there were sharp speeches and feelings exhibited, as much so as upon anything I ever saw in this town, and to my view at the present moment, they were like two dogs that had been quarreling, until they had got tired and left off, and there was a sort of common consent to abandon the conflict, and not to keep the progress of the work from going on, by a general assent of making the bridge where it is now. The location of the bridge was the result, but that there was any contract or agreement that was to be final and conclusive and not to be revoked, I know no such arrangement as that. There was a cessation of the conflict, and the work went on."

The directors, desirous of conciliating the people of Newark, and expediting the completion of their road, yielded to the pressure, and passed the following resolution, which had the effect of allaying the excitement. It is dated on the 24th of September, 1834, and is as follows:

"Whereas, considerable diversity of opinion has prevailed among the citizens of Newark relative to the location of the railroad bridge across the Passaic River, and the location mentioned in the annexed resolution having been agreed upon as a mutual accommodation of conflicting interests, and with a view to the settlement of all matters of controversy; now, therefore, be it,

"Resolved, unanimously, that the railroad bridge be located across the Passaic River at the north end of the dock owned by Moses Dodd, with a draw of forty-five feet in width, provided that the right of way from the western termination of said bridge, to the entrance of the avenue on Market Street can be obtained on reasonable terms, and provided also that the owners of the property on the above mentioned part of the route of the railroad shall agree that the Company may use any moving power thereon which they shall deem proper."

And on the 26th of December, the following resolution was passed:

"Whereas, it is desirable that the bridge across the Passaic River be definitively located; and whereas, further delay in order that all difficulties may be removed, is not deemed expedient, therefore—

"Resolved, that the bridge across the Passaic River be, and the same is hereby definitely located, immediately north of the dock lately owned by Moses Dodd."

These resolutions of the Board, for the purpose of proposing an accommodation of conflicting interests and putting an end to controversy, seem to have brought the dispute to a close, and received general acquiescence. But these documents exhibit no contract, binding the Corporation never to change the location of the bridge under any change of circumstances. They, accordingly, retained the commercial dock property, which was originally purchased for the purpose of a bridge. This proposition and resolution of the Board was for the sake of peace. Those without had conflicting interests—they were bound to no conditions; they gave no consideration, except "ceasing to quarrel when they got tired." Even the parties who had brought suits to frighten the directors were not bound to withdraw themselves. The directors exercised their own discretion under the circumstances. But time, which changes all things, has produced a great change in the circumstances. Newark has become a great city. Locomotives moving at a velocity of forty miles an hour, which were then considered the dream of the projector, are now established facts. Curves have given way to straight lines, and the notion that railroad cars, darting through the most frequented streets of a city, are either a convenience or a benefit, has become obsolete. The conflicting interests which inexperience and ignorance had originally produced, need no longer to be propitiated for the sake of peace. The people of Newark no longer object to having the bridge located where it was originally intended to place it, and the people of New Jersey, by their Legislature, have determined that it would be beneficial to the public to have the old bridge, with its narrow and troublesome draws, taken away, a new one erected below, with larger and better draws, and that the railroad should pass through the city by the shortest route—by a straight line, and not with short curves.

The complainants have shown no contract made by themselves with the Railroad Company, nor have they shown any covenants running with the land, on which they as assignees are entitled to a remedy at law, or relief in equity.

Having thus disposed of the three great points so ably discussed by the learned counsel, the minor issues of fact or law have become immaterial, and need no further notice.

Let a decree be entered in each of these cases, dismissing the bill, with costs.

Per Curiam, R. C. Grier, Circuit Judge.

Judgment of the Circuit Court, dismissing complainant's bills, affirmed in the Supreme Court of necessity, the court being equally divided.

Ins. Co. v. Mordecai, 329
6. The insurance was upon the freight of each successive voyage, and is to be applied to the freight at risk at any time, whether on the outward or homeward voyage, to the amount of the valuation.
Idem. 329
7. Where a number of special partners are incorporated to carry on the business of insurance, the stock subscribed and owned by the several partners constitutes the capital publicly pledged to all who deal with it.
Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 349
8. Where an insurance company did not require its stockholders to pay in cash more than ten per cent. of its several shares, the ninety per cent. retained by the stockholders is as much a part of the capital pledged as the cash actually paid in.
Idem. 349
9. When that portion of the capital represented by these securities is required to pay the creditors of the Company, the stockholders cannot refuse the payment of them, unless they show such an equity as would entitle them to a preference over the creditors, if the capital had been paid in cash.
Idem. 349
10. An open or running policy, is one to insure goods shipped at a distant port when it is impossible to be advised of the particular ship upon which the goods are laden, and it cannot be named in the policy.
Orient. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 529
Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 529
11. The party insured can insure the cargo "on board ship or ships," on condition of declaring the ship upon the policy and giving notice to the underwriter as soon as known, and, if possible, before the loss of the ship on board of which the goods have been laden.
Idem. 524
12. The underwriter agrees that the policy shall attach, if the vessel be seaworthy, however low may be her relative capacity to perform the voyage.
Idem. 524
13. The ship must be seaworthy, or the policy will not attach; but the degrees of seaworthiness are various; and the rates of premiums are varied by the underwriters according to the character and qualities of the vessels to which they relate.
Idem. 524
14. The principles of law and rules of construction governing policies of this description, stated.
Idem. 524
15. Where the parties agree, that in respect to vessels rating lower than A 2, the premiums on the risks shall be fixed at the time they are declared or reported; and when thus fixed, and the premiums paid or secured, the policy attaches upon the goods from the time they are laden on board the vessel.
Idem. 524
16. The mere declaration of the ship on board of which the goods are laden, is not sufficient to complete the contract; the insured must pay or secure the additional premium, at the time of the declaration of the risk.
Idem. 524
17. Where the vessel declared or reported by the assured was rated below A 2, and the Company had reserved the right to fix the additional premium; and unless assented to by the assured and the premium paid or secured, the contract of insurance, in respect to the particular shipment did not become binding; held, that the premiums were to be settled when the risks were reported, not at any other period.
Idem. 524
18. Where the plaintiff objected to the premium, and the Company, in answer to this, respond, that it had reserved the right in the policy to fix the premium in the case of vessels rating below A 2, and that it could not consent to its determination by a third person; held, that there was no waiver of this right of fixing the premium on the part of the Company.
